He heard the sound of a van and watched as Dutch's van came to a park. They came in in a whirlwind, waking Johnny up and dragged them to the beach. They played beach volleyball and built sandcastles, which Daniel didn't think he could get competitive about but he did.

They spent the night at Mr. Miyagi's, Jimmy grilling so they could eat in the garden.

On Monday a package arrived.

Another mystery box.

This one was postmarked from Okinawa.

Daniel just knew there was something in there for Johnny from Chozen.

Who had even told Chozen when Johnny's birthday was?

How had he known?

Maybe Mr. Miyagi had told Yukie and she'd told him?

Could Daniel go a single month without hearing from Chozen?

Was the Pacific Ocean just not big enough?

What had Chozen bought Johnny?

Would Johnny like it more than his gift?

He couldn't right?

Daniel knew Johnny better. His gift had to have be the better one.

But Chozen had money...right? Sato hadn't fully cut him off. Making him one of the richest guys on the island. Sort of. At least in the village.

He kind of wanted to burn it. But there might be things from Yukieand Kumiko in there.

And maybe it'd be nothing.

Another book.

He wouldn't do it.

He was dying to know what was in it.

It wasn't like they would know if Johnny opened it early.

Besides, wasn't it his birthday over there anyway? Due to the time difference?

Tommy had caught him staring at the box. The guys had taken a couple of days of classes off, saying that it wasn't a problem.

They'd leave Tuesday morning before Ms. Lawrence came to get Johnny for their lunch.

"What is it?"

"Package from Okinawa for Johnny."

"Oh cool. Wait, why do you look like you hate it?"

"It's probably something from Chozen."

"Why would Chozen send something? Is it part of his penance?" Tommy asked with a laugh, walking past to pour himself some tea out of the pitcher in the fridge and coming back.

"No, it's because he likes Johnny."

Tommy stared at him for a moment.

Daniel could see the gears going.

"Oh," Tommy said, then laughed into his glass. "You know Johnny probably doesn't know."

Daniel sighed. "I know that."

"So why are you upset?"

"Because Chozen is flirting with my boyfriend. I won the match to the death. I thought that meant I'd win space. Space from Chozen, but it seems instead I won him no longer wanting to kill me, but instead trying to steal my boyfriend."

Tommy smiled softly. "Your life is sure full of adventure. I think if someone had come up to me last year and told me anything about your life now with Johnny I would not have believed it."

Daniel looked at him, relaxing a little. "Yeah, me either."

When Johnny got up he didn't want to open it yet. Saving it for his actual birthday. And the guys had plans, so Daniel didn't have a chance to try and persuade him.

The guys refused to tell them where they were going.

Dutch driving the van only said, "Somewhere Johnny's going to love."

Daniel tried to think of where. sitting in the backseat next to Johnny.

He'd taken the day off from working in the shop, under the promise the guys would come up and help on another day.

Dutch said he would, reminding Daniel he'd helped sort dirt. That he already was working for free.

Daniel promised to make him dinner sometime.

Food seemed an easy reward for the guys.

They parked and Daniel looked around for a clue.

"Johnny do you have a clue where we are?"

"I think so," Johnny said.

"So part of your birthday gift," Bobby said. "Is that we bought you a membership, so you can come whenever you want."

"What is it?" Daniel asked.

"Three in one," Jimmy said with a smile.

"Yeah, sorry Daniel you might find him here instead of the beach," Dutch said amused. "Or your bed."

"Welcome to the Huntington Library, art museum, and botanical gardens," Tommy said as they headed down the path towards a large building.

"You may want to bring Mr. Miyagi, they've got bonsai and a Japanese garden with a tea house," Bobby said.

"We wanted to invite him but he didn't want to take the day off from working in the shop."

Daniel nodded, he'd asked if Mr. Miyagi wanted Daniel to come in and Mr. Miyagi had shaken his head and told him to have fun.

He felt bad.

But it'd be good to see other designs and to be able to tell Mr. Miyagi about it later.

It was kind of like work. Research.

Which according to the guys was accurate. They started in the library, walking through the exhibition hall looking at original manuscripts of books

Daniel hadn't heard of many of them.

Johnny though moved slow, studying the books on display. When he was done looking they walked around the library for a bit, quietly as people were studying, and researching, before heading into the art gallery.

Daniel knew the art galleries in New York and New Jersey. But he hadn't been to a lot of them in LA.

It was nice to walk around a gallery again.

To see new things.

Though he would rather be in the gardens. It seemed like the guys were thinking the same thing, trying to just give Johnny a taste, so he could come back and explore later. Pulling them along and to the gardens after a short half-hour in the gallery.

They headed to the conservatory looking at orchids and listened as a worker explained how one of the plants, a type of orchid, and the beans from it became what was used to make vanilla. Daniel hadn't ever seen it up close. Bobby telling him that they infused the beans in vodka to make their own extract at the bakery.

They wandered through the gardens, stopping for tea at the Japanese tea house, looking at bonsai, trees, and flowers until Daniel's feet were tired from all the walking. Until all the plants started to blur together.

Tuesday morning Daniel got up early.

Their room was still full of the guys and he was ready to have the room back to themselves again.

He still wanted to know what was in the box.

Wanted time alone with Johnny.

He had wanted to wake up with him with his hands all over him, but the guys were there.

He learned his lesson last time.

So he got up and made pancakes.

Chocolate chip with banana.

He was pretty proud of the idea and how they turned out, when Johnny and the guys came out.

He set them out on plates for them with an exaggerated flourish and a big grin on his face.

"What's this?" Dutch asked.

"I'm thinking I'm going to call them Bananarama."

"Like the girl band?"

"Yes," Daniel said.

"It's good," Johnny said with a smile after trying them.

Mr. Miyagi same and had some, complimenting him on his cooking before heading to the shop. The guys left shortly after, hugging them tight and wishing Johnny a happy birthday before heading out.

"You gonna open the box?" Daniel asked.

Johnny turned to him and went to grab it. He moved it carefully to the counter, standing next to it with a pair of scissors.

Daniel moved in close, he knew nothing was going to jump out and attack, but he still wanted to be close.

Daniel didn't want to look.

He had to look.

He had to know what Chozen had sent.

But he also didn't want to know. What if it was better than his gift?

Couldn't be. Could it?

He was going to do something he wanted to for a while, and hopefully, it'd be fine. It'd calm him down. It'd get him through whatever awful thing Chozen had sent.

Daniel slid his hand into the back pocket of Johnny's jeans.

Johnny stiffened and his gaze flicked to Daniel just for a brief moment, Daniel smiled at him. He wasn't moving, he was staying put.

Johnny hadn't pulled away or swatted at his hand, so his hand was staying there.

Johnny blushed but turned back to open the box.

He pulled out an envelope and set it aside.

There was a box in thick fancy fabric with colorful paper folded on top.

Johnny carefully opened it, careful of the paper and unwrapping the patterned cloth with white flowers and two cranes.

He set it aside to find a wooden box. He lifted up the lid and found a sake set.

"You didn't turn 21," Daniel said with a laugh. "Can they drink earlier in Japan?"

"Yes, but it's 20. Not 18." Johnny said. "It's pretty though."

Daniel had to agree, but he didn't get it.

The next thing Johnny pulled out was also wrapped in cloth, but softer. Another box.

There was a little note, it was from Yukie, wishing Johnny a happy birthday.

Daniel relaxed watching as Johnny opened the box. There was a recipe on top. Instructions with pictures on how to make a sweetened iced matcha drink.

It was all of the stuff Kumiko had used during their matcha lesson including a fancy and beautiful container of matcha. Daniel laughed softly.

"Maybe you'll like it this time," he said.

"I think that's why she sent the instructions," he said.

"What else is in there?" Daniel asked.

Johnny pulled out a card and flipped it open. It was from Kumiko. He read it then passed it to Daniel.

She'd drawn in it. Wished him a happy birthday, said she sent him gifts from Tokyo. Snacks and a Fuurin.

"What's a Fuurin?" Daniel asked.

Johnny was carefully opening a box that had been wrapped in bubble wrap. He carefully pulled out a glass cup with a bead and string, hand-painted with flowers and a piece of thick paper. There was a string at the top and Johnny held it carefully. It made a soft sound as he held it up.

"A wind chime?" Johnny asked.

"I guess so," Daniel said looking around. "How about there?" he asked pointing to a spot near their room.

Johnny nodded putting it back in the box.

"Says here Yukie also sent charms?"

Johnny opened the other envelope that he hadn't earlier and tipped it.

Small cloth satchels fell into his palm along with a letter in annoying handwriting.

Yakuyoke for Daniel.

There was a little sketch.

Johnny picked it out and handed it to Daniel.

ward off evil.

"I don't think it's working," Daniel said with a frown.

Shobai-hanjo for Miyagi, good luck in business.

Johnny set that one aside for Mr. Miyagi.

Shiawase for Johnny, happiness

Johnny held it gently in his hands.

Daniel frowned looking at the paper. Something had been scratched out. Like Chozen had wanted to write something else but had to change it. He studied the characters between the two. They matched. So Johnny had gotten the happiness one.

But the one that was marked out said En-musubi. There was nothing that said En-musubi.

Daniel frowned then looked back at the card from Kumiko. "Snacks are next."

Johnny nodded opening up the next box which was filled with tiny colorful candies. Flowers and little stars and what looked like a small cake.

"What's that?" Johnny asked leaning over to read the card over Daniel's shoulder again.

"Cheesecake?" Daniel said looking at it. "Apparently Japan has its own style, so she found it in Tokyo and they promised it'd be good when it arrived. So essentially she sent you lots of sugar."

Johnny laughed, pointing at the bottom of the card.

Hope your birthday is the sweetest. -Kumiko

"Too bad the guys already left could've gotten help," Johnny said.

"Well Mr. Miyagi will help tonight I'm sure. Though I guess I'm not going to be making you a cake," Daniel said with a sigh.

Johnny looked at him in surprise.

"You were going to bake me a cake?"

"Well yeah. Either I was or Mr. Miyagi was. He made mine last year. It was nice. But we'd be drowning in cake, we're already drowning in candy between my Nonnio, Kumiko, and Abuela you've made out better than any kid has for Halloween in their life. I've never seen someone get so much candy for their birthday."

"Maybe I'm just that sweet," Johnny said with a teasing smile.

No one was home. Mr. Miyagi was at the shop. The guys had left to go back to school and Dutch to his class.

If he let Johnny tease too much he'd be insufferable, he'd run off, Daniel would give chase, nothing would happen because by the time Daniel caught him Ms. Lawrence would arrive to take Johnny out for lunch.

But if he moved now. If he kept him caught then maybe he could get things moving and he wouldn't spend hours frustrated. All day daydreaming about how if he'd moved faster, if he'd done something different what could've been.

But if he struck now...

Daniel set the card down and turned, putting his hand on Johnny's cheek pulling him down to a kiss. A deep kiss. He did taste sweet and warm. Mostly the sweet syrup from the pancakes still lingering on his tongue.

Johnny kissed him back, meeting him with the same intensity.

Daniel moved his other hand out of Johnny's pocket and to his waist, turning them, so Johnny's back was to counter, breakable items out of the way.

No escape. No running. Pressing closer, flush against Johnny.

Johnny's arms came around him, holding him close. Hands on Daniel's back.

Daniel moved his hand from Johnny's hip to under his soft t-shirt, pulling it up. He pulled away just enough to move to Johnny's neck, lips to his neck, and fingers touching warm skin.

"Maybe a little sweet," he whispered, teasing, liking the way Johnny shivered against him, the easy way he was able to get a leg between Johnny's. How Johnny seemed to get a little weak and how his hand had to come back to the edge of the counter for stability as Daniel ground against him, making a point, hearing the sound fall from his lips and feeling how Johnny's body responded.

He glanced at the clock over Johnny's shoulder. Double-checking they had time. Two hours before Ms. Lawrence was supposed to get there. They had time for something at least. More than last time.

Daniel was trying to get Johnny's shirt off but Johnny's hands came to his wrists, pulling away. Or trying. Daniel hadn't given him much space, but Daniel paused looking at him.

"Our room," Johnny managed, blue eyes dark, breathing heavy.

Daniel blinked at him. Stepped back carefully. Johnny walked ahead of him, taking his hand and pulling him to their room, shutting the door behind them.

Daniel looked around.

Bed. Bed right?

He started to walk towards the bed and Johnny let go of his hand.

He turned with a frown, about to ask, only to see Johnny taking off his shirt.

Daniel's mouth went dry.

Less than five feet to the bed. A couple of steps.

He had seen Johnny shirtless, but there was something heavier in the air, something about knowing Johnny was taking off his shirt for

Daniel, because of Daniel that threw him off a little.

Johnny walked back to him and leaned down to kiss him, cupping Daniel's face in his hands. Daniel dragged his fingers down Johnny's back, hands going into his back pockets, grinning at the surprised sound Johnny made when he squeezed.

Bed. Move to the bed. Remember the goal. The plan. As haphazardly put together as it was.

He let go and pulled away.

Maybe he could be competitive.

Something more so than Johnny.

He took off his shirt, moving slow, knowing Johnny was watching, stepping back towards the bed.

A challenge, a dare.

He added his jeans to the pile on the floor, less graceful than he'd hoped, but he'd work on it. He smiled at Johnny. As much as he wanted to unwrap Johnny like a present, he also wanted to see him do it on his own. He'd like to watch him take off his shirt. Wanted more.

"Your turn," Daniel said.

Johnny wasn't graceful either, which was a relief. Maybe it was just the way jeans were.

He pulled Johnny towards him, turning so he was facing him, back to the bed, twisting on his heel, turning, a swift move of his other foot, catching behind Johnny's with a push so that he landed on the bed.

It was almost perfect, but Johnny read him, saw what he was doing and with an amused look, he pulled Daniel with him so they collapsed in a heap on the bed.

He'd wanted to take a moment to enjoy a simple image of Johnny mostly almost completely undressed in his bed looking up at him with those eyes on him. That look that was so heated, not the way it'd once been heated, but in such a better way. It still got his heart pounding but it was different, pleasant, and also sent blood the wrong way. The right way maybe. But Johnny was laughing softly, pleased at having caught Daniel off guard.

Daniel pushed himself up.

Johnny following him, leaning against one arm while his other hand went to the back of Daniel's head, fingers in his hair, pulling him into a kiss again.

There was a limit it seemed to distance, every time one moved a couple of steps back the other followed.

A theme since the start. Balancing on opposite ends, unable to escape the other, when the other got too far they'd find one another and it'd led to blows, but now it led to something better, the space dwindling, the walls breaking down, until it was just the two of them, unable to keep their hands and lips off one another. Reaching for the other whenever they moved, Johnny's fingers in Daniel's hair, gentle and soft as Daniel explored the skin beneath him.

Johnny curled up towards him, like he wasn't sure what to do, like he wanted to do something, when Daniel glanced up at him, watching, but there wasn't much for Johnny to do, with Daniel sinking lower, pretty pleased with the red marks he'd left along the way.

He stopped at Johnny's hip, Daniel wanted to see everything, and if Johnny stayed like that, looking down at him he could.

That unwavering eye contact.

He wondered which of them would lose the intense staring contest they were having.

He pulled the last of the fabric down when Johnny didn't seem inclined to stop him, his face was flushed, all red and pink, lips parted as he breathed heavily.

Daniel was going to watch him, every reaction to his mouth on him, over him, around him.

Johnny's held his gaze as long as he could, a valiant effort and then he let his head fall back with a sound that reverberated down Daniel's spine. He watched as Johnny's hands tightened around the bedding like he needed to be holding something.

Daniel wanted to kiss him, see his face again, and not just that exposed throat.

He could.

He would.

Wiggling out of the last of his own clothes to press close to Johnny.

Johnny's head came back up, eyes on him, not letting Daniel be quick enough to kiss his neck like he'd wanted but the roll of Johnny's hips was enough.

There was more they could do, but he wanted that to be different, to take their time. In his head that was a whole night, a whole day, with no plans on the horizon, but this, moving against each other was pleasant, with Johnny's eyes back on him, kissing him, feeling Johnny shift so he was propped up on one arm, the other on Daniel's hip, trying to adjust for better friction, for more skin to touch, following the moves Daniel made like he was studying, learning, memorizing Daniel the way Daniel tried to memorize Johnny.

If Daniel could go back in time he'd tell himself not to go to the beach that night. Befriend the old guy in the workshop and learn kata from him, learn karate, and don't try to date Ali. Try to date the other hot blonde at school. The one who looked like he was a little rough on the outside, with the intimidating friends, but it was all on the outside, that it was nice under that surface. Because if he'd moved faster, better, then he could have had Johnny moaning under him and into kisses earlier and fewer bruises.

Definitely, none on his heart because once he gave it to Johnny he handled that like he'd been given something made out of the most fragile glass and held it so carefully.

More careful than Daniel probably was with Johnny. Hand squeezing a pec enjoying every sound Johnny made, knowing he wasn't quiet himself. Glad no one else was home.

Things probably had to happen the way they had for Johnny to be out from under Kreese's thumb and Sid's shadow, but Daniel could daydream.

A world where LA welcomed him with open arms from the start, where he made friends and the soccer team and road on the back of Johnny's bike to school, talking Johnny into coming to his soccer matches, kissing under the bleachers, going to parties, maybe being one of those couples that disappeared into one of the guest bedrooms for a couple of hours, leaving awkward and disheveled, obvious when caught. Passing notes in class. Dancing together in his shower costume with Johnny at the Halloween dance. Hidden away together.

But even if that would've been nice. Not to have hurt his knee, not to have gotten beaten on Halloween, chased, and run off the road, he had Johnny now. Melting into the bed, boneless and looking at Daniel with those blue eyes, it didn't matter, as long as he had this, leaning down to press his forehead against Johnny's.

A guy who his grandparents liked enough to already accept as family after one meeting, who spent all of his money that he had on Daniel and their sensei, a guy who was so awful at telling people liked him that he hadn't noticed Chozen's affections, or the way people looked at him when they were out, hadn't noticed the girls who flirted. Who'd taken time to craft an arrangement for Daniel's father, who'd held his hand and listened to him talk, who listened to every word, who worked out to do something Daniel had said partially as a joke and then had done it in a photoshoot, who had looked at him so warmly now, like he felt the same. As his breathing slowed as Daniel's calmed down to match him, laying on him heavily but not uncomfortably yet. Arms coming around Daniel's waist, holding him.

As long as he ended up here, with Johnny, the path didn't matter.

Chapter End Notes

> En-musubi (you get 1 for wanting a relationship, 2 to protect a relationship) Chozen tried to send just one and Yukie and Sato nixed it. Because the three of them went together to get the charms to send and Sato was like ah, hoping for a relationship? Good luck nephew. But then when he tried to send it they were like no no no. You can only send two, not one if you want to send it to Johnny. Because he's in a happy relationship. They thought it was an innocent mistake. So Chozen's had to keep it and had to swap it for a general happiness one. They did however miss the other thing he sent. Like the sake cup is fine, they thought that was cool, but again kind of weird because Johnny's not turning 20.
>
> Chozen sent the sake cups because of Sankon No Gi which is a ceremony where you drink sake together, usually for weddings to welcome your S/O into the family, and sometimes to join the mafia (yakuza, which kind of fits Chozen), but it essentially is a ceremony to become part of the family. Like next time we see each other we drink as family. They also missed the specific cloth Chozen used because he'd already wrapped it. It's an obi, which is a type of kimono belt kind of the white flowers are bellflowers (love) and cranes (marriage). And the paper is noshi, a type of decorative origami for gifts. Essentially the flirt went up to 1000%. So even though Daniel is like I don't know what this is but I'm suspicious, he's right lol.

The stars are Konpeitō, the flowers are wasanbon. I wanted Kumiko to send Tokyo Banana but it wasn't invented until 1991 so I went with the cheesecake which can be found everywhere.

I also did not mean for Johnny's birthday to be like three chapters, but well whoops.

Thieves in the Night

His mother wanted to know what Johnny had gotten from Mr. Miyagi for his birthday. They were at her house eating dinner. It'd been a couple of weeks since his birthday, rolling into September. His birthday lunch had been mostly talking about the library and the package from Okinawa. He hadn't gotten his gift from Mr. Miyagi at that point. And she'd been busy since.

She had ordered take out and they sat at the tiny kitchen table she got.

"A hachimaki," Johnny said.

She thought for a moment, knowing the word and trying to place it.

"Ah!" she said when she remembered. "The headband right? For karate?"

"Yeah," he said warmly.

It really had been a good birthday. He'd never celebrated so much.

He was a little embarrassed by all the attention he'd gotten. Of having all the focus on him. It had been nice.

They'd eaten dinner together, Daniel had cooked and they put candles in the cheesecake even though Johnny had protested because he'd already done that, but he'd blown them out and they'd eaten the cheesecake with Mr. Miyagi who had helped him find a good spot to hang up the windchime and had given him the hachimaki.

Mr. Miyagi had also accepted the charm with a warm smile on his face putting it in his wallet to take to the shop.

It had been a peaceful couple of weeks and a nice day with his mom.

They'd worked out the garden. He'd spent most of the afternoon helping her plant flowers, shrubs, and decorative grasses. Telling her that the shop was expected to open soon and that they might actually be ready sooner.

Mr. Miyagi was leaving all the bonsai at home and it was a small army of tiny trees, he liked looking at all of them, carrying his own over from time to time to see how it looked amongst the crowd, able to pick his out instantly. But he never left it there.

He'd noticed she'd circled the opening date on the calendar.

He also told her about Dutch's taekwondo tournament, explained the differences, invited her.

"Is he fighting or doing tricks?" she asked.

"Fighting I think," Johnny said.

He wasn't sure. Dutch had been talking about the boards he could break. Three in one go now. But Dutch also made it sound like the tournament was like the All-Valley. A lot of fighting.

She sighed.

"I'd like to, but those boys are important to me. I can't sit and watch Dutch get hit. I know myself too much. I'd get up and yell at the ref and have to be escorted out."

Johnny snorted at the mental image. Of some opponent getting a hit in, not even a good hit, and his mother shouting from the stands. He knew she didn't like to see him get hurt. But the fact it spilled out to his friends was kind of sweet.

They ate ice cream in front of the TV, watching a movie she'd rented and it was so nice.

Peaceful.

Johnny kissed her on the cheek and left to get the Avanti.

It was a Friday night.

The guys were supposed to be coming over.

He was looking forward to seeing them. He wanted to tell Dutch that his mother would come if he promised he wouldn't get hurt or hit. Otherwise, his mother was going to climb down out of the stands and chew out the ref for letting anyone touch him.

Dutch would be delighted.

He pulled into Mr. Miyagi's lot and parked the Avanti.

The guy's cars were there, the lights were on.

The truck wasn't there which meant Daniel and Mr. Miyagi were still at the shop.

Johnny hopped out of the Avanti then stopped.

There were a lot of footprints in the dirt. It was all scuffled up.

"Guys?" Johnny called, running towards the door.

There was blood in the dirt.

Blood on the door.

Blood on the floor as he pushed open the doors.

He hurried through the house looking for them, then spotted them laying down in the kitchen bruised and battered.

"Yo, Johnny welcome home!" Jimmy called with a lazy wave of his hand holding an ice pack to his eye.

"What the hell happened?" Johnny asked voice tight.

"We met Mike Barnes," Tommy said.

"And his two friends," Bobby added.

Johnny rushed to get the first aid kit.

The green stuff that had been used on him when he was hurt.

He sunk down next to them, frantically looking them over, trying to assess the damage.

"Nothing's broken," Bobby said as Johnny helped him sit up. "Except maybe my pride. I've gotten a little rusty."

"We got here and they were trying to make off with the bonsai. Don't worry, all the bonsai are fine, we scared them off and beat their asses, or at least got some good licks in," Jimmy said as Johnny looked carefully at his eye.

It was just going to be a nasty bruise, but nothing worse.

He set about cleaning cuts and scrapes, bandaging them up, feeling for fractured ribs while they talked about the fight, about the tournament letter left behind.

"Fucking bold as shit to come into someone's home and try to steal their stuff for a stupid fucking tournament," Bobby said hissing as Johnny cleaned the cuts on his hands, the broken skin from all the punches landed.

"Inane," Tommy said.

"Thank you Mr. SAT questions," Jimmy said rolling his eyes.

Johnny heard the sound of the truck and heard the door open.

"In here," Johnny called.

"Got room for some more?" Dutch asked.

Johnny turned to look at them wide-eyed at his tone.

Dutch had Daniel under one arm, carefully helping him in.

Mr. Miyagi following with them.

Daniel's left arm was covered in blood.

"His arm went through a window," Dutch said. "Really getting sick of this Mike Barnes. I went by the shop to chat and drop off the Down Stairs club tickets for Jessica's going away party and she brought dinner and then the next thing we knew the guy and his goons descended on us. Bastard kicked Jessica in the stomach. She's home safe and sound with instructions to take care of the bruise and we told her how to check her ribs, but man, what a fucking piece of shit."

"Are you okay?" Daniel asked studying Johnny, worried.

"I got home after the fact," Johnny said. "I'm fine."

He carefully looked at Daniel's arm. There were still bits of glass. Jimmy was explaining what had happened to Mr. Miyagi.

"How the hell do they know where you live?" Tommy asked with a frown as Dutch sat down on Johnny's other side.

"Boys okay?" Mr. Miyagi asked tone worried, looking them over.

"Yeah, we're okay Mr. Miyagi. And we protected your bonsai. They tried to steal them. But hey, double-check they didn't sneak off with any of them. It was dark. I think we got them all but check and let us know," Bobby said.

"I got their plates," Tommy said bitterly. "So we'll call the police if anything is missing."

"Hai," Mr. Miyagi said. "Thank you."

He walked off to go count the bonsai after confirming Johnny had it handled.

"Shouldn't we call the police anyway?" Daniel asked wincing as Johnny carefully plucked pieces out of his skin setting them in a bowl, cleaning the wounds, and studying them trying to decide if Daniel would need stitches.

It looked so far that it would be okay.

"Police are shit about this kind of thing. Unless we've got more evidence."

"Isn't all this evidence?" Daniel asked motioning at them all.

"Yeah, you'd think," Jimmy said. "But you walk into the station and tell them there's some karate feud happening and they'll just laugh."

"Honestly we already tried to see if we could get you a restraining order but it didn't go through," Bobby said softly.

"Seriously?" Dutch asked eyes wide.

Mr. Miyagi came back and turned on the kettle to make tea.

Johnny finished up Daniel's arm.

He poured them all cups of tea and then took the green powder and made a paste, working through the group, chuckling at the response to the smell. Patting them on the shoulder or arms.

"Help heal," he said.

Between the two of them, all five were bandaged up and slathered in goop.

"All bonsai accounted for?" Johnny asked.

"Hai," Mr. Miyagi said. "All safe. Thanks to boys."

"What are we going to do?" Daniel asked. "They'll come back unless I sign the damn paperwork. What if it's worse next time? The shop is trashed and we're supposed to open soon. They're not going to stop until I sign the tournament paperwork."

"Maybe you just have to sign the paperwork," Jimmy said.

"But he can't," Dutch said with a frown.

"Yeah, but they don't know that right?"

"No, but-"

"So sign the paperwork, show up and when you get there show your ID. The guy at the front will be like whoopsie, you can't actually compete. And you can go aw man, I tried. Just you know shrug at Mike Barnes and be like I did what you wanted it's out of my hands. It's a loophole, exploit it."

"But what if I have to still fight? If that doesn't work? I'm not strong enough to take them."

"You'll have to train," Bobby said.

"Mr. Miyagi? Will you train me?"

"Kata, hai, but not for tournament," Mr. Miyagi said.

"It's fine," Dutch said.

"How's it fine? I can't compete without a sensei."

"We'll start training. Jessica and I have been going for morning runs at like 5 am, come with us. I can spar with you some days and on the weekends the guys can spar with you, right?" Dutch asked.

"Yeah, I need to get back in fighting shape anyway, that was, eye-opening," Bobby said with a frown. "My dreams of being an ass-kicking pastor kind of went up in smoke tonight. I liked that dream."

"When your arm heals, another good workout might be to go rock climbing with Jessica," Johnny said. "She was telling me how much she loves it."

"It sounds like Jessica is going to train me," Daniel said with a laugh. "She might not ever want to see me again after tonight."

Daniel's cheek was red, it'd bruise.

Johnny got up to get him an ice pack.

"I doubt that. Besides she goes like at least once a week to go climbing. Invited me to go with her. I'm sure it extends to you too."

"You think, huh?" Daniel asked, eyes following Johnny.

Johnny returned with his ice pack gently holding it to Daniel's cheek.

"Yes. It's how she likes to spend her weekends. She told me the more the merrier."

Daniel's hand came up over Johnny's, warm to the opposite of the cold of the ice pack.

Johnny hated that they were all hurt.

Hoped that they got good hits in, burnt Barnes and his friends so that they'd think twice before coming back again.

Maybe he should also go back to training. Just in case.

He hadn't had a chance to spar much, he'd been mostly doing kata which was a good workout, and so was lifting bales of hay for the horses and cows at the sanctuary, and carrying children off to bed, but it wasn't the same.

Maybe he'd join them for their runs...

5 am.

He liked sleeping in.

Running at 5am meant getting up at 4am at least.

He didn't want to do that. He used to do that all the time.

But now he liked sleeping in. He liked sleeping. Now that it wasn't littered with nightmares. Now that he woke up to Daniel playing with his hair or his soft breath against him.

The phone rang.

Mr. Miyagi's hands were full. He was making dinner now, food for all the guys.

Johnny carefully transferred the ice pack into Daniel's hands and got up to get the phone.

"Miyagi residence," he said.

"Johnny! How have you been! Did you have a good birthday?" Mrs. LaRusso asked.

"Yes, Mrs. LaRusso," Johnny said turning to look at Daniel to see if he wanted to talk to his Mom. "I got my gifts, thank you. I think we're going to make a pie this weekend. And please thank um Nonnio and Nonnia for me as well."

Daniel was looking at him, getting up carefully, a little wobblily, hissing as he tried to push himself up with the injured side.

Mrs. LaRusso had launched into telling him about an orchard the family-owned and about her award-winning pies.

He bit the inside of his cheek to stop himself from saying something to Daniel, a gentle reminder to be careful, he didn't want to worry Mrs. LaRusso.

It was up to Daniel if he wanted to tell her.

Daniel leaned his uninjured side against the wall holding out his hand.

Johnny waited for her to take a breath, which was a daunting task. Fingers curling in the phone cord, waiting for a moment between peach season and cousins to tell her Daniel was there. It took longer than he wanted, but he jumped when she stopped for a breath, telling her, "it sounds like fun, and here's Daniel Mrs. LaRusso. I'll talk to you later."

He handed the phone over with escaped back to the table.

Mr. Miyagi had finished cooking and the guys ate quietly thanking him. Leaning over bowls of noodles, it looked like ramen.

"You spending the night?" Johnny asked quietly.

"Of fucking course," Dutch whispered back. "There's no way we're leaving you guys alone this weekend. Not with Barnes out there."

He made it sound like Barnes was a violent escaped animal from the zoo or some monster in the darkness. But looking at his friends, at Daniel it did seem like it.

If he didn't know what Barnes looked like he might've thought that he was the guy who'd broken into the house that time before. But something Tommy said made sense. It was a good question.

Mrs. Douglas kept track of all the information for the competitors which included addresses, but last year Daniel's address had been South Seas.

Mr. Miyagi's address wouldn't have been on the paperwork.

They shouldn't have known he'd moved in with him, but they had.

They'd even sent the paperwork about the new rules to Mr. Miyagi's for Daniel.

How did they know where to find Daniel?

First the shop and now the house.

He turned looking at the fireplace, towards the front door thinking.

Mr. Miyagi's medal of valor was hanging up.

He got up and walked over, trying to remember where he'd seen the man in the house.

There were the yellow flyers that he grabbed every day by the door to give their neighbors to tell them about their opening day. It had the shop's address and phone number on it.

The man who came into the house must've given it to Mike Barnes.

He knew where Mr. Miyagi lived and had started to send Mike Barnes to the shop first, and then they'd come that night expecting no one to be home. Only to find the guys. They were trying to corner Mr. Miyagi and Daniel.

Why?

What would've happened if they'd lost the bonsai?

They would've lost all of their stock.

They didn't have enough money to get more. So it would've forced their hand to do something drastic to stay afloat.

But they wouldn't have had to.

Johnny would've gone to his mother or the guys.

Mr. Miyagi wouldn't have accepted it outright. But maybe as a loan with zero interest.

They were trying to make it as miserable as possible, uncomfortable to force Daniel's hand. To be a part of a tournament he didn't want to be in. Couldn't be in.

They didn't know about Johnny. Whoever was doing their research hadn't seen him yet. But he'd seen them. Which gave him the element of surprise. But how would he use it? Could he? Should he?

He walked back and sat down with a frown.

"Everything okay?" Tommy asked.

"Maybe not, let me keep thinking about it," Johnny said.

Daniel came back after a while with a smile on his face. Still holding the ice pack to his face, he sat down to eat with the guys and Mr. Miyagi.

He told Johnny more about the fight. About Jessica bringing over mac and cheese and the first prototype of the pots for the bonsai. Telling him how perfect the pot was.

After dinner, Johnny worried about the tense atmosphere.

Daniel had been smiling, a good conversation with his mother, but it had soured, fallen into darkness as he had shared the awfulness of the night.

Johnny looked at Mr. Miyagi who seemed to be trying to remain positive.

Reminding Daniel that nothing had happened to the bonsai.

There was a little spark.

Daniel was tired of getting hurt and the gentle positive outlook Mr. Miyagi was trying to remind him of that there was at least one bright side was clashing.

Johnny took Daniel's hand in his.

"Mr. Miyagi, let's play hanafuda tonight," Johnny said.

The guys couldn't resist games and Daniel would hopefully calm back down if Johnny held his hand, if he stayed close, if he occasionally pressed his leg to Daniel's the way Daniel used to do to his, reminding him he was there and solid and nothing else was going to happen that night and that he wasn't alone.

Daniel wasn't adrift at sea in a storm on his own trying to understand Mr. Miyagi, trying to make sense of the situation, trying to solve problems

He had Johnny and the guys.

He turned to Daniel as Mr. Miyagi passed out the cards, as he explained how to play.

"I'm here, not going anywhere," he said softly in Daniel's ear. "Whatever you need."

Daniel looked up at him, brown eyes wide, studying for the exact meaning of the statement.

If Daniel wanted to end the fight Johnny would help.

If Daniel wanted to train, he'd train with him.

If Daniel wanted to just stay in bed and avoid the world, well Johnny could be there too, under the blankets.

He'd repair the shop as many times as needed.

Daniel pressed his forehead into Johnny's shoulder.

He knew it was awful. His mother was across the country. His family was across the country. His other adopted parent who supported him was looking on the bright side when Daniel wanted answers and actions. Wanted this to stop.

Johnny ran his fingers through Daniel's hair, ducking his head while the guys asked about the sake cup, how it was an animal which made him smile, reminding him of the garden in Okinawa and Sato. They'd like each other he thought.

"It sucks. It all really fucking sucks. The shop will recover. I'll put it back together as many times as it falls apart and I'll patch you up too. Every time you make a new enemy. We'll be 70 and I'll still have your back when someone tries to pick a fight with you over pizza or pasta or food or cars. You'll win against Barnes the way you won against Chozen, against me, the way you'll win against whoever hopefully doesn't come next, but if they do you'll win then too. Focus on the plan. Morning runs with Dutch and Jessica, some rock climbing, kata," Johnny whispered. "You just tell me what you want me to do and I'll help."

Johnny's shoulder felt wet, he gently wrapped his arms around Daniel trying to be mindful of everywhere he and Mr. Miyagi had patched up as Mr. Miyagi tried to explain the different sets. They'd get through this night, and every other night after it.

Rebuilding

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

It was raining in the morning, a rarity in LA, that for a moment Daniel thought he was in Okinawa or Newark. But with Johnny's arm around him, he knew he wasn't in Newark. The soft snoring coming from the floor meant he wasn't in Okinawa either.

He pushed himself up carefully wincing. It was going to be a long day of repairing the shop.

They'd also have to find a safe spot to put the bonsai, somewhere where Barnes and his friends couldn't get to them.

Johnny's arm had fallen around his waist and he turned to look at him, the arm tightened around his waist. He was sleeping peacefully.

Daniel wondered when that had happened. He smiled softly, reaching out to touch the blonde hair that was starting to get a little long.

He could hear the rain pouring outside, the crack of lightning, and the rumble of thunder.

Johnny didn't even stir, breathing soft. It was after seven according to the red glow of the alarm clock.

The guys were sleeping on the floor, on the bedding they'd gotten out for them, that was pretty much theirs at this point. A little nest of ex-cobras at the foot of his bed.

Sometimes it was frustrating to have them there. But he was glad they were there now. That they hadn't been alone through the night.

All the places he felt safe in California were gone.

Seven Seas, the shop, everywhere except for right there. In his bed with Johnny and the guys sleeping on the floor.

One day he'd have to get them something more comfortable to sleep on.

He didn't like that Mike Barnes had been there too. He hadn't come in the house but had been so close.

Johnny hadn't ever come to his place, there were a lot of lines Johnny never crossed. Chozen had but, it was different.

Johnny had cared about Ali, and it'd been fun to rile him up, especially when he'd agreed not to fight Daniel.

Chozen cared about honor and his uncle's honor. They just hadn't understood one another. Eventually ended up on the same page.

But Barnes only seemed to care about wanting to beat the shit out of Daniel.

Johnny had more guys on his side than Chozen or Barnes, but Bobby had always held back.

These guys with Barnes were mindless like Mike Barnes had trained them well enough and he just had to point and say go and they'd go.

His shoulder hurt.

The windows at the store were broken.

He didn't trust that things were going to be okay.

Everything always got worse first and if this was just the beginning, then-

Johnny sat up looking at him bleary-eyed for a couple of seconds then shifting. He sat up, pulling Daniel into his arms, wrapping the blanket around him. One second Johnny was sleeping at his side and the next Daniel was leaning back against him bundled up like a half-asleep Johnny had mistaken him for a burrito. The thought was amusing.

"You're safe," Johnny murmured softly next to his ear. Breath on Daniel's ear warm and it sent a shiver down his spine.

"They know where I live Johnny," Daniel said softly, turning to look at him, trying to get an arm out of the blankets around him.

"They do," Johnny said. "But there are a lot of things they don't know."

"Yeah like, what?" Daniel asked, practically a huff.

He'd been trying to wiggle an arm out, but Johnny had done an impressively good job.

He got one hand out and Johnny caught it in his as it swung up faster than he'd expected once it'd no longer been pinned down.

Johnny pulled his hand back and Daniel watched as Johnny brought his hand up to his lips and gently kissed the top of his hand, eyes looking on him the whole time.

"They don't know how dangerous these hands can be, that the fact you don't want to fight is for their own good."

Daniel laughed, a soft exhale of laughter. But it died when he saw Johnny wasn't teasing, wasn't laughing. His eyes were serious.

"Johnny," he managed, trying to figure out how to explain that Barnes wasn't like everyone else. Like even fighting Chozen or Johnny had been scary. He didn't have the same confidence in himself, and he was tired. He wanted to be left alone. He wanted someone else to take care of it for him. Like the police.

Daniel squeezed his hand, the hand that held his.

He did appreciate Johnny being there though, awake. He was glad he wasn't alone.

Johnny looked down at their hands and then sighed burying his head in the crook of Daniel's neck.

Daniel felt lips press against his neck, the gentle graze of teeth on his skin. Another bruise to add to the collection, but this one was being so lovingly administered that it wasn't the same at all. Though he hated that he was all wrapped up in a blanket so he couldn't turn and wrap himself around Johnny.

He'd only freed the one arm and he hooked it up and to the top of Johnny's head, fingers in his hair, letting out a small gasp as Johnny found a sensitive spot of his neck to suck on.

Daniel managed to free himself from the blankets and turned, clapping hands to either side of his face. "Don't."

"Don't?"

"Don't get hurt. Avoid Barnes. You see him, take those long legs of yours and run."

Johnny kissed him.

The guys had woken part of the way through their make-out session and turned into the most embarrassing peanut gallery Daniel had ever had to deal with. Scaring Johnny off and scandalizing Daniel.

At breakfast, they discussed what to do with the trees.

Dutch offered for them to stay at his place. It had the best security out of everyone's house and he was home. Unlike the rest of the guys.

Mr. Miyagi reluctantly agreed to store the stock at Dutch's, caving easily when Dutch reminded him that they'd taken care of Johnny's bonsai over the time they were in Okinawa.

Mr. Miyagi helped load the bonsai after breakfast into Dutch's van in the rain, telling them he'd get a headstart of cleaning up the shop.

They drove out to Dutch's place. He had to lean over at the gate to punch in a code to get through the gates and then drove up a long winding road to a house bigger than Sid's or Jimmy's. But it was so far from the main road you'd never know it was there.

Instead of going into the mansion, Dutch led them and the small parade of bonsai through the rain to a glass conservatory on the property.

He fussed with another keypad and then hauled the door open, propping it open with a brick.

It was beautiful. Flowering plants, trees, and butterflies.

"Keep an eye on Johnny," Dutch said softly to Daniel. "I always lose him in here."

That made sense, Daniel thought. He didn't want to leave either.

"Shit," Dutch said. "Johnny grab Mr. P. He's making a break for it."

Daniel turned to see a peacock strutting with purpose for the door and Johnny stepping out in front of it, arms out wide blocking the door. The peacock eyed him for a moment before turning like he'd just been curious and wasn't trying to make a break for it.

Johnny didn't move from his post watching the peacock suspiciously and the peacock after a couple of feet turned back, clocked that Johnny was still watching him, ruffled his feathers, and continued on deeper into the conservatory.

Mr. P only tried to run three more times. He snuck out past Daniel who had been carrying one of the last of the bonsai and had spun on his heels as the bright flash of feathers ducked around him and out into the rain.

The peacock hurried off towards Dutch's van, pecking at the wheels, before looking around and turning back to Daniel, eyes full of challenge.

Daniel did not want to have to chase a peacock around the grounds when Dutch came up at his side with a sigh.

"Mr. P, you hate the outside, it raining, you hate that, what are you even doing?"

He held up a box and shook it.

Mr. P who had been stubbornly preening in the rain, looking a little miserable but not budging on principal, his head shot up at the sound. He ducked down, running fast back into the conservatory past Daniel's feet, before flapping his wings, sprinkling him with water and flopping onto a cushion Daniel hadn't noticed amongst all the flowers.

He tried to think of any of the guys having pets. He hadn't noticed, but a peacock was not what he would've ever thought Dutch had. But there were a lot of things he hadn't expected. Dutch filled a nearby dish with food, then turned back and looked at Daniel who was setting down the last bonsai.

"Where's Johnny?" Dutch asked.

Daniel looked around, looked at the other guys who looked around trying to spot the tall blonde.

Dutch sighed rubbing his face.

"You know, once upon a time I thought about setting a damn bed in here and just letting Johnny move in, but my parents use this for parties when they're home, and never give me a heads-up, but I swear he's as bad as Mr. P. Oh if you see Mrs. P, be careful she likes to peck at ankles."

"How come I've never been in here?" Bobby asked.

"Because my parents don't like when people come over. Plus your house has baked goods. It's better," Dutch said with a shrug.

"Oh, so they like Johnny better than me huh?" Bobby asked teasing. "Better than all of us?"

"They do," Dutch said flatly. "He took care of me while I was sick and they wanted to give him something as like thanks and he declined. Everyone always wants something from them so they were kind of stunned. So they gave him a free pass. If I'd asked they probably would've let him move in, but then they would've forgotten and been confused as to why I put Johnny's room in the conservatory. Ugh let's see, sometimes he likes the bees. Let's check there."

"Bees?" Jimmy asked with a frown. "Why do you have bees?"

"Honey," Dutch said with a shrug. "Plus I liked bees as a kid. My parents set it up when I was like five. Not the best gift for a five-year-old. But I liked bugs, there's a shit ton of bugs in here."

"Won't the peacocks eat your bees?" Tommy asked.

"They could if they're pissy at me. But they eat like royalty so they know better. Plus the bees sting them," Dutch said.

They followed him around large ponds filled with frogs, lily pads, and large koi fish down a path and there was Johnny.

He was setting a jar down on a table, bees buzzing about. He glanced up.

"You haven't been dealing with the honey," Johnny said pointing to the honeycomb build-up on the outside of the box.

"I've been busy," Dutch said with a shrug. "It doesn't hurt them. It's just messy. It's not like a bear's going to break in or something."

A white peacock was sneaking towards Johnny who was carefully putting honeycomb into a jar. A hand fell on Daniel's shoulder, he glanced at Dutch.

"Don't tell him," he said in a soft whisper. He had a look of mischief in his eyes.

Mrs. P's head came back poised to peck at Johnny's ankle.

Johnny shifted his foot back and she missed.

She tried again and he moved again, eyes not leaving the work he was doing.

Mrs. P ruffled her feathers in frustration Daniel felt like he understood.

Johnny dipped down pulling something out of his jacket pocket and setting it on the ground.

She ate it and he stepped around her gathering up the jars.

"Damn, I forgot you're used to Mrs. P," Dutch sighed.

"Hoping I got pecked?" Johnny asked amused, passing jars to Bobby, Tommy, and Jimmy.

"What do you want us to do with this?" Tommy asked looking at the jar with a frown.

"Eat it."

"It's honeycomb," Jimmy said.

"Yeah, put it in your tea or something," Johnny said with a shrug.

"You're giving out my honey," Dutch said with a frown that didn't reach his eyes, looking amused.

"I believe last time I was here you told me please help me get rid of the honey any chance you're here. I can't keep up," Johnny said.

"I did say that, didn't I? Is that why you left the group? I was worried we were going to lose you in here," Dutch said.

Johnny looked at him, head tilted slightly. "You know why Mr. and Mrs. P like it in here?"

"Bugs?" Dutch asked amused. "The things they like most are in here and not out there."

"Yes, and the things I like the best live out there," Johnny said eyes falling on Daniel as he motioned around the outside.

Dutch clapped Daniel on the back before turning.

"Okay, well is there any other cleaning you want to do here or shall we go clean up the shop?" Dutch asked.

"Just wanted to bail out a little honey," Johnny said shifting the jars in his hands. "That's it. I'm not going to go bug-catching or something. Besides, you should give some to your Taekwondo teacher and classmates."

"Who are those jars for?" Dutch asked motioning towards Johnny's arms.

"The house and Jessica. I think after getting kicked by Barnes she needs a pick me up."

The playful nature in Dutch's eyes fled. "Yeah," he said quietly, shoving his hands in his pockets. "Fuck Barnes."

"We'll check in on her today," Johnny said. "She's right across the street from the shop."

"Good," Bobby said. "I don't know who Barnes's sensei is but the fact he's beating up girls pisses me off."

"Mrs. Douglas didn't know who his sensei is," Johnny said softly, his hand finding Daniels.

They walked past the bonsai and Mr. P and Daniel felt relieved that they were all safe.

Jessica came by the shop around lunch.

The place was looking better.

Jimmy had called someone to rush repair the glass and they rebuilt shelves and most of the screens.

They'd gotten a lot done throughout the morning and Daniel was feeling better.

Mr. Miyagi had gotten there early and had listened while Daniel told him all about the conservatory and the peacocks and the bees and showed him the honey Johnny had harvested.

They had planned to go over to check on Jessica around lunch but she'd beaten them to it.

"What do you want for lunch?" Tommy asked her.

"Pizza?" she suggested.

"On it," he said walking over to the phone to make an order.

Mr. Miyagi walked over to her talking softly handing her a small jar of green goop he'd made that morning.

Daniel had wondered who that had been for. If he was sending some home with the guys.

She was nodding and then walked across the floor to him, looking around as she went.

"I was going to come and help you clean up," she said taking in everything. "But it looks like you're mostly done."

"Yeah, we put everyone to work," Daniel said with a soft smile.

"What's Johnny doing?" she asked softly.

Daniel turned.

Johnny had thought he could repair the shoji screen Daniel fell through and had been sitting in the back of the shop trying to put it back together again.

The special mulberry paper was in a roll next to him.

They'd repaired doors in Okinawa after the storm, it was similar, Johnny had been injured but had still tried to help.

Daniel was pretty sure this one was beyond repair though. He'd fallen on it pretty hard, it wasn't like when, was it, Dennis? Dennis had just broken the paper.

"Being stubborn," Daniel said fondly.

"I know why you, Dutch, and I are bruised, what happened to the other guys?" Jessica asked softly.

"Barnes."

"When?" she asked eyes wide.

"They apparently went to the house last night to try and steal the bonsai."

Her hand came to his arm, his left one and he winced.

She pulled away, eyes still full of concern.

"Did they get the bonsai?"

"With a house full of ex-cobras? No. But they're miffed that Barnes got any hits in. We weren't expecting them to come to the house."

"What are you going to do?"

"I'm going to sign the damn paperwork."

"But Daniel-"

"I can't compete, I'm too old," he said with a soft smile. "But I'll just pretend. And I'll train just in case something weird happens and I have to go through with it. Speaking of which, apparently you and Dutch get up at ungodly hours to go running?"

The concern on her face turned into a soft smile.

"Yeah, you wanna join?" she asked.

Daniel heaved a big sigh. He didn't want to. But he felt like it'd be a good idea.

"Yeah."

She laughed.

"We can get smoothies after. With wheatgrass and protein."

Daniel looked at her in horror.

"Who are you? Are you the same girl who brought us mac and cheese? Who literally just asked for a pizza for lunch?"

"Hey, It's good for you," Jessica said with a grin. "Besides it evens everything else out."

"Does it?"

She laughed. "You're training, it's good to use good fuel for that."

"I'm going to regret this," Daniel complained. "I knew I shouldn't have relaxed after the deathmatch was over. I let my guard down. Got comfortable."

"Deathmatch?" Jessica asked while Daniel carried his mop over to the corner.

A spot in the roof was leaking.

There had been more but Johnny had spotted that weeks ago and had fixed the roof.

Daniel didn't want to tell him he'd missed a spot. He was so determined to fix the last screen.

He caught Tommy's eye. Tommy's eyes followed the drip up to the ceiling and then he picked up the phone again.

The plus of having Johnny do it was it was free labor. Which he knew he shouldn't take advantage of him, but they hadn't made money yet.

Daniel did not want to see how much it'd cost to fix the windows, or how much the phone call Tommy was making would cost.

"I'll tell you on our run tomorrow. It'll give me something to complain about other than running," he said with an amused smile.

"Fine, I guess that will give me something to look forward to, other than running circles around you," she said with a teasing smile.

"Johnny said you also go rock climbing?"

"Yeah! I do. I've been trying to get him to come along, you want to come with?"

"It's a good work out right?"

"Yes! It's great."

She sounded so excited. Daniel was tired already.

"Yeah, sign us up for that one too. You're essentially my new coach," he said with a sigh.

She grinned and patted his back.

"Don't worry, we'll get you back in fighting shape in no time."

Daniel sighed. "Yeah, for a fight I'm not planning to fight, but for a fight, I'm worried I might have to."

"If you fought someone to the death Daniel I'm pretty sure you can handle Barnes."

She was so confident.

Even though he doubted it he had to admit, it was better than doing everything on his own. Better than when he'd tried to teach himself karate from a book.

It'd be different this time. He had friends by his side, a base knowledge, and two big wins under his belt. He really had earned his black belt.

The pizza came and they sat around one of the repaired tables eating.

The guys were talking about UCLA and answering Jessica's questions about college. She was thinking of next semester. She'd taken the semester off as a gap year to be in LA and to get some sun and try something new.

It was nice to sit with them and eat pizza on the floor and to talk and listen to Mr. Miyagi mention school, the school he went to, the classes he'd taken.

Jessica also teased him by telling them he was getting up early tomorrow to go for a run and asking if the guys if they wanted to come with. All bright and excited.

They groaned. Dutch was coming, that was a given.

But they sighed, their egos bruised, agreeing to come along Sunday morning.

Johnny sighed. "I'm not going to have a choice tomorrow huh?"

Bobby laughed throwing his arm around Johnny's shoulder easily. "Nope, if we're here on the weekend and going, you have to too."

Tommy had been taking notes in a notebook and after he finished his slice of pizza looked up.

"Okay," he said looking from Mr. Miyagi to Daniel. "So I called a security company. There's going to be a lock on the door and the gates. For the shop and the house. From what I can tell they've been coming while you've been in here after hours. There's a way to set the lock so you can get out, but they won't be able to get in. So we're going to set it for that after hours. Getting you a pin code lock too, so Jessica can come in and out, or you know, us. For the house, you've got the three entrances to the garden. The main gate and then a couple of others. I didn't realize part of the fence opened up into a door in the back until Barnes and his friends escaped that way yesterday. So we're turning that back into an actual unmovable piece of fence and putting a lock on the rest of the gates. And your front door. Mr. Miyagi, I know this probably isn't what you want, but people are getting in, and I just don't think it's safe otherwise."

Daniel expected Mr. Miyagi to brush off their concern, to tell them everything was fine because there were still good things in the world, and that Barnes and his friends would just go away. That optimism that had gotten under Daniel's skin the night before.

But Mr. Miyagi nodded, "Hai, good idea."

Daniel studied Mr. Miyagi.

He usually always brushed things off, but maybe he understood that people breaking into the grounds of the house was a problem. A reminder of the awful parts of Okinawa when Chozen had tried to destroy the house. Maybe he understood that they wouldn't go away.

Maybe he could ask if he'd teach Daniel again. He felt the question well up but he swallowed it down.

He wanted Mr. Miyagi to focus on his dream. On the shop. Not worry about him or the tournament, and Mr. Miyagi had already made it clear how he felt about the tournament.

He felt better though, having a game plan.

He'd sign the paperwork, maybe he'd go to the All-Valley offices and do it.

Or the next time he saw Barnes, whichever happened first.

And then maybe he could finally enjoy the shop. Finally, get it ready without fear of Barnes and his goons trashing it.

He could enjoy a shop full of little trees and answering the phones and talking to customers and casually flirting with Johnny when it got slow. When he got bored.

He'd start his mornings off early in a routine, running with Dutch and Jessica and drinking green smoothies full of weird things that were good for him, and he'd come to the shop and get it ready, or if there was enough time he'd go home and shower and maybe crawl back into bed with Johnny for awhile. Using the endorphins and adrenaline to try and coax a little more pleasure out of his mornings, a reward for himself for getting up early and running, getting to wake Johnny up, and offer a different type of workout.

He liked that idea. But he worried he'd be too tired to even attempt it with how excited Dutch and Jessica were.

It had sounded awful, but the more he mulled it over, maybe getting up early would have it's perks, maybe he'd find ways to spin training into something fun.

He wondered if he could mark sex as an extra workout. Tell Johnny in a teasing way that it was training. It'd get his heart pounding for sure, burn a few more calories.

His hand found Johnny's thigh next to him. It might be fun.

They could make this awful situation better.

Chapter End Notes

> So the burrito wrap is an actual calming technique. Here's some info on it. I picked it because you're supposed to do it with babies and animals and Johnny's been kind of dealing with both so it was an automatic reaction when he was half asleep. Like oh, where's Daniel? Oh there's Daniel. He looks stressed, when the kids or the animals are stressed they get burrito wrapped. So Daniel gets burrito wrapped.
>
> Also, I wanted Dutch's place to be ridiculous thus the pet peacocks. Also naming pets is hard and kid Dutch wasn't creative so it's just Mr. and Mrs. Peacock or Mr. and Mrs. P for short.
>
> Sometimes bees just do not care, thus Johnny just getting honey and honeycomb like it's nothing. He learned that from Dutch, because Dutch would not be scared of his bees since he got them at 5 and would've figured that out long before they met. I also figure if his parents don't like people that much they'd be growing as much of their own stuff aka their own chickens for eggs and thus their own bees for honey in the conservatory. Even though they're not home much. I also wanted each of the guys to have a spot that they were like well if things explode with Sid and Johnny needs somewhere to go this is where he's staying. But the problem with Dutch's is that the conservatory is also used for business meetings so there are too many people in there from time to time, so that's why it's not on Johnny's list of places to go to, because any second it might need to be some polished place that a bloody/bruised kid wouldn't be welcome in. (Though he'd always be welcome, but you know how Johnny is/was).

Finding a way back into a rhythm

Chapter Notes

Big diversion from the canon because of previous changes.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Five am found Johnny standing sleepily outside of a park with Jessica who was bouncing on her feet and Dutch who was stretching, warming up.

Daniel was waking up, slowly, mumbling to himself about a reward system that Johnny couldn't understand.

Johnny wanted to know when Dutch had become a morning person, let alone a morning runner.

It had to be taekwondo.

Johnny used to be a morning person.

Sleeping in hadn't been safe and then Kreese gave him such an intense workout schedule that he slept most of the time.

He wondered if it was similar. If Dutch had found a teacher who was inspiring him. Enough so to get him up and moving so early.

Jessica was thanking him for the honey at his side.

The rest of the guys were complaining and yawning.

Johnny stretched.

He could remember how to do this again.

He'd just gotten comfortable. Complacent.

Kreese would yell at them for getting lazy and letting their guards down, would say that was exactly why someone like Barnes had shown up.

He'd smelt blood in the water, noticed they weren't paying attention. Weren't guarding their weak spots.

"It's from Dutch's bees," Johnny said.

"You have bees?" Jessica said turning to Dutch.

"Yeah," Dutch said with a shrug.

Like everyone has bees or like she'd asked if he had a TV. No big deal.

"Ready?" Jessica asked brightly.

Wide awake for five am. Full of energy.

Johnny remembered what it was like to not need sleep. It'd been nice.

No. He shouldn't think like that.

He'd really enjoyed his lazy mornings, lazy days.

Johnny nodded.

Reminded himself to pace himself.

This wasn't a race, even though he was looking at the guys who were complaining about being awake, he thought maybe if it was a race he could win.

He probably would win.

He hadn't really taken time off since they'd quit Cobra Kai to stop working out.

They'd just been sitting around studying.

He'd been doing manual labor. His muscles hadn't gone away.

He'd just been using them differently.

It wasn't a race.

He'd pace himself.

It wasn't really a run, per se in Johnny's opinion.

A gentle jog.

He found himself turning around and bouncing on his feet with Jessica while they waited for the others to catch up.

"See," Jessica said looking at him with a grin. "It's not so bad."

"The problem is," Johnny said. "I haven't had a chance to sleep in much in my life, so I've been enjoying it."

"So I shouldn't expect to see you often?" she asked.

"Maybe not tomorrow. Daniel was mumbling something to himself about the only fun part of this would be coming home to me. And I don't know what's happening in that 5 am brain of his, but I guess I'll find out tomorrow. The true test will be to see if I can continue to sleep after he leaves. It'll be a good experiment."

Jessica laughed softly.

"Is that what he's been mumbling about? He promised to tell me about his death match, whatever that even means. But he's been too distracted."

"Death match is exactly as it sounds. Happened in Okinawa over the summer."

"What? Who goes to Okinawa and gets in a death match? Wait," she turned to him grabbing his arm and looking up at him wide-eyed. "Does that mean Daniel's killed someone?"

Johnny laughed.

"He showed mercy."

"Okay okay, I need more context. Why did you go to Okinawa?"

"You do know if Daniel promised to tell you you're going to hear all of this again the next time you go running right? Just wait and let him tell you."

"You were there right? Tell me something," she complained.

"To be fair I was knocked out for the majority of the fight."

She pouted.

"Convenient. Was it like this Barnes guy?"

"Chozen was obsessed with honor but had like the wrong understanding of what it meant. He seemed to think it meant unquestionable respect. That he and his family were in the right always, even when tricking others. Any inconvenience was a slight on his honor. He didn't seem to realize it didn't make sense. Because it's what he'd been taught. He was following in his uncle's footsteps and he hadn't realized his uncle was wrong."

"Sounds like you got to know him," she said looking at him before turning to continue to run as the guys caught up.

He followed.

"I understood it. It's hard to realize the person you believed in or trusted was wrong, taught you the wrong things. Chozen's lucky though, his uncle is trying to be better and so he."

Sato never tried to kill Chozen and Kreese would never change.

That was the difference.

Johnny was happy for Chozen to have that.

Knew he'd never have that. But he had other things and it'd be fine.

"And Barnes?" Jessica asked.

"No clue. That's the weird thing. He just wants Daniel to fight him. Something about money."

"Money is a big motivator."

"But the All-Valley doesn't give you money. You get a trophy."

"Oh."

She was quiet for a while as they ran, mulling this over. Thinking.

Johnny kept checking back periodically that Daniel and the guys were still there.

Dutch was keeping up with Daniel, and Daniel was talking, mumbling something as they went.

Dutch was listening valiantly, keeping pace.

Like he was herding Daniel, keeping him with the group.

He probably should be doing that.

"I think I'm going to go back and try and keep Daniel company," Johnny said. "That okay?"

"Yeah. Of course," she said slowing her pace as well.

"Oh ho! Look whose finally slowing down! Tired huh?" Bobby called as they neared.

"I think they just missed us, finally realized we're not all long-legged monsters," Jimmy said.

"I thought we would've been more evenly matched, now that we're all out of karate," Tommy said with a pout. "I forgot Johnny won every race at school."

"Sorry, guys," Johnny said.

"Don't have to slow down on our account, we don't need your pity," Jimmy said.

"I missed you, but-"

"Oh he's slowing down more," Tommy said surprised as they passed him.

"Ohhh someone realized they've been a bad boyfriend," Jimmy said with a laugh. "You know it's weird for Johnny to be behind us and not being on a track."

"Hey Jessica, thanks for putting up with all of us. But you don't have to slow down on our account," Bobby said.

Johnny heard her laugh. "It's fine, this is more fun."

Dutch slapped his shoulder when Johnny slowed down enough to meet him and Daniel.

"I'm going to join the guys and Jessica. Good luck man, he's uh...something this early in the morning."

Dutch picked up the pace easier, joining the small crowd ahead of them, like he was relieved to be ahead.

Johnny really shouldn't have focused on keeping up with Jessica. Should've stuck by Daniel's side since the start.

It'd be the slowest jog in his life, but it'd be fun.

Daniel looked up at him with a frown.

"Wait, why are you back here?"

"Wanted to run with you," Johnny said.

"I didn't mind you running ahead."

"Well I do," Johnny said amused. "Besides maybe if you get faster you'll have more fun the next time we spar."

He remembered how frustrated Daniel had gotten trying to catch him. Maybe that'd be a good carrot. Better than just going back to bed and cuddling.

Daniel was studying him, glancing up at him.

"I will add that to my goals. Get fast enough to actually catch you."

If it was anyone else Johnny would've taken part of that as a threat, but from Daniel, it was a promise of something else, especially with that look in his eyes.

Maybe he didn't want to cuddle.

Oh god, early morning Daniel was usually flirty.

Was that what Dutch had meant?

Johnny was used to it, or missed a lot of it.

He was still trying to figure it out. But Daniel always had been more touchy in the morning but in a slow lazy way.

Daniel was going to do this every morning? With friends? What had he been talking about in the back of the group?

What was the reward he wanted?

Johnny felt his ears burn. He knew what Daniel would say if he asked.

"You going to be okay to do this every morning?" Johnny asked. "With Jessica and Dutch?"

"Of course," Daniel said like he'd been challenged.

Revving up to accept the challenge, or bet, whatever Johnny was going to throw out.

"What are you going to talk about?"

Daniel blinked, clearly it wasn't what he'd expected Johnny to say.

"I don't know, Okinawa? Newark. We'll see."

"What were you talking to Dutch about?" Johnny asked, not sure if he actually wanted to know.

Daniel furrowed his brows with thought. Retracing his steps mentally trying to figure out what he'd been talking about.

He stopped suddenly.

Johnny bounced at his side.

"Fuck," Daniel said looking suddenly much more awake.

"Do I want to know?" Johnny asked watching as Daniel blushed.

Daniel buried his head in his hands.

"I was talking about what would make all this worth it."

"Yeah?" Johnny asked.

"Well, I think I just talked about how nice it was to watch you run. Probably for- oh god, how long have we been running?"

That didn't sound too bad.

Johnny had been fast, he always thought it was fun to watch runners shoot across the field when he was leaving school.

Johnny checked his watch.

He'd expected something worse.

"Half hour?"

"Oh god, a half-hour?"

"Come on, let's keep running."

Daniel sighed moving again.

He was quiet for a while but then he started talking again.

About the shop. About the windows and the shoji screens and why had Johnny been so stubborn? But Johnny had fixed it. So even though he was complaining he was also heaping praise on Johnny. How he could barely tell that it was the one he'd fallen through. How the whole place sparkled and how it felt like a bad dream if only his arm didn't hurt.

They eventually stopped at a picnic table in the park.

The guys collapsing in the dirt and on the benches.

"I'll get the smoothies," Johnny said looking at all of them. "So give me your orders."

"I'll come help carry," Jessica offered.

Johnny got mumbles and groans, but he pieced together orders from everyone.

Dutch wanted a tropical smoothie with spinach, kale, and protein powder.

The other orders were harder to parse together.

Johnny followed Jessica to the shop.

It wasn't too busy and the owner seemed to recognize Jessica, asked what happened to Dutch.

Johnny smiled, that was good for Dutch, to be known, asked after. He'd be delighted to hear about it.

He put the orders in, adding things to it as Jessica recommended, like dumping protein powder in every single one.

Daniel had just laid down on the bench in the park and looked up at Johnny, hair plastered to his forehead that Johnny brushed aside.

He told Johnny to surprise him.

So Johnny ordered him a chocolate and peanut butter banana smoothie. Maybe it was a bit early for chocolate and peanut butter, but he'd heard Daniel complain about green health smoothies for a good ten minutes.

He could treat himself to some green monstrosity the following day when he wasn't with Johnny.

Johnny was going to get him something sweet.

He got himself an acai berry drink that he totally butchered how to pronounce it and the worker completely unphased typed it in and repeated it back to him pronounced correctly.

The worker talked to Jessica congratulating her on her larger running group.

She laughed saying it was because their friends were visiting for the weekend from UCLA.

Johnny smiled. Their friends. The guys would be happy.

They carried their drinks in carriers back to the park.

The atmosphere was different.

Daniel was pacing, chewing on his bottom lip.

Johnny really couldn't turn around without something happening.

He sighed, passing out the drinks.

"What happened?"

"Well, Barnes popped up like he's tracking Daniel. Wasn't expecting all of us and was short one of his goons, so he didn't try anything but threatened to trash the shop again before we'd get back, said if we're all here there's no one to protect the bonsai," Bobby said with a sigh.

"He doesn't know where they are now, but if he did and even if he bypassed the keypad or broke in Mr. and Mrs. P wouldn't let him get too far," Dutch said.

"Daniel signed the paperwork," Jimmy said.

"He also threatened Jessica," Tommy added with a deep frown.

"Slimeball," Jessica said sourly.

"Do you want to learn some self-defense moves?" Dutch asked taking his smoothie from her.

"Maybe I should," she sighed.

"Well you've got one guy who knows taekwondo and six who know karate, so take your pick," Bobby said with a grin.

Johnny walked over to Daniel stepping into the path he was wearing down into the dirt while Jessica moved into a practice stance with the guys coaxing her through practice moves, smoothies in hand.

"Hey," he said softly holding out the drink for him in one hand.

Daniel stopped startled and took the drink looking up at him.

"It's okay, remember the plan?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah," Daniel said. "I just, we live with Mr. Miyagi so we're not alone, but Jessica-"

"We'll update security at her place too," Johnny said. "have her check-in at night, it'll be fine. She can let her aunt know. And you can add her to your list of nightly calls like your mom."

"Just what I need to rack the phone bill up even worse than I already do," Daniel said with a frown, but his shoulders were relaxed.

Johnny laughed softly.

Mrs. LaRusso did rack up their phone bill, but it was expected.

It was better than not hearing from her.

"We'll do our best to keep her safe. And she will too," Johnny said motioning to where she was sparring with Bobby, moving to block his telegraphed slow moves. "It may be fun to add it to your routine. Run in the morning, spar with Jessica, go to the shop, and then on the weekends we'll go rock climbing."

"Who'd have thought not going to college would keep us so busy?"

"Life just seems to be made that way."

Daniel nodded trying his smoothie then looking up at Johnny.

"What's this? This doesn't taste healthy."

Johnny grinned.

"It's full of protein powder, but it's chocolate and peanut butter with a banana. You can torture yourself with healthy green smoothies tomorrow. How is it?"

"It's good. Wait what did you get?"

"Acai, want to try it?" Johnny asked holding his drink out to him.

Daniel took it and handed him his to try.

The haunted looked, the tension from running into Barnes again seemed to be fading.

Johnny wondered how Barnes had found him this time.

This area didn't seem like a Barnes haunt.

Did he just cruise around all day looking for Daniel?

He was glad Daniel hadn't been alone, that there hadn't been a fight.

Hopefully, now that Daniel had signed the paperwork he'd be left alone until the tournament.

He reached out and took Daniel's empty hand.

"Think you can do this every morning?"

"Yeah, I'm more awake now. I think it's possible. Just going to take a while to be able to keep up with Jessica and Dutch."

"I'm sure you'll find them running with you."

"You think? I'm so much slower than all of you."

"You'll catch up. Give yourself time. Jessica's been doing this since before she moved here, and Dutch has been doing taekwondo. It's unfair to yourself to compare. You'll see as you keep going, as you keep getting better."

"Think I'll catch up to you?" Daniel asked.

"Maybe, I'd be excited to see it," Johnny said warmly. "But I also don't mind running by your side. How's your shoulder doing?"

"Itchy," Daniel said sourly.

"Because it's healing. We've got something in the first aid kit at home for that. I'll put some on it when we get home."

"Thanks," Daniel said softly, kicking at the dirt.

Johnny glanced around then ducked down, kissing him.

"Always and anytime," he said when he pulled away.

Chapter End Notes

I want to stamp no bonsais were harmed in the creation of this fic. Even though they're fictional. So we are not digging up Mr. Miygai's bonsai from Okinawa and it's not getting ripped in half. We're not even going to meet Mike Barnes while rock climbing because how the heck did he find them there???? They were down a hole in the earth out in the middle of nowhere. It doesn't make any sense to me. So I've nixed it.

Grand Opening

Chapter Notes

> Due to some family stuff I will be taking a hiatus. The current plan is to be back in about a week.
>
> Messing with the timeline a little bit here too.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Running was not Daniel's favorite thing. But going with Jessica and Dutch was surprisingly pleasant, they'd been doing it for a week.

It was getting easier.

The downfall however was that Dutch would also show up at the house to pick him up and would just come directly to the room to make sure he got up.

Scared the shit out of Daniel the first time. He woke up to his alarm then turned and there was Dutch, sitting at his desk. Scared him so badly he yelped and Johnny woke up, sitting up hair all messed up, looking around. When he saw Dutch dressed for a run and Johnny had just mumbled, "Have fun running," kissed Daniel's cheek and went back to bed.

It wouldn't be until later in the week, the security was supposed to get set up. He wondered if it would deter Dutch from his morning wake up. He doubted he'd be that lucky plus they were starting with the shop because the opening day was coming up fast. Then the house.

He'd wanted to sleep in five minutes halfway through the week and Dutch had pulled at his sleeve.

"LaRusso, time to run. Up we go Daniel. Go get ready."

Daniel had joked that Jessica was going to be his trainer, but he hadn't expected how much Dutch just wasn't going to let him wiggle out of it.

He became like a brick wall not letting Daniel turn around or change his mind, just kept turning him around and pointing forward.

Onward.

Johnny joked that Dutch was herding him, and it really felt like it. Like Daniel was some sheep and Dutch was a sheepdog not letting Daniel just mosey and enjoy smelling the flowers.

But, as Johnny had expected they didn't leave him behind as he'd feared. Running with him and chatting along the way.

He told Jessica about the death match in Okinawa.

She told them about all the mountains she had hiked and climbed, from Sugarloaf to Knobly. He thought she was joking about the names of these mountains.

"They're real!" she said laughing, adamant she was telling the truth.

"Sure they're real," Dutch said laughing as well. "Like the tooth fairy."

"We'll go to a library or somewhere with an atlas and I'll show you," she said.

It was an early grey morning, with a light mist. A little unusual, Daniel thought but he also wasn't up early in California that frequently to know for sure.

Jessica had been asking Dutch about his bees and was slowly getting a list of all of Dutch's pet bugs. A lot of beetles from the sound of it. Butterflies too.

Daniel wanted to go back to the conservatory and look around some more. But he had a feeling it'd be a while.

He spotted a water fountain and beelined to get water as the two of them bounced at his side, warning him not to slow down for too long.

"Hey!" a voice called and Daniel turned to look at an old damaged blue Ford pull up alongside the sidewalk.

"Oh hey," Daniel could not remember the guy's name.

He walked over, trying to remember the guy's name while he introduced Jessica and Dutch who came closer, curious.

"Terry Silver," the man said.

Daniel introduced them, Dutch and Jessica to Mr. Silver.

"안녕하세요," Dutch said with a slight nod to his head.

Daniel didn't have a clue what Dutch had said or why.

Mr. Silver glanced at Dutch before turning back to Daniel.

"You training for the Olympics or something?"

"No, uh, just some tournament," Daniel said.

It felt weird to say he was training for a tournament when he didn't think he really would compete. When he didn't want to. But that'd take too long to explain.

"The one you won last year? What's it called?"

"The All Valley."

He felt like he should've thrown in the under 18. That he didn't want to but was cornered.

"Right. Good, good for you. A champion should defend his title. John Kreese told me you had a lot of heart."

"Oh, yeah?"

Daniel liked the idea that John Kreese thought he had heart, but he doubted it.

He also noticed Dutch had stopped bouncing and was holding himself in that coiling position, just ever so subtly. Like the name of his old teacher had gotten his blood boiling. Daniel understood that.

"Listen, do you know how to do a front sweep?"

"Well, uh, not really."

Daniel wondered what he was talking about. Mr. Miyagi didn't really name the moves. Not the same way as Johnny knew them. They'd sat down and compared notes and Johnny knew the names to all the moves and Daniel knew them as wax on, wax off or like drum technique. He wondered which one was probably a front sweep.

"Learn, learn. Most of these tournament guys are a sucker for the front sweep. You can catch them every time."

"Really?"

That sounded too good to be true. He'd have to ask the guys. He'd have to ask Johnny. He knew all the moves.

"Ask your Mr. Miyagi. He'll show you."

Daniel was pretty sure if he asked Mr. Miyagi, Mr. Miyagi would show him how to sweep. Like with a broom. It was a nice idea, but he didn't teach that way.

Unless that was what a front sweep was.

"Yeah, well, I'm kind of training for this one myself."

"Oh, that's too bad. Look, I've got a good book on sweep techniques. I'll drop it off for you sometime, okay?"

Daniel really didn't want to learn from a book again, but Mr. Silver was trying to be helpful and he could use all the help he could get.

Plus he'd sounded like he was actually worried about Daniel.

Actually wanted him to win and to learn, that hearing Daniel was on his own for this one had him sympathetic and worried.

When Mr. Silver drove off Jessica turned to them.

"That was real nice of him to offer the book-" she stopped staring over Daniel's shoulder.

Daniel turned.

Dutch was watching the car drive off with a strange look on his face.

When the Ford turned the corner and disappeared out of sight he howled with laughter, scaring a man walking his dog nearby.

"What?" Daniel asked.

"John Kreese said you have heart? The guy wouldn't know a compliment if it slithered up his ass. Heart? Kreese thought you had heart. The absolute bull shit this man is shoveling."

"He said he came into town to help Kreese apologize," Daniel said. "Maybe Kreese had told him stuff he wouldn't tell other people."

Dutch was starting to bounce again, still laughing, ready to get moving.

Daniel sighed following him with Jessica back along their path.

"Yeah about the damn all-valley which he suddenly doesn't remember what it's called? I think he was just pissed because you forgot his name."

"He came all the way from Korea, he's bound to forget things."

Dutch continued to laugh. "Yeah, I doubt that's true either. The guy is made of lies and nothing of substance. If he's been living in Korea and studying under a Korean teacher he should've known what to say in response to 안녕하세요."

"What do you say in response to annyeonghaseyo?" Jessica said slowly repeating what Dutch had said.

"You repeat it back."

"What's it mean?" she asked.

"Peace be with you, it's the greeting. Polite form. I mean he could've said something else to me because I'm younger, but still it's basic shit he should know having come from Korea and having had a Korean teacher. And you said he said Kreese also studied from the same teacher? No fucking way. He never used any Korean. He always told us he learned in the army. Daniel, I'm telling you, that guy is lying through his damn teeth," Dutch said. "And about weird shit. Who lies about who taught them?"

Daniel frowned as they ran.

"What about the front sweep?"

"I mean yeah," Dutch said. "But man, it's kind of close to what Johnny did to you in the tournament. It's not like Barnes isn't going to know it. Really you should ask Johnny to teach you that, he'd be good at it. He read all those books and then practiced them. Unless that's on your list of rewards."

Daniel nearly tripped over his own feet glancing at Dutch who was laughing.

"What? What's on his list of rewards?" Jessica asked.

"It was what he was mumbling about the first time we went out for a run, mixed with enjoying the view," Dutch said.

"Well, that can be a good motivator. Oh, wait Johnny was saying he'd over heard part of it, didn't understand it, something about coming home to him?" Jessica said thoughtfully, trying to remember.

"I guess that's one way to put it," Dutch said with a laugh.

"I'm sorry okay," Daniel said.

"Hey man, you do you. We've been cockblocking you left and right haven't we? Hang in there," he said cackling.

"Not just you," Daniel said sourly, "This whole damn situation. There's always something."

"Oh!" Jessica said eyes wide. "I'm suddenly glad I chose to run with Johnny that first morning."

"Yeah count your blessings," Dutch said. "I delved into the inner workings of Daniel's mind, just a small portion of it and I am scarred for life. I was a little worried, but it seems to not be a problem if Johnny's not around. So we're lucky."

"So does your Mom know you and Johnny are dating?"

"Yeah," Daniel said.

"Want to know something funny?" Dutch asked with a big grin and Daniel's heart sank.

"Yes,"Jessica said.

"So Johnny's got a crush. We try and invite Daniel to hang out as much as possible right? They're...hmm...cuddly? Right? Cute. Johnny continues to chalk it up to just how Daniel is. Well Daniel tells his Mom and ex, right? And Johnny tells his Mom. Their moms become friends. Daniel's Mom fishes for info but Ms. Lawrence made a promise to Johnny to not interfere. So like there were all these chances of them dating earlier and finding out, but no one talked to one another, and guess who confessed first?" Dutch said with a big grin.

"Daniel?" Jessica said.

"You would think, right? He talks the most. You'd think he'd just spill right? Explode at some point for hiding his feelings for- what was it, Daniel? Almost six months?"

"Or something," Daniel mumbled.

"Nope, Johnny did. Daniel, tell her when our favorite idiot decided he had to tell you?"

"In the middle of a big dangerous storm," Daniel said.

"In Okinawa?" Jessica asked.

"Yes."

"Isn't that great? Put them together in room after room. Hell, I threw them together for 7 minutes in heaven. Nada. Throw danger at them and bam dating. Oh, and everyone's like ah yes, stamp of approval. Except for Johnny's ex-stepfather."

"What happened there?" Jessica asked eyes wide, totally enjoying the drama of Daniel's life.

"He belatedly said if he had to chose a guy for Johnny, I was the one he would've picked," Dutch said with a laugh."After five years of hating my guts, and every friend Johnny has."

"Daniel you live in a soap opera."

"Right?" Dutch said. "And everyone wants to make it even more of a soap opera. Like look at this Silver guy right? Says his teacher is from Korea. Can't even say hello in Korean. Says he came because Kreese fucked up the All Valley, can't remember the damn name of the tournament. Says he's here because my sensei died out of a broken heart because we left because he tried to fucking kill Johnny yet we haven't seen any obituaries or a grave or a damn urn with ashes in it. And then he says Kreese said Daniel has heart? Oh, he's trying so hard for something but I don't know what. But it's the next chapter of Daniel's dramatic life."

"I swear my life wasn't this dramatic in Newark," Daniel said.

"What'd you do make a wish with a genie on the ride over?" Dutch asked.

"Oh, or a wish on a star?" Jessica asked.

"Deal with a devil at the crossroads?"

"Cursed wishing well?"

"What did you ask for Daniel? I want a grand adventure? Man, you really gotta be careful what you wish for huh?"

"I did no such thing, I wanted to go home the whole way here," Daniel said.

"Still feel that way?" Dutch asked, playful tone suddenly softer.

"No, I like LA."

"Where's home for you now?" Jessica asked. "I like LA but home's still Columbus for me."

"I keep trying to make it here," Daniel said. "But then it feels like people and things keep trying to stop that."

"Time to put your foot down and kick their ass," Dutch said.

Dutch made it sound so easy. But he'd also seen Dutch fight. He'd been on the other side of it. He didn't back down, he didn't seem to get scared.

Daniel was scared. It bubbled up from time to time.

He'd fought someone to the death last time and got out of it by pure luck.

How'd he get out of this one? Because it seemed like Barnes wanted to kill him.

Why him? Why was it always him?

They continued to run until the cafe Jessica wanted to go to opened. A place to get juice and omelets near the park.

Daniel collapsed into the seat, grateful to sit. To stop moving for a second while the other two went over the menu.

He tried to enjoy the moment. Because he had done it. He'd gone for a run for a full week.

He had friends willing to get up early and go running with him, who didn't mind running slowly, even if it felt like they were running circles around him, keeping pace and keeping him moving forward.

Friends to talk with and to get breakfast with. He hadn't thought he'd get back to this.

This is what he thought his life in Newark would've been like, continued to be like if he'd stayed.

A dream he let go of when he moved to LA.

He just wanted the reason to not be there. The whole reason he was up early and the reason he was running.

Why couldn't it have been something simple like hey we run in the morning all the time, why don't you join us?

Why'd it have to be someone wanted to fight him, backed him into a corner, and now he had to run. Had to train.

Why couldn't it be normal?

The shop was almost ready. Mr. Miyagi was excited. He sang as he worked, hummed, had that sparkle in his eyes and that easy smile. Everything was worth it to have made him that happy.

They'd picked a Saturday for opening day and very very carefully transferred all the bonsai back to the shop with Dutch's help. They set up the shelves, the pots Jessica had made were done and it really was perfect.

Johnny and Daniel told Mr. Miyagi to flip the sign to open for the first time.

Daniel tried to not get his hopes up.

He was worried Barnes and his friends would show up.

He hoped signing the damn paperwork would stop him. Appease him long enough to leave him alone. Let them have this day. This space.

Mr. Miyagi was smiling as he flipped the sign, opening the door and bowing.

Ms. Lawrence stepped in, dressed like she was planning to attend a red carpet event and wanted to stop by to get a bonsai beforehand. Like this was an errand, like she was grabbing a nice bottle of wine.

Even though Daniel had a brunch scheduled with her for later in the month, something that had made him nervous when Johnny had held his hand over the receiver of the phone and held it out to him with a soft, "My mom wants to talk to you."

That had nearly given him a heart attack, even though she made it sound easy and fun.

He was worried that this was a moment to judge him. That she was looking for dust, for things to criticize. But she was walking through the shop with Mr. Miyagi looking at the trees and asking him about them.

Johnny looked so at ease that Daniel tried to relax.

Dutch's hand came down on his shoulder.

"Dude you're fine. Ms. Lawrence likes you. Chill."

Easy for Dutch. He was almost always chill.

There was so much in Daniel's life to not be chill about. But he took a deep breath and tried to find that internal balance Mr. Miyagi always talked about.

She ended up buying three and Daniel didn't know how to feel about that.

They'd made money. Which was great. A sale. And she refused discounts. But it was also like if his mom had come to his lemonade stand and was his only customer.

She looked pleased about it. And Johnny carried them out to her car looking happy as well.

Daniel felt relieved as he closed the cash register.

He'd mark it as a win. Even if no one else came for the day, they'd still had a sale.

Even if it might've been a pity sale.

"She dressed up," Dutch said amused when Johnny came back in after his mother left.

"Yeah, she was pretty excited. Circled opening day on her calendar and already knew where she wants to put them. She's trying to fill the house with as many plants as possible. I had to tell her she couldn't buy them all."

Dutch laughed. "I can't wait to see her place when she has her housewarming party."

"Me too. She's been sketching it out, it's kind of cool."

The door bell rang and Daniel who had resigned himself to one sale and the only other guests being Jessica or the guys, hopped up from his stool at the checkout.

Actual customers.

He watched as Mr. Miyagi spoke with them, as Johnny talked to them, as Dutch helped carry things for them.

He recognized some of them, their neighbors, people who Johnny had handed the flyers out to.

People he didn't know but who seemed to see Johnny and Dutch and who talked to them both warmly. He heard them talk about a gardening shop.

Daniel was surprised at how busy it got.

He hadn't expected that.

He hadn't expected to be so busy that he didn't even see that the guys had arrived until Tommy's aunt was snapping photos for a local magazine, wanting to interview Mr. Miyagi about bonsai and the shop for a spotlight.

So busy that he didn't realize it was lunch time until Jessica popped up at his side with a bag of take out and gave his arm a gentle squeeze.

"Looks like it's a hit," she said with a soft smile.

"Yeah," Daniel said, taking it all in.

There was always a chance they wouldn't keep this momentum up. But they wouldn't be in the red.

They'd be able to keep paying rent.

They'd be able to keep stock and designing stock.

They could pay Johnny.

He felt hopeful. It'd been so hard to feel hopeful. And everyone looked happy.

Busy and happy.

"Congratulations," Jessica said warmly.

"Thank you," Daniel said smiling back.

When the evening came to an end and they locked up, Daniel sunk down to the floor with a sigh.

Johnny was stretching, which was distracting Daniel from what Jessica was talking about.

Bobby had gotten dinner, some take out from a nice restaurant he liked and they sat together in a circle, leaving room for Johnny who walked into the back.

"Congratulations on your first day of your dream shop Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said when he came back, opening a bottle and pouring some into a glass that he handed to Mr. Miyagi.

"What's this?"

"Grand opening gift," Johnny said. "Mom helped me pick it out. It's supposed to be a champagne-style sake."

"Thank you Johnny-san. Please thank mother too," Mr. Miyagi said holding out his glass in a kanpai to their sodas in plastic cups.

Daniel was surprised they weren't drinking as Johnny sunk down next to him, carefully setting the bottle down for Mr. Miyagi to look at.

"Of course Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said taking the bowl of food Bobby was handing him.

"You gonna do teach a bonsai class, Mr. Miyagi?" Tommy asked.

"Or like a workshop?" Jimmy added.

"On bonsai?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

"Yeah, you could offer lessons and classes, people like that kind of thing. And they pay for it," Bobby said.

"Miyagi think about it."

Daniel liked that idea. People coming to learn about bonsai from Mr. Miyagi. A shop with a section for lessons. Learning how to care for tiny trees. It sounded like fun.

Johnny leaned over, shoulder gently brushing Daniel's and he looked over as the guys talked about all the different lessons, as Jessica talked about the community classes the pottery shop did.

"How do you feel?" Johnny asked softly.

"Relieved," Daniel said.

"You did good. This is very cool Daniel."

Daniel felt his heart pounding in his chest. He set his hand on the floor between them, he couldn't do what he wanted, well he could, but the guys wouldn't let him live it down, so instead he laced his fingers through Johnny's on the floor between them. He smiled, they had done it. Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees was up and running and a hit and Mr. Miyagi was living his dreams. It felt so good and he was grateful for the friends around him, there to help celebrate his wins and to help him through his losses.

Chapter End Notes

> The names of places you can apparently rock climb are hilarious According to the Mountain project there are several places to rock climb in Ohio, including some locations called Slippery When Wet, Scrub-a-Dub-Dub, and Slappy McCracken. The area around Ohio heads into the Blue Mountains which then joins the Appalachian mountains. All mountains mentioned are technically mountains, but whether they're open to the public for hiking and/or rock climbing or were in the '80s is a different matter. Sugarloaf I think was privately owned and while you can probably hike all the mountains I mentioned, rock climbing is a different matter. On some websites it says you can rock climb at Sugarloaf but they don't list it as something to do on their website but you can hike.
>
> Champagne sake is actually calledSparkling sake or sparkling nihonshu

Post-run nap

Every morning didn't go the same way.

Dutch came back with Daniel several mornings and would bring Jessica so Johnny stopped trying to go back to sleep. He'd read a little and then getting up and would make breakfast.

Sometimes Mr. Miyagi would still be around and they'd eat together. Other mornings it was just him.

He'd do kata in the garden, taking his bonsai out with him, like he had an audience of one, or a friend practicing with him, just a million times slower, practicing what Mr. Miyagi and Daniel had taught him.

Then his mother learned he was up early every morning and started to come by to get him for breakfast.

He tried to tell her he was waiting for Daniel to come home and he didn't mind waiting for him but she said he shouldn't spend his whole life waiting on a boy. Even if that boy was Daniel. His time was precious and he needed to use it properly. Let Daniel wait from time to time.

Johnny didn't know how to explain to her that he found it relaxing. It wasn't like he was standing in front of a mirror messing with his hair every five minutes or trying to look nice. He was still doing stuff. Taking the time while he waited to do things he needed to do or wanted to do, when he had time to himself. Like installing a grate in the chimney so he could stop checking it every time he walked by.

But he did tell her about the All-Valley and the stuff happening with Daniel and she listened with a frown.

"Cobra Kai is competing?"

"Apparently," Johnny said.

"They shouldn't be. Or Kreese shouldn't be. I've him banned."

"Someone else then. Oh, also some company called Dynatox is sponsoring it and changed the rules."

"Dynatox huh?" she asked scribbling the name down on a napkin.

They were at an old-fashioned diner and she had gotten them both big breakfast platters with pancakes, eggs, bacon, fruit, and toast.

It was too much food but she liked to take the leftovers home.

Sid always told her it looked bad to take leftovers home, wouldn't let her. She was loving doing everything he'd told her she shouldn't or couldn't.

She even would take Johnny's leftovers home. She'd eat them throughout the rest of the day.

Her home was almost done, almost ready for her party. She was getting excited about it. To show everyone around, to celebrate being single again. To have her own place.

She opened her wallet and pulled out a wad of cash and set it in front of Johnny.

"Mom, I'm fine," Johnny said.

She'd already been putting money in his account. He remembered walking into the bank to take out cash and having to figure out where all the money had come from. A stipend, an allowance, and she wouldn't stop giving him money.

He didn't know what to do with it. He tried to pay rent to Mr. Miyagi and he refused. Told him to clean the gutters instead. In a Miyagi way. Just a quiet note that hmmm gutters full.

He no longer felt like he needed an emergency fund. He didn't plan to go anywhere. Just quietly work with Daniel at Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees. Now he didn't even need to be paid.

He could be dorky and say he wanted to be paid in kisses from Daniel or something else silly. It seemed too silly to tell him. But he kind of wanted to.

His mother wouldn't hear of it though. Wanted him to get paid, even if it wasn't much. She was used to not being paid for her work, not enough, and she wasn't happy with the amount of work he was doing for free. Even though he told her he liked doing it. Even if he told her she was giving him too much of an allowance for an 18-year-old boy with little to no expenses. He had to remind her the Avanti wasn't a black hole for gas. That he was volunteering most of the work he was doing. And volunteering was good.

But she wasn't going to stop. She'd stubbornly told him that she didn't get to spoil him, so she was now. Plus she told him he was probably the only kid on the planet complaining that his parent was giving him money.

He doubted that. He knew she worried. Knew she'd been upset when he told her about the emergency fund, about being in Okinawa with no money. Getting hurt in Okinawa and relying on Mr. Miyagi and Yukie to take care of him.

She was overcompensating.

He wanted to explain that if he didn't need to get paid for working for Daniel then they could keep the lights on at the shop longer.

He knew it probably wasn't a good idea long-term. Daniel wasn't the type to let Johnny continue to work for free for long.

But Johnny also wanted to help keep Mr. Miyagi's dream going, to help it reach that point of self-sufficiency and if not getting paid or just collecting IOUs could get them there he'd do it.

"Do you know how to do a front sweep?" Daniel asked after one of his runs.

"Yeah," Johnny said looking up from his book.

"Can you show me?" Daniel asked.

He was sweaty and tired-looking, hair plastered to his forehead.

"Sure," Johnny said setting aside his book and standing.

He walked to Daniel and hooked his leg behind his, tapping at it.

"If I put enough weight and motion here you'd fall."

"Do it," Daniel said.

Johnny nodded, making sure there was nothing he could hurt himself on if he fell.

He looked at Daniel, making sure he was ready, and then knocked his foot against the back of Daniel's leg, sweeping it out from under him.

He reached out and grabbed Daniel before he completely fell.

"Do you want to try?" Johnny asked looking down at him. If sweeping hadn't been the awful thing Kreese demanded Johnny do in the tournament he'd do it more often. Just to catch Daniel in his arms. But it was tainted by the tournament.

Daniel had a thoughtful look on his face.

"Yeah," he said after a moment, pushing himself up and out of Johnny's arms.

He was too gentle the first time but got Johnny the second time.

Johnny got back up quickly and Daniel did it again.

The third time Johnny pulled Daniel down with him, on top of him.

"Is this how you counter it?" Daniel asked amused looking down at him.

"In a tournament? No. Bad idea," Johnny said. "You don't want those guys this close, they can steal a point."

"Is sweeping a good way to get points? Think it'd work against Barnes?" Daniel asked.

"Maybe not perfectly, but it could give you a moment, a breather to take a point and then get away from him," Johnny said thoughtfully.

Daniel pushed himself up but stopped about halfway up, chewing on his bottom lip then looking back down at Johnny and dipping down to kiss him.

"That is definitely a bad idea for a tournament," Johnny said. "You will not get a point."

"Really?" Daniel teased.

"Nope, can't hit the face."

"That's a hit?"

"I think it's the only thing it could be construed as based off the rule book," Johnny said.

"A kiss is not a hit," Daniel said.

"It's contact isn't it?" Johnny said propping himself up with a grin.

"Semantics," Daniel said rolling his eyes. "I think it doesn't count."

"Well, you'll just have to try and change my mind."

Daniel didn't need more than one quick invitation before he was kissing him again, pushing him back down into the grass.

Johnny was kind of surprised he still had energy.

The first morning he'd stayed home while Daniel was out running he'd tried to go back to sleep but it was impossible to sleep in after Daniel left.

He tried.

He knew Daniel hoped he'd just go back to sleep.

But without that weight, that warmth he just couldn't sleep any longer.

So he sat in bed and read.

He worked on his bonsai, talking quietly to it about how it was so damn early that maybe he should go running with Daniel every morning.

Or maybe he could go fishing with Mr. Miyagi.

What did people who got up so early normally do? A run on the beach?

He used to go for a run on the beach and then to a gym, one that was practically free near the beach so he could do Kreese's workout regimen without Sid's money.

It would depend on what Daniel actually really wanted. It had sounded like Daniel had wanted to come home and have sex, but with the way Daniel had practically collapsed after the last run, Johnny didn't think that would actually happen.

But maybe he'd want to go back to sleep, or cuddle, or talk. Or who knew, maybe that runners high would lead to something else.

Johnny went back to reading.

He'd finished all the books the guys were supposed to read for the semester and the librarian, impressed had handed him a thick book, The Count of Monte Cristo, telling him to read it next.

He was thinking he'd have to recommend it to Tommy. It had an air of mystery to it he thought Tommy would like.

He wondered if Daniel would like it, but he was worried that the length of it would scare Daniel off. But he was enjoying it.

The door opened and Daniel was wearing his robe, he must've come home and gone straight into the shower.

Johnny had meant to pretend to be asleep, to try again, because that had been part of Daniel's mumblings, waking Johnny up. But then he'd gotten lost in the fucked up life of Edmond Dantès and the perfect storm of evil scheming men that sent him to the chateau d'if.

"Why am I not surprised?" Daniel asked with an amused look sitting down next to him. "Did you go back to sleep after I left?"

"I couldn't, I meant to but," Johnny held up the heavy book.

"That good huh?" Daniel asked rolling onto his side, leaning against Johnny's shoulder.

Johnny wanted to say yes. Would happily start over and read it to Daniel, introduce him to Edmond the sailor who was arrested on his wedding day because of a conspiracy, a group of people who were pissed at him for being successful and getting the girl.

Johnny stuck a bookmark into the book and set it aside.

"It's good. How was your run?"

Daniel's arm came around his chest, curling up against him.

"I hate it," he said with a frown.

"That bad huh?"

"But," Daniel said with a sigh. "They're good company and they keep me going. They are brutally determined not to let me slow down or stop."

"That's good right?"

"Yeah," Daniel said but without the feeling behind it, like it was but he didn't like it.

Johnny shifted down so they were face to face, rolling on his side towards Daniel.

"I'm proud of you."

Daniel looked at him, a little surprised.

Johnny gently put his hand on Daniel's cheek.

"You're getting up early and doing something you don't want to. It's not easy. I hated going for 5 am runs. But it's better than a 1 pm run. You're doing all of this stuff with a goal in mind. You're showing up, it's fine if you complain about it or hate it. But you're still doing it."

Johnny was pretty sure Daniel wasn't wearing anything under the robe and he wanted to answer that question, it was open at his shoulders and he could see the expanse of skin there, but he wanted to know for sure.

He wanted to reward Daniel for his hard work. It might not have been exactly what Daniel had in mind when he mumbled about coming home to Johnny but he thought it could be pleasant, and he wanted to try.

"Is Mr. Miyagi's truck here?" Johnny asked.

"No, he's gone to the shop already."

"Did Dutch drop you off or is he also around somewhere?"

"He had taekwondo, he left," Daniel said.

Johnny nodded leaning forward to kiss Daniel, hands going to the tie around Daniel's waist but Daniel had shut his eyes, his breathing was slow and steady, asleep.

So fast that Johnny had been stunned.

Exhausted from running.

He let his hands drop and just picked up his book again, reading with Daniel curled up next to him, sleeping softly, damp hair on Johnny's arm, bound to fall asleep before Daniel woke up again.

Now though it seemed like he had more energy with the way his hands were running up along Johnny's chest. Awake more than he had been the last couple of times he'd come home and taken a nap, finding wherever Johnny was and climbing onto his lap making Johnny think things were going in a different direction before Daniel fell asleep. It'd happened six times so far, not that Johnny was keeping track.

"Are you going to fall asleep?" Johnny asked when Daniel pulled away from his lips to look down at Johnny.

"Of course not," Daniel said.

"You like your after-run naps," Johnny said.

Daniel was tugging up Johnny's shirt and he felt the tickle of grass against his skin.

"I think I'm finally building up some stamina," Daniel said.

He looked proud of himself, confident. But still tired.

Johnny didn't get his hopes up. He'd been on this ride before, it was a slow carousel that before it came to an end Johnny usually ended up with Daniel asleep and Johnny having to carry him off to bed any hopes of an orgasm or anything close thrown out the window.

He started to push himself up a little but Daniel pushed down on his shoulder.

A gentle request to stay.

Johnny stayed, watching Daniel sitting on top of him, looking golden in the early morning light.

There were a lot of things Daniel never had control of in his life that Johnny knew.

It was like he was playing an awful game of shells and every time he made a choice life switched out the prize. Gave him a rock or nothing instead of money or a chocolate like he'd expected.

He didn't get to stay in Newark.

He didn't get to join the soccer team or swim in the pool he'd been promised.

He didn't get to spend his summer in LA with Ali, heck he hadn't gotten to spend prom with Ali either, he hadn't been able to talk Kumiko into coming home with them, he hadn't gotten to help Mr. Miyagi spend more time with his father, he didn't get to come home and see his mother or go back to the apartment and live there with her again.

He was forced into fight after fight without a choice.

Buffered around and it wasn't fair.

Daniel complained about it. But he also faced it. Dug around him to get his bearings before facing it.

He'd search other spots of his life for some semblance of control, his own way of balancing it out.

Sometimes he just wanted Johnny to be there. To lean against him, a safe steady shore to weather out the other storms.

Sometimes if Johnny thought of where they started he felt dizzy. Overwhelmed by the way Daniel looked at him, reached out for him, trusted him.

He knew from the look on Daniel's face he wasn't going to sleep.

No before work nap this time.

His heart pounded in his ears, trying to swallow his heart back down, to force it to calm down.

"You do know, you were the hottest person in our school right?" Daniel asked, fingers running along his skin, like he's trying to memorize it, every feeling of Johnny beneath his fingers.

One thing Johnny had learned was that Daniel's mouth was always busy, especially now that they were on the same page.

Those quiet lust-filled looks didn't last too long before Daniel just closed in whatever distance there was and would start whispering in Johnny's ear and it was overwhelming. Hand on his arm, or shoulder.

Whatever dam had been keeping it all in his head had broken or overflowed and the number of compliments he got meant if someone asked Johnny what Daniel liked about him he'd have a very weird list to share if he felt like sharing it. Johnny didn't think he'd ever be able to repeat it out loud.

Daniel liked his hair, the way the sun hit it, how soft it felt. That one was tame, something he sometimes whispered in their room when he played with Johnny's hair before bed or when he woke up.

He liked his muscles which Johnny had already guessed, already knew, but the way he talked about it was like a starving man being given his favorite meal.

Daniel liked his eyes, his hands, his legs, the list kept going depending on the day and his mood.

He liked this outfit or that outfit, specifically because of the way it showed off a muscle or his eyes or something else, but he liked it better if it was off.

He was talking about his ears, which was a new one.

Daniel was talking about how pretty they were when they were red and Johnny was struggling because Daniel was biting his earlobe, his breath tickled and his hands were on him, between them and it was hard to figure out how to focus, what to focus on.

He was always trying something new. Always had something he wanted to give a try. Some never-ending list. Like he had a copy of kama sutra somewhere with a goal to try every possible choice, even though Johnny knew they weren't anywhere near that yet. Working their way there though Daniel kept small bottles in his pockets now, like he was ready for that, with travel size lotions or vaseline or oil, whatever that wasn't for his hands. Or was only for one hand. They still got used, just not how Johnny expected, not yet.

Johnny didn't know how to respond to what Daniel always talked about, told him, the never-ending cascade of warm compliments, the way he lamented that Johnny wasn't in a dojo that wore gi's because it'd be fun to take it off, like that was a normal regret someone would have.

But while Johnny didn't have the same courage to just compliment someone until they turned into a pile of goo which is what Johnny felt like, he kept trying to figure out a way to convey how he felt back. He didn't know where to start.

Like he was pretty sure if Daniel had talked his ear off in the first place, anywhere even close to this, he wouldn't have been able to lift a fist to have fought Daniel for the life of him.

He would've curled up in a ball covering his blushing face with his arms.

An instant knockout, point LaRusso.

Which would've been a very different night on the beach that first time.

Kreese wouldn't have been able to give him a good counter, because Johnny didn't think there was one for horny Italian guy from Newark with a dirty mouth that knew what he was doing or at least had the confidence to follow through until Johnny was boneless and towing a line of embarrassed and turned on like a trapeze artist.

He wanted to think of a way to reciprocate it, other than rolling his hips, moving against Daniel, other than trying to touch Daniel whenever he could, trying desperately to focus when everything out of Daniel's mouth threatened to destroy it.

Johnny never would've won a single fight if he'd ever met this version of Daniel's dirty talk. Or the fact that he didn't seem to care where they were half the time. Like the garden.

Johnny would've moved them, to their room, but Daniel's one-track mind, once it got settled, didn't usually seem interested in moving.

Though to be fair, Johnny had opened that door at the drive-in, but he'd tried to give them as much privacy as possible.

The garden was barely private. And with the number of people who just showed up, it was almost less private than the shop. And even there Daniel would sometimes come up and whisper something in his ear. Like if he had something to say he couldn't keep it to himself.

It was kind of a relief that the shop had been busy since they opened.

That Mr. Miyagi was around, that Daniel kept professional appearances because he was pretty sure if there was a lull or if Mr. Miyagi left and it was just the two of them Daniel would not be able to keep his hands to himself.

And the problem was that Johnny wouldn't mind.

The fact Daniel wanted him, even if he hadn't said a word, even if he didn't say it all the time, was addicting.

And it made him wish he'd gone to the beach earlier. That he hadn't thought about what he was going to tell Ali and practiced it in front of a mirror all afternoon, and practicing it quietly in front of Bobby, pacing in his room until he didn't sound like the nervous wreck he'd felt, in the hopes that she'd tell him something, anything about why.

That he'd just gone early, then maybe he'd have met Daniel first, maybe he would've been chiller about the whole thing, maybe he'd have played soccer with Daniel.

He wanted to hope for better what-ifs, more time together from the start, a change in timeline like he could go back and fix things, so that instead of doing this in Miyagi's garden they could've been doing this earlier.

Though there was a chance Johnny wouldn't have been able to focus long enough to graduate.

Every study date would've devolved, he wouldn't have escaped the clutches of Cobra Kai.

He might not have escaped Sid either.

He hated the "everything happens for a reason" nonsense but it was apt.

The path he'd taken had been long and winding, had beaten the shit out of him, cut up his feet so that whenever he looked back it was just a nightmare of his own bloody footprints and darkness. It was such a stark contrast from now that he wouldn't trade it. He'd rewalk through that awful path if it led him here, with Daniel rubbing against him and moaning loud enough Johnny was glad Miyagi lived in the middle of nowhere.

That they didn't have neighbors.

Johnny didn't know what they'd do if they got an apartment.

The number of noise complaints they'd get would probably get them kicked out.

All those dreams of soft mornings drinking coffee from their favorite mugs and making eggs and toast, standing in a kitchen somewhere downtown waking up slowly in the safety of their apartment. Safe from people like Sid, or Kreese, or Mike Barnes and his friends might end abruptly if they couldn't figure out a way to quiet down in the right spaces.

That or Johnny was going to have to learn how to do soundproofing. Soundproof their entire apartment. Anywhere they lived. Because he never wanted to quiet Daniel, let him talk all day long, all night long, be as loud as he wanted, then they could play their music louder when they danced. However, they danced.

He'd find his own ways to show Daniel how much he loved him.

He'd work his way to words.

Ways to tell him that the way Daniel looked at him made his heart flutter, that he sought him out in a crowded room because he liked to see him having fun, liked to see the way he smiled when talking to people, talking with his hands.

He liked watching him cook, the way he danced around the kitchen, knowing how to do everything. The way sometimes he got show-offy with a knife, the way he could flip an omelet or a pancake with his wrist in the pan, no tools needed.

The way he leaned against the wall and curled the phone cord between his fingers while he talked to his mom.

The way he looked golden in the morning, the way his mouth tasted it when they kissed, his eyelashes while he was sleeping, the way he looked in those shorts he sometimes wore that seemed outrageously short, or that jersey that rose scandalously when he stretched.

The robe he wore when he got out of the shower after his runs, the way he talked about the bonsai, about his plans, his dreams, about anything, and everything, the way he looked so peaceful while doing kata, the way he looked when he drove his yellow Ford, when he drove Johnny somewhere like it was a treat, or even when he got into the Avanti.

The way he got annoyed when the guys showed up and slept on their floor, but then settled in and talked with them, enjoyed their company as much as they enjoyed his.

How nervous he looked setting a new dish he'd tried to make in front of Johnny, how expectant and how proud a simple nod and telling Daniel it was delicious made him. How he beamed. H ow competitive he got over the simplest things and Johnny couldn't help but meet him, every time.

How fun it was to rile him up because it usually brought Daniel into his arms.

How he looked, how he sounded when he was close, fingers digging into Johnny's skin like he wanted to leave his fingerprints behind, to try and steady himself.

How the words out of his mouth somehow managed to get worse, something Johnny never thought was possible.

How Daniel always pulled Johnny along, over that edge like it was easy.

Maybe he was too easy. Which was an embarrassing realization.

Whatever Daniel wanted to do or try Johnny was down, as long as it was Daniel.

And he'd figure out how to tell him, one day.

Johnny had had breakfast with his mother again and it'd turned into brunch. After talking to him about plans she'd been working on for the house she drove him back to Mr. Miyagi's. He was getting the updates slowly. She'd hired an interior designer she was working with who'd painted and wallpapered, redone the carpets, and made sure her home was getting the most natural sunlight a house could without turning it into an oven during cloudless LA days.

He hopped out of her car and into the dirt of the lot.

It was sunny and warm out and there were new paths in the dirt.

Unfamiliar cars had come into the drive.

He walked quickly to her side, kissed her on the cheek, told her thank you and ran to the gate to the garden.

The guys always parked the same way, always stuck around and it was a weekday.

This was as if someone had peeled out in a hurry.

There was no blood that he could tell.

He spotted Daniel in the backyard in his work out clothes near the punching bag they'd set up.

He was sitting and reading some old book.

"What's that?" Johnny asked sinking down next to him.

He had some dirt on his shirt next to his neck and Johnny brushed it off.

Daniel looked up at him and showed him the book.

It was on karate.

Old.

Johnny shifted, pulling Daniel back into his arms, so he could read it over Daniel's shoulder.

Daniel settled against him.

It wasn't good.

It was dry.

It was like one of those books you find in a garage sale and you think oh hey I like karate only to find it's being sold for a reason.

A book where the writer didn't know what they were talking about.

The math textbook they had in school was more interesting then this thing.

"Daniel," Johnny whispered softly in his ear. "I can get you better books on karate. If you want to read about it."

Daniel blinked, pulling his gaze from the book.

"Are there better books on karate?" he asked like he doubted it was a possibility.

"Yeah, this is....uh...bad," Johnny said gently tapping the page of a badly inked person in a pose. "Where'd you even get it?"

"Just someone trying to help," Daniel said leaning back to look at him.

"I figure I can get all the help I can get."

Johnny didn't know how to tell Daniel that whoever gave him this book probably actively hated him.

It was the most passive-aggressive gift he'd seen in awhile.

It was like when you got someone a book on how to get their shit together when they thought they were doing fine.

It would've only been worse if it'd been like a karate for babies book.

"How about we go to the library?" Johnny asked gently kissing Daniel's neck.

"You say that like you're offering to take me dancing or somewhere to have sex," Daniel said with a breathy laugh.

"I like the library," Johnny said mock hurt, mock offense.

He hadn't really taken the guys with him to the library.

Any of the libraries in his collection.

But he couldn't just stand by and let Daniel read some awful book that was like trying to sift through sand for water.

It'd cause damage rather than teach him anything.

And he kind of liked the idea of taking Daniel to the library, holding his hand and leading him through the stacks, knowing his way around.

Showing off that he knew how to find things quickly, and knew the good ones.

Daniel was studying him for a split second before he grinned.

"Is this like a big deal?" Daniel asked.

He looked excited. Twisting around to look at Johnny.

"I know you like books and reading and whatnot, heck the book you've been reading is massive and you're still pretty into it. But is this like, oh I don't know, like if you take a girl shopping and you follow her around while she looks at shoes and she's just so fucking happy?"

"It's not like shoes," Johnny said releasing his arms from around Daniel's waist and leaning back.

"Ugh you know what I mean," Daniel said.

"No, I'm afraid I don't," Johnny said, head tilted.

He didn't.

He liked books yeah, but it wasn't the same as someone who liked shoes.

Libraries were free.

A no fight zone.

Safe.

He'd seen plenty of girls get into fights over clothes during a sale.

"You've got like what five library cards in your wallet, which one would we even go to?"

Johnny already knew which one.

The one that had stained glass ceilings and alcoves you could disappear into.

They had the best collection on martial arts and he hadn't been in in awhile.

Plus it was close.

No Strings Attached

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The libraries were somewhere that Daniel had wanted to see ever since realizing that was all that was the only thing in Johnny's wallet in Okinawa.

He wanted to know what kind of guy collected library cards like some people collected credit cards or baseball cards. Why his guy thought it was special.

He wanted to see what the appeal was.

He wanted to see it through Johnny's eyes.

Not just the library they went to for his birthday or the one in New York.

He wanted to see Johnny's libraries, the ones he loved so much he took their cards with him overseas.

Plus he was wondering if it could be an aphrodisiac. Like if they did well enough at Little Trees if Daniel took Johnny to a bookstore and told him to get whatever books he wanted if he'd get laid.

Not that Johnny really needed an aphrodisiac but Daniel wanted to collect all the things Johnny liked, wanted to know what got him going because so far Daniel thought he was still guessing.

To be fair having mornings filled with running had been exhausting, but Daniel knew what he wanted. He'd been enjoying what they were doing up till this point but he wanted something he didn't know if he could have.

Okay, there were a few things he wanted that he didn't know if he could have. But he was working up the courage to ask for one of them. Steps. Slow easy steps forward.

The problem was he'd have to keep his hands to himself and he didn't know if he could.

He was worried about it, worried they'd slide backward.

But the thought of Johnny looking up at him with those blue eyes, on his knees kept popping into Daniel's head, kept stirring his blood. He knew he'd want to put his hands in Johnny's hair, but he was scared he'd choke him.

It'd be different of course, he wouldn't put his hands around Johnny's neck, but he was worried that even though he knew he wouldn't last long that one wrong mindless move might wake up those very carefully laid to rest fight or flight responses.

It was why Daniel was mostly trying to control the flow of their encounters to rubbing against one another or hand jobs.

Because he feared hurting Johnny in any way close to some of the worst people who'd been in Johnny's life. He refused to be that person. To fall even remotely on the same radar, to set off those responses even by accident.

Johnny had parked at the library and was holding his hand out to him, motioning for him to follow.

Daniel took his hand, always surprised at how comfortable Johnny was at holding his hand almost anywhere and everywhere. Like he wasn't scared of anyone.

Johnny led him through large hallways that were polished and echo-y and up a set of spiral staircases into a large room with stained glass and through the stacks, like he knew his way around as easily as he knew his way around LA. He looked so at ease.

He stopped and let go of Daniel's hands looking through the shelves and grabbing books.

"This one is strategy," Johnny whispered placing one into Daniel's hands. "This one's offense, this one's defense, do you want history? No, probably not useful right now."

A book went back onto the shelf.

"This one has the sweeping you were asking about. Are five books too many?"

Daniel realized it wasn't a hypothetical question and looked at Johnny whose hand was hovering over the shelves, over another book, and Daniel smiled.

He was always so fucking beautiful. But the light of the library suited him in a weird way.

"This is enough," he said softly, holding the stack of books to his chest and holding out his other hand.

Johnny took it, leading Daniel through the halls to the checkout.

There was a librarian who looked kind of bored for the middle of the week mid-afternoon, but she perked up seeing Johnny, eyes glancing down to the held hands and then the smile turned to Daniel.

"Studying karate again?" she asked, eyes flicking back to Johnny.

"Daniel is," Johnny said with a soft smile.

She nodded.

"Johnny's read through that section at least fifteen times. Every book in the section, so he knows better than I do which ones are the best."

She took the books from Daniel going through and checking them out.

"He knew which ones to grab automatically. I think I'm lucky to leave with only five," Daniel said.

She smiled.

"He regularly maxes out how much he's allowed to check out. Though I heard, you're currently focusing on The Count of Monte Cristo. How's that going?"

Johnny looked a little startled.

"How did you-?"

"Well, we learned you've been sneaky and have multiple library cards during your mother's divorce proceedings. It was kind of nice to meet other librarians and talk about stuff, so now we meet a couple of times a month to compare notes and ideas. You come up sometimes. We were curious why you went to so many libraries so we compared what you checked out normally. That's how I learned we have the best martial arts collection," she said proudly.

Johnny looked embarrassed and shifted uneasily.

"Yeah, it's good."

She nodded, smiling warmly and taking his card. "Now I get to tell them because we have the better martial arts collection I got to meet Daniel. They will be very jealous. Daniel, you've got two weeks but you can renew them."

"Thank you," Daniel said taking the collection of books, shifting them back to one arm so he could hold Johnny's hand again.

He kind of liked that.

Liked that some group of librarians was going to meet up in a week or two to talk about what children's programs were working and what was bothering them and this librarian would tell them she had a sighting of Johnny's boyfriend and looked absolutely delighted about it.

He liked that Johnny's community seemed so excited to see him, so excited to see them.

Johnny was right.

The books he'd gotten Daniel from the library were a million times better than what Mr. Silver had given him.

He felt bad because maybe Mr. Silver just didn't realize.

Maybe he'd been out of the country too long to know that books had gotten better.

Maybe when he'd last been in the states this was all they'd had about karate.

But what he was reading was better. Plus if he got bored with one he could swap to the other ones. Read strategy, tournament styles, offense and defense, and basics.

Things he knew but hadn't ever had names for.

He read in the evenings after work, Johnny on his side of the bed reading, and Daniel felt kind of old.

Like this was going to be them in 50 years or so, but with reading glasses on their noses.

It felt dorky.

But Johnny looked so peaceful and content.

Running was also getting easier, his days were better.

He'd come home in the morning and shower after the run and go to their room to change.

Sometimes Johnny was still reading, sometimes he was in the garden doing kata, sometimes he was out having breakfast with his mom.

But it was nice.

One morning while Johnny was in their room reading Daniel decided to just ask, to just tell Johnny because it's what he wanted and it was becoming a persistent dream. Haunting him. His godfathers had always stressed talking about things, communication, and he knew they'd tell him to talk to Johnny.

He sunk down on the bed next to Johnny kissing the side of his neck.

Johnny put a bookmark in his book and turned to Daniel, moving so that he caught Daniel's lips with his own, away from his neck.

Even that, if Daniel thought too much about it made his heart hurt so badly.

Johnny trusted him to be near his neck, something he hadn't trusted anyone with for months, not even his mother.

And now Daniel could kiss him there and bite there and maybe Daniel didn't need a blow job. He could survive his entire life without one. They'd do other things, keep doing other things.

Johnny's hand was on his thigh, running his thumb in circles on his skin. Warm and soft from being in bed while Daniel had been out running.

Johnny's other hand went to the tie of the robe Daniel was wearing and it hesitated just the briefest of second before pulling it loose.

Hmmm, maybe he should just see where Johnny would go with this, because Daniel was curious. Curious what Johnny would do. He was pushing the robe from his shoulder, kissing the skin as it was exposed. So damn gentle.

"Do you need a nap?" Johnny asked pausing, hand warm on Daniel's hip.

Daniel was so focused on what Johnny was doing that it took him a moment to register what Johnny had asked.

"No, of course not."

"You sure?"

"You seriously think I can just pass out in this state?"

Johnny laughed softly. "Just checking. Last time I tried this you passed out."

Daniel blinked at him, he had taken naps the first couple of days after starting his running. Maybe the first week.

He would take a shower and curl up next to Johnny and fall asleep.

He laughed softly.

"Sorry, didn't mean to leave you high and dry. But clearly not happening this time."

"Is Mr. Miyagi's truck here?"

"Nope," Daniel said suddenly feeling like he'd been through this conversation before. Maybe a couple of times.

"No Dutch?"

"Nope."

Daniel wanted to tell him to hurry up with whatever he wanted to do, it was kind of like watching someone trying to get organized before starting a project and Daniel was going to get frustrated and take over and he was trying not to this time.

He was trying to let Johnny try what Johnny wanted to try.

Curiosity and libido were at war and if Johnny didn't start something Daniel might die or ruin it.

Though having him leaving a bruise on his hip with his mouth was a new one, taking the scenic route was what Daniel realized Johnny was doing.

It was kind of ridiculous, maybe he'd just take care of it himself.

Johnny caught his hand, kissed the top of it, and interlaced their fingers and Daniel huffed a sigh.

Johnny was smiling, he knew what he was doing, taking his time and how frustrating it was.

Savoring.

Daniel wasn't something that needed to be savored. He was still a young guy, he didn't need the slow molasses build-up. He got turned on sometimes by the stupidest things sometimes. Watching the way Johnny did just about anything could set him off. Walking, running, fixing things, the way his hands moved across the pages of whatever book he was reading or across the steering wheel of the Avanti. The way he looked on a beach, frolicking in the ocean and having fun. Perfectly innocent things that his body just always reacted to.

But Johnny seemed to like the slow romantic foreplay.

Seemed to like to savor him and that was something that made his heart pound quickly in his chest.

A frantic excitement, that Johnny would take his time because he wanted to and because it was Daniel. He was opening his mouth and the panic flooded Daniel's veins.

"Wait."

Blue eyes flicked to him, curious, waiting, the tongue that had peaked out withdrawing back.

"Be careful," Daniel said.

"I'm not going to bite you Daniel," Johnny said amusement fighting with confusion on his brow. "Not unless you want me to."

Oh god.

"No, I mean...you don't have to."

"You don't want me to?"

"I do, but-"

He'd just been tormenting himself on how much he wanted this exact thing and here he was cockblocking himself.

"Only do what you can handle," Daniel said. "I don't want you to choke."

Johnny looked down at Daniel's dick in his hand and studied it with an embarrassing level of attention. Like he was trying to figure out logistics now and Daniel covered his face in his hands.

"I don't want you to get hurt," Daniel said softly. A whisper into the air.

"Did it hurt you?" Johnny asked.

"Huh?" Daniel asked pushing himself up again, looking at Johnny. Focusing was difficult with the gentle lazy way Johnny was moving his hand. "No, it's just-"

Johnny lowered his head again and Daniel's planned sentence, the words he'd struggled to get to line up in a way that made sense scattered away and were replaced with a few choice surprise curses.

Daniel didn't have a clue what he was saying, lost them like they weren't even stopping in his brain for a visit to register before filling the air around them.

Johnny seemed amused by that, the faintest trace of a smile on his face as he bobbed his head.

Maybe if he could go back in time he'd tell himself, the version of himself being a brat about going to LA to hang in there.

Give it a year, you'll have a boyfriend enthusiastically giving you head like he'd been studying hard with one goal in mind.

Pre-LA him, warned with that future premonition would've avoided the beach that night, flirted with Johnny up a storm until he got that boy in his bed before a year.

One goal in mind, lure him into your bed sooner.

Because he won't leave once he's there, and the things you want him to do he'll do of his own volition without needing to ask.

Just let him try.

That would've been nice.

But this was also nice.

Even if he didn't know what to do with his hands.

Even if he wanted to grab Johnny but couldn't let himself.

Johnny might not get it, might not be thinking about how Kreese had choked him or the months of being hurt, of running when anything went near his neck, but Daniel remembered and he refused to let that happen again, to ruin the moment by trying to take control of the situation this time.

So he tried to find other things to hold onto, the bed was a good one.

Huh, if he thought about it it's what Johnny did.

Subconsciously keeping his hands to himself, probably also trying not to hurt Daniel then.

An unspoken moment of the same idea shared between them.

Not wanting to hurt one another, even though it took everything in Daniel not to move, to not chase the feeling building up, knowing if he could just hang in there, it'd be amazing and without an accidental reopening of an old wound.

Besides, maybe he could just keep talking, even if he couldn't keep track of what he was saying, coming undone easily from Johnny's tongue, led exactly where he dreamed to be.

Daniel thought he could train with Johnny.

But he learned he couldn't.

Not if they were alone.

He couldn't help himself.

It was like a dance.

It brought him close to Johnny in ways that even if he tried to focus on paying attention, on karate, it led his mind elsewhere, to getting Johnny out of his clothes as fast as possible, and based off the knowing smile and the way Johnny teased him it clearly was a similar thread running through Johnny's brain.

"Anytime you wanna train, I'll be there for you. No strings attached."

It's what Mr. Silver had said.

After the fifth or sixth time of trying to focus on sparing and not the way the sun hit Johnny's skin or his hair, the warm way his hands felt on him, Daniel realized he couldn't spar with Johnny with a goal in mind.

He couldn't prep for the tournament this way.

He needed somewhere to go and study.

But he was worried it'd hurt Johnny's feelings and Mr. Miyagi's.

He wanted them to relax. This was his problem. Not theirs.

Even so, going to the Cobra Kai dojo felt wrong.

Everything about the place felt wrong. From the sirens that went by as soon as he walked from his Ford to the door, to pushing the door open and watching Mr. Silver practice in his black gi.

He didn't know what he'd expected when he heard Mr. Silver say he was reopening the dojo. But he'd expected other students. Other people. But it was just Mr. Silver.

He didn't know if that was better or worse.

He wanted to say it was better.

No students should be in Cobra Kai, hell he didn't think he should be there.

But he also felt bad for Mr. Silver, trying to clean up the mess left behind by his friend, willing to create a place for people to go and practice, opening space up for Daniel. And Daniel needed a place to spar that didn't lead him to be dizzy with lust.

The whole place felt haunted, with Kreese's photos watching him and his cardboard cut out still by the door.

The bright dojo Daniel remembered stepping into what felt like so long ago had a darker dingy atmosphere.

He tried to chalk it up to it being evening.

That he'd come by after working in the shop.

"Listen, I gave your offer some thought." Daniel began as Mr. Silver walked over all smiles, hands on his hips. "And, um..."

"And?"

He felt so bad asking.

It felt like he was going behind Johnny and Mr. Miyagi's back. But Mr. Miyagi had his dream to focus on and Daniel couldn't stop focusing on Johnny.

With his luck, he'd accidentally trained himself into flirting with whoever he fought from now on and it'd get awkward.

"And if it's not too much trouble, I'd like to take you up on it. I mean, you know, just on a short-term basis."

Because eventually he'd figure out how to be balanced again after the fight with Mike, and he could enjoy kata with Mr. Miyagi and Johnny and he could keep things in separate compartments.

"No trouble, are you kidding? It'd be an honor. How does Mr. Miyagi feel about it?"

Daniel frowned, honor just felt wrong now.

It was like a red flag that sent up all the alarm bells in his head because of Chozen and Sato.

People seemed to always have their own definition of the word and how did he tell this guy who thought it'd be an honor to help train him that he was doing this behind Mr. Miyagi's back? That he wanted Mr. Miyagi to work on his dreams and not the constant fights Daniel found himself in?

He felt ashamed going behind his back but Mr. Miyagi didn't have time to teach him, didn't want to teach him for a tournament.

Mr. Miyagi always hoped there was a way out of it, a different path or route Daniel could take, but he could never find it.

It kept leading him to fights, even if he tried his hardest to run in the opposite direction.

Even if the tournament might end up being fake.

Even if he might never have to step onto the mat.

But Daniel was worried. He didn't like that the guys had gotten hurt and it felt like only a matter of time before Mr. Miyagi or Johnny got hurt.

He couldn't have that. Couldn't let that happen.

"Mr. Miyagi, he, um...he doesn't...He doesn't need to know about it, if..."

"But he knows you're competing," Mr. Silver said with a frown.

It was kind of like Mr. Silver was leaning in close without leaning in.

Johnny was taller than Daniel but didn't make him feel small.

He was like a nice tree to lean up against or to teasingly move so he could enjoy a bit of shade from the sun that always made Johnny laugh.

Mr. Silver was tall in a different way, imposing.

He made Daniel feel small like he was a mouse being inspected by a hawk or a big snake.

"Yeah. I mean, he knows that. He just...He doesn't approve."

"Well, everybody has a right to his opinion. Look I won't say anything."

Why did it have to come to this?

It felt bad.

The way he worded it made it sound like he was cheating. Like he'd gone over to the enemy's side and was betraying everyone.

He wasn't. He was just going to train in an actual dojo and learn some moves and try to focus on training.

He just needed the space, like a gym, to train where he wasn't distracted.

"Thanks," Daniel said softly with a nod.

"So, when do you want to start?"

"I mean, that's up to you. Whenever it's..." Daniel said shrugging.

This was a big favor.

He couldn't afford to pay right now.

The shop was out of the red but they still had to pay off the broken windows and the repair to the roof and get more bonsai.

He didn't have any other spot he knew of to go and train.

"Oh, hey, I got a gi hanging in the closet. I think it'll fit. What do you say we go right now?"

"Now?"

Daniel thought he'd need to fill out paperwork, that Mr. Silver would want him to pay something, or promise to pay something later.

Also whose gi was it in his closet that fit Daniel?

Didn't all the cobras take their stuff when they left?

Was it like some lost and found?

Daniel was pretty sure in comparison to all of Johnny's friends Daniel was the smallest.

How gross was that gi that no one had wanted to take it home?

Was it the snake?

Maybe all of the guys had left their gi's behind because like Johnny they couldn't handle it.

Couldn't stomach seeing that snake again.

He went into the locker room after Mr. Silver handed him the gi.

He stared at the snake longer than he should've. He didn't like it. Didn't like seeing it again, not this way.

But he put it on anyway.

He hadn't been able to figure it out for the tournament because Mr. Miyagi's training didn't include gi's.

Daniel didn't want to have to rely on Ali for that if he ever entered another tournament again. And he'd even joked with Sato that it was the one thing he'd been especially bad at.

They'd had a day in Sato's dojo while Johnny was out with Kumiko and Yukie and Sato had shown him how it was meant to be worn, how to tie the black belt on.

He'd told Daniel that Miyagi-san's karate needs no uniform. But for the rest of us it helps to separate. Time to fight, time to rest. Important to learn, like any other tradition, hmm custom. Like tea ceremony. Like dance.

Chozen had rolled his eyes, from where he'd stood in the corner with his arms crossed.

Sato had wanted to show him a different move, something he'd created to take home.

For protection and good luck.

Like he'd known Daniel would get into more fights.

Like it was bound to follow him like some damn curse.

And teaching him the move, how to wear the gi was like a way to pass on his knowledge, a piece of his karate to go home with Daniel as an apology.

Sato's root karate was the same as Mr. Miyagi's, but who he was now, what he did was different. And he wanted to share that.

Told Daniel he looked forward to seeing what his karate would become one day.

Daniel didn't think he'd ever be so grateful for that lesson on how to wear a gi.

The whole situation would've been even worse if he'd had to have asked Mr. Silver for help. To explain with his head bowed in shame that he didn't know how to wear one.

The lights were on brighter in the dojo when he stepped back out, barefoot onto the mats.

A weird human-shaped monstrosity of wood and metal, like some demented game of hangman, stood in the corner.

Mr. Silver stood ready for him with red focus mitts, something Daniel only knew a name for from the books Johnny had checked out for him.

He was nervous.

The fake person in the corner freaked him out a little.

It was made of thick wood but he reminded himself why he was there.

Just in case Mike Barnes didn't take Mr. Silver's threat seriously, in case he tried to fight someone else, in case things went south.

He would be ready.

Even if he'd had to walk straight into the cobra's nest to get the help he needed.

Chapter End Notes

> All the other librarians were super jealous that one of them got to meet Daniel and now will forever ask Johnny where Daniel is and why he didn't bring him with every time they see him.
> Johnny was worried they'd take away his cards and make him pick one.

Old Traditions and New

Johnny came home to find Daniel sitting on their bed with his foot in a foot bath with Mr. Miyagi looking sad, on his way out. He looked between the two of them setting his things down and hurrying over.

He'd gone to babysit the kids after work and after hours of kids shows and reading to them and making mac and cheese with little cut-up hot dog pieces in it he'd expected to come home to Daniel and Mr. Miyagi sitting around after dinner, not the tense atmosphere.

He sunk to his knees next to Daniel looking into the green bubbling water.

"What happened?" he asked looking up at Daniel.

"It's nothing," Daniel said waving off his concern.

"Was it Barnes? Did you drop a bonsai on your foot?" Johnny asked reaching for Daniel's ankle to look.

"I'll be fine. I just kicked some 2 by 4s."

"Why would you do that?" Johnny asked, voice tight, looking up at Daniel who sighed and ran a hand through his hair.

"Great question," he said with a sigh, flopping back on the bed. "I thought I could do it."

Johnny gently set Daniel's foot back in the water and laid down on the bed next to him. "You want to break boards?"

"I guess. Honestly, I just don't know what I'm doing. I just-" Daniel sighed covering his face with his hands.

"We've got Dutch's tournament soon, he's like specializing in breaking boards, maybe he'll have a bunch of tips and tricks you can use."

"You think?" Daniel asked looking at him, as Johnny wrapped his arms around him.

"Well you did break through a shit ton of ice," Johnny said. "You can probably break a 2 by 4 like Mr. Miyagi broke through that tree. It's not impossible, but Daniel, you gotta work your way up to it. You could break something by jumping into it kick first."

"Yeah?" Daniel asked, his eyes were glittery like they were full of unshed tears and Johnny kissed him softly.

"Yeah," Johnny said softly, running his fingers through Daniel's hair.

He smelled kind of weird.

Almost like the cigar smell of the Cobra Kai dojo. But it was so faint that Johnny thought it had to be something else. Like he walked through some smokers on the way home.

He made sure Daniel was comfortable, got snacks, and curled up next to him.

"That book you've been reading, will you read some of it to me?"

"Sure," Johnny said looking for his book, grabbing it as Daniel rested his head on Johnny's chest and he flicked back to the beginning, introducing Daniel to Marseilles and the Pharaon.

"Where's that?" Daniel asked, interrupting and looking up at Johnny.

"France."

Daniel frowned but quieted as Johnny continued, introducing him to Edmond Dante.

"He was a fine, tall, slim young fellow of eighteen or twenty, with black eyes, and hair as dark as a raven's wing; and his whole appearance bespoke that calmness and resolution peculiar to men accustomed from their cradle to contend with danger."

Daniel shifted, careful to keep the injured part of his foot in the water, rolling onto his side as Johnny read, wrapping his arm around him.

After a while, while Dantes was explaining that he didn't think he had any enemies who might be out to get him, bewildered as to why he'd gotten into trouble, he realized Daniel had fallen asleep.

He carefully shut the book and set it aside. Daniel's long dark lashes fanning over his cheeks, his lips parted as he slept.

Johnny glanced around their room, at the bonsai on the desk.

"Think he's going to be okay?" he asked it quietly.

Daniel was smart, he knew better than to go around kicking 2 by 4s and hurting himself.

He'd looked distraught like he knew it'd been a bad idea but hadn't been able to stop himself, hadn't been able to figure an out.

Like there was some gang out there that he was determined to join where you had to kick 2 by 4s to get in. It was like he was a kid trying to fit in with the cool kids but being hazed.

He ran his fingers gently over Daniel's shoulder looking at the bonsai with a frown.

He didn't understand why Daniel was kicking wood when he was focused on training and the shop. But he waited a bit, then carefully pulled away.

He tucked Daniel into bed drying off his foot then heading off to shower.

When he came back Daniel was still asleep, gripping Johnny's pillow tight.

Johnny turned off the lights and sunk down onto his side of the bed, gently tugging at his pillow.

Daniel rolled over knee going between Johnny's legs just barely escaping an accidental injury.

Daniel shifted on top of him like he'd been looking for him in his sleep and as soon as Johnny was there again he wasn't moving.

Johnny's ears burned and he breathed an unsteady breath through his mouth.

He wondered if he'd ever get used to it.

He was starting to doubt it.

Daniel always found ways to get under his skin and this time, it was by tangling up their legs the way necklaces got tangled up in a jewelry box together.

The guys came home almost every weekend, a loud arrival breaking the quiet of Mr. Miyagi's home.

Johnny would've worried if he hadn't seen how Mr. Miyagi prepared for their arrival.

The way he went shopping for snacks before they arrived.

The way he restocked the fridge, asked about what Daniel and Johnny thought they'd like to have for dinner over the weekend because they almost always spent the night.

If he didn't see the smile on his face when they piled in greeting Mr. Miyagi warmly.

Sometimes they came early, surprising them in the shop and every time it happened Mr. Miyagi was delighted and put them to work.

He didn't know if the guys realized how happy seeing them all made Mr. Miyagi, or even how he liked talking to Johnny's mom when she came to ask questions about her bonsai.

But it was a relief that they weren't destroying the man's peace and quiet. A relief that he seemed to look forward to the company in his own way.

Jessica came over for dinner sometimes when the guys were over and the little table Mr. Miyagi had would become crowded, but it wasn't a problem, sitting around chatting with bowls of food in hand.

Jessica asking them about classes and the going-ons of UCLA.

She'd tell them about the running with Dutch and Daniel, map out the rock climbing she wanted to do for the weekend.

They'd complain about the fact she wanted to go early in the morning but it was all playful.

They'd all go anyway.

It didn't matter how early, how tired they were from a week of classes and partying but they'd show up and herd Daniel and Johnny out the door to meet Jessica at whatever rock she'd picked that weekend to go climbing.

They'd take Dutch's van Saturday mornings after breakfast with Mr. Miyagi, always asking if he wanted to go rock climbing with them and Mr. Miyagi would smile but shake his head, had stuff to do.

So they'd drive down to the shop and pick up Jessica who'd sit in the back with Johnny and Daniel.

She looked so happy.

Every Saturday morning with all her gear climbing into the van.

They'd drive out to Joshua tree, following her instructions on what to do the first time.

A million questionns directed her way that she seemed to love. Answering their questions, and showing off as she scaled the rock face like it was nothing, easy, while the guys huffed and puffed their way along.

They did Echo Cliffs a couple of times, Jessica slowly building up the difficulty as they went through all the rock climbing in the area and they were getting better at it.

They had less questions for her.

Knew what to do to stop and just hang out, literally, along the rocks, and to enjoy the view.

And it seemed to help Daniel.

To get out with the guys and take a moment to stop and enjoy the view.

Though he usually was slower, taking his time up or down the mountain.

Enjoying the sunrise as it broke over the horizon.

It seemed to bring him some peace, to help him rebalance.

Johnny had never thought about rock climbing before, but he got it.

Knowing he could scale a mountain with just some rope and a few tools gave him a level of comfort in himself like he knew if some bastard tried to start a fight with him he'd probably be fine, but now he knew if he had to climb a mountain he could do that too.

Not that there seemed to be many emergencies in his life that would lead to that, but it was still comforting. And the sunrises were always stunning.

He looked back at Daniel in his orange puffy jacket looking out at the sunrise, thinking.

He was always so slow when they climbed up the mountain but faster going down.

He talked, it wasn't like he was quiet the whole time.

He talked with Jessica and the guys and Johnny.

At first complaining about the process, how scary it was, W*hy'd she do this for fun? This was fun? They were all going to die!*

But now that he no longer was focused on what was right in front of him, now that he could expand his view, relax and enjoy the things pointed out, like hey check out that hawk, or look there's the van, it's so tiny.

While they were hiking along one of the cliffs to get started Daniel hooked his arm through Johnny's and leaned in close pointing out into a crevice.

"Mr. Miyagi planted a bonsai in there for safekeeping," he whispered.

"Yeah?" Johnny asked, it looked unsafe to go down.

They walked a little closer and he saw water coming in.

It had to fill up.

He spotted the little tree, it looked exactly like the design on Daniel's gi, on the patch on his red jacket he was wearing, on the red jacket Daniel had worn to the o-bon festival.

"That's a scary-looking one," Dutch said. "We climbing down that?"

Jessica laughed.

"No, there's another spot, that one fills with water, it's not safe."

They followed her along the rocky outcropping to a good spot.

Dutch was talking about his upcoming tournament.

His parents said they were coming.

He was trying to sound nonchalant about it.

Like it wasn't a big deal. Like he wasn't trying to get his hopes up again.

But Johnny could see it.

He wanted his parents there.

He wanted them to watch, to be there in the crowd.

He was getting his hopes up again.

They'd have to prepare in case his parents flaked.

Dutch would shrug his shoulders, say it hadn't mattered, but it would've.

The guy didn't see his parents often. Had grown up mostly alone, so every promised arrival of his parents got him excited, hopeful.

He met Bobby's eyes and knew he was thinking the same thing.

He nodded to Johnny. They'd do something. They'd be loud enough to drown out the silence where his parents were supposed to be. Because they knew.

They'd seen how disappointed Dutch had been at their first tournament, looking through the crowd for his parents, unable to find them, the way his shoulders had sagged adding it to the litany of other broken promises.

Johnny had recommended they go out for pizza afterward, just the five of them.

Nothing fancy.

The older kids went out to some restaurant with Kreese, but Dutch needed attention, not to disappear in the crowd or in the shadow of the older kids.

They'd ridden their bikes there afterward, following Johnny to a hole in the wall he liked with cheap but good pizza and crowded around a booth, sticking Dutch in the middle so he couldn't escape.

Well, he could've.

He could've climbed over the back of the booth seat or over the table but he didn't.

They talked about the fight, Johnny breaking down all the stuff he'd noticed the guys do, their strengths, what they'd done well while they ate greasy pizza and drank soda.

They listened to him and he remembered his heart pounding wondering if it'd been the right idea, to cheesily tell them what they were good at after a tournament when Dutch hadn't even placed.

When he'd lost and his parents had broken their promise.

But their eyes had been on him and he'd kept going.

He'd been reading all the books he could on karate and tournaments.

And it'd paid off, he knew for his own final match why he hadn't won, how to improve to win next time. What he should've done.

He didn't know if they'd want to hear that. What they should've done. But he was excited to go home and tell his Mom about it, about his first tournament, about how the guys had done because she wanted to know.

He'd thought, back then, Sid wanted to know too.

Dutch started to sit up a little straighter, that feral look he had sometimes fading listening to Johnny heap praise on him, telling him he was doing good, and it was their first tournament and they'd done better than the other newbies from other karate clubs and dojos. They'd done better than the other kids in their own dojo.

Bobby had held up his cup of soda, a short speech and they cheers'd to a better tournament next time, to kicking everyone's ass in the future.

Maybe they'd go to pizza afterward again, or maybe Dutch would have something with his taekwondo friends.

Johnny wasn't sure as he made his way back down the mountain by rope next to Daniel who was talking about the shop, how he was thinking maybe they should print out care guides because so far it was all on Mr. Miyagi. Little pamphlets so Mr. Miyagi didn't have to talk to every customer before they left.

Johnny agreed.

The care guide Mr. Miyagi had written him, in the beginning, had been invaluable. He still had it somewhere. He'd worn the paper thin, reading it so much, over and over again, until he'd memorized every word, every stroke of Mr. Miyagi's pen.

When rock climbing was done they went out for brunch.

It was a nice way to spend their Saturdays, like a continuation of the hiking he and Daniel had done for their dates, but with friends.

As the month continued on the tournament plans revved up.

Jessica hadn't ever been to a tournament and when they went on their lunch break they'd talk about it.

Daniel would talk about the one All-Valley he fought in and Johnny would talk about all the tournaments he'd been in.

What he expected, what he was curious about, comparing Taekwondo and karate.

She said she was ready to cheer on Dutch, excited to see the fights.

On the morning of the tournament, Johnny walked with Daniel through the crowd with Jessica and Mr. Miyagi to find their seats in the gymnasium.

He saw Bobby and the guys in their seats, waving out towards them, saw Mrs. Douglas with her son sitting near the front who waved at him as they passed.

Bobby hadn't lied.

There were a lot of girls in the group with him, near the seats the guys had been saving. Wearing sorority t-shirts and UCLA gear. There'd been a bus out front.

"Did you all come with the girls?" Johnny asked sitting down next to Bobby.

"Yeah, we hitched a ride on the bus with them," Jimmy said.

There was a girl sitting next to him who smiled and held out her hand.

Jimmy looked pleased.

"Johnny right? I'm Jenny," she said with a smile.

Johnny shook her hand.

"Nice to meet you," Johnny said introducing her to Daniel, Jessica, and Mr. Miyagi.

He was looking through the crowd and laughed, in the middle of the sorority group was Gabriella and her grandmother. Abuela looked so small among all the college girls but looked delighted. One of the girls was chatting with her in Spanish. Gabriella caught his eye and she waved. Johnny waved back.

"Gabriella ride with you all too?" he asked amused.

"No, they were here first and one of the girls knew her so they just surrounded them. I learned that Abuella used to go to oh what's it called? Lucha libre matches when she was younger and Gabriella said her grandmother's been looking forward to it since Dutch mentioned it. Said her grandmother would've come and got her even if she hadn't already planned to come."

"She does know it's not wrestling right? Like it's not the same thing right?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah, I think Abuela's just excited to see some fighting. Gabriella translated it to, watching Dutch kick some ass."

There was a blonde sitting next to Tommy that Johnny hadn't clocked yet.

He leaned forward a bit trying to figure out who Tommy was talking with but Bobby grabbed his hand and put a disposable camera in his hand.

"You've got a job," Bobby said.

"Right," Johnny said looking down at the camera.

"Pass one down to Daniel and Jessica. See if Mr. Miyagi wants one."

"Won't they all be from the same angle?"

"I guess," Bobby said with a shrug. "But if one of us is shit at taking photos and it's blurry then there's like four or more chances."

"Got it," Johnny said passing them down. Tapping Daniel's thigh and handing him the cameras.

He stopped his conversation with Jessica only for a split second, hand going to take Johnny's only to realize Johnny was handing him something not asking to hold his hand. He looked down at the camera then up at Johnny.

"Pass it down please."

Daniel took them, handing one to Mr. Miyagi and Jessica. The row in front of them was empty, they were near the front, and as the announcer walked out welcoming them in Korean and then swapping over to English, explaining the rules and the plan Johnny watched a fashionably dressed blonde walk in followed by a couple in black suits still wearing sunglasses and looking uncomfortable.

It was his Mom, she reached back taking Mrs. Dutch's hand and pulling her along to their seats in front of Johnny and his friends.

"Oh thank fucking god," Bobby said relaxing next to him as the Dutch's parents sat down in front of them, as they nodded to Johnny and his mom reached back to pat his knee and smile at them.

"I wasn't expecting my mom to come," he said surprised.

"Dutch invited her in person. And Jimmy explained during one of their meetings how his parents never show up. She must've dragged them here. Bless your Mom."

"Yeah, but she said she didn't want to come because she didn't want to see him hurt," Johnny whispered back.

The tournament started and Johnny watched.

He'd never been in the seats before.

He hadn't expected it to be so popular.

At most of his tournaments, he ignored the crowd because it was his opponent's parents and friends and none of them were cheering him on. So he tuned them out. But it was different being in the crowd for a friend.

Daniel's hand found his and Johnny glanced over.

He was watching, studying the moves of the tournament with his lips in a straight line.

Not happy or upset, focused. Like he was prepared for this to be him soon, to see how a different tournament did it, to take in moves he could use himself.

Two people stepped out and held out boards, three at different levels, and Dutch walked out jumping up and breaking each one of them before his feet touched the ground again.

"Shit that was cool," Bobby said from his side and Johnny nodded.

After a couple of groups showed off what they could do the tournament began.

Dutch went through several rounds ending up in the semi-finals which made the atmosphere electric. Surrounded by people there especially invested in Dutch. And Dutch seemed aware of it, Johnny caught his eyes, watched as Dutch took in the guys and the girls and grinned and then his eyes flicked down to see his parents and Laura and he smiled. Head held high as he turned and listened to his teacher. His Sabomnim.

It was impressive to watch him go, light on his toes, darting around the mat, faster than he'd ever been in karate.

He got first place in his class and Johnny itched to go down and congratulate him. Grinning as Dutch's parents stood up cheering loudly when he won, when he was handed his trophy, almost as loud as the group around them. All that hard work paid off.

"I'm going to ask him how he cuts through boards," Daniel said softly from his side.

"He is a good person to ask now. Award-winning champion of cutting boards," Johnny said with a teasing smile on his lips, rolling the film in his disposable camera to get one last shot of Dutch's parents talking animatedly to his mother.

He had plenty of Dutch, at every step along the way.

He just hoped they'd turn out good.

He wondered if they'd take him out for pizza, or steak if he'd have something he wanted to do with his parents, if they'd be willing to hang around long enough to do something, or if his taekwondo club would have plans.

He'd have to be prepared to be flexible.

It was Dutch's win and they'd see him when they saw him.

The guys were talking animatedly as they crowded around outside, waiting to see if they could congratulate Dutch.

The sorority girls had descended on his sabomnim with questions, she'd looked a little startled at first but had warmed up quickly, they'd taken Gabriella and Abuela with them, like they were honorary sisters they weren't letting go of.

"So what are you doing now?" Johnny asked Bobby.

"We figured we'd go home for a bit, then maybe spar a bit with Daniel," Bobby said with a stretch. "Go rock climbing. You know the usual fun."

Johnny poked him in the stomach grinning as Bobby jumped, swatting at his hands.

"The usual fun huh? Is Jenny joining?"

"I don't know, you'll have to ask Jimmy. They've just started hanging out more. He's pretty smitten."

Johnny turned to look for Jimmy and spotted Tommy and the girl he was talking to.

The other guy who was with them.

Johnny stiffened, his arm going around Daniel and pulling him in before he could walk off to find Dutch.

"Johnny?" Daniel's muffled voice came from his chest.

He gently swatted at Johnny before letting out a huff of air, frustrated, stewing but not trying to free himself.

"What the hell Bobby?" Johnny asked.

Bobby blinked at him then turned.

"Yeah, shit, so that wasn't my doing. Dutch invited her as a joke and she invited her boyfriend. Tommy's playing buffer."

Johnny knew Daniel was good with Ali, but her boyfriend was...he didn't know about that.

"What's wrong?" Jessica asked.

"Our ex is here," Johnny said stiffly.

"Ali?" Daniel asked, still quietly muffled, trying to pry himself free again, pushing himself on tiptoes to look over Johnny's arm to see her. Johnny covered his eyes with his hand.

"Yeah," Johnny said with a frown.

Damn Daniel was wiggly.

"You both have the same ex?" Jessica asked with a laugh. "I'm adding it to the your life is a soap opera list. Is it on bad terms?"

She was looking at him pointedly.

"Er, Daniel and her still get along, but she cheated on him, with uh," Johnny motioned to the football player.

"Oh," Jessica said glancing over, "Oh!"

"Yeah, and I don't, we're not in bad place, but I'm not a fan of...either of them."

Daniel bit his pec through his shirt and Johnny yelped letting go, hand going to his chest.

Daniel smoothed out his hair. "I'm fine Johnny. I'm not scared of some college football player," he said reaching out and taking Jessica's hand. "I'll introduce you."

"You were smothering him," Bobby said softly.

"He's going through enough, he didn't need-" Johnny sighed rubbing at his chest. "Little fucking piranha."

Bobby laughed softly throwing an arm around him, gently bumping his head against Johnny's. "It's kind of nice."

"Nice?" Johnny asked looking at Bobby in horror.

"Yeah, I mean that's something I would've expected before Daniel to do. You know? Bite you in the tit."

"What the hell are you talking about?"

"You and Daniel were always play fighting on top of actual fighting you know? Before Okinawa and you guys dating and this Mike Barnes stuff. Reminds me of the old him. I was getting worried."

"Can't believe your fucking happy that my boyfriend bit me."

"I mean doesn't he bite you anyway? I don't know why you're so unhappy," Bobby said poking at a spot on Johnny's neck near his shoulder that he knew was bruised from Daniel's mouth.

Johnny swatted at Bobby who laughed. "My Mom is here, Mr. Miyagi is here."

"You are as red as a tomato," Bobby said with a grin. "Listen I get you were trying to protect him, but like he's safe here. Tommy is over there and he took Jessica. Plus he and Ali are on good terms. Just let them hang out for a second."

Johnny heard familiar footsteps and swallowed down the petulant complaint on his tongue to turn and look at his mother who ruffled his hair.

"You survived not jumping after the ref," Johnny said.

"Yeah, I'm proud of myself," she said with a smile dipping her head down to kiss him on the cheek. "Though it helped that Mr. and Mrs. Dutch were louder than me with every complaint."

Johnny nodded with a smile watching as Dutch walked out, changed out of his uniform, and was met immediately by his parents. "Thanks for bringing them."

"Of course, all these boys are precious to me. A guy wants his parents with him, I will make it happen. Though the power I wield is a little dangerous, it's going to my head. I didn't even have to ask much. I just mentioned I had heard Dutch had a tournament coming up and they jumped. Do you want to come with us? Figured if they had someone else to go with they couldn't back out. Though uh, getting them out of their black tinted van was a feat. I promised we'd have dinner," she leaned down and whispered softly. "I don't think they have a lot of friends actually, so this is probably good. Almost feels like I've befriended like a very lonely kind of paranoid Addams family," she said smiling.

"They're nice," Johnny said.

"How is it both of you are on their friend list and none of the rest of us are?" Bobby complained.

"Oh I wouldn't say that," Laura said reaching out and pulling Bobby into the hug. "Besides, you know we love you too right?"

Bobby grumbled into the hug but was smiling.

"He kicked ass didn't he?" Laura said with a smile. "Is this how all your tournaments were?"

"No, we didn't have such an intense cheering team."

Laura's smile faltered and she let go to cup Johnny's face. "I'm sorry honey."

"It's okay," Johnny said. "I always had the guys and Dutch-" Johnny paused turning to look out at Dutch smiling, actually beaming and so happy as he talked to his parents. "He's needed this."

Laura smiled smoothing Johnny's hair before wrapping her arm around his shoulder. Johnny wanted to tell her that this also was nice. Just being with her, cheering on Dutch together with his friends and Daniel, and being in the crowd of so many people cheering for the same person. To see Dutch get the recognition he deserved.

Goal in mind

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Daniel met Ali's new boyfriend officially and it was weird. But this he could handle. He could meet his ex-girlfriend's boyfriend. He could do it with a smile on his face when he asked if Daniel was dating Jessica because he was still holding her hand.

Daniel grinned and he threw his thumb over his shoulder.

"Nah, I'm dating the blonde," he said motioning to Johnny who still has a sour look on his face rubbing his pec.

Maybe that'd been a bad choice, but it'd also been satisfying.

The football player glanced between the two of them. Johnny with some other guy's arm around his shoulder and Daniel holding some girl's hand. Let him be confused. It was fine.

It was refreshing. Normal. This was what everyone else dealt with, awkwardly running into their ex and the new person they were dating. It wasn't related to karate in the slightest. Daniel could breathe so easily.

Ali talked about her classes, promised that they should meet up soon, especially after Jessica, leaning forward voice low, responding to how'd your summer go with "He fought to the death in Okinawa."

Daniel watched as Ali's boyfriend who was still puzzling over Johnny, looked back down to Daniel, like had to take this information in and readjust his opinion and preconceptions and that was satisfying.

"Okay, we seriously have to catch up. You went to Okinawa?"

"Yeah, Johnny came with."

"That's what Tommy said," she said turning and smacking him on the chest.

"Their life is like a soap opera huh?" Jessica asked with a grin.

"Jessica, I like you, how long are you in LA for? I need someone else to fill me in on all the excitement I missed."

Jessica looked delighted by this. Delving into their workout routine to get Daniel back into fighting shape for the All-Valley.

"But you're-"

"Yeah I know," Daniel said. "I've been cornered by guys so hopped up on karate to the point they barely have any brain cells left who are determined I fight again."

"Daniel," Ali said, voice full of concern. "That's awful."

"Yeah, which is why," Daniel said turning towards the crowd gathering around Dutch. "I'm going to see if he can teach me how to kick some boards."

"Kick some boards why?"

"My teacher wants me to break 2 by 4s," Daniel said absently trying to watch what Dutch was doing, where he was heading off, trying to decide if he could ask tonight or tomorrow.

"Teacher? 2 by 4s? Daniel, what are you talking about?"

"He said it's the only way I'll win, he made it look easy, cut through it with his foot like butter," Daniel said. "We'll get brunch," he said shooting her and her boyfriend a grin and let go of Jessica's hand to go find Dutch.

Watching Dutch kick through those boards made him realize there had to be a trick to it. That the closet he was going to get to figuring it out was by asking Dutch.

It wasn't impossible after all Mr. Silver had done it. Plus Mr. Miyagi had broken like a huge piece of wood with his hands.

Dutch was talking to his parents who clapped him on the shoulders, said a few quick things and then walked off, grabbing Mrs. Lawrence who'd been talking to Johnny.

She looked surprised, kissed Johnny's forehead, and followed after them.

Johnny's arms were still folded across his chest, his face was still a little pink. His eyes found Daniels and Daniel smiled. He'd make it up to him.

"Okay, what did you do to Johnny?" Dutch asked arm coming around Daniel.

"Bit him, probably overdid it," Daniel said.

Dutch laughed. "Bit him huh? I used to bite people, parents are glad I outgrew it, and here you are being a menace to society with no grumpy adults around to complain about it. So, what can I do for you?"

Was it that obvious Daniel wanted something? He kicked at the ground beneath his feet.

"Yeah, uh you kicked through boards, think you could kick through something thicker?"

"Thicker?" Dutch asked.

"Yeah, you know that guy with the book?"

"Daniel," Dutch said softly, concern in his tone.

"Well he's been helping me and well I want to kick through boards."

Dutch studied him a moment, before hauling his bag over his shoulder and giving Daniel's shoulder a gentle squeeze. " Yeah okay, I'll add it to this weekend's hang-out plans."

Daniel relaxed, relieved.

"Thanks."

"No problem, it'll be fun to show off some more."

They ended up going out for pizza at some little hole in the wall and the guys seemed so at ease, with Jessica and Mr. Miyagi among them.

Bobby had said the girls had gone after Dutch's teacher to ask her a million questions and Johnny was talking.

They'd egged him into it. And Dutch was batting his eyes in an exaggerated way that had Jessica and Daniel laughing until Johnny talked. Breaking down the fight, praising all of Dutch's hard work, until at the end he held up his cup.

"You kicked ass! Sorry Mr. Miyagi."

Dutch laughed quickly raising his glass.

"Hell yeah, I did," Dutch said with a big smile on his face.

Was this the cobras from before? One of those things they did from long ago?

A tradition that was there's that they'd let them into?

Like going to the carhop with Johnny or up to the lodge?

It was so nice, all these places they let him into. That they didn't even think twice about. Dutch could've done anything after his tournament but he chose this. And Daniel could see it, those five boys after All-Valley tournaments sitting around talking about the fight and eating pizza, making Johnny go over the highlights. He wondered though what it'd been like after the last All-Valley. Had the tradition been broken? Or had they all sat here unable to say a word, going through the motions but not feeling it? Had Johnny been there? Had they waited for Johnny hoping he'd walk through that door but knowing he wouldn't join them that time? Hurt but not able to blame him or be upset at him, more upset with themselves and Kreese. Betrayed?

Dutch was saying something and Daniel tried to reel his focus back in. Something about how nice it'd been to having his parents finally show up. Not exactly like that but it was clear and bold what he meant between the lines, of having the guys bring so many friends to come and cheer him on.

Touched.

Daniel patted his arm a big grin.

"Of course," he said.

Dutch blinked looking up at him with a warm smile. "I knew I made the right choice telling Johnny we had to keep you."

"Keep me?" Daniel said with a laugh looking back at Johnny who was blushing and trying to hide it behind a sip of his soda.

But he didn't deny it reaching over and taking Daniel's hand in his, thumb brushing over the back of his hand.

Even their traditions were healing.

Daniel refused to give up.

He'd broken so many boards under Dutch's teaching. After Dutch had showed him the right way.

He thought he had it and was ready to face that monster in Mr. Silver's Cobra Kai studio.

He'd take care of the legs.

But then as their lesson continued as he squared up he realized Mr. Silver wanted him to go for the ribs.

For the chest.

Make the guy stop breathing.

It was fucked up.

Everything Mr. Silver was teaching him was fucked up.

But he was tired of people not leaving him alone. Mr. Silver paused, tilting his head when Daniel hesitated.

"Mr. LaRusso, what are you hoping to accomplish? You want to do this to win the tournament right?"

Daniel frowned.

He didn't care about winning the tournament.

He just wanted to go back to the quiet time he'd had with Johnny.

He wanted to keep him safe.

Didn't want anyone to put their hands on him again, not like Chozen who'd just waltzed up behind him, held a knife to his throat, and then like Mr. Miyagi, Johnny was too forgiving.

The thought of what sort of nightmare would happen if Johnny ran into Barnes was stressing him out.

He worried that Johnny just wouldn't run.

Wouldn't get away fast enough.

"I want to keep my boyfriend safe," Daniel said, eyeing the wooden practice dummy.

Mr. Silver had turned the face on to show Mike Barnes.

He hesitated to throw the punch though.

He'd gotten out of a fight to the death without killing Chozen.

He could figure a way out of this.

But he couldn't

"I can't help you if you don't take my help," Mr. Silver said with a sad sigh, shaking his head and walking away.

Daniel hated that.

Hated disappointing people.

He already had disappointed Mr. Miyagi.

He was already screwing up, he couldn't keep screwing up.

He sighed, if only it'd been the legs, he couldn've taken the legs.

But he sighed, looking at the wooden planks, hauled back and punched.

His knuckles immediately bled.

He grimaced.

He kept at it.

At home Johnny caught him trying to sneak around, caught his injured arm, the bloody knuckles and his eyes widened with concern.

He didn't say anything though, glancing up at Daniel's face, studying him for a moment before gently bandaging him up in their room, using the first aid kit and the green powder.

But then he pulled Daniel into his arms, careful of his hand, careful of his arm that he'd been holding to him when Johnny had found him.

"If there's anything I can do," Johnny whispered.

"Just be here," Daniel said after a while, leaning back against him, breathing in that freshly showered smell, twisting slightly in his arms, pressing his nose against his warm neck. Closing his eyes. "Just stay right here with me."

Chapter End Notes

Terry Silver to his people following Daniel around "Find his boyfriend".
Then when he gets a manila folder, he doesn't look at it. He just passes it to Barnes and his friends.
"Go introduce yourselves."

Self Defense

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Johnny was sitting outside a cafe reading. Daniel and Mr. Miyagi were out getting more bonsai, he was supposed to meet Jessica but her aunt had gotten some rush orders, she was going to be late. He didn't want to hang out at the shop by himself so he'd gone to a cafe. Thought he'd try something new and she'd meet him there. It felt fitting to sit reading a French book while sitting at a cafe.

"Hey man, you LaRusso's boyfriend?"

Johnny blinked looking up at three guys. Mike Barnes hands were on the table in front of him and he was leaning forward with a sneer.

Looked like his element of surprise was gone.

"Yeah, and?" Johnny asked. "You the boyfriend police? Need to check some credentials?"

"We just want to have a chat," one of the other guys said pulling Barnes back.

"A chat huh? About?" Johnny asked.

A fist grabbed the front of Johnny's shirt, trying to pull Johnny in. He liked that shirt it'd been a gift from Tommy, so he leaned forward with it, glancing at the fist then up at Barnes.

"Don't want LaRusso to get cold feet, so we'd like to remind him what's at stake."

"How many hits to the head have you gotten?" Johnny asked gently placing his hand over the fist on his shirt.

"Just want to talk," the guy said again, the little Tweedle-dee behind Barnes. Tweedle-dum didn't seem to be paying much attention, checking out the waitress.

"We are talking, aren't we?" Johnny asked, raising an eyebrow at the guy with the necklaces. "Or is this not talking? Is that some slang from whatever sewer you all crawled out of?"

"Listen here-"

"Are you going to punch me or kiss me? Because I'd rather the first honestly. I'm pretty happily taken and you're not my type."

It worked.

Barnes hauled back his arm and Johnny shifted so it wouldn't do as much damage when it connected with his face.

He'd have a black eye, but, Sorry Mr. Miyagi, Barnes hit first which meant it was a free for all now and Johnny could not wait.

He stood up grinning looking down at the guy. Barnes looked up startled, eyes growing wide for half a second as Tweedle-dee and Tweedle-dum realized what was happening.

"This can't be the right guy," Tweedle-dee said.

Barnes opened his mouth to say something but Johnny stopped him with a punch to the face, stepping out of the way of the cafe tables and chairs.

"Snake, man, what do you wanna do?" Tweedle-dum asked.

Barnes looked pissed. Determined.

That was fine.

Johnny had time.

He had plenty of revenge to get.

A black eye for Jimmy.

A kick to the stomach for Jessica.

He didn't know how to get revenge for Daniel though. He wasn't going to destroy some shop just to get glass in the bastard's arm.

But he could keep hitting.

Let him run this time.

Barnes got a few hits in, but Johnny barely noticed. He'd done a good job of letting his anger go, but this guy was like a dog with a bone. Wouldn't stop.

He wouldn't kill him. He wouldn't permanently injure him. Even though it'd be so damn easy to snap his stupid arm. Even if he thought it might make him feel better.

Johnny grabbed Barnes's shirt, hauling him forward. "You and your little friends leave Daniel and Mr. Miyagi, the shop, and Jessica alone. If I hear you were skulking around again you will not like what will happen."

Barnes turned his head with a scowl on his face and spat out a gob of blood. He'd heal. Johnny hadn't hurt him too badly, just roughed him up. Had show restraint.

"Fuck you."

"No thanks, again, not you're not my type. But hey, you're the one who wanted to talk, since you care so much about this tournament. Whose your sensei? Which dojo are you fighting for?"

Barnes looked away from him scowling.

Johnny flicked his forehead.

"Is there anything in there?"

Barnes let out a string of curses. "I study at Cobra Kai okay you bastard."

"I figured."

"You figured-" Barnes hauled off on a bunch of curses trying to pry Johnny's fist from his shirt.

"Yeah, so whose your sensei? Kreese?" Johnny asked, proud of himself for saying the name aloud without tripping over it, without his voice shrinking.

"Fuck no man, Silver."

"Silver?"

"Yeah, you got shit in your ears? Terry Silver. Now let go."

Johnny let go frowning as Tweedle-dum and Snake grabbed Barnes and ran.

The name was familiar he just couldn't place it. He wondered if it was the guy who snuck into the house.

He should ask, he turned.

They were gone.

Damn, he shouldn't have let Barnes go.

A hand came down on Johnny's shoulder and he turned.

The waitress was holding a packet of peas.

"For your eye hon," she said with a soft smile.

"Thanks," Johnny said. "Sorry for the commotion."

"It's fine, that the guy you warned us about?"

"Yeah," Johnny said softly.

"You let me know if you need anything," she said.

"Thank you," Johnny said sitting down at the table he'd vacated.

He didn't normally get into fights in front of adults. But she seemed so unfazed.

He'd warned every shop he'd gone into about Barnes and the guy with the slicked-back hair when they were telling them about the grand opening.

After Daniel and Mr. Miyagi would walk out, he'd handed over the grand opening flyer and told them about Barnes and the mysterious guy who broke into Mr. Miyagi's house.

He warned them to be careful, come if they needed help.

"Holy shit Johnny!"

Johnny looked up to see Jessica.

"Hey," he said.

"What happened?"

"I met Barnes," he said with a grin.

It stung a little.

He must've busted his lip.

That sucked.

It'd hurt to kiss Daniel.

Should've hit Barnes harder.

"Shit, let me get you home. Where's the Avanti?"

Johnny laughed. "I think hanging around with Dutch has destroyed your vocabulary."

"You can complain like my aunt later. Give me those keys."

"I can drive," Johnny protested.

"With a black eye that's probably swelling? Yeah, I don't want to tell Daniel I let his precious boyfriend drive off with a black eye and got into a wreck. Come on you," she said pulling at his arm, grabbing his book, and sticking it under her arm.

"You taking him home?" the waitress called.

"Yeah, going to get him patched up," Jessica said.

"If anyone gives him trouble over it, come get me. Those boys started it," she called.

Johnny set the bag of peas down.

"No hon, take those with you, we got plenty."

"Thanks," Johnny said picking it up again and pressing it back to his eye.

They walked to the Avanti and Jessica stood with her hand held out impatiently, blocking him from the driver's seat.

"I-"

"Dude, I'll be gentle to your baby,"

Johnny scrunched his nose up.

"You have for sure been spending too much time with Dutch."

"You know what I mean. I know how much you like this car. I won't scratch it. I'm a safe driver. Scouts honor."

Johnny frowned.

"You're a girl scout?"

"Well, not now, but like for a year when I was a kid. It still counts," Jessica held out her hand insistently.

Johnny didn't think that's how that worked, but she wasn't going to budge and his eye did hurt.

"You can't tell Daniel I let you drive."

"What? Why?"

"I don't let anyone drive."

"Okay, so?"

"So he's going to want to drive it. And I think I might faint if he tries."

She rolled her eyes taking the keys he reluctantly got out of his pocket, snapping them up before he'd even handed them over, and hurriedly slipped into the driver's seat fingers tapping at the wheel excitedly.

"Hey," he said.

Her head shot up looking at him.

"How badly am I bleeding? I don't want to bleed on my seats."

She studied him closely.

"You're fine Johnny. Just a nose bleed and some other cuts. But let's get you home 'kay?"

He sighed moving over to the passenger seat and sitting down carefully.

He watched her drive, hand gripping the bag of peas tightly and digging into his own knee to keep himself from trying to backseat drive.

She drove better than Louie Jr. at least.

She got him to Mr. Miyagi's in one piece. Parking and hopping out to open the front door with the key from Johnny's keyring.

She made him sit down in the kitchen and kept running around, asking where things were, darting around so much it made him a little dizzy. But when she had everything she needed she went to work very carefully patching him up.

She stayed, eating reheated tamales with him and making tea. She even brought his bonsai out and it was kind of nice to just sit and talk.

Daniel and Mr. Miyagi got back late at night.

Johnny had nearly forgotten the state of himself until Daniel was looking at him horrified, rushing over and practically onto Johnny's lap as he cupped his face in his hands.

"Who the hell-"

"I'm fine Daniel," Johnny said grabbing Daniel's wrists gently in his hands.

"You sure as hell do not look fine."

"I just met Barnes," Johnny said. "He didn't know who I was but knew I was your boyfriend, which was very weird."

Daniel leaned back on his heels stunned.

"Barnes did this?"

"It's not that bad Daniel. I'm okay. He looks much worse."

"Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said with a frown.

"He hit me first," Johnny said. "I just- I stopped the fight. I look, there was a witness, she said-"

"They started it," Jessica said sourly.

Mr. Miyagi sighed, walking towards the kitchen to start dinner.

Johnny looked at Daniel.

He looked so upset.

"A man who can't breathe can't fight," Daniel whispered.

Johnny frowned looking at him.

He looked on the verge of tears and yet more pissed than Johnny had ever seen.

"A man who can't see can't fight."

"Well that's not true," Johnny said softly.

They'd tried that once. The guys and he had gone camping and they'd tried to spar while blindfolded. Tommy was surprisingly good at it. Plus at one of the tournaments, there'd been a blind master who came and demonstrated his skills. No one could take him.

Daniel blinked, his shoulders were all stiff.

Johnny let go of his wrists and wrapped his arms gently around Daniel's waist.

"It wasn't all for naught. I think I kind of understand his fighting style now, and I found out which dojo he's with and the name of his sensei and-"

"I don't care. I'm going to kill him," Daniel said.

It was his tone that worried Johnny, the look on his face.

He was serious.

Johnny thought if any of them would kill Barnes it'd be himself.

Revenge for the torture he'd been putting Daniel through, but it was clear, something was wrong.

Daniel's knuckles were bloody again.

It was weird to see their hands like that, both of their knuckles red and damaged. Johnny's was bad but Daniel's was worse.

Daniel was furious in a way Johnny had never seen.

In a way that reminded him of the feral kittens, the shelter got from time to time. Where they didn't want anything, didn't trust anything, and even if you tried to give you food they'd hiss and claw at you. He couldn't tell Daniel that though. He was probably too mad to try and burrito, plus that'd require moving him and he didn't look like he was going to budge.

"Daniel, don't kill him on my account," Johnny said trying to be light. "It'd be a waste of your punches. He's not worth the effort of burying him."

Daniel wasn't listening, his eyes were glassy.

It was clear he was memorizing every scratch, the blossom of the bruise now visible because the peas were set aside.

"Did you run?" Daniel asked softly.

Johnny frowned. "No. I stood my ground,"

One of the shiny angry tears fell down Daniel's cheek.

"I asked you to run. I didn't want you getting hurt."

"Well, I'm tired of watching you get hurt," Johnny said stiffly. "I'm not going to run from Barnes."

"Johnny," Daniel said with a frown.

"Did you forget somewhere along the way that I'm an All-Valley two-time champion? That I've been fighting for over 5 years?"

"But-"

"Nuh-uh," Johnny said. "No buts, I'm not going to stand by and let you fight this one on your own. I'm planning to be annoyingly fighting by your side until well after your hair turns grey. I get that fights are just going to pop up. But I can handle it. These muscles aren't just for show. Plus I know you could probably kill a man with these hands, but let's try to keep pushing murder off the table. huh? I don't know if they'll let me visit you in prison."

Jessica had walked off shortly after Mr. Miyagi had started dinner to call someone and came back sitting down next to them again.

"Why wouldn't they let you visit him?"

"I don't think they let guys have conjugal visits with other guys," Johnny said tilting his head. "I'd have to figure out how to get thrown into the same prison as him, and even then there'd be no guarantee."

Daniel's hands had fallen from the side of his face and now were holding onto his shirt.

"What?" Daniel asked voice almost a squeak of surprise.

Johnny turned to him. It looked like he'd shocked the darkness from his features.

Johnny cupped the side of his face.

"Prison for murder is quite a while, Daniel. I don't want you to get locked away. I want you to stay here with me."

He was blushing.

Johnny grinned, storm clouds averted. But he'd keep an eye out for it. That had sounded like someone else. Someone like Kreese. It sounded like Cobra Kai.

He ran his thumb over Daniel's cheek.

"You got out of a death match without murdering someone, I think that brain of yours can utilize the people around you to avoid murdering Barnes. If anyone can do it, it's you. You get thrown the weirdest shit, but you always figure it out, this won't be different. But this time, you've got plenty of people who have your back. Use us."

"He's right."

Johnny looked up, tilting his head to see Dutch whose eyes fell to his face.

He frowned but didn't say anything plopping down next to them.

Dutch leaned forward into their space looking at Daniel.

"It fucking sucks right?"

Daniel nodded.

"Are you alone?"

Daniel opened his mouth.

"You're not," Dutch interrupted. "The guys are only a half-hour away. They may bitch and moan but they're close. They didn't leave the state, hell technically they didn't leave the city. They didn't high tail it overseas. You've got less than four months until hopefully, this nightmare is over. You've got Jessica across the street, you've got me a phone call away, you've got Johnny in your damn bed. You're not alone. You don't have to go mobster on us. You don't have to go over to the dark side. Okay? Unlike Okinawa, we've got your back because we're here. And hell if you'd asked, we'd have come to Okinawa. We show up for each other man, it's what we do. Good times, bad times, or if we're just fucking bored as shit. Plus man, you've got Mr. Miyagi. I know he's the bendiest go with the flow zen person you could possibly know and that can be frustrating when you want clear-cut action, but that man cares about you like a son. What's Mike Barnes got huh? Anger management issues? But Daniel you'll kick his ass in the ring if you want to do that while following the rules. Because you kicked our collective asses while following the rules. And Barnes ain't worth breaking them. And like look at Johnny man, yeah it fucking pisses you off to see him hurt, right? But like look at him. He's got a black eye, but it's like the ghost of one. Dude, he clearly moved out of the way to limit the damage. He's got a split lip, and a bruise on his cheek, but look at his hands, Daniel."

Johnny sighed moving his hands so Daniel could look at them.

Daniel took them gently in his, looking them over.

"That shit," Dutch said pointing at Johnny's knuckles. "Is from kicking ass. Like yeah, not happy he got into a fight again, it feels like the bad times again, but just looking at him I can tell he fucking won the fight. Yeah, Barnes got his pretty face, but I bet Barnes's face is all swollen right now and needs a shit ton more bags of peas than Johnny's one."

Dutch turned to Johnny.

"You kicked his ass right?"

"Yes," Johnny said.

"Good," Dutch said slapping his back with the palm of his hand.

Daniel was holding his hands.

Jessica hadn't bandaged them just cleaned them, something about letting the wounds breathe, saying she could wrap them later. He'd make sure they bandaged Daniel's as well.

Daniel let them go and shifted forward wrapping himself around Johnny with a shaky breath into Johnny's shoulder.

Johnny wrapped his arms around him, looking at Dutch with a raised eyebrow.

Dutch pointed at Jessica.

"She called, told me what happened, and asked if I'd give her a ride back down to her apartment."

Johnny ran his hands up and down Daniel's spine.

If he could figure out how to get rid of Barnes earlier before the tournament he would.

If he could figure out how to get rid of Cobra Kai, Terry Silver, and keep Kreese out of his life he would.

But for now, he'd focus on Daniel, on showing him he was fine, of supporting him, keeping an eye on any wounds that appeared that he didn't want to talk about.

Mr. Miyagi brought out dinner and they ate.

Daniel very reluctantly climbing out of his lap, sitting as close as he could.

Jessica and Dutch chatted amicably by them and Daniel talked, slow at first, but he was relaxing, chatting along.

Every once in a while though his hand came down onto Johnny's thigh like he was making sure he was still there, still solid and next to him, even though their shoulders were touching, even though Daniel's knee was over his, resting against his. Even though Johnny occasionally worried a circle into a new spot of Daniel's back with his hand. Trying to anticipate that worry, that concern, and to head it off by being more tactile himself. Trying to remind him he was fine and he was there.

Chapter End Notes

> When Snake, Dennis, and Mike Barnes return Silver is so confused. They hadn't brought back the manila folder, so he doesn't know what Johnny looks like or his name, but he thinks that if Daniel wants to protect him he's got to be smaller and not know how to fight, so how the heck did Barnes lose to such a little wimp?
> Barnes: He wasn't tiny! He knew how to fight!

Silver is starting to think good help is hard to find these days.

There's really only like two inches difference between the actors, but I figure when you go in thinking you're going to fight a pipsqueak nerd who's sitting at a cafe reading a book only to find out he's taller than you and full of muscle you kind of panic.

Field of Poppies

Daniel could not sleep well. He couldn't wrap his mind around how they'd found Johnny.

Had Barnes seen them together?

He'd already kissed Johnny in front of Jessica before telling her, without realizing it. Had he driven by while they were in the shop? Was he spying on them? He knew where they lived, knew where they worked.

Johnny rolled over in his sleep, his hands that Daniel had bandaged before bed despite Johnny's protests, wrapped around him.

Daniel looked up, blue eyes were open, he wasn't asleep.

"Go back to bed," Daniel said brushing hair from Johnny's forehead.

"I'm in bed," Johnny mumbled.

"You know what I mean," Daniel said a huff, wrapping his arms around Johnny's shoulders.

The bruises looked darker, worse in their room.

"Wanna talk?"

"No," Daniel said.

Johnny let out a snort of air, practically a laugh.

"What?"

"You always want to talk."

"Not always."

"Always," Johnny said with a soft yawn.

"Go back to sleep."

"No."

Daniel stared at him like he could force Johnny to go to sleep out of pure force of will.

"It's like you forget sometimes that I used to kick your ass," Johnny said. "Like I can't handle a few punches like you forget that I've handled several Mike Barnes in my life. I'm not made out of fine china."

"You got hit with a snowball and ran."

Johnny frowned. "Yeah but I don't think that'd happen again."

"Barnes is like an evil jack in the box, I never know when he's going to pop up and hurt someone I care about. There are no boundaries with him. I-Chozen held a knife to your neck and you shrugged it off like it was nothing. That was even with Chozen having boundaries. Everything steadily gets worse, Johnny. Kreese tried to kill you, Chozen tried to kill you, the pattern is that Barnes will try and kill you. With my luck, he's going to bring a gun."

"Chozen was using me to bait you."

"I know that."

"He explicitly told me it was all for show."

"Johnny don't tell me it didn't freak you out."

"It did. But Chozen isn't Kreese. Chozen apologized to me. Practically every time he saw me afterward. Kreese...I don't know is in Tahiti or something probably drinking Mai Tai's and getting massages. He probably hasn't given a thought to what he did. And I'm...I'm working on accepting that I probably won't-he'll never apologize to me. That was a betrayal. It's different Daniel. Barnes is no one to me. I don't give a shit about him, except that he's a pain in the ass and keeps hurting you and people I care about. You're not the only one who's allowed to be pissed about the situation. You're not alone. Just like you were worried about Chozen. I'm worried about Barnes. I don't like it. I don't like that he knows where we live or the shop or that he keeps finding you like he's tracking you. But if he comes after you while I'm around I'm going to punch him in the face and I will apologize to Mr. Miyagi about it later. I don't want to see you get hurt either okay?"

Daniel sighed pressing his face against Johnny's chest.

"Hey, don't bite me again."

"I won't," Daniel said with a laugh, though it was tempting.

He thought about what Johnny said, about the concern he always saw when he got hurt, while Johnny wordlessly bandaged up his hands and his feet, the bruises, and cuts. He thought about telling Johnny that Terry Silver had said Kreese was dead. That he wasn't sipping drinks in Tahiti, but Johnny probably wasn't ready to deal with that yet. He listened instead to Johnny's steady heartbeat, relaxing in his arms until his eyes shut and he fell asleep.

As October rolled around Daniel was pretty sure with Dutch's help he could break a man's bones with a well-sent punch and kick and he didn't like it.

But he'd take out that practice dummy next time he walked into the Cobra Kai dojo.

He was able to talk and run with Dutch and Jessica in the mornings without feeling like death was snapping at his heels. He felt stronger, almost like when he'd been in Okinawa, better than Okinawa.

He still didn't want to fight Barnes though.

He didn't want to kill anyone.

But he'd made himself into a weapon.

Coaxed there by Mr. Silver, polished by his own hard work.

He sparred with the guys on the weekends and it was fun. He was careful. He didn't want to hurt them, but it was good to practice strategy.

Ms. Lawrence and he had had brunch three times now. Now it was their fourth. He was telling her about Silver, about how he was training not just for the tournament but also to keep away others. She listened curiously and nodding.

She was easy to talk to. Even though it felt weird.

Was everything he was doing bad?

He thought Mr. Miyagi wouldn't approve.

But maybe she would.

"Sounds like Cobra Kai, but hopped up," she said thoughtfully sipping on her bloody mary

Daniel chased around the eggs on his plate with his fork.

"Yeah," he said softly.

Was it? Was it just Kreese's Cobra Kai but with Terry Silver's spin on it?

Mr. Silver made it seem like he was helping.

Like he wanted Daniel to be able to defend himself in any situation.

He was taking time out of his schedule to help him.

Daniel wasn't paying him.

And it wasn't like weird teaching techniques hadn't gotten him far before. Mr. Miyagi's teaching methods were always indirect. And Daniel was now kicking through two by fours.

Mr. Miyagi could split a tree.

He was getting to the same point, just taking a different route there. Except maybe a bad way.

"What's his name again?" she asked.

"Terry Silver."

"Hmm," she said thoughtfully.

"What?" Daniel asked.

"He's teaching you?"

"Yeah."

"His name wasn't on the list of registered sensei's I got from the All-Valley last year."

"Oh, well he came from South Korea because, well we haven't proven this but he says Kreese is dead."

"What?" Ms. Lawrence asked setting her drink down.

"Bobby said not to tell Johnny until we've seen a death certificate, and the guys have been digging around, so we're not sure, but Mr. Silver is teaching in the old dojo and I haven't seen him or heard from him...Johnny, he joked and said he's probably in Tahiti. But he's not around, so like maybe he did die?"

"Daniel, are you telling me your studying in the Cobra Kai dojo?"

"Well yeah. It hasn't been that no mercy stuff. Terry Silver has his own method. Quicksilver, he calls it."

"And what's that entail?"

Daniel repeated the three lessons of Quicksilver to her, about how to stop an opponent like Barnes. About how Mr. Silver would show him on the punching bag or something and then Daniel would do it on the practice dummy, made of wood, and how really he'd gotten much better at it, and could break through it, and yeah it did hurt, but...

Her hand shot out and held his.

"Daniel," she said softly. "That's not how you're supposed to learn karate."

"He's trying to help me," Daniel said.

"Daniel, I-I don't think he is. That sounds like Cobra Kai, they don't help. It sounds like another version of Kreese. Some of-" She frowned, but she didn't look away. "Some of Kreese's methods were similar. I found out when I did my digging on Kreese. He made the boys do all sorts of stuff with that same awful style of rhetoric. Break it down Daniel. He wants you to kill your opponents. Blinding someone with their own blood, that's no mercy. Breaking their legs, crushing their ribs, your striking hard and fast, and showing no mercy to your opponent. It's against the rules."

"Ms. Lawrence, he's the only one trying to stop Barnes. He's teaching me for free-"

"Daniel, there are good men in the Valley who expect nothing in return like Mr. Miyagi. And then there are bad men in the Valley who use it as a trap. You will be like the mouse Kreese gave all the kids-"

Daniel felt his heart pound. "The-the mouse?"

She nodded. "He gave all the kids a pet mouse, and then as soon as they got them attached to their little furry friend he fed it to a snake."

"Are you saying he's teaching me how to win while also making me a mouse?"

She sighed. "I think he's trying to mess with your head, Daniel. I've fallen into that type of trap myself. Things seem good, but then they fly off the handle over the slightest thing. If you're not perfect, suddenly they're pissed. So you start working extra hard to get better because you disappointed them and it's got to be you right? You end up overdoing it, overworking, trying too hard at something you're not interested in because you want to make it up to them. You want that praise again. Daniel, it's manipulative. And it's quicksand. You don't realize it until it's too late. And you know what another type of quicksilver is?"

Daniel's mouth felt dry, remembering the times Mr. Silver flew off the handle.

How he thought it was his fault.

She couldn't be right, could she?

He shook his head.

"Quicksilver is another word for mercury. Mercury, it's a metal that acts as a liquid and it poisons people. Causes mood swings, bouts of anger, nervousness, irritability, anxiety. Daniel honey, I think he's poisoning you slowly. Maybe I'm wrong, but if I'm not then you're in danger and you got to get out."

Daniel chewed on his lip. If she was right, if he'd been played, if this had all been a big scheme, why? Why would Silver do that?

He thought about mercury from science class, the class he'd had with Johnny. Their teacher had done a whole lesson on it. And it was...apt.

Mr. Silver was smooth.

But she was right it was incredibly toxic and if he'd been teaching Daniel Cobra Kai with ulterior motives...he couldn't have been.

But Johnny had been stuck in Kreese's trap for years.

Ms. Lawrence had been trapped in Sid's.

If anyone could spot another trap or another person stuck...no.

He couldn't be.

Why would Silver hate him?

He didn't even know the guy.

It didn't make sense.

"I'll be careful Ms. Lawrence, thank you. I'll uh, think about it."

She gave him that look.

That look his own mother gave him.

Full of concern but out of ways to try and persuade him.

He'd be careful.

She'd given him things to look out for.

Her hand suddenly grabbed his again and she held it tight, eyes hard, full of warning.

"Just know, if a grown-ass man is yelling at you, it's not you. Nothing is your fault. There's something wrong with him. And you put yourself first. Hell, a grown-ass woman does it, it's not you. Your still a kid. Yeah, you're 18, but they have no right, and this man, this Silver has no right to be teaching you this way. You shouldn't be hurting yourself to learn. If the goal was to break two by fours he would've started you off on something softer, easier, attainable. Okay, Daniel? He yells at you, it's not you. There's something wrong. When you're in a field of poppies all the red flags look like flowers. Okay?"

Daniel frowned. He'd have to look at Johnny's book for that one. He had a bad feeling about the metaphor she'd just used, it was in her tone, but he got what she meant and he felt better.

"Thanks, Ms. Lawrence," Daniel said softly playing with a packet of sugar on their table with his free hand.

It's a little embarrassing how he could tell how pissed off she was on his behalf.

Like if Terry Silver showed up and Daniel tried to introduce them she start smacking him with her purse or her fist.

It was an assumption actually.

He had no clue how she'd handle a fight.

But it was that mother bear instinct he'd seen in her with Johnny and it was touching that she was so worried about him. That she'd go to bat for him too.

She didn't let go of his hand and grabbed her fork with her other hand and stabbed at her pancakes angrily.

Daniel who always was a little nervous to meet her realized he was so glad he did. So glad she was in his life. Because maybe she was wrong. But the fact she cared enough to get pissed on his behalf. That he knew she was meeting with him so frequently because his own mom was across the country, it hurt his heart, it was bittersweet.

Her and Johnny had been through so much, and here she was holding his hand, taking care of him, not letting him slip through the cracks while his mother was gone.

Making sure he was eating, making sure he was taking care of himself, staying safe.

He was pretty sure she reported back to his mother. Because sometimes when he called his Mom she knew things he'd told Ms. Lawrence. And it didn't upset him.

But it was love.

A different kind of love.

But it was still love.

She cared about him.

Didn't want him getting hurt.

Didn't want some stranger manipulating him. And it wasn't just because he was dating Johnny.

Dutch had quietly mentioned that she came by sometimes now, dropped off food at his house like she was trying to get rid of it, like she was drowning in tamales and other things, but he'd said he had a feeling she was checking on him.

Like now that she had all this free time on her hands, now that she was free, she'd adopted him as one of her kids.

Dutch had run a hand through his hair awkwardly, telling Daniel it was kind of nice.

She was like Johnny.

Different but you could tell where he got it from.

It felt like that.

Like she'd adopted him into her group of kids she was keeping an eye on.

And while Daniel was 18, while his ID made him feel like an adult, while he was figuring out a business, while he was doing all this adult stuff, he still felt lost at sea.

Lost out in the world.

And sometimes he wished his mom was there. That he could just go to South Seas and up to apartment 20 and ask her:

"Hey Ma, how do I get my shirts ironed the way you do it?"

Or the millions of other things he'd realized he hadn't asked her to teach him before he'd gone for Okinawa.

He didn't know which soap she used, how she cleaned the caulk in the bathroom so it stayed bright.

How did she know which store sold the best clothes?

How she got things on sale all the time?

How she found the things he liked?

Ms. Lawrence wasn't his mom.

No one could ever replace her.

But it was like a band-aid.

A gentle blanket placed over his shoulders and the promise that they'd wait through the long night until she got back together.

His eyes pricked with tears and he blinked looking up at the weird twisty lights the brunch spot they were trying out had.

She'd think he was upset about Silver.

Not that he was homesick for his mother, for her home cooking, for the dishes she made that he just couldn't get right and she couldn't tell him how to fix it over the phone. What trick she did that made it just right.

Daniel got a hold of himself, bundling the homesick feeling he was all too familiar with up to enjoy the moment, to spend time with Ms. Lawrence who was telling him she was thinking of making her divorce party, something the guys are adamant she still had, and her belated housewarming party rolled up into a Halloween party.

"Three in one," she said with a laugh. "Everyone can come in costume."

Daniel smiled, it sounds fun, better than last year.

Though that bar is so damn low.

Johnny shoved it straight into the dirt.

But now, maybe they could dress up together.

A dorky couple's outfit.

He wondered if he could get Johnny interested in that.

There were plenty of movies they could dress up as.

But not a lot that were couples, that wouldn't be weird.

Maybe they could be something else.

Definitely not ghoulish skeletons.

Never again.

That would be something to look forward to while he tried to think of what to do about Silver, about what to do about the tournament and Barnes and all the big things he kept trying to shove away into the back of his mind.

After brunch came to an end she gave him a big warm hug and kissed his cheek before heading off to her car and Daniel drove home to Mr. Miyagi's.

Johnny was in the garden doing kata.

He'd gotten up early to go to the sanctuary and he had a band-aid on his hand.

"What happened?" Daniel asked voice tight with worry.

"Cat," Johnny said after following Daniel's gaze to his palm.

"How's my mom?" Johnny asked.

"Good, start thinking of a good nonskeleton Halloween costume. We can dress up together."

Johnny blinked then looked thoughtful like he was going to think about it very seriously.

"Hey, where's your book on flowers?" Daniel asked taking off his shoes and walking towards their room.

"On the desk."

Daniel picked up the well-worn book and flipped it to the index, then flipped back to poppies.

When you're in a field of poppies all the red flags look like flowers.

He looked at the picture of a red flower.

Death. Greek and Roman offering to the dead.

Daniel sunk down into the chair. Did she seriously think Silver was that bad?

If an enemy can't stand, he can't fight.

If an enemy can't see, he can't fight.

If an enemy can't breathe, he can't fight.

Daniel shuddered.

Balance

Chapter Notes

> Moved something from the mysterious time between TKK3 and Cobra Kai here.

Daniel was sitting out on the wooden platform looking at the garden.

They'd had dinner with Mr. Miyagi and he'd gone to bed.

Johnny held a jar out to Daniel.

Daniel blinked surprised at the item suddenly thrust in front of his face and looked up at Johnny.

"Pick something," Johnny said. "Tomorrow morning let's go on a date."

Daniel took the jar in both hands and stared at it.

Johnny felt antsy.

He didn't like that Daniel was hurt and not telling him who did it.

He didn't like that his own mother was technically going on more dates with his boyfriend than he was.

Hell, Ali had come up and picked up Daniel for brunch.

Their ex got more dates lately than he did.

"Aren't the guys coming up?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah but I told them to find something else to do in the morning."

Daniel carefully opened the jar and pulled out a folded-up piece of paper, handing the jar back to Johnny.

Johnny needed to get out.

He needed a change from the everyday.

There was too much going on.

Too much pressure.

Too many people.

He had time with Daniel, alone with him in their room, sometimes in the shop when it wasn't busy, but it wasn't the same.

All their free time had turned into emergency preparation mode.

Enemies on every front.

It was like the nightmare Kreese had drilled into him and he needed a break.

He needed to do something fun.

Something calming.

Something alone with his boyfriend to let off steam.

Daniel unfurled the piece of paper and squinted at it in the lantern light of the garden.

"Bike riding," he read.

Perfect.

Daniel tapped the piece of paper against his lips thoughtfully. A mischievous look in his eyes.

Johnny waited, putting the lid back onto the jar.

"Let's make it interesting," Daniel says.

"Won't it already be interesting?" Johnny asked. "I figure you'll have plenty to do trying to keep up with me."

Daniel grinned, shifting and turning to him. His finger poking Johnny in the chest. "Let's race hotshot, winner gets a prize."

"What kind of prize?" Johnny asked.

Daniel was biting his lip.

Nothing good.

Everything good.

He was about to agree to something incredibly stupid because he couldn't refuse Daniel.

Because Daniel had great ideas even if sometimes they sounded stupid at first.

Awful.

Embarrassing.

God, he was going to recommend the loser run through a field naked or something.

"Whatever the other wants," Daniel said lowly.

That was a threat.

A promise.

Johnny's heart pounded.

He never wanted to both win and lose at something so badly.

"Yeah?" Johnny asked leaning close. "Don't want to put some ground rules down huh?"

"I already know what I want, when I win."

"Oh, you're so sure you'll win?" Johnny asked.

"Of course I am," Daniel said with a grin. "And you can just enjoy the view on the way."

Johnny laughed. "I like your confidence Daniel, but you've forgotten how fast I am."

"Yeah, running," Daniel scoffed. "Not on a bike."

"You think you've got a fighting chance?"

"I know I've not only got a fighting chance but I'm going to win."

"So why don't you just tell me what you want now then?"

"Because I want to tell you when you lose, or when I want to," Daniel said with a grin, turning and kissing him, a quick mischievous kiss before getting up. "Now let's get our sleep huh? If we're going to race, if I'm going to beat you I want to get a good night's sleep ahead of time."

Daniel was stretching.

Johnny was going to make him mad.

He was going to do it.

He got up, keeping low, picking Daniel up over his shoulder.

A quick easy move and Daniel yelped in surprise.

"Johnny! Put me down!"

"You looked tired," Johnny said innocently, arm around the back of Daniel's thighs.

He'd behave.

Even if he knew Daniel wouldn't have.

Just a little.

"Figured I'd be helpful."

Daniel was prodding at his back, trying to figure out a way to safely get out of Johnny's arms without sending them both tumbling to the ground.

Johnny carefully shifted, leaning down and to the side to grab the date jar he'd set down.

When he stood back up Daniel pushed himself up looking at him, hands digging into Johnny's shoulder.

"When you offered to carry me around because of my knee, was this what you had in planned?" Daniel asked.

"Something like this," Johnny said, walking to their room, and pushing the door open with his shoulder, stepping carefully through, ducking to be careful of Daniel's head since he was being stubborn and refusing to just relax.

Because Johnny didn't think Daniel knew how to relax.

For a guy who meditated a lot, he did not chill.

"Got it out of your system yet?" Daniel asked sourly.

Johnny set the date jar on the desk.

"Actually I'm lamenting I hadn't done this from the start."

He felt Daniel stiffen.

"What does that mean?"

Johnny grinned, let Daniel stew over what he meant for a while.

Let his mind run wild for once.

Though.

Maybe that wasn't fair. Daniel's mind always ran wild.

Constantly wild.

"Sure you don't want to tell me your hopeful prize?" Johnny asked.

"You gotta wait."

Johnny could practically hear the look on his face. Petulant. Stubborn.

Johnny walked to the bed and put his free hand on Daniel's back.

He knew Daniel wasn't too miffed.

That it was all airs.

All play. Just like him.

He squeezed Daniel's thigh, let his hand go up a bit.

"I see," Johnny said thoughtfully. "That's how it is hmm?"

Daniel squirmed.

Johnny shifted forward, to lower Daniel down onto the bed, hand purposefully on his ass.

It seemed innocent like he was helping make sure he didn't fall, wasn't just dumping Daniel onto the bed, just gently laying him down, but it was sneaky.

He looked at Daniel who was frowning still.

Eyes on him.

Seeing through him.

"You are not going to distract me from winning in the morning," Daniel said.

Stubborn. So damn stubborn.

"Who said I was trying to distract you?" Johnny asked feigning ignorance and confusion.

Daniel huffed and pulled Johnny down into a kiss that almost promised more.

Almost.

"After I leave you in my dust," Daniel promised with a playful grin and Johnny sighed as Daniel wiggled out of his arms to get ready for bed.

They got up early and took the truck.

Mr. Miyagi said they could after they'd both stared at their cars unable to decide which one could hold both of their bikes.

Johnny felt bad at the thought of leaving Mr. Miyagi without his truck, but he looked at all the cars in the lot and reminded himself that Mr. Miyagi wouldn't be without transportation.

Johnny wanted to bike in Angeles National Park.

It wouldn't be a quick trip.

It was nearly a half-hour out, but he'd biked Cogswell Dam before and he liked it, and it was nicely shaded and he wanted to show it to Daniel.

Plus he had an unfair advantage for winning.

Because he knew the trail.

Daniel had tried to drive but Johnny had asked Daniel if he knew any good spots to ride.

He was met with a petulant silence as Daniel got into the other side of the cab, as he flicked on the radio, playing with it as Johnny drove.

"Thought you were going to spend the whole drive over telling me how you were going to win," Johnny said driving them out of Reseda.

"I am going to win," Daniel said.

Johnny smiled.

He was so confident.

So sure of himself.

Maybe he knew something Johnny didn't. And then Johnny remembered that bike in the back was the one Daniel had been on that one night, driving him off the road and down the hill.

He was lucky, so damn lucky that he hadn't killed Daniel multiple times.

That Daniel sat next to him without fear.

Without concern for being by his side.

Wanted to be next to him.

A hand was on his thigh and he glanced over, a quick glance to see Daniel watching him, those big brown eyes dark.

"Are you trying to distract me so I won't win?" Johnny asked amused.

"Is it working?"

"You'll have to try harder than that," Johnny said with a laugh.

"That can be arranged."

"We will die, don't you dare," Johnny said quickly as Daniel's hand moved between his legs.

Heart pounding hard.

"Sure you can't multitask?" Daniel asked.

"Daniel, I will lose focus and I will crash Mr. Miyagi's car and we will die. You are too distracting."

"Too distracting huh?" Daniel said pulling his hand back with a dramatic sigh. "Maybe if you let me drive I could show you how good

I am at multitasking."

"Do you want to go bike riding or not?" Johnny asked.

Maybe he'd let Daniel drive them home, learn whatever that meant.

No. This was Mr. Miyagi's truck.

Boundaries had to be set.

Why did Johnny have to be the responsible one?

Daniel gave a little pout sinking into his seat.

"Yes."

"Save that energy for trying to win," Johnny said.

"I will win."

Maybe he would.

Johnny hadn't ridden a bike in a while, not one you had to pedal.

But he was still going to pretend he had a chance.

Still, bicker right back, self-assured.

After their race, Johnny and Daniel went home.

Daniel won just barely. And he was refusing to tell Johnny what he wanted for the win.

It's frustrating.

But he's smiling so damn brightly that Johnny hadn't taken off his sunglasses and it was worth it.

He could keep being a pain about it, but sometime, eventually, Daniel would tell him.

Plus Johnny had to admit he's looking forward to the surprise.

And at least Daniel had kept his hands to himself on the ride home, too excited about winning, chattering the whole way home.

The guy's cars were in the lot.

And he looked around for them.

Mr. Miyagi was making his iced green tea and carrying it out on a platter towards the garden greeting them on his way.

Johnny stopped on the steps to the backyard.

There was a big hole in the yard.

The guys were digging a hole.

A big ass hole in the garden.

"What are you doing?"

Daniel had beelined straight for a shower, whistling happily but hearing Johnny he turned and came out to see the hole in the garden.

"Boys build pond."

"A pond Mr. Miyagi? That's pretty cool! Going to get some koi fish or something? Lotus?" Daniel asked leaning against Johnny, hand running along his back.

"Okay, Mr. Miyagi we think this step is done, wanna take a look?" Bobby asked crawling out of the hole.

He was covered in dirt from head to toe.

He was sweaty and his hair was plastered to his forehead.

The other guys scrambled out in the same state.

"You might not get your shower," Johnny said softly. "Unless you hurry."

"We can just hose them off right?" Daniel whispered back.

"They will track mud in and if you spray them down I am not cleaning up the mud,"

Daniel heaved a sigh.

"Fine. You're no fun."

"Excuse you, I'm a lot of fun," Johnny said in mock offense.

Daniel leaned up and kissed him on the cheek.

"If we had our own place, we'd just shower together," he said, squeezing Johnny's ass and before spinning on his heels, continuing his whistle towards the bathroom.

Johnny thought he'd been cool, but somehow Daniel always figure out how to find his weak spot, to surprise him and he knew he was bright red as he looked out at the guys.

When he managed to calm down he offered to help.

He asked Mr. Miyagi if any help was needed but the guys and Mr. Miyagi told him no.

So Johnny sat with his book and read until Daniel finished his shower.

"They don't want help?" Daniel asked, drying off his hair.

"Nope."

"Let's make pie then," Daniel said holding out a hand.

He'd dressed already in those shorts he liked that seemed too short and one of his jersey shirts that if Daniel lifted his arms showed skin that Johnny always wanted to touch.

He took Daniel's hand, following him to the kitchen as he got out the ingredients, the stuff from Daniel's mother that they hadn't gotten around to yet.

Daniel talked to him softly, talking about his mother's famous pies, about the family competitions, the orchard competitions, the blue ribbons his mother had.

He sounded so proud, knowing what he was doing was going to be delicious.

A nice treat they could share with the guys who were...using power tools, that seemed like a bad combo.

But Mr. Miyagi was watching them, guiding them so he doubted there'd be a trip to the emergency room.

Or at least he hoped not.

The pie turned out good.

Smelled amazing and Daniel gave him a look like was there any doubt?

And no, there wasn't but, he still was pleasantly excited, looked forward to a taste of their hard work.

They let it cool which was like torture.

Daniel kept swatting at his hands, kept taking them both in his.

Torture.

Absolute torture.

Everything about the day, the night before, was torture.

If Johnny couldn't enjoy Daniel he wanted to enjoy his cooking at least for the moment.

If he couldn't learn what diabolical wish was bouncing around in his head then at least let him enjoy a slice of pie that he helped make.

"You will burn the roof of your mouth and your tongue, and I like that tongue," Daniel said pointedly.

Johnny sighed, he wiggled his hands out of Daniels and pulled him close, breathing him in.

He wanted something.

Anything at this point.

"Can I get a kiss then, at least?" It came out a little whinier than he meant, a little desperate for something.

Daniel pulled away blinking up at him in surprise than a tender warmth spreading across his face.

"Of course Johnny," he said pushing himself up as Johnny leaned down, kissing him in Miyagi's kitchen.

So soft and gentle, warm, a solace for a second-place win. Another to add to the list.

A salve on the itchy feeling Johnny had. Antsy.

Like he needed to get out, to go for a long ride somewhere.

Like he needed something but didn't know what it was, but this, this was helping, the way Daniel slid his fingers into his hair, the side of his face, delving deeper into that kiss.

They needed their own place. Johnny wanted to scoop Daniel up, set him on the counter. But it wasn't their counter.

They ate breakfast there with Mr. Miyagi.

Maybe if he got them a hotel room or something, the expensive kind with the fluffy robes.

Maybe that'd be nicer.

But it still wouldn't be theirs.

Maybe he'd have to start looking.

Casually keeping an eye out for something.

For when Daniel was ready to leave Mr. Miyagi's place.

What if that was never?

He wanted to laugh.

Daniel complained about the lack of privacy in every line of how he held himself whenever they were interrupted.

In that way, Daniel couldn't keep his hands off of him when they were alone even for a moment. Like in the truck.

Daniel pulled away with a sigh like Johnny had been the one to pull away. Like he regretted it, even though he'd been the one to do end it.

Johnny could do this all day, find some quiet spot and just kiss all day, all afternoon.

Who needed food or water if he could just kiss Daniel?

Okay, he knew he'd need food and water. But, still.

"Come out here and check it out!" Johnny heard Tommy's call and he turned heading out to the garden.

The hole in the yard was full of water and a polished piece of wood floating in it. A big circle.

"What did you guys make?" Daniel asked stepping forward, curious.

"Balance wheel," Mr. Miyagi said nodding his head with approval. "For moving in sync with another. Friend. Each move must be the same and equal, must reach balance with another. Without seeing other. Learn to read."

"That sounds difficult," Daniel said.

"And hilarious," Dutch said with a grin. "If you fail you fall into the water."

"Boys try," Mr. Miyagi said motioning towards it.

"I want to try," Tommy said scrambling up and towards the water.

"You know what, me too," Dutch said following him to the other side.

It took them a while to try and get up onto the wheel.

If they didn't try and climb up at the same time then the other would sink into the water.

They kept failing. Sinking into the water.

But they eventually get onto the balance wheel.

Kreese never taught them anything like it so they just moved awkwardly in a circle until Tommy got a look on his face and jumped. Both of them splashed into the pond and Dutch spluttered and Tommy laughed until Dutch caught him and shoved him back under. Just one push and then he let go, frustration without danger. Playful.

"Johnny try," Mr. Miyagi said motioning to the wheel.

Johnny blinked, and carefully walked out to the water.

It was cool, which was refreshing after a day of biking and baking pie in the kitchen and the hot air of LA.

He waited, and Bobby waded out looking confident.

They put their hands on the wheel at the same time and push themselves up.

They managed to keep it from bucking them.

They stood across from each other while Johnny tried to think of what they could do.

Kreese didn't teach kata, and it was built for kata.

There was a look in Bobby's eye and Johnny inwardly groaned.

So dorky.

He rose his arms like Bobby.

His family and their love for Madonna music.

It was because his parents liked it.

And his little siblings liked it.

Johnny was used to the Madonna dance parties.

Embarrassing.

To be fair though it was mostly a lot of arm movements, not a lot of moving around the wheel.

So it was probably the easiest move that could be done on the wheel.

But Johnny was pretty sure the point was to do kata.

To move in tandem around the circle.

Which he guessed they were doing.

Kind of.

They stayed up longer than Dutch or Tommy and got back down carefully of their own volition.

They broke for lunch and tried the pie.

It was as delicious Johnny thought it would be. Watching as Daniel preened over all the compliments.

Then they tried again.

The dancing had led to an idea for the guys and they tried dancing.

They didn't fall in as often, but it wasn't easy.

Popular dances they knew.

Then Daniel was tugging him back towards the water.

Kata.

It wouldn't be easy, watching each other, and trying to read the other's moves.

"Atatatata," Mr. Miyagi said. "Back to back."

"We won't be able to see each other then Mr. Miyagi," Daniel said turning to him.

Mr. Miyagi nodded.

"Yes, must sense, feel."

Johnny looked at Daniel.

He was up for the challenge and after a moment's hesitation, it seemed like Daniel was too, or preparing to fall into the water.

They turned carefully, it was harder to move at the same time unable to see him.

But they managed it for a few steps before falling in.

Daniel popped up quickly, eyes wide, turning to Johnny.

"Let's try that again," Daniel said.

That look of stubborn determination in his eyes.

Johnny got it.

It had felt like there had to be a trick to it.

He wanted to try it again.

They fell in the water five more times and were soaked by the sixth, but they managed to complete the whole kata routine that Mr. Miyagi had taught them with grim determination, back to back on the balance wheel.

They fell in only because of the excitement at getting it right.

They'd spun to face one another and slipped right back into the water.

"Shit, that was great," Dutch said.

"Should we clap?" Tommy asked.

"Golf clap of course," Jimmy said.

"I'd say 7 out of 10 since they didn't stick the landing," Bobby said in his most obnoxious faux posh voice, matching the guys.

A polite round of claps rose up from the guys sitting in the garden.

Mr. Miyagi was smiling, looking at them all fondly and shaking his head before going to get towels.

Johnny looked at Daniel smiling warmly.

It was like a new challenge, a new goal, to get better, to get perfect at it.

And he knew from the look in Daniel's eyes that they would perfect it.

There was no doubt about it.

A Broken Curse

Chapter Notes

Kind of moved something in TKK3 up to this chapter.

They were taking Jessica out dancing.

All the guys were in town and Daniel recommended they go dancing so that the club for her going away party wasn't the only time they took her dancing.

Plus he liked dancing.

He missed being in a crowd surrounded by bodies.

Yeah, maybe it'd be a bit weird to have one girl and six guys walking into a club. And Daniel wasn't sure if it was a club that would be chill about him dancing with his boyfriend.

But Jessica looked absolutely delighted.

They were walking down the steps into the club that Dutch had picked out and Daniel was telling Jessica about how much wood he could kick through now because of Dutch's help.

They'd dressed up a bit and Daniel was focusing on talking to Jessica because it was unfair.

Unfair that he couldn't dance with Johnny because Johnny looked nice.

He always cleaned up nice and dirtied nice and just always looked hot.

He thought he'd get immune to it at some point.

But not yet it seemed.

He hadn't seen the white suit, it looked like a beach outfit, casual but dressy, a pop of color under the blazer, almost turquoise that made his eyes pop.

It looked familiar but he couldn't place it.

He knew if he pulled away with Johnny, found some little dark corner to dance with him that the guys would keep an eye on Jessica.

She wouldn't miss them.

But he'd still feel bad.

It'd been his idea and he planned to have his first dance with her.

Dance till it was time to get a drink.

Which meant Johnny would hang out with the guys.

Would he dance with someone else?

Would he just sit in a corner drinking a beer or something else?

Jessica grabbed his hand and pulled him out to the dance floor and he looked back at Johnny whose eyes were on him.

He felt like he was in Okinawa again all of a sudden.

Jessica didn't dance the same as Kumiko.

Kumiko was a dancer.

But it was still fun and Jessica was smiling and it was infectious.

And he was showing off a little bit because he knew Johnny was watching.

After a few songs, they broke to get a drink and Dutch was there grinning asking if they'd had fun. If Jessica really thought she could survive of a night of dancing with six boys.

She laughed like it was a challenge. Like there was no way she wouldn't.

"Let me just get a drink," she said. "You volunteering to dance next?"

"Maybe," Dutch said with a grin.

Mr. Silver was there suddenly talking to Daniel, telling him that Daniel had told him he was going to be there.

But Daniel remembered not telling him.

Because Ms. Lawrence had made him nervous.

He remembered specifically avoiding telling Mr. Silver where he was going or his plans, being flippant about where he'd go after their lessons, or his weekend plans that Mr. Silver always asked about. Trying to get a little more distance between them just in case her worries were valid.

And they'd made this choice last minute.

Dutch had picked the club, not Daniel.

He hadn't known where they were even going until that night.

Until Dutch had parked the van out front.

Then Mr. Silver was asking who his friend was, slipping past what had to have been a lie, but why he was lying Daniel didn't know.

It reminded him of what Dutch had said, that Mr. Silver lied through his teeth and about the weirdest things, things that didn't make sense.

Like he was trying to get Daniel to question things Daniel knew for certain like he knew Mr. Silver had said he'd come off a plane from Korea, had said he'd studied there, but didn't know basic Korean.

Like he knew Mr. Silver knew about the All-Valley but suddenly didn't.

Like he knew he hadn't told Mr. Silver he was going out with Jessica dancing at this club, because Daniel hadn't known he was going to this club.

It was confusing.

The other ones he could chalk up to Mr. Silver grieving the loss of a friend, of being busy and trying to clean up an overwhelmingly large mess.

He knew he and his Ma were wrecked after his dad died and he knew they forgot stuff, that things slipped their mind.

But they hadn't become mind readers, that...that felt like a stalker.

And the hand that had been on his back felt a little too familiar, a little too much of a coincidence to be okay for a guy who just sometimes let him borrow his dojo to practice. Who offered to teach him Cobra Kai so he could win.

Daniel felt a little sick, stumbling over his words with Mr. Silver and turning to Jessica to see what Mr. Silver had meant.

Had his smile always looked so creepy?

Had it always never met his eyes?

When Daniel had run into Johnny and the guys it was because of shared locations.

It was always because of school or just bad luck, or because he hadn't known it was a popular hang out for the kids from school.

Chozen was also bad luck, it'd been a small village or he'd been spotted by one of his cronies who'd left to get Chozen. Because they'd talked about that before he left Okinawa.

Daniel had demanded to know how he always found Daniel and his friends and Chozen had told him that his friends always spotted him.

That the people he knew spotted him and then would come to get him.

Like when he'd cut through the ice, he'd been just across the street at the dojo, had just finished work and they'd come to get him to tell him that Daniel was in the betting bar with the ice.

Because Johnny was easy to spot from a distance and he'd told them to keep an eye out for Johnny.

It was always quick for them to see Johnny and then glance around and see Daniel was with him.

Daniel had asked if Chozen bothered Johnny when Daniel wasn't around, and Chozen had shoved his hands in his pockets and looked away, Wouldn't you?

Daniel had spat back that it was his boyfriend so of course.

That had riled Chozen up again and he had to take a deep breath.

Muttering how they hadn't been dating when they arrived and with an annoying punk like Daniel it might not last, a roll of his eyes and shaking his head before getting himself under control again like he had to remind himself that he wasn't fighting Daniel again.

That he'd promised his uncle he'd stop.

The dance had been a coincidence.

He'd gone to blow off steam from losing.

It'd been bad luck.

And seeing Johnny had been fun, a nice highlight, but then he realized that Daniel was probably around too and he could get his money back, make his night better.

But instead, he got punched in the dick.

In the end, Chozen had apologized, hand running through his hair and looking awkwardly off to the side like he couldn't meet Daniel's eyes, kicking at a rock nearby.

Petulant like a toddler who was forced to say sorry.

It'd been one of the first times he apologized, he'd gotten better at it as they went along through the rest of the summer.

Especially if Johnny was around or Mr. Miyagi.

But this. This was planned.

Why would he have said Daniel had told him?

Why not have said that he just happened to be in the neighborhood?

Why not say it was a coincidence?

Why not tell Daniel that he'd just happened to see him and wanted to say hi?

Why make Daniel question what he'd said?

Like yeah Daniel spoke a lot, and maybe that would've worked, he would've thought he'd mentioned it at some point if Dutch hadn't made the whole thing a big surprise.

Not telling them where they were going when he picked them up in his van.

It'd been a surprise to him too.

Mr. Silver had to have followed them.

Which didn't make sense.

Why would he follow Daniel?

To make sure Daniel wasn't just fooling around and was still serious about studying for the tournament?

Was it like Daniel was some investment that Mr. Silver had to keep an eye on?

But how?

Why?

Was Daniel his only student?

Was he worried that Daniel would leave like all the students had left Kreese?

He thought he'd made sure it was understood that this was a temporary thing, that he was grateful but he wasn't going to ever stay at Cobra Kai forever.

Mr. Silver would have to make other friends, get other students.

Like maybe Daniel would gift him a bonsai as thanks, but now his blood was screaming to run, to cut ties ASAP, but he'd have to figure out how to do it gently, explain that Daniel already had a teacher and competitions and tournaments weren't really his thing anyway, champion or not, but Mr. Silver would be okay, he'd get other students.

Maybe.

Or he could do something else.

Like go back to Korea and continue whatever peaceful life he lived there. Or didn't live there.

Daniel was starting to doubt anything Mr. Silver had told him.

A guy tried to throw an arm around Jessica's shoulder but Dutch moved in first.

Blocking and not letting him through.

A dark look in his eyes that Daniel hadn't seen since before they were friends.

The guy looked startled at the wolfish grin that spelled wild danger and ran off.

"Your boyfriend Danny-boy?" Mr. Silver asked.

Dutch? Daniel opened his mouth, smiling about to laugh and explain no that he was a close friend but then Dutch was there, arm around Daniel's waist.

He'd whispered something to Jessica and she was heading off to find their group.

"One of them, Daniel here has, oh man I've lost count honey, six boyfriends and I think three girlfriends."

Six? What was Dutch doing?

He was grinning but that dark look in his eyes hadn't left.

The wild one from when they used to fight.

When they hadn't been friends.

Full of threat, practically feral.

They'd been walking through the crowd and had stopped near a wall, a pillar in the room.

Mr. Silver looked a little stunned.

Like he was about to laugh and say it was a joke right?

But Dutch let go of Daniel's side and walked up close to Mr. Silver and kicked up his leg, the high way he did for Taekwondo, against the wall, showing off, all up in Mr. Silver's space.

Even though the guy was a giant he stumbled back a little in surprise.

"Sorry man, you're a little too old for him though. He's arguably the most popular date in the Valley. Goes into a dojo and leaves with numbers, dates. And they're fun dates. But he doesn't date anyone over the age of 21 or anyone under 17."

The guy who'd tried to touch Jessica came back and hovered awkwardly. Like he needed to ask something like he had unfinished business and was looking awkwardly at Mr. Silver.

Mr. Silvers face was contorted, he looked angry, lips curling into a sneer.

Dutch looked at the guy hovering, casual, and at ease.

"Hey man, how old are you?"

"20."

"Daniel, want to add him to your date roster?"

"I think it's full at the moment," Daniel said stunned at what was happening.

"Sorry bud," Dutch said, backing away and bringing his leg back down. He shrugged and turned back to Mr. Silver patting his chest. "Good luck man, maybe try finding someone else your own age. What are you 50? There's a bingo hall across the street. Heard good things from my teachers. You can win a king-size candy bar there."

Dutch turned, arm wrapping back around Daniel's waist so easily. "Come on honey, let's go see your other boyfriends. We've been gone too long they'll get jealous."

Dutch waved flippantly at Mr. Silver, guiding Daniel through the crowd.

He was grinning, glanced back and Daniel felt lips on the top of his head.

"What are you doing?"

"Pissing that guy off," Dutch said warmly.

Daniel swatted at him gently, realizing Dutch was flipping Mr. Silver off.

Dutch laughed warmly, but Daniel's heart was panicking.

Dutch had made it seem like Daniel was like some pimp or something.

Now how was he going to explain this?

"You know if he sticks around," Dutch said, "You could have the other guys dance with you. It'll drive it home for sure. And they'd get a kick out of it. You could dance as much as Jessica."

Daniel wrinkled his nose.

"You sure that's not going to start a fight? Like if we're going to dance won't someone try and start something?"

"You do realize I picked a club near West Hollywood for a reason right? This ain't a gay club, but it's pretty chill, and the bouncers have a zero fight tolerance with people trying to start shit. There's no way I'd let us go somewhere dancing where you and Johnny can't safely dance."

"Seriously?" Daniel asked.

"Hey, I take my fairy godparent responsibilities seriously man. I know how much you wanted to dance at prom. I saw the damn look you gave Johnny, and Ali told me," Dutch said letting go of him as they neared their group.

Johnny was sitting at a table, his back was to them.

Jessica and Bobby were arguing about pie.

Daniel leaned over Johnny, gently putting his hands on his shoulders and gently dragging them down to wrap his arms around him.

"Have fun dancing?" Johnny asked, tilting his head back to look at Daniel while Dutch told them about the fun he'd had.

Interrupting the pie argument that Daniel only caught the end of.

"We'll just have to bake our pies and compare them," Jessica said.

"You're on," Bobby said holding out his hand.

She took his hand and shook it.

"Yes," Daniel said softly in his ear, glancing at the table to look for Johnny's drink.

He picked it up and took a sip.

Boring old ice water.

For who Daniel had once thought of as an ace degenerate Johnny sure didn't drink as much as Daniel would've expected.

"Water?" Daniel asked amused.

"It's better if your dancing."

"Who even are you?"

"I'm trying to be the responsible one."

"Are you always the responsible one?" Daniel asked with a soft laugh.

"With these idiots?" Johnny asked waving his hand. "I'm like the temperature check. If I start drinking they start drinking. If I stick to water then maybe they drink, but it won't become a thing."

"A thing?" Daniel asked setting the cup back.

"Dutch stripping and challenging the biggest bouncer to an arm wrestle. Or heck, the poor bartender."

"Yeah that won't do, he told someone he's my date."

"Dutch?"

"Yup."

Daniel watched him, for a spark of jealousy. But it wasn't not there, he just looked curious and amused.

"And?"

Oh this bastard, he was going to dance with every other ex-cobra and make Johnny wait.

Maybe flirt up a stranger to add to his roster.

Make Dutch's joke a reality.

See if that stirred up his blood.

He pushed himself up and gave Johnny's shoulders a pat.

"Okay, I'm heading back to the dance floor, who wants to dance?" Daniel asked looking at the guys.

Johnny stood up so suddenly that Daniel had to step back to avoid him, but then the arm wrapped around his waist and pulled him close.

Daniel looked up into those blue eyes and swallowed hard.

"I do," Johnny said.

All resolve to tease fled.

All jokes of dancing with the guys to rile Johnny up faded.

His heart pounded hard in his ears and he followed Johnny out to the dance floor.

Johnny didn't even head to a dark corner like Daniel expected. Like Daniel would've picked. Right into the center, into the crowd.

It was something Daniel had been itching to do since before prom, something they didn't get to do.

They danced sometimes in their room. Not as often as Daniel would've liked. There was a lot that they just didn't do out of respect for Mr. Miyagi. They didn't want to be too loud too late. Or too early.

Daniel liked loud music, the kind you could feel in your bones, in your lungs and veins.

The sound of a live band, or loud music, so loud that you have to figure out how to talk in a different way. The way that at the end of the night your throat hurt from trying to be heard over the music, the kind of music you can't help but dance to.

Daniel didn't think he'd get the chance to go somewhere with Johnny like that.

Didn't think they could dance somewhere outside of the shadows or the darkness except for their room or a gay club which most of those carded and as far as Daniel knew he couldn't get in for three or four years and even then they might not let him in thinking his ID was a fake because of his LaRusso face.

Johnny, they might not even check his ID and that was frustrating.

He wouldn't blame them.

He wouldn't turn Johnny away either, but he was younger.

It was unfair.

But, maybe he just had to find the right places.

Places like this and maybe they could go more often. With their friends, just the two of them, dancing together, in their own world.

Closer than any school teacher at prom would've ever allowed.

The band switched it up to a slow song and Daniel wrapped his arms around Johnny's neck and Johnny leaned down, arms around his waist as they swayed, stepping slowly in a lazy way.

Mr. Miyagi said it was important to understand one another to use the balance wheel, to gather cues without needing to talk. To be able to know where the other was going without seeing them, just by feeling. Sight wasn't needed.

A man who can't see can't fight.

Johnny had said that wasn't right. Maybe Johnny was right.

Mr. Miyagi was teaching them how to fight without looking, to have each other's back without seeing the other.

It still wasn't tournament training but, dancing with Johnny made it seem easy.

He could feel the subtle shift of Johnny's stance, the movement of his muscles, and knew where he wanted to go.

He was easy to follow, to breathe together, and move easily against the dance floor among other couples.

He wondered if he could turn the tables if Johnny could read him as easily as-

Johnny had stiffened.

Daniel looked up at Johnny.

"What's wrong?"

He was looking at something through the crowd.

"There's a guy staring at us," Johnny said.

"Like he wants to fight?" Daniel asked, taking over because he wasn't going to let some creep ruin his night of dancing with Johnny.

"No, but I've seen him before," Johnny said, following him, being led back into the dance, but on alert.

There was something in the way he said that that made Daniel wonder if he'd seen a ghost or something.

Halloween was coming up, Johnny had been reading Dracula.

"Are you sure he's staring at us?"

"We can test it," Johnny said.

"How?"

"Moving further into the crowd, closer to the band, we'll disappear there."

That was easy.

Bigger steps, old school slow dancing, one two three, one two three, it felt a little silly but Daniel didn't want to stop dancing with Johnny when there was a creep watching them.

Hopefully, the guy would piss off and leave them alone.

"So?" Daniel asked.

"Can't see him," Johnny said, following easily as Daniel led.

"Good," Daniel said, wanting the focus back on them, on each other, let the rest of the club fade away until they were too tired to keep dancing.

It turned out that neither of them wanted to stop.

Daniel refused to be the first one to stop dancing, to take a break and Johnny didn't say a word.

They would've continued stubbornly dancing until the club closed if Bobby hadn't found them motioning back towards their table.

Daniel would've chalked it up to competitiveness, but they didn't get a chance to dance often, hadn't ever danced together in a club.

He thought it was a combination of both.

Daniel followed, looking around, wondering if he should apologize for his friends to Mr. Silver, but he couldn't see the tall man in the crowd.

He felt a little bad that he'd just let Dutch be kind of a dick to him, even if Mr. Silver had set off alarm bells in his head.

Johnny's hand held his the whole walk back, ever so gently.

He looked happy but there was a watchful look in his eyes as he scanned the crowd, looking for the creep he'd seen before.

They sat down in a heap at the table, sinking down next to one another on the booth side and Bobby set two glasses of ice water next to them.

"Where's Jessica?" Johnny said over the music.

"Dancing with Tommy," Bobby said pointing through the crowd at the two dancing.

"Jimmy and Dutch?"

"Found girls who didn't have dance partners," Bobby said pointing in another spot.

"Why aren't you dancing?"

"I've been dancing all night, I'm tired," he said plopping down on Johnny's other side and grabbing his own ice water. "You two never stopped, and I danced with Jessica, some girls visiting from Florida, a girl visiting from Paris, a girl and her friends visiting from Canada, and a guy from Texas who was even wearing a cowboy hat and boots. If a cowboy asks you to dance you dance," Bobby said with a grin.

"Must be hard being so popular," Johnny said into his drink.

"Exhausting," Bobby said with a grin, leaning back with a sigh.

Daniel leaned his head on Johnny's shoulder watching their friends dance.

Now that he sat down the exhaustion flooded his veins like a heavy blanket.

He didn't want to go anywhere.

This was his spot now.

He'd live there forever, let his bones rest wearily on that booth seat leaning against Johnny until the end of time, or at least until his tired feet stopped throbbing.

The ice water helped.

He'd known he was tired, but not until he sat down with his legs like jelly had he realized just how tired.

He smiled softly into his cup.

It was worth it.

A chance to go dancing with Johnny and their friends.

A night out dancing that didn't end in a fight, unlike every other time he tried to take a girl dancing.

Unlike Halloween, unlike Okinawa.

He sighed relieved against Johnny.

He hadn't realized how nervous he'd felt, determined to make taking Jessica out on the town a third times the charm. And it seemed it was. Because having Johnny with him and the guys, letting Dutch pick the place, it seemed to break a curse and maybe the rest of them could also be broken.

Party Time

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Johnny got a call from Gabriella one day after they'd finished working at the shop and he had to go driving around in search of a fax machine he could borrow.

He made a mental note to buy a fax machine for the shop.

They might never need it again, but he still thought it might be useful.

Maybe they'd get fax orders.

Expand the bonsai shop.

If she was right then all the pieces would be in the palm of his hands.

He'd called Tommy immediately after his call with Gabriella.

They were all spending the night at Bobby's.

Mr. and Mrs. Brown were in the midst of Halloween baking and needed taste testers. A bunch of hungry college kids had brought the four of them to Bobby's house.

Daniel and Johnny were supposed to join them the following morning and Jessica was supposed to meet them there too. To continue her pie war with Bobby.

He was on a mission now and Mr. and Mrs. Brown's gory horror concoctions of sugary treats might have to wait.

He found a little mom-and-pop printing shop that let you rent their fax machine for some change and their phone for about a quarter.

He called Gabriella back and gave her the new number, the number for the fax machine and hovered.

He waited impatiently for the thing to finish coming through. He bought a tape recorder they had for sale and the batteries and fiddled with it putting it together while he waited.

The fax machine started to spit it through.

It was the guy.

The guy he'd seen in Mr. Miyagi's house.

The guy he'd seen at the club watching him dancing with Daniel, he'd looked so pissed, like he was fuming but was trying to look calm, smiling but it was angry, predatory, creepy.

Black hair slicked back into a tiny ponytail like a vampire knock-off, like someone dressed up for Halloween as Dracula, except he'd been dressed the way people in the Hills dressed when they wanted to look like a commoner.

The expensive clothes that didn't look expensive.

$5,000 jacket and t-shirt, that looked like he'd grabbed them out of a thrift shop but were actually designer if you knew what to look for. Like he was trying to underplay how much he made.

He was smiling at Johnny from the page that he snatched out of the fax machine. It was the exact same kind of smile Sid had.

It looked friendly but was actually a trap.

Perfectly designed to make it seem to everyone else that he was was being friendly, helpful, but he was speaking poison, each word laced in venom and he knew it, enjoyed every second of it like it was a fun game of cat and mouse.

He was wearing a suit in the picture.

Even from the picture, Johnny could tell the brand.

Sid had made him learn.

So he could glance at someone based on what they wore and know whether they were worth hanging out with.

It was an Ermenegildo Zegna Bespoke, an over $20,000 custom-made suit.

This was someone Sid would've liked.

Rich and powerful dripped off the picture.

He'd have made Johnny talk to him, tried to befriend him. If he'd known this guy was the owner of Cobra Kai, Sid would've been more invested.

Terry Silver. Owner of Dynatox and Cobra Kai.

He picked up the phone again.

"Did you get it?" Gabriella asked.

"It's him."

"You sure? That's the guy who broke into Mr. Miyagi's house?"

"And showed up at the club."

"So you think he also has ties to Cobra Kai?"

"Barnes said Terry Silver is his sensei, and he's the one pulling the strings at the All Valley. Listen I gotta go home, I gotta show this to Mr. Miyagi and Daniel and see if they've seen him since. And I gotta tell the guys that I have a confirmed name and face," Johnny said handing the paper to the woman behind the counter who took it over to the copier to make him copies as he put a couple of bills on the counter. Putting the recorder in his jacket pocket.

"Johnny be careful, this guy is rich enough to bury almost anyone who comes across him."

"This guy has sent people to rough up my boyfriend, to terrorize him and Mr. Miyagi. They've beaten up Jessica and the guys. I'm not going to back down."

"I know you're not. I'm just asking you to be careful. Guys with power like that can make people disappear."

She sounded worried.

"Don't worry Gabriella, I'll be fine," Johnny said taking one of the copies he was handed and writing down a quick note.

He popped it in the fax machine again, checking the number he'd scrawled down for the Brown's fax machine and punched the number in.

"Don't do anything stupid. He's dangerous Johnny."

"I can't promise anything," Johnny said with an amused smile as he heard her huff over the phone. "But I'll try okay?"

"Fine. Okay, but I'm going to check back in on you later okay? I want to be kept in the loop. I'm going to ring Miyagi's place or, no, you're supposed to be at the Brown's tomorrow. I'm going to call around Johnny and if you drop off the grid I'm coming up there and finding you."

Johnny didn't have any siblings.

He had the guys who were like brothers, and he had girl friends he kind of thought of as sisters, the kids he babysat treated him like a big brother, but that tone, Gabriella was like a cool older sister. Worried because she'd probably heard the stories. She'd gone to the divorce proceedings. She knew Johnny got himself in trouble almost as much as Daniel did, but Johnny didn't talk about it. Didn't complain. The only way to find out was to corner him and find out.

Johnny knew he could handle himself but she was worried and she'd be pissed at him if he got into too much trouble.

He smiled.

"Yeah yeah, got it. I'll do my best."

That seemed to be enough, it was the best he could give.

He gathered up his final piece of paper when the fax machine was done with it then thanked the couple running the shop and hurried out to the Avanti.

He had a lot he had to do.

He had had a plan he'd been toying with, and there were steps, but step one was to get home and have an emergency house meeting.

He imagined he'd walk in and Mr. Miyagi and Daniel would be sitting in the garden and he'd hold up the piece of paper with Terry Silver's face on it and he'd explain that this was a bad bad man and if they saw him they should go the other way.

That he was the puppet master behind Mike Barnes and do not interact with this guy because he was nearly as rich as Midas and had access to toxic waste.

Johnny shuddered, they were lucky the guy hadn't poisoned their water, but he made a mental note to get a PH kit and check their water supply just to be on the safe side.

Of fucking course it was a bored rich guy with too much time on his hands.

When was it not?

He felt like he was in a Saturday morning cartoon.

Why the guy even cared was beyond him because he'd gone over the records, there was no way Terry Silver had Daniel on his radar at all.

There'd been no way they should've met.

But Silver must've known Kreese. Had to have. Kreese probably had mentioned him as one of his old war buddies. Which was why the name had sounded familiar.

It was the only connection.

But it wasn't like Daniel had destroyed Cobra Kai. Kreese had.

By publically...because he'd...

His mother had killed Cobra Kai.

Was she in danger?

Had she been quietly fending off Silver and just hadn't mentioned it to Johnny?

No.

She'd written the name down like she'd never heard it before.

So his mother who was as far as he'd last known, trying to find Silver and sue him into the ground hadn't been enough of a threat? And Daniel had?

Because why?

Why Daniel?

Why was it always Daniel?

If Kreese was pissed with anyone shouldn't it have been him?

He'd made it clear he wanted to kill Johnny.

Johnny swallowed hard.

He thought he'd gotten better about it.

But this was so close.

If Silver was like Kreese then Daniel wasn't just in slight danger.

This wasn't like Chozen.

This was big red neon lights and the tournament was a trap.

He didn't know how, but he'd figure it out.

He'd go over the rules, go over how it worked.

Kreese had wanted them to break Daniel's leg, destroy his knee.

Thankfully they'd failed, but Silver?

This was a very specific attack, designed just for Danie.

How would they get away with it in front of a crowd without it being obvious and what would they do?

Break his bones?

Permanent damage?

Or straight-up murder in front of a crowd?

Kreese wasn't above that and he had a bad feeling Silver was in the same mindset.

His fingers gripped the steering wheel tighter.

Maybe he'd book a cruise.

Take Mr. Miyagi and Daniel on a cruise of the Bahamas until after the tournament.

They'd come back to the ashes of the shop, maybe Silver would burn down the house and the garden.

But staying seemed like a bad idea.

Dangerous.

He couldn't leave the bonsai behind, couldn't leave the places unprotected.

Mr.Miyagi and Daniel had worked so hard.

But Johnny wanted to grab both and run for the hills, put them somewhere safe, and then come back, sweep away the remnants of Cobra Kai that refused to die no matter how hard his mother tried to stomp them out until it was safe for them to return.

Cobra Kai felt like it was his problem.

It had been his dojo.

He's the one who'd walked into that dojo as a kid and thought he'd found the perfect spot for him finally. A home, a community, a family. All the things he'd been looking for, a spot to belong to, the perfect ground to put roots down and grow.

He just hadn't realized how poisoned the earth had been beneath his feet. And now because of him, it was a part of Daniel's life, it'd found Mr. Miyagi.

The guys had escaped with ease. Just shrugged it off like old snakeskin, but after every good thing Daniel and Mr. Miyagi had done for him that damn cobra had found its way back in, led in by Johnny because he hadn't been able to fight it off.

He'd let it win.

Mr. Miyagi had scared it off, but Johnny should've known it'd slink off to heal its wounded pride and come back with its own friends and go after all of Johnny's weak spots and ignore him.

His friends, his boyfriend, Mr. Miyagi, the house, the garden, the bonsai, the shop, hell the girl across the street.

Johnny parked the Avanti and hopped out of the car.

The Ford wasn't there but the lights were on.

"Hey, Mr. Miyagi? Where'd Daniel go? He's here right?" Johnny asked hopping out of his shoes, tripping as he rushed, papers under his arm.

"Daniel-san leave. Make stand. Quit bad teacher," Mr. Miyagi said looking out past Johnny the way Daniel probably had gone with a frown, with a worry. "Miyagi go after."

"Okay, I'll come too, but hey, Mr. Miyagi, this guy," Johnny said holding up the picture of Terry Silver. "You see this guy around? He owns Cobra Kai, and Mike Barnes, and I caught him sneaking around the house, he broke in. Please tell me you haven't seen him around."

Johnny was hoping for a negative.

Praying with all his heart that Mr. Miyagi had never seen the guy.

That he would've told Johnny like Johnny had asked him all those months ago if he saw a tall guy with slicked-back hair.

But it was immediate in his face, the way his eyes widened in shock, the way he hurried towards the door. Past Johnny.

Johnny dropped the papers and hurried after him, quickly shoving his shoes back on his feet.

"Mr. Miyagi?" Johnny asked as Mr. Miyagi hurried to the passenger side of the Avanti.

"Johnny-san, just once, drive very fast."

"Where?" Johnny said starting up the car and peeling out of the lot.

"Cobra Kai dojo. Daniel-san quitting. Mr. Silver I think. Must be."

"Shit!" Johnny said realizing what he meant.

What all those bruises on Daniel's hands and feet were from.

Only Cobra Kai taught like that.

Johnny should've realized.

He always came home bruised and battered.

Johnny had been squirrely about it himself when he'd come home from Cobra Kai. But he'd always been bruised, it was so commonplace that no one asked, he'd gotten so good at hiding it that no one noticed it.

Daniel didn't hide it, not well, and with Mr. Miyagi's medicine he always healed up pretty quickly. And he was so damn stubborn.

Even if Johnny had figured it out earlier, there was a chance Daniel wouldn't have believed him, wouldn't have budged.

Because that's what happened.

It'd happened to him. Johnny had had to hit rock bottom to see who Kreese had been. And hell Kreese was probably lurking around there somewhere.

It was a trap and Daniel was going in with all that optimism and hope that sometimes dimmed but never died. Hope that it could be a quick understanding between adults, not a petty grown man who'd been playing with Daniel and wouldn't enjoy his game-ending early.

"Why didn't you tell me?" Johnny asked.

"Hope not same man. Mr. Silver came, said Kreese dead. Thought needed proof. Miyagi keept checking. No dead Kreese. No obituary. No check-in at morgue."

It was hard to imagine Mr. Miyagi asking around the morgue for a dead Kreese. For him.

"Kreese bad teacher, still important part of Johnny-san's life. Death still hurt."

There was no way Kreese was dead.

He'd seen him at the airport with his blue bag heading into international departures as they were arriving from Okinawa.

He'd smelled the cigar smoke first.

He'd never forget that smell.

It would be locked in his memory for life.

It used to be a smell of home. Of Cobra Kai and learning karate and studying and having someone who cared about him.

But it had triggered a fight or flight response. It's made him freeze in the airport as the breeze carried the smell to him, as he saw Kreese walking off like he didn't have a care in the world, unable to look away until he was out of sight, until he was gone, like a phantom from his nightmares, an old memory haunting him, until Daniel came back to get him, pulling him out of that petrified moment, with the gentle warmth of his hand and out of the airport.

He'd been a sitting duck.

And Daniel was in danger and didn't know it.

He drove as fast as he dared through the streets of Reseda, that familiar path to Cobra Kai feeling his heart pound loudly in his ears, the buzz of his blood in his veins.

"He's not dead Mr. Miyagi," Johnny managed. "I saw him at the airport when we got back from Okinawa."

He wouldn't even contemplate that Kreese was dead.

That he'd seen a ghost heading off on vacation.

If Kreese was dead and a ghost, he'd haunt Johnny.

There'd be no way he wouldn't have noticed Johnny.

He would've taunted him.

Only a living Kreese would've ignored him, would've had places to be and things to do.

"Why not say?" Mr. Miyagi asked, voice filled with concern.

"I-I was shocked, and then Seven Seas was gone and you both were upset and it just never seemed important," Johnny sighed. "We're going to have to start just talking about everything, aren't we? Mr. Miyagi, this is going to be dangerous. Like if Terry Silver is going after Daniel that means you're also in their crosshairs, and the fact he's been going after the shop, the bonsai, he's going to try and hurt you too. I think I'm not really on his radar because..."

He'd lost, he'd failed, he was dead to Kreese. Not worth the annoyance.

"Get help or something Mr. Miyagi. I'll get Daniel."

"Johnny-san," Mr. Miyagi said.

"Listen Mr. Miyagi Cobra Kai is strike first and that's assault. If Daniel is in there and they rile him up and he punches first? They got him on assault. This guy he's rich. Gabriella thinks he's got a DA in his pocket. Which explains why my mother and Jimmy have had such a rough time getting Cobra Kai out of the Valley. We'll have to make a retreat tonight. Because getting Daniel out of there safely is the priority."

"Hai," Mr. Miyagi said thoughtfully as Johnny parked and jumped out of the car running towards Cobra Kai and pushing the doors open hoping he'd make it in time, before the trap was fully sprung.

And maybe...He pushed the play button on the recorder in his pocket.

He got a whiff of that cigar smoke as soon as he opened the door and he hurried past everything and towards the sound of voices. Towards Mike Barne's coming out from the back.

"I'm what he's talking about, shithead!"

He saw Daniel, Terry Silver in a black gi looming over him, hand out to block Mike Barnes from coming closer.

Daniel looked pale, was backing away, holding his hand out as Silver yelled at him, following him.

Johnny rushed forward, put himself between them, pushing Daniel behind him.

Mike Barnes stopped in his tracks.

"You."

"Miss me?" Johnny asked. "I told you I'd know if you went near Daniel again."

The look on Barnes's face was worth it.

Startled and shocked.

"Johnny, we gotta go," Daniel said hurrying towards the door, pulling on Johnny's arm.

"What's wrong with you Barnes?" Silver asked, frowning.

"That's the guy,"

"That's the guy," Silver repeated, rolling his eyes.

Daniel wasn't behind him anymore, holding onto his arm.

Johnny's back was to the door, keeping an eye on them, backing up towards the door.

Trying to keep Daniel with him, moving safely towards the door.

Not turning his back to them.

He wouldn't let Silver or Barnes follow them.

But there was something in Silver's eyes, an amused smile like Johnny had made a mistake, had missed something.

He had only a moment to contemplate what it could be when he heard the footsteps behind him, the smell of cigar he caught as he entered the dojo had been so strong.

Too strong.

He hadn't thought about why it'd be strong near the door but not the rest of the dojo.

He'd been focused on getting Daniel and going, on keeping himself between Daniel and the danger.

Away from Mike Barnes and Terry Silver.

He'd made a mistake.

He pushed Daniel out of the way, closer to the wall.

They wouldn't go around them.

Daniel could still slip out the door behind them.

He could escape.

If he moved fast enough.

Johnny could be the distraction.

"Hello, again Mr. Lawrence."

It curled around him like the cigar smell of cigar smoke, as that right arm went around his neck and pulled him back against a solid immovable wall.

"Losers aren't welcome in this dojo Lawrence, you know that. You remember the punishment for losing right?"

"See?" Terry Silver said laughing, eyes full of delight, smacking Barnes shoulder. "This the punk you're scared of?"

The fear Johnny had instilled in Barnes, the warning, faded and he saw a grin.

Saw the look on Daniel's face, that fear mixing with anger.

He wanted Daniel to run.

To escape.

He knew now, that it'd all been tricks and lies.

This wasn't Chozen, Chozen who'd made sure he'd had space to breathe.

There'd be no way to choke out a "Run" like he wanted to, no desperate way to get him to move. To get Daniel's legs to run and carry him out of the dojo and to safety.

Johnny closed his eyes.

When he'd started hanging out with Mr. Miyagi, when Mr. Miyagi had started teaching him kata there'd been a day where they were sitting on the back of the truck eating lunch.

Daniel had been doing something with his mom.

It'd been nice. Nice to just sit with the old man and have lunch.

It'd been before Okinawa, before graduation, one of those moments where Johnny struggled with asking what he'd wanted to ask for months. But had had trouble seeking out his answer because it had brought back flashes of that night in the parking lot and he'd freeze up.

"Mr. Miyagi, how do you stop someone?"

"Stop someone?" Mr. Miyagi had asked looking up at him.

"I panicked last time," Johnny said quietly, voice barely a whisper.

Mr. Miyagi looked at him for a moment then nodded. He set his food down and turned to Johnny, slowly going through different situations, different moves, slow and calm, patient when Johnny asked him to explain it again and again until he memorized it.

Johnny put his hands on Kreese's elbow and pulled down, curling forward, bending his knees.

He was distracted, talking to Terry, laughing. Like trying to murder someone was as easy as just holding a bag of groceries.

Johnny could feel Kreese's breath on his neck.

He slipped his leg back, behind Kreese's, and with all of his might spun to the side, his leg sweeping Kreese's leg and sending him to the mats. He landed a punch to Kreese's throat before bouncing pack and out of the way.

While Kreese coughed Johnny turned his attention back to Barnes.

"Wanna go?" Johnny asked, fists up, knowing Daniel was behind him, watching his back, watching Kreese.

Daniel could handle Kreese, or pull them out. Especially while Kreese was still coughing.

Barnes turned pale.

"You little shit," Silver yelled. "I will kill you. And Danny boy will fight in the tournament and he will lose. And he'll lose slow. And painful. And we'll bring back Cobra Kai. The whole damn Valley will be full of them."

Johnny heard the doors open.

Mr. Miyagi.

Thank god.

"We thought there was a party happening,"

"Looks like we missed some of the excitement."

"Woah, Kreese you look pretty awful for someone who's supposed to be dead. You a zombie or something?"

"Yeah sorry, we didn't come to the funeral, couldn't find it. No one sent us the details."

"Well, it's obvious now why not."

"Thought everything stank like lies. Hey, look it's the old man who says he's from Korea. Do you remember your Korean yet 바보? Thought I told you to piss off and leave Daniel alone creep?"

"Shit," Barnes said, backing up.

Terry Silver grabbed his shoulder.

"We don't run, Barnes," he growled.

"Right," Barnes said but he looked nervous.

"Boys," came Kreese's raspy voice. "Long time no see."

"Not your boys," followed the sound of a bell.

"Well well well, look whose here. The big war hero," Silver said. "What are you waiting for?"

Barnes shot forward and Johnny tripped him and smacked him in the back, sending him stumbling into the lights, flicking them off.

Mr. Miyagi stepped up to the mat, a deep frown on his face as he moved in front of Johnny.

Kreese got up, walking over to Silver, turning to him as they bowed to each other.

"Party Time."

"We're old friends," Kreese said slapping Silver's shoulder and stepping forward to meet Mr. Miyagi who'd walked forward onto the mat.

"Come on Johnny, let's go," Tommy was saying, tugging at him.

He glanced back, the guys were pulling Daniel to the door, but he was dragging his feet.

He wouldn't go until Johnny left and Johnny knew neither of them would leave Mr. Miyagi behind.

"We wait," Johnny said softly.

"I shouldn't have worn my favorite shirt today," Tommy murmured at his side with a sigh, easily falling into that old familiar stance, ready to fight should Barnes pop up again, but Johnny thought he wouldn't.

He hadn't hit the wall hard, he wasn't bleeding, he was for sure faking it.

He caught Barnes's eye and watched as Barnes went back to playing injured and out for the count.

He had half a mind to go over and kick him.

He was kind of moving like a beetle that had fallen onto his back. Or a guy from a national soccer team anytime someone breathed on them.

When Johnny's attention went back to Mr. Miyagi he saw Kreese land face-first into the mat and shut his eyes. Mr. Miyagi walked towards Silver who was waving his arms and making strange noises. The guys came up close, watching the fight.

Daniel beside him, the paleness he'd noticed earlier fading, taking Johnny's hand.

"Come on, little man! Let's see how good you really are!"

All of Terry Silver's moves were fast, chopping movements. Big kicks, big punches, and Mr. Miyagi ducked around them easily, before using that momentum to send him headfirst into one of the walls. Every movement Mr. Miyagi blocked or got out of the way.

He made it look easy, using Terry Silver's momentum against him, knocking him to the ground, sending his charge when he got back up straight into the mirrors on the back wall.

The mirror shattered as Terry fell into it and paint buckets fell on top of him, covering his gi and his hair in white paint.

Mr. Miyagi bowed to him, copying the moves and sounds Terry had made at the beginning of their fight.

"You think this is the end of it old man? I'm going to open Cobra Kai dojos all over this Valley. Hell! I might even teach for free! From now on when people say karate around here all they'll hear will be Cobra Kai karate!" Silver got up, yelling at them as Mr. Miyagi walked back towards them.

He reached out and grabbed Kreese's gi and pulled him close, pointing at him.

"John Kreese's karate! You won't even be a memory!"

"Says the guy with no students except one that he had to ship in and promise money," Johnny said, throat hurting.

"You," Terry Silver said, the hyena laughter that had begun turning into a growl. "Will die after we break Daniel, every bone in his body, ripping that championship title from his weak-willed hands."

"We all will eventually. But if you mean that you're threatening me-"

"Of course you fucking loser. You better sleep with one eye open."

"I think that would creep Daniel out a bit," Johnny said, he started to turn towards the door.

Mr. Miyagi had already walked past, towards the door, speaking softly to Daniel.

The guys were waiting.

But Johnny still had to point out the obvious that was clearly being missed.

"You should know Terry Silver, that's the second time John Kreese has tried to kill me. He's failed twice now. I don't know where that fits in your whole no losing thing. Or with your thoughts on failure. But I'm not scared of you and Mr. Miyagi, is the best karate teacher in the whole valley. Hell, probably the whole country. Look how many students Kreese lost to him. And the fact is Kreese lost those students because he couldn't hold his temper. Because he tried to kill me."

The laughter that had been on Kreese's lips also stopped and he looked at Johnny. All the embers within Johnny that sometimes sparked with the feeble hope that there was a chance that Kreese would feel remorse, that he cared, that those five years of their student-teacher faux father-son relationship had meant anything were doused by the look on his face of disgust and hatred.

Just like Sid.

"Next time, sometime when you're alone, without your friends, without that little man, all alone like you were born to be then I will finish the job," Kreese said. "You will stop breathing, and die all alone in a gutter like you were meant to from the start, and you will just be a bad taste, of a failed student I should've never let step foot into my dojo. A mar on the Cobra Kai name."

Terry Silver grinned, looking at Kreese, and began laughing again.

Kreese didn't laugh, it was a threat and a promise.

Johnny turned, walking past Barnes who was sitting on the floor and out the doors of the dojo.

Daniel and Mr. Miyagi had been talking and were out the door.

The van was sitting on the sidewalk like Dutch had driven it in such a hurry that he hadn't even parked properly, the doors were even still open.

"We'll meet you at Miyagi's," Bobby said softly, hand gently hovering over his arm, reaching and then squeezing lower on his arm.

"Okay," Johnny said walking to the Avanti, hand going into his pocket, into and clicking the button, hoping he'd done it right.

He paused.

"Mr. Miyagi, ride with Daniel," he told the older man who nodded, seeing the way Daniel had hovered.

"I'm coming with you," Daniel said.

"But your Ford," Johnny said looking at the yellow Ford that Daniel loved parked across the street.

If they left it there, if they left it behind there was a high chance it'd be destroyed.

"Miyagi drive it," Mr. Miyagi said holding out his hand.

"You sure?" Daniel asked.

"Hai."

Daniel fished around in his pockets, hands trembling as he handed the keys over to Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny wanted to reach out and pull Daniel into his arms and hold him close, but he didn't trust that if they stayed any longer that monsters licking their wounds inside the dojo wouldn't run out and try and finish the job.

Every second they delayed felt dangerous.

Daniel walked carefully around to the other side of the Avanti, pulling his red jacket around himself like he was cold despite how hot and windy it was from the Santa Ana winds.

Johnny sunk down into the Avanti, feeling the engine come to life, a purr of comfort as he pulled away, a careful drive back home, back to Mr. Miyagi's.

Adrenaline was still pumping through his veins and he felt antsy. But right now the only thing that needed to happen was to get them home and to get them home safely. Then they could put this nightmare to rest.

Chapter End Notes

바보 means fool, idiot, also like a clown

A Billion Kisses

Chapter Notes

> For the purpose of this fic Daniel only studied under Silver for like a month and a half or two months-ish without him going every day, just a couple of times a week if that. So a lot less than in the movie.
>
> Also, warning, spiraling incoming.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Daniel's hands wouldn't stop shaking. He ended up sticking them under his armpits in the hope that it would help. His heart was pounding in his ears and he kept looking at Johnny.

Johnny's hair was messed up, the usual fluff sticking up in the back from where Kreese had been. His neck was red again. His voice had that rasp to it.

He'd been so grateful to see Johnny suddenly appear in front of him.

To watch the way Mike Barnes had stepped back like Johnny was an apparition of ass-kicking in his future, but when they'd gone to leave when Kreese had appeared Daniel had nearly snapped.

Had zeroed in on the type of move he would have to make to break Kreese's legs like the practice dummy. But was worried he'd get Johnny's by accident.

He'd been so furious and panicked and scared all at once.

And his blood was still buzzing in his veins, and his eyes were welling with tears.

"How could I be so stupid?" Daniel said, voice cracking. "Why am I always so stupid?"

Johnny had shut his eyes and Daniel had thought he'd never open them again.

He didn't know how long it took.

But Johnny hadn't fought back. He'd just curled inward. Hadn't said a word.

He'd wanted to move but he didn't know how to, what to do to bring a stop to it.

He'd been eyeing the trophies on the case, his plan had been to grab one and slam it into the back of Kreese's head.

But he didn't know if he'd make it in time. And Mr. Silver was just laughing. Delighted in watching, how he'd ever thought a man like that cared.

"You're not stupid for getting conned by a con man," Johnny said.

"I should've known! What kind of stranger would take someone like me and train them for a tournament?"

"Mr. Miyagi?"

"Johnny."

"I believed for 5 years that Kreese liked me," Johnny said.

Every word he said sounded like it hurt.

His blue eyes met Daniel's then flicked back to the road.

"And that was a man who taught me to trust no one. But trusting people, Daniel it's good. Not everyone is like Kreese or Silver. There are shitty people in this world, but also...good people. And if people like Silver or Kreese make you stop trusting or believing in the good of others then they win."

Daniel rubbed at tears falling down his cheeks and brushed them away with his palms.

"I walked straight into his trap."

"Yeah, but you didn't know. How could you have? You trusted him because you're a good person, you want to believe in people. And that's a good quality. It's a good thing. Terry Silver is a bad guy. And not small potatoes Daniel. You didn't get tricked by some trying to sell you insurance for alien abductions out of the back of his truck. You were tricked by a very rich and very powerful man. Someone who has a DA in his pocket and who dumps toxic waste in other countries, who seems to only own Cobra Kai as a hobby, or because Kreese is his old war buddy. He has the money and the means to pulls scams with his free time and he set the whole thing up, got Barnes to scare you straight into his dojo, where he taught you, for some bizarre reason how to be even more deadly than you already are. Clearly, he didn't do his research and didn't know how badly that crane kick fucking hurt," Johnny was smiling, a soft painful laugh as he drove, and for some reason that hurt Daniel more. "Or that you spent your summer fighting to the death overseas. He tried to get you Daniel, but he failed because you went to quit right? You knew something was wrong. It doesn't matter how long the con lasted, you're the one who ended it. The one who looked around and said hey wait a minute, this isn't right. And that's brave Daniel, incredibly brave, and you always are. Even when you're scared."

It wasn't fair.

Johnny had nearly died again and he was comforting Daniel.

His soft voice was scratchy and hurt.

Daniel got punched. Daniel got kicked.

But Johnny always got choked.

People always went straight for his throat.

Would he not let Daniel near him again?

Would they fall backward?

He hadn't been choked before Daniel had he?

He'd been the tough guy on campus that people left alone.

But now, because of Daniel, he'd nearly died three times in less than a full year.

Twice had been by Kreese. And Daniel hadn't done anything either time.

He was safer without Daniel around.

Safer apart.

He couldn't stop shaking.

Couldn't stop crying.

Terry had found them because of him. Had found out about Johnny because Daniel had said he wanted to learn how to be stronger to protect his boyfriend and he hadn't even been able to do that.

Silver had tried to hurt Daniel and he had.

But even worse than that, he'd hurt Johnny because of Daniel. Because of Daniel Johnny had gone back into the Cobra Kai dojo, straight back into Kreese's arms where he immediately tried killing him again.

The Avanti pulled to the side of the road in the dark and the hazard lights turned on.

"What are you doing?" he asked, voice watery, unsteady.

Johnny pushed back his seat.

"Do you want to come here or do you want me to come to you?"

Daniel stared at him.

Daniel wanted to tell Johnny that he should run, far far from Daniel, like his life hinged on it, because clearly, it did.

Just like Johnny had said after the doctor's appointment this type of thing wasn't ever going to stop, and it always got worse somehow.

Johnny had said Silver had a long reach, was powerful. And Terry had promised to kill him. Kreese had promised to kill him. They'd both laughed and turned their eyes off of Daniel and onto Johnny and if he didn't run now, leave Daniel behind, then he wouldn't make it.

There'd be no apartment filled with flowers and books.

No making Johnny Italian food.

No seeing his family flip out over the sweater his Nonnia had sent.

No introducing Johnny to the rest of the family.

No sitting with him and his mother again.

It'd be better that way.

Safer for Johnny.

If he let him go now then he could run.

He could go to his Mom's home or take those long legs somewhere else.

Somewhere safe.

Safe from the shrapnel that always hurt the people around Daniel but always cut deeper for some reason with Johnny.

Always tried to mortally wound him.

If Johnny left now he could make it.

He could become someone else.

He could become a park ranger somewhere, spending his days walking among giant ancient trees, teaching kids about nature.

He could become a librarian at some big library somewhere nice and quiet, far away.

He could be a florist in a small quiet town, where he got to know everyone and everyone would get to know him.

Maybe he could sell books somewhere, recommending good books to people who were a little lost.

He could go backpacking through mountain ranges, drive his dear Avanti and enjoy the nights full of stars until he found a nice beach.

He could go to Hawaii and become a surfer.

He could pick up a modeling contract somewhere overseas.

Maybe he'd fall in love again, with some nice person, whose life wasn't fraught with danger and pain.

And they could live out that dream Daniel had.

Johnny making repairs and someone cooking home-cooked meals for him that were healthy, getting up early to have coffee before heading off to work.

And Daniel would stay in Reseda and he'd stay with Mr. Miyagi and he'd compete in the tournament and find a way to beat Mike or he'd fail.

It wouldn't matter, because his heart would be gone.

Somewhere else, somewhere safe, and it'd grow and it'd flourish, somewhere safe away from him.

"Daniel," Johnny said quietly. "Breathe."

Johnny's hand reached out and took his, shifting towards him, climbing over the console and towards him.

"What are you doing?" Daniel asked.

"You didn't answer, so I'm coming to you. Though this is going to be kinda awkward," Johnny said shifting, studying Daniel carefully before sitting carefully on his lap and wrapping his arms around Daniel.

"Breathe Daniel," Johnny said softly in his ear.

"You should run," Daniel said.

"Not happening."

"You could have a better life."

"Not possible."

"But-"

"Keep breathing."

"I didn't save you."

"That's okay. I saved myself."

Johnny had rested his head atop Daniel's and Daniel wrapped his arms around Johnny, gripping the back of his shirt.

"Why won't you run?"

"Because I like where I am."

"But it's safer!"

"Am I too heavy?" Johnny asked. "Going to break those legs you've been working out?"

"No," Daniel said softly letting go of his shirt to hold him tighter.

Johnny made a soft hum and fell quiet.

Daniel listened to him breathe, listened to his heartbeat in his chest, the weight of him solid and whole in his lap.

He didn't want to let him go.

He didn't know if that made him more selfish, eviler than Silver.

But he wanted to keep Johnny.

Didn't want to give up on all those dreams.

Wanted to stay by his side, together.

"It's okay," Johnny said. "It will be okay."

He sounded so sure. Just like he had in Okinawa.

Steady and sure when Daniel was overwhelmed. When he was panicking.

"Johnny,"

"Hmm?"

"I asked Mr. Miyagi to teach me for the tournament."

"You sure?"

"Yeah," Daniel managed.

"I'll add Mrs. Douglas to my list."

"Your list?"

"People I gotta call."

He wasn't shaking anymore.

He was breathing better.

The tears had stopped finally and he sniffed pulling back ever so slightly and rubbing his eyes.

"I'm sorry for not telling you. I-I wanted to just train somewhere where I wasn't distracted."

"Distracted?" Johnny asked. "By what?"

"You. You're very distracting when I'm trying to practice."

"You're the one who tends to want to spar and then to stop sparring."

"Because you're distracting."

"You're going to have to point it out next time because I'm pretty sure that's a you problem," Johnny said amused, a small teasing smile.

Daniel gently smacked his chest.

"The point is, he offered me a space to study and then kept talking about helping me train. So I went and I had the dojo to myself like most of the time to study and I thought, it was kind of nice to use the equipment and to just have a designated space for it. And then a couple of times he'd try and train me on stuff. And it was nice to just focus. But everything he taught me was weird. But he made it sound like it made sense."

"Yeah," Johnny said, arms resting on Daniel's shoulder and behind him on the seats, blue eyes focused on him.

"It was only when I repeated it, that it didn't make sense. Like when I mentioned it to you, and to your mom and-"

"You told my mom and not me?"

"I thought you'd be upset I wasn't training with you."

"I mean yeah."

Daniel looked up at him again.

"Okay, then what can I do to make it all up to you?"

"Make what up to me?" Johnny asked head tilted.

"Lying-"

"You didn't lie."

"Fine, keeping secrets."

"We're not supposed to keep secrets?"

"Johnny, I'm trying to apologize. You got hurt because of me. Let me make it up to you."

Johnny looked around thoughtfully like he'd pick some sort of treat from the quiet night, from the closed shops and empty streets, from the glow of the lights above.

He then smiled and looked down at Daniel.

"One billion kisses."

"What?" Daniel asked.

"If you want to make it up to me I want a billion kisses."

"That's a lot."

"Don't think you can do it?"

There was a challenge in Johnny's voice.

Like it was a dare.

Daniel could never back down from a dare with Johnny. Never turn away a challenge.

He didn't know how Johnny did it, how he helped him regain balance so easily.

And he knew if he looked closer Johnny wasn't quite so steady himself.

That it had been a big deal.

That it had reopened old wounds.

But now that Daniel had regained his balance, he'd helped Johnny with his, once the adrenaline holding him together faded.

Until then...a billion kisses.

Daniel licked his lips, cupping the side of Johnny's face.

"I've got a lot of work to do," Daniel said leaning forward and kissing him.

Chapter End Notes

Alien abduction insurance is real btw (though probably isn't sold out of the back of a truck) and not where I expected it to be from, which is Florida 👽. Also, I read it's a thing in the UK too.

Cigar Smoke

Daniel had stopped crying. That hyperventilating panic seemed to have calmed. And he was kissing Johnny. Moving like he wanted to move them somewhere, but he couldn't move, not in the car, not in that position, so his hands ran all over Johnny, along his back, into his back pockets, like he wanted to pull his shirt off, while his tongue was greeting Johnny's like they hadn't seen each other in years, even though they'd made out earlier that day, in the morning at home, and at the shop when no one was around, when Mr. Miyagi was out talking to Jessica's aunt about the pots and answering her questions about the bonsai they'd gifted them.

Johnny had to pull away, a little breathless.

Daniel grinned up at him.

"How was that?"

Maybe asking for a billion kisses was going to be the death of him. Or at least land them both in jail for some stupid law he didn't know about.

Daniel's hands had decided Johnny's back pockets were where they wanted to stay and Johnny was pretty sure Daniel had asked him a question but he'd lost it. He didn't want to move. He didn't want to care about laws or decency. The adrenaline of the night was fading and he'd been so focused on Daniel, that his goals were fading away.

The anger that had made his blood boil, he'd wanted to hold onto that, just a thread of it and use it to focus, but it was dissipating fast.

What it was leaving behind however was just the fear, the fear of when Kreese's shadow had fallen over him, when that cigar smoke enveloped him, all too familiar like too frequent nightmares he'd tried to forget.

The fear of knowing Daniel had been in danger and the frustration that no one had told him.

His goal had been to get the hell out of there as fast as possible.

To get Daniel somewhere safe, back to Mr. Miyagi's.

He was getting tired, drained

It'd been a question.

"Yeah," Johnny breathed.

"Nine hundred ninety-nine million nine hundred ninety-nine thousand nine hundred ninety-nine kisses left," Daniel said.

"How about I get us home?" Johnny asked.

If he didn't pull away now he'd curl up next to Daniel and fall asleep.

Though maybe that'd be a decent revenge for every time Daniel fell asleep on him, but then he'd have to let Daniel drive and he wasn't that tired yet.

He carefully pushed himself up as Daniel let go of him and moved back to the driver's seat, readjusting it, flicking off the hazard lights, and pulling away from the curb.

Daniel's hand found his thigh.

They were closer to home than Johnny had originally thought which was a relief.

Mr. Miyagi was waiting on the porch, the lights were on and the van was parked nearby next to the yellow Ford.

"Looks like we worried Mr. Miyagi," Daniel whispered leaning over to kiss him on the cheek before pushing the door open.

Johnny stared ahead into the darkness, past the fence.

Somewhere out there was Kreese, pissed even more than before. And Silver and Barnes.

Chozen Johnny understood.

But Johnny no longer understood Kreese.

No longer wanted to.

He didn't want to understand Silver or Barnes either.

He just wanted them gone.

For his own nightmares to be gone, and for Daniel to be safe.

He looked for the anger he'd followed earlier.

The anger that has sparked, he wondered if he could get it to a bonfire, or if it'd freeze over.

Either he could work with. As long as it got him moving.

"Johnny you coming?" Daniel called.

"Yeah," Johnny said taking the keys of the Avanti and dropping them into his pocket.

He walked towards the house and the warm glow.

The guys were in the kitchen talking quietly.

Mr. Miyagi had joined them.

Daniel gently reached out taking Johnny's hand.

"I gotta make some calls before I forget," Johnny said. "I'll meet you."

Daniel studied him a moment before nodding and joining the guys.

Johnny turned and went to the phone.

Mr. Miyagi had gotten a little phone book for them with their collective important numbers in it.

Johnny hadn't thought he'd need it.

He'd memorized so many numbers, but now that his mother had moved and the mansion was no longer, now that the guys were off in dorm rooms, now that the circle of people in his life had expanded there were important numbers he didn't know.

He flicked open the book, flicking a couple of pages through, glancing at the time on the clock on the wall.

He carefully placed the phone to his ear, dialed the number, and waited.

"Hey," he said when he heard the line on the other end click as someone picked it up. "You mind helping me with something?"

He managed to find a spark of it.

That feeling he'd held onto while Daniel had been crying in the passenger seat.

That boiling anger.

The promise he'd made himself. He'd promised himself he'd get Daniel home. Safely at Mr. Miyagi's.

He'd planned to send him to bed, tuck him and get to work. But this worked too.

The guys talking to him quietly in the kitchen, too far away to hear his soft conversations.

Anger building up as he spoke. The spark leading to a simmering.

He was going to show Silver what revenge actually looked like.

Silver thought Johnny was nothing because Kreese thought he was nothing.

Not realizing who Johnny was. And Johnny was pissed. Pissed was easy. He could work with pissed.

He was the only son of Laura Lawrence, who had kept them going on a paycheck of practically nothing.

He'd lived in a car, on the beach, he'd survived bully after bully, shitty school after shitty school, he'd survived Sid Weinberg. He'd survived Kreese's shitty teaching techniques and now that blindfold was off.

He could see clearly the absolute bullshit Kreese had been shoveling and they'd picked the wrong boy.

They'd picked the wrong guy to mess with because maybe Johnny wasn't a cobra anymore but he still had fangs and he would bite so hard they'd never forget.

He worked his way through his mental list, moving pieces on the board.

Terry was out there playing a Saturday morning cartoon villain, and he'd left himself open focused on Daniel. Focused on the All-Valley and the Cobra Kai studio.

Johnny would show him everything he'd learned from Cobra Kai.

He'd strike hard, and he'd show no mercy.

A hand found his shoulder and he looked back at Bobby.

"Thanks," Johnny said to the person on the other end of the phone before hanging up.

That look was full of worry, concern and then he was pulled into a tight hug.

"I'm sorry you ran into Kreese again. I'm sorry he tried to kill you again. But I am so damn proud of you."

There was something in his tone that made that scratchy feeling in his throat return and Johnny's eyes water.

He hugged Bobby back, burying his head in his shoulder.

"We should've said something. Told you what Daniel told us. But we didn't want to tell you that Kreese was supposedly dead when he clearly wasn't. But it might've been better to have all worked on it together. Especially since you solved it. Dutch fucking screamed when we got your fax. Because he's the only one of us who'd seen Silver. I've never seen him panic like that. Practically ran out of the house cursing up a storm yelling about how he knew that motherfucker was a liar, he'd been the one to say Kreese was dead. We were going to go give him a piece of our mind. Didn't think Daniel would be there, or you. And oh god that van is not built for speed. Thought we were going to die before we got there. But then the Ford was there and the Avanti. I think until Dutch saw those and Mr. Miyagi at the phone booth, he was planning to crash through the fucking windows and hope Silver or Kreese were on the other side."

"There's a lot of cement, you all would've died."

"I have never claimed that any of us are smart," Bobby said with a laugh, hand coming to the back of Johnny's head and ruffling his hair. "I was prepared for anything you know, absolute blood bath but to walk in and see you back to back with Daniel. Daniel was facing the door and man I've never seen him look so fucking wild. Pissed. He had his foot on Kreese's chest and looked like he was about to beat the shit out of him when we came in. I gathered from your little speech and Daniel's catch up when you guys got home, that you're the one who put him on the ground. I'm so damn proud of you Johnny. You kicked that bastard's ass. I'm sure it was a terrifying moment. Daniel said he just suddenly appeared out of nowhere."

"I think he was behind his cardboard cut-out," Johnny mumbled with a sniff.

"You know that checks out. When I started at Cobra Kai he would jump out from behind it to scare the students. I clocked him in the face the first time he did it to me, so he stopped. I remember panicking because I hadn't held back and apologizing and he told me not to apologize. I thought I'd get kicked out and was so damn worried over that punch, but now it's a moment I'm fond of."

He sounded proud, his arms moving to Johnny's waist, his knees bending and then picking Johnny up, ever so slightly off the floor in a tight bear hug.

Johnny wiped tears off his face quickly before he was set back down.

"You got to teach me how you did that."

They turned to see Daniel staring wide-eyed.

"Well I'm a bit taller than you," Bobby started.

He had that look in his eyes he sometimes got.

Determined and stubborn.

Daniel had gotten stronger lately, but the idea that he would pick Johnny up, even a little seemed to be like the way most kids looked at cake.

It was mildly terrifying to Johnny though.

He liked being solid and on the ground and if Daniel could lift him the ground was as good as gone.

"It's not necessary," Johnny said, but Bobby was pulling away, explaining how he found it easier if he picked Johnny up from the waist with his knees bent and then stood up.

How he used to be able to pick Johnny up higher. Like when they first became friends. He could just pick him up and throw him into the lake or the ocean, whatever body of water they were near, Jimmy's pool was another good one. But then all that muscle made Johnny heavier, and now it took two people to throw him into water. But he could still hug him off the ground a little. Not as high as he used to when they were training because he was out of shape.

Johnny contemplated running.

Just bolting.

But Daniel had been crying specifically about him running and Johnny had said he wouldn't. So he wouldn't.

He swallowed hard, hoping Mr. Miyagi had made some tea somewhere for him to get some for his scratchy throat.

Johnny shot Bobby a dark look.

Daniel didn't need any more tricks up his sleeves.

"Hey, maybe he can use it to flip Barnes in the tournament. If he wants to learn anything I know how to do I'll teach him."

"It's karate Bobby, not wrestling," Johnny said sourly as Daniel's arms came around his waist.

Bobby laughed.

"Daniel be careful, please don't hurt yourself," Johnny said.

"I've never worked out this much in my life," Daniel said. "This is the most enjoyable way to tell if it's actually paid off."

Johnny sighed.

Daniel dipped down a little too low.

Johnny stood as still as possible, not trusting himself to breathe.

Daniel tried to stand and it was close. Teetering. A little off the ground. Further, then Johnny thought Daniel would get.

Daniel set him back down and frowned.

That look Johnny knew.

He wanted to try again.

Johnny put his hands on the arms around him and gently pushed them away.

"I need tea," Johnny said softly, he was doing everything in his power not to cough.

But he could feel it.

He'd talked too much on the car ride over, on the phone.

The crying on Bobby's shoulder hadn't helped.

Daniel looked up at him with a frown then his eyes widened.

"I'll get it," he said letting go turning, and hurrying off.

"He's fast when he wants to be," Bobby said sounding amused.

"I hate you," Johnny said before coughing, which hurt.

Bobby laughed softly, an arm wrapping around him. "Love you too."

They walked out to where the guys were sitting in the grass in the garden.

Johnny sat down among them.

They were chatting about Halloween talking about his Mom's party, trying to guess what her house would look like on the inside.

The mug Jessica had made him was held out to him full of hot tea.

He took it gently from Daniel

"Thank you," he said softly.

He took a sip.

It had honey in it and he remembered nearly ten or so months ago sitting in South Seas Apartment room 20 with Mrs. LaRusso, her handing him a cup of tea, patiently waiting to hear what he had to say.

A stranger at that time, barely an acquaintance who'd took one look at him and wordlessly made him tea, the same way Daniel had made it now.

The exact same way.

He blinked back tears.

Daniel sat down in the grass next to him, arm wrapping around his waist while he drank the tea enjoying the quiet peacefulness of the garden.

"Skeletons?" Jimmy asked.

"No," Daniel said.

"Right. Sorry," Jimmy said.

"What are other traditional monsters?" Dutch asked thoughtfully. "Vampires?"

"Did that," Johnny said.

"Werewolf?" Bobby asked

"Not as cool," Dutch said.

"Zombies?"

"My mom would get upset," Johnny said softly.

"Ghosts?" Tommy asked.

"That is an easy one," Bobby said.

"I can do ghosts," Johnny said quietly.

"Oh, you got an idea?" Jimmy asked. "Like you did our skeleton makeup?"

"And the demon make up before that."

"And the vampires the year before that."

"Yeah," Johnny said finishing his tea and setting his mug carefully down.

He was so tired now.

He'd just rest his eyes a little.

He laid down, putting his head In Daniel's lap.

It was less than a second before Daniel's fingers found Johnny's hair.

He was asking the guy about their Halloween costumes, about the stuff Johnny had done.

"I'm assuming he'll do a test run tomorrow," Bobby said.

"Why tomorrow?"

"Halloween taste testing," Bobby said. "It's what we'd started when we got the fax Johnny sent. You guys were supposed to meet us in the morning."

"Right, shit, I forgot all about it," Daniel said.

"We'll just all go together in the morning," Dutch said.

"Daniel-san," Johnny peeled his eyes open.

Normally he'd have jumped up, moved to see what Mr. Miyagi needed but he was too tired to want to move.

He'd nearly fallen asleep.

Mr. Miyagi held out familiar green goop.

Johnny inwardly groaned.

"For Johnny-san's neck."

Daniel took the jar carefully.

"Thank you Mr. Miyagi."

Daniel looked down at Johnny.

"Will you be okay if I do this?" His voice was so soft, practically a whisper.

"You want to shower first or something?"

Johnny did want to shower. Get rid of the smell of cigar that lingered on his clothes, and his skin, the smell of the dojo, of the cologne Kreese used that usually was overwhelmed by the smoke.

He'd been trying to ignore it.

But now that he focused on it it was overwhelming and he sat up.

"Yeah," he said softly.

He got up heading off to the bathroom.

The last time Kreese had tried he'd seen it coming. Well, he hadn't foreseen Kreese trying to kill him. But he'd seen the anger in him, the tense lines all taunt like a trap prepared to be sprung. He'd seen it in the violent outburst when he'd snapped the second place trophy and threw it.

But he hadn't been able to stop himself.

He'd been so upset at how Kreese had behaved, how he'd behaved, how the guys had behaved and that outburst wasn't fair.

Hadn't been fair.

But this time.

Kreese had snuck up behind him.

A shadow that had just fallen over him, that horror movie feeling of something big and deadly with murderous intent right behind you.

He scrubbed at his skin with soap, tried smelling his shampoo, Daniel's shampoo.

He shifted in the shower so his back was to the tiled wall.

Last time he'd showered five times.

Every time he'd thought he was done and stepped out of the shower he'd catch the whiff of cigar smoke on his dirty clothes and it sent him right back into the shower.

He'd thrown everything out except the jacket, which he'd tried hanging up outside of his window.

Eventually, he'd had it dry cleaned and it had been better when he got it back.

He'd won.

He'd saved himself.

But he still felt bad.

There was a knock at the door.

"Yeah?" he called.

"Mind if I just sit in here?" Daniel asked opening the door a little.

"No," Johnny said softly brushing away tears, though he realized there wasn't really a point in it after he did it.

He heard the soft footsteps on the tile. Heard Daniel sit down outside of the tub shower.

"If you swapped to a bath I could wash your hair," Daniel said.

It was tempting.

Maybe tomorrow.

His skin was still too pink.

He also didn't want to stay in the bathroom all night.

He did want to go to bed.

To curl up next to Daniel.

He just knew as soon as that curtain opened the swirl of steam, the movement of the air would bring that cigar smell, the cologne right back to him and he'd shut the curtain again and he'd be back at square one.

"I know you're not okay," Daniel said softly. "How could you be? Tonight was bad. And it's okay to take your time. If you can't, if you need space let me know. If you need me closer, I will climb in there with you, if you need Bobby or one of the guys next to you tonight instead, I get it."

"Could you-"

He didn't want Daniel to get rid of his clothes.

It wasn't the clothes.

It was the smell.

"Get rid of the cigar smell?"

That probably didn't make any sense.

How did he succinctly explain it?

He didn't want to explain that Kreese always smoked awful cigars and so he always smelled like it and it clung to everything else. Like a fingerprint. Like he had paint on his hands but with his aura or something weird like that.

That he smoked when he wanted to say something ominous, like when they had meetings in his office about plans.

About how Johnny was almost perfect, just never perfect enough. Close.

He was working hard but never got there. Never where he should be.

How with all the work and effort he'd been putting in he just hadn't made it yet and that was kind of sad right?

To put all that effort in, to be a finger's breadth away from the goal and never quite reaching it.

Johnny had always left those meetings smelling of cigar smoke, determined to work harder.

But he'd learned it had been bait.

See how much he'd do if Kreese kept moving the goal post.

Now that smell turned his stomach.

He heard Daniel moving.

"Got it," Daniel said.

Did he? How?

Johnny barely got it.

A smell was a smell.

Even if it felt as thick as the arms that he always hoped would embrace him proudly but instead tried to kill him.

Twice.

He also didn't want Daniel to leave.

"Wait," Johnny said.

"Switch to a bath Johnny."

Johnny blinked and plugged the tub, switching the water over.

It was awkward to just stand there soaking wet waiting for the water to pool around his feet.

He heard the door open and Bobby's voice but couldn't make out the words over the sound of the water.

He hugged himself, shivering a bit before sinking down in the water. Better.

"You comfortable?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah," Johnny said softly into his arms that were hugging his knees to his chest.

Daniel pushed the curtain open.

He wasn't standing, was sitting on the other side of the tub and he leaned back after pushing the curtain open, back to the opposite wall, facing Johnny.

Daniel leaned an arm on the side of the tub and put his head in his hand.

He just sat there while the bath filled the rest of the way before leaning over and turning it off.

"Want me to talk?" Daniel asked softly.

Johnny nodded, resting his chin on his knee.

Daniel looked thoughtful for a moment, like he was picking a topic, though Johnny knew he rarely stayed on topic, didn't know how he could if he felt as frazzled as Johnny felt. As exhausted.

"Did you wash your hair already?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah."

"Then how about I do your back?"

Johnny nodded and Daniel leaned over to get his soap and a washcloth to wash Johnny's back, gentler than Johnny had been on his own skin.

He talked about the shop. About the budding relationship with the garden shop Dutch and Johnny had gone to and how they wanted to work together at some gardening festival.

They'd paid for the booth and would talk about dirt and Mr. Miyagi would create some designs and maybe teach a class.

He talked about how he kept fielding calls because of the interview with Mr. Miyagi in the magazine Tommy's aunt had connected with them.

They were flourishing.

"Which means," Daniel said leaning forward. "I need to know how you want to be paid."

"In kisses," Johnny said.

Daniel looked surprised then laughed. "Johnny I'm already drowning in kissing debt."

"You're smart. You'll figure it out."

"Figure it out? I meant did you want to be paid by a check or cash. How much is each kiss worth? Are different kisses worth different amounts? Like a peck, how much is that worth versus a long slow French kiss? Does it lose value if it's too messy or does it gain value? What if I kiss your hand? Or neck? What if it's a hickey leaving kiss? How much is that one worth?"

Johnny shut his eyes listening to Daniel ramble as he tried to figure out the worth of a kiss and how much he owed Johnny in back pay, adding and subtracting from that billion.

Daniel whined that he'd never be out of this debt.

"At the amount of debt I owe my ghost is going to still be in kissing debt."

Johnny laughed softly.

Daniel shifted forward and Johnny opened his eyes as Daniel leaned into the tub to kiss him.

"My kisses will start losing value, you'll get sick of them," he complained.

He looked a little stressed, trying to find the value of kisses.

"Impossible," Johnny breathed into the kiss.

"Johnny I gotta pay you actual currency," Daniel said pulling away slightly. "For one, our taxes and possibly our insurance would be a nightmare. And I'd have to have an awkward conversation with Jimmy but I don't know if that'd make one of us a prostitute or not."

"Kissing isn't sex," Johnny said amused. "Not how that works."

"It feels alarmingly close."

"You just don't think you can do it."

"I can do it," Daniel said rising to the challenge. "I just don't think either of us has enough time for over a billion kisses."

"You backing out of our deal?"

"Never," Daniel said kissing him again, his hand going to the other side of the tub to balance himself.

"Hey, clothes are in the wash. Here's something to sleep in for-" Bobby said before stopping in the doorway. "Johnny."

Johnny felt himself flush bright red and grabbed the curtain pulling it shut.

Bobby burst out laughing.

"What kind of reaction is that?" he asked. "Dude the karate tournaments all have locker room showers and we went to the same school for 4 years. With the same gym class. The same after-school classes and clubs in the same locker rooms. I've probably seen your dick more than Daniel has."

"I don't think you're helping," Daniel said bitterly.

"Hey don't give me that look. You've known him for like a year and a half or something and have been dating for almost half a year? I'm assuming compared to four years plus tournaments, that you haven't made it to the same amount yet."

Johnny didn't have to see Daniel's face to know Bobby was making it worse.

"Besides, he's sitting in a way where you can't even see anything," Bobby said and it sounded like he was coming closer. "Clothes are on the sink, Johnny."

"Thanks," Johnny said.

He heard the door shut as Bobby left.

"I'm going to get out and go to bed," Johnny said.

He didn't hear Daniel budge.

No movement.

He carefully pulled open the curtain.

Daniel was still sitting there, looked like he was patiently waiting.

Damnit, Bobby.

"I will splash you with water," Johnny said.

Daniel just grinned at him, like he didn't care.

Johnny sighed flicking him with water.

"At least hand me a towel will you?"

Daniel got up and grabbed Johnny's towel, one of three on the back of the door.

Johnny took it, draining the tub and wrapping it around his waist as he stepped out of the shower, kissing Daniel. Moving him back against the wall near the sink, grabbing his clothes while he did so.

It was a little awkward but he managed to keep Daniel distracted with kissing.

He pulled away to put his shirt on.

Daniel blinked at him taking in Johnny, fully dressed, hanging up his towel.

"How?"

"Misdirect, lesson one of magic," Johnny said

"Wait, so you actually know magic tricks?" Daniel asked following him closely out the door, grabbing a jar of the green stuff Johnny had forgotten about.

"A few tricks."

"I wanna see 'em."

"Good luck with that," Dutch said from the kitchen.

He grabbed his glass of water and followed them

"Wait why?"

"He doesn't do his tricks very often. Says he's out of practice."

"Said the same thing about surfing, but he still surfed," Daniel said thoughtfully as they opened the door to their room.

The guys were sitting on the floor and Johnny walked to his side of the bed.

He'd bought a bedside table.

A small one for his book, a lamp, and his bonsai.

He gently ran his fingers on the outside of the pot before sitting down on the bed listening to Dutch and Daniel talk about things Johnny knew how to do but didn't share. The guys adding the other things they knew, comparing notes.

Johnny pulled back the blankets and curled up.

"Wait!" Daniel said, hurrying over. "We got to put the stuff on your neck."

Johnny frowned, rolling onto his back with a huff.

"It helps, you know it helps," Daniel said sitting down next to him. "You going to be okay?"

Johnny sighed, tilting his chin up.

He heard Daniel flick the jar open and then the cold feeling of the paste on his neck over the spot that hurt, the burning bruise.

"Mr. Miyagi said to rub this one in," Daniel said softly. "So please hang in there."

He was gentle, massaging the cool green paste onto his neck. Johnny waited patiently until he pulled away.

Daniel was all tense, holding his breath, and let out a sigh when he was done recapping the container.

He leaned back over Johnny and kissed him.

"Good job."

It didn't seem like a big deal to lay there and let someone else rub in medicine, but it did help. The guys were doing rock paper scissors on the floor. Tommy cheered coming over and gently scooting Johnny into the middle of the bed.

Wherever they ended up going next, they would need a bigger bed.

Daniel had a look in his eyes like he wanted to protest, but he didn't, instead just grabbed his stuff to go change.

Bobby was talking about how his little siblings had bolted, were at some friend's house. Some friend whose parents didn't let them have sugar and had some vegetable garden. Dutch was laughing and saying it was their loss, more for them, forgetting every year before the amount of sweets Mr. and Mrs. Brown always thought they could handle and never could. Forgetting the first year where they'd ended up crashing from their sugar high and laid out in the garden sick. Listening to them talk until the bed dipped on his other side and the lights turned out and he felt Daniel's lips on his forehead before finally falling asleep.

Lemon Pie War

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Daniel woke up to Johnny's nightmare and felt his heart sink, wrapping himself closer to him, a soothing whisper in his ear, that he was okay, safe in Daniel's arms. The guys had done rock paper scissors before bed and on the other side was Tommy who also seemed to have woken up.

The fast heartbeat Daniel had felt under his hands and the panicked breath relaxed and Daniel sighed, breathing into him.

"Nightmare?" Tommy whispered.

"Yeah."

"Kreese probably right?"

"Probably," Daniel said running his fingers through Johnny's hair.

"That's something that I've thought about over and over again and it's never made any sense to me," Tommy said.

"What?"

"Why Johnny?"

"What do you mean?"

Tommy pushed himself up turning to face Daniel.

"Kreese made it seem like he did what he did because Johnny lost. But, he got second place. Technically kind of, Bobby got third. The rest of us didn't even place. So why Johnny? It's not like Johnny hadn't lost before. He's got various other second place wins, other first-place wins, third and no place wins from over the years at other tournaments. Sure he'd mostly been winning lately and he beat himself up pretty badly when he lost, but Kreese didn't. So why was it the All-Valley that made him snap? Why Johnny? Why not any of the rest of us? I mean you and Johnny didn't get along over Ali. But you were nothing to Kreese. Except that Mr. Miyagi protected you in a fight and beat the five of us. So why did he care? Why didn't he try to kill like Jimmy or I or Dutch? Or Bobby for quitting before the rest of us? It wasn't the second place that made everyone leave, it was him trying to kill Johnny. But why Johnny?"

"Because it was Johnny," Bobby's soft voice came from the floor.

"What do you mean?"

Bobby sighed sitting up.

"Do you remember all the times when we were younger and Johnny would come in with a black eye or a busted lip or just beaten up?"

"Yeah."

"And Kreese at first would demand he tell us who did it. All this bullshit about how if one of us was hurt it was like the whole class had been hurt. Like it was an affront on him personally."

"So?"

"Johnny never said who did it."

"Wait so you think-?" Jimmy asked. "That's fucked up."

"It makes sense," Dutch said quietly.

"I don't follow," Daniel said.

"He's saying that because Johnny didn't speak up all those years ago he thought he could get away with it. That even doing it in front of witnesses, it wouldn't come back to him because Johnny got hurt by other people all the time and never tattled. Even though everyone in that parking lot saw him do it. He knew Johnny wouldn't-" Jimmy's quiet voice sounding pissed.

"Not just that," Bobby said. "I think he knew about Sid. Think about it. None of us had a home life like that. He put his hands on us our parents would've taken their money and pummeled him into the ground or locked him up. Even if we'd tried to hide it. They'd have made a big deal over it. Any of the other parents in the dojo. If Johnny had mentioned it to Sid...Sid wouldn't have cared. He knew Johnny wouldn't fight back because he cared too much about what Kreese thought of him even when he didn't agree. He knew Johnny wouldn't tell anyone or press charges. And he knew Johnny's guardians wouldn't come after him. It's why he took it out on Johnny."

"He didn't account for Ms. Lawrence though," Tommy said softly.

"Or us," Dutch said.

Once upon a time that tone nearly sent Daniel into a panic. Had freaked him out because it reminded him of the past. But this time he agreed with it. Silver, Barnes, and Kreese made him nervous but he was pissed. And he wasn't the only one pissed.

"Johnny's up to something for sure," Bobby said after a moment. "He's got something planned."

"How do you know?" Daniel asked.

"He called someone, or a couple of someones as soon as you two go home."

"Do you know who?"

"No, I tried calling back the last number but the person who answered didn't say a word and hung up on me," Bobby said.

"Weird," Tommy said.

"I'm dying of curiosity. But we didn't tell him anything, so knowing him he's not going to want to bother us with it," Bobby sighed.

Daniel saw him flop back onto his back.

It was grey out, he looked at the clock, almost 5 am.

"We're not running this morning right?" Daniel asked.

"Right," Dutch said.

"Then back to sleep," Daniel said softly, laying down again, pressing his forehead back into Johnny's back.

They ended up all piling into Dutch's van to go back to the Browns.

Johnny looked better than he had the night before. Better than he had in the bath. There'd been a moment where there'd been a tremor in his voice and he was so relieved he'd gone in to check on him. His skin had been bright pink and Daniel didn't know if it'd been from the heat of the water or what, but it'd made him worried. Worried that Johnny had come close to fainting from the heat. But his skin hadn't been too hot when he'd washed his back.

But he seemed calm, holding Daniel's hand.

Jessica was in the kitchen when they arrived at the Browns.

Her hair was up and she grinned when they came in.

"Ready Bobby?"

"Yes," He said rolling up his sleeves and heading into the kitchen.

"Can I work on our costumes?" Johnny asked.

"Yup," Bobby said waving him off.

"I'll be okay," Johnny said softly kissing Daniel's cheek, letting go of his hand, and walking off into the house.

Daniel looked out after him, wanting to follow, but he found himself pulled by the guys to the counter in the kitchen, sitting on a stool.

It'd been a while since he'd visited the Browns.

Their house was decorated for Halloween with spiderwebs and fake bloody handy prints and spooky flickering electric candles.

Mr. and Mrs. Brown walked in.

"Are you two ready?" Mr. Brown said.

"Yes," Jessica and Bobby said.

"Then....Three. Two. One. Go," Mrs. Brown said with a grin clicking a stopwatch.

"What's happening?" Daniel asked.

"They got into an argument when we went dancing about pie. So they're baking pie," Jimmy said.

"Some Ohio pie," Dutch said. "I think they're fighting over lemon pies."

"Skeleton cookie?" Mr. Brown asked offering a plateful of what looked like gingerbread cookies decorated to look like skeletons.

Daniel took one.

"Thanks."

"You should make one of your Mom's pies for Mr. and Mrs. Brown," Tommy said.

"What?" Daniel said with a mouth full of gingerbread.

"Daniel's Mom has an award-winning pie recipe," Tommy said turning to the Browns.

"Oh really?" Mrs. Brown said curiously.

"It's a blueberry pie, that's her best one," Daniel said.

"Well, you should make it too."

"It's really better when she makes it."

"But you remember the recipe right?" Dutch asked.

"Well yeah."

Jimmy leaned over, dropping his voice low.

"If they like it they might ask your Mom if they can buy the recipe from her. Or offer her a job baking it."

Daniel blinked, he didn't know if that was something his mom would like, but it'd be nice to give her a route back to LA.

"Uh, do you have blueberries?'

"Of course," Mrs. Brown said leading him to the other kitchen.

It was also decorated for as well with pumpkins set out and the cake plates swapped for ghoulish skeleton hands and severed hands holding up the plates.

"Make yourself at home."

"Thank you," Daniel said looking around.

There were so many cupcakes under the domes on the cake plates. Ghost toppings, some that looked like they were bleeding, and one with little candy witch's feet sticking out of it.

He heard footsteps and saw Johnny.

He stopped, looking at Daniel.

He was covered in flour and his face was painted white.

"What are you doing?" Johnny asked.

"Making Ma's blueberry pie. Did you use all of the flour on yourself?"

"No," Johnny said. "Do you need the cheesecloth?"

"No," Daniel said amused watching as Johnny pulled a large roll of cheesecloth out of a cabinet, grabbing a pair of scissors and sitting at the counter going to work.

Daniel watched him for a moment, he was so focused.

He had to pay attention.

This could get his Ma out of Jersey. Maybe. Though she might not leave uncle Louie while he was sick and on his own.

He went to work making dough and flouring the counter. He worked the flour in before separating it into two balls and putting it in the fridge.

He cleaned up and moved onto the filling glancing at Johnny who had draped himself in white cheesecloth and was applying black lipstick to his mouth.

No fake teeth outlined around his lips this time.

He had a mirror and was looking at it with a frown.

"What?" Daniel asked.

"I'm not sure if it looks better with the black or if the white looked better," Johnny said thoughtfully.

Daniel set the blueberries he'd gotten out of the fridge down and walked over.

He leaned over Johnny.

Johnny leaned back away from him.

Daniel frowned.

"You will smudge it," Johnny said.

"I can be careful."

Johnny gave him a look like he doubted that but he leaned forward again, meeting Daniel in a kiss.

Daniel pulled away with a grin, no smudge.

"Told you."

Johnny picked up the mirror and turned it to face Daniel.

Daniel had a bit of lipstick smeared on his lips. He laughed softly.

"Okay, well, you look fine still," Daniel said trying to wipe it off of his lips.

"You're just making it worse, hold on," Johnny said grabbing a cloth, wetting it, and gently holding Daniel's chin in one hand and gently rubbing his lips with the cloth in the other.

It got rid of the lipstick but it didn't help the root of the problem.

Daniel wanted to kiss him again.

"There, you're good now," Johnny said setting the cloth aside.

He picked up the lipstick again, swiping his pinky across the top and dabbing it under his eyes making them black, then mixing it with white so it faded into grey on the outside.

Daniel turned, going back to his pie.

He focused on the filling, mixing blueberries, sugar, and all of his mother's secret additions.

He remembered her teaching him as a kid, making it together every blueberry season.

The fact she'd written out the recipe for Johnny warmed his heart.

He wanted to cook with her again. Missed it.

"Do you think," Johnny began slowly.

Daniel glanced up from the pie filling he was working on.

"Yeah?

"You'd be willing to tell me about Silver?"

"I-"

"If you don't feel up for it I understand. But you interacted with him the most out of everyone. I know his goal is to reopen Cobra Kai, and he thinks you're the reason it closed. Or that by defeating you it'll give the dojo enough of a boost to reopen and make it, I don't know, a franchise or something. I just want to know so I can be prepared."

Daniel shuddered.

Once Silver's mask had been off it'd been off.

The things that sent off alarm bells became sirens in Daniel's head.

All the excuses he'd made for the man had crumbled to dust under that devilish laugh, the crowing at their discomfort and Daniel's fear.

He pulled the pie dough out of the fridge and went to work rolling it out, adding flour to keep it from sticking to the counter or the rolling pin.

He started slow.

Told Johnny about meeting Terry Silver in the garden, how he'd known about Mr. Miyagi serving in the 442nd. Knew about all these things, hadn't really talked to Daniel. Had said Kreese was dead. That Kreese had planned to come and apologize.

"I saw both of them. I should've mentioned it. I told Mr. Miyagi about Silver, but it wasn't enough."

Daniel's hands froze over the crust.

"What?"

"When we got back from Okinawa I saw Kreese at the airport. We were arriving, he was leaving."

Daniel remembered Johnny suddenly not being with them. The deer in headlights look he had, all tense and pale holding that whale shark, and having to go back and get him.

He'd never asked what made Johnny stop. Just thought he'd gotten overwhelmed at being home. About possibly going back to the mansion. Something Daniel had started to try and figure out how to avoid. A split-second thought of asking his mom if Johnny could stay with them.

"And then you were going out one night to meet with Jessica and I fell asleep in the garden. I woke up and there was a man in the house. Tall, wearing dark clothes, going through Mr. Miyagi's stuff. That's how he got the shop's address I think. How he knew about it. How he knew about the 442nd. You just missed him, coming out of the shower. He climbed into the fireplace when Mr. Miyagi came home. I thought it was a dream. But I found his footprint on the ground so I told the guys, I told Mr. Miyagi. I told everyone when we were passing out flyers. Be careful there's a tall man breaking into houses with a slicked-back ponytail. When you woke me up you looked rattled, a little scared, and well that night you ran into Barnes for the first time. I didn't want to scare you more by saying someone had also broken into the house."

Daniel remembered for practically months the way Johnny would stop at the fireplace, grab a poker and poke around in it, searching for something.

They rarely used it so Daniel assumed he'd heard a raccoon or a bird in there.

Something normal.

Not Terry Silver hiding in their fireplace.

That-

That was terrifying.

No wonder Johnny had been so adamant about security.

"He broke into the house?" Daniel asked, hands shaking.

Johnny got up, walking over to him and taking his hands in his.

"Yeah."

Daniel told Johnny about Silver.

About how he just kept showing up.

How he had to have been stalking Daniel because it was too frequent.

Which meant he was watching Daniel, following him. Because it kept happening.

How he lied about things like he wanted to make Daniel second guess himself.

But how most of the time Dutch was there to point out the lies. Or it was too obvious, like the dance. Impossible for Daniel to have told Silver where they were going when the only one who'd known was Dutch.

"That was the creep who was watching us dance," Johnny said softly.

Daniel nodded, telling him about the Quicksilver method, about the conversation he'd had with Ms. Lawrence.

Johnny gently rubbed his fingers over his knuckles.

It was like once he started talking about it he couldn't stop talking. About all the alarm bells. About how he'd try to warm up with kata and Silver would yell at him. How he'd tell Silver the same thing every time.

He would stretch by himself, didn't need help.

He was so used to Mr. Miyagi being hands-off.

That learning with Mr. Miyagi was like an independent study until it came time to learn kata or to put it all together.

And Silver was hands-on.

Adjusting Daniel's stance with his hands on his hips and he didn't know if that was normal or-

"It depends, but if you were uncomfortable," Johnny said lifting his gauzy arms to wrap them around Daniel. "Then it wasn't okay."

He looked pissed.

His words and his tone were soft and gentle, but he looked pissed on Daniel's behalf. Daniel breathed a shaky breath and sighed, pressing his cheek into Johnny's chest.

"If you want to study together, we'll have Dutch chaperone," Johnny said softly.

Daniel laughed.

"Yeah, we need a chaperone."

"What do you want to do?" Johnny asked.

Daniel pulled back a little.

Johnny was all wrapped up in the white cheesecloth.

"It might be fun to get you out of all of this," Daniel said tugging on it trying to figure out where it started and ended.

He made the prettiest damn ghost he'd ever seen.

"I meant about Silver and the tournament," Johnny said, carefully prying the cheesecloth out of his fingers.

"I mean we could-just a little."

"Not in the Brown's kitchen," Johnny said. "There are possibly two small children who are quiet on their feet around here. I'm not scaring them."

Daniel huffed out a sigh.

"I'm going to compete and beat Barnes and get them out of our lives. I want them gone."

"Then you focus on preparing for the tournament and I'll handle everything else," Johnny said lifting his hands to the side of Daniel's face.

"Like what?" Daniel asked.

"Making sure they let you compete. Paperwork. And revenge."

He made it sound like he was offering ideas for what they were going to have for dinner.

Easy.

"That sounds like a lot," Daniel said.

"I've got plenty of time on my hands," Johnny said.

"And they're nice hands, even covered in flour," Daniel said amused.

"Oh shit, right," Johnny said letting go of Daniel's hand and looking for that cloth again to wipe Daniel off.

Daniel laughed softly as Johnny dusted flour off of him.

"Might be the messiest costume I've ever seen. But you're still gorgeous."

His ears were red, the only way under all that makeup that Daniel knew he'd gotten through, made Johnny blush.

"I'll figure something out. This is just a prototype," Johnny said gently wiping flour off of Daniel's cheeks.

Daniel smiled, turning back to his pie when Johnny was done.

He put it in the pie pan, filled it with the filling, and went to work designing the top.

He finished his latticework and stuck it in the oven.

He cleaned up again and then sat on the stool next to where Johnny had returned to looking thoughtfully in the mirror again.

"After Halloween, and your Mom's party," Daniel began.

"Yeah?" Johnny asked turning back to him.

"I want to claim my win," Daniel said hooking his leg around Johnny's.

Johnny looked at him for a moment, then leaned towards him.

"The bike race?"

"Yes."

"Well, what do you want?"

Daniel grinned.

"You'll see, just that first weekend in November, have nothing planned. No babysitting, no volunteering, no guys. Just you and me."

"Is that your request?"

"Nope, it's the precursor."

"I don't think that's what the agreement was exactly," Johnny said amused. "But okay."

Daniel smiled. He was looking forward to it. He had plans. A couple of different plans.

"Pie's going to take about 40 minutes. I'm going to take this," Daniel held up a timer that looked like a box. "So do you want to go see the other pie competition? Theirs should be done soon. Also aren't we supposed to be eating treats? Taste-testing?"

"Yeah. But feel free to turn down things. The Browns are overwhelming with their food taste testing."

"I'm from an Italian family in Jersey I think I can handle it."

Johnny gave him a look that made Daniel feel like he'd uttered famous last words.

He unhooked his legs from Johnny's and headed with him back to the other kitchen.

Arguing was not what he expected. But it's what he found.

Jessica was pulling her pie from the oven and set it out to cool.

"It's boring," Jessica said leaning against the counter taking off her oven mitts. "It's 90% meringue. How is that good? It's like air. There's nothing to it."

"And who wants to eat a whole slice of lemon?" Bobby asked motioning to her pie. "The pith is bitter. No one likes eating the pith."

"Right on time," Dutch said. "Nice ghost costume, I see what you meant."

"Are you covered in flour?" Jimmy asked.

"Yeah, I still need to figure that out."

"Arts and Craft store," Tommy said. "We can get glittery grey spray paint or something, spray at a distance and it should do the same look."

"Perfect," Johnny said taking a seat on one of the empty stools next to him.

"So what's with the lemon pie war?" Daniel asked.

"So at the dance, Bobby asked Jessica if Ohio had any famous foods," Jimmy said.

"And she said they have good lemon pie," Tommy said.

"And he said Oh like meringue and apparently she hates meringue," Dutch said.

"So they decided they'd both make their favorite lemon pies and make everyone try it to get other people's opinions. So since this is also the Halloween taste test for the bakery we figured it'd be a good time." Johnny said softly. "For them to compete."

"It just has to cool," Jessica said with a smile. "And then they'll know that they've been eating awful meringue all their lives when they could've been having real lemon pie."

"They're going to hate the lemon slices. The point of a lemon pie is the flavor of the lemon. Not actually putting lemons in it," Bobby said. "That's too much."

"Scared of a real lemon Bobby Brown?" Jessica asked.

"Not a chance Jessica Andrews."

"Ghost cookie?" Mr. Brown asked.

"Right, Halloween taste testing, sorry Mom, Dad," Bobby said putting his pie aside to cool and taking off his oven mitts.

"No, this is fun," Mrs. Brown said with a laugh.

"Frankenstein's monster bar?"

"Oh, honey don't forget the grave parfaits."

"Oh right."

Before Daniel knew it a large pile of sweet treats was set in front of him. No end in sight. Like he'd walked into the witch's house from Hansel and Gretel.

"Make sure to drink water," Johnny said softly.

"Yeah," Daniel said eyes wide at all of it.

They'd even made their own little candy lollipops shaped like different monsters and severed limbs.

"Halloween and Valentine's Day are pretty intense around here."

"And winter," Dutch said. "They like making gingerbread houses. And not like gingerbread houses that are normal. Nah. Last year it was a to-scale model of Paris."

"After a delightful wedding anniversary trip to Paris," Mrs. Brown said fondly.

"And before that, it was a scene from storybooks. The boys requested those," Mr. Brown said with a smile.

"The boys?" Daniel asked.

"Us," Tommy said. "But mostly Johnny. We'd come every winter before the holidays and help them build their gingerbread houses. The first year we did it, we were all shit at it."

"Except Johnny."

"He's got an artist streak," Mr. Brown said fondly.

"That's what I'm learning," Daniel said smiling, taking Johnny's hand in his.

Daniel tried to pace himself trying all the treats, giving Mr. and Mrs. Brown the best feedback he could. But after a while, it all tasted the exact same. Sweet.

"I think it's time to try our pie then," Jessica said cutting slices and setting it out in front of each of them.

"You know, be honest right?" Bobby said.

"Yeah man, we're not scared of hurting your feelings by saying hers is better," Dutch said.

"Hey!" Bobby said. "You should be a little concerned about my feelings."

Johnny laughed softly.

"I'm sure they're both great."

"But you gotta pick one," Bobby said.

"I want to split mine, who wants to split mine?" Johnny asked.

"Me," Daniel said, he didn't think he could eat more than a bite of each anyway.

The rinds of Jessica's pie weren't as hard as he expected.

It was light and the crust was flaky.

A perfect palate cleanser.

But Bobby's pie was also good and Daniel liked meringue.

He held the fork between his lips unable to choose, turning to Johnny.

Johnny was unreadable.

Daniel didn't have a clue which one he'd pick.

He turned to look at the other guys, at the Browns, each trying the pies.

Bobby and Jessica cut another slice and traded.

He watched them try to school their features.

They turned their backs to one another and it was clear they both liked the other's pie. Which made sense.

Bobby grew up with baked goods and Jessica was a good cook.

He'd just say it.

"I like both of them," Daniel said. "Jessica's is different, never had one like it, but it's good and I like the crust, but I also like meringue and that's probably the best meringue I've ever had."

"I agree," Johnny said, setting his fork down.

"Well, that's taking the easy route. You're supposed to pick one," Bobby complained.

"Admit that you like Jessica's pie and that she's a good cook and Jessica can admit she likes your meringue and that you're a good baker and we can all say thank you for this wonderful experiment," Johnny said. "I'm not going to pick one."

"You're always like this," Bobby complained.

"Not always. I will tell you that if Daniel's pie, which," Johnny picked up the little timer box. "Is almost done, was part of the competition I'd pick his."

"What but it's not even done!" Jessica said.

"I'd pick it because he's my boyfriend and I know his mother's baking is wonderful and I already have had her blueberry pie which Daniel made. I like everything he makes, so he always wins first place."

"That is nepotism," Jimmy said around a mouthful of pie.

The box popped open and a little skeleton popped out with a cackle.

"I'll go grab my pie," Daniel said.

"Need help?" Johnny asked.

"Nope," Daniel said.

He grinned as he hurried down the hall to the other kitchen. He liked that he won first place no matter what. That Johnny liked his cooking and his baking. Liked that Johnny picked him. The way he'd said it, so soft and fond. Like it was an irrevocable fact.

Though he didn't think he could eat any more sugar. Not even his own pie. Which was disappointing.

He actually was looking forward to whatever health food Jessica and Dutch had picked out for their morning run the following day.

It looked good when he opened the oven and he felt a pang.

He missed his mom. Uncle Louie wasn't doing great. No one else was there to help out. So she was stuck.

He'd started the conversation multiple times and always stopped.

Ma, I miss you, can you come back to LA? Why'd you leave without me? I mean I wouldn't have left, but I would've liked to have talked about it. Did you have to leave? Couldn't we have found another option? You were supposed to be here. You promised you'd never leave me after dad died. You promised it was you and me forever. That we'd have each other's backs. And I know I didn't talk to you about everything. It's been really rough without you. I miss you.

He carefully pulled out the pie and set it on the stovetop. It looked good. Perfectly golden.

He took a shaky breath.

Would you have known Silver was bad?

He hadn't even opened that can of worms with his mom yet. Hadn't told her about training or the tournament.

He'd waited to tell her last time too, but this was different.

Part of him was happy she wasn't there.

She was safe.

The thought of Mike Barnes or Silver terrorizing his mother made him sick. But he also wanted her there.

He sighed carrying the pie out of the other kitchen and setting it down on a cooling tray.

Mr. and Mrs. Brown were around him suddenly popping up on either side leaning forward, inspecting his pie.

"Crust looks good," Mr. Brown said.

"I like how you did the lattice Daniel," Mrs. Brown said.

"Smells divine."

They waited, impatiently.

Daniel didn't think he'd ever seen two adults stare at a pie so intensely.

They were talking about it like they were trying to guess what made it smell exactly the way it did like they were trying to pry his mother's recipe out of the pie just my scent.

Daniel sat down next to Johnny who gently took his hand.

"You know, I've never seen my parents so excited over someone else's pie," Bobby said, hand coming to Daniel's shoulder.

"Yeah, they said they liked mine but that was completely different. If I had hadn't, how many was it? Four graveyard parfaits? I would be ecstatic to try that pie," Jessica said.

"You ate four of the graveyard parfaits?" Daniel asked.

"There were four different flavors," Jessica said. "I had to. Now I'm hoping I can take a slice of your blueberry pie home with me. Maybe two slices, one for my aunt."

Johnny's arm moved to wrap around his waist, pulling Daniel in close.

"His mom won an award for that pie recipe."

"Really?" Jessica asked. "That's so cool Daniel."

"Yeah," Daniel said leaning back against Johnny. "I miss her."

"You'll see her again soon I'm sure," Johnny said softly.

Daniel sighed.

He liked how sure Johnny sounded, but he knew his Mom wasn't leaving Jersey for a long time.

His best bet was to go to Jersey for Thanksgiving or Christmas, but he didn't want to leave Johnny and he was also pretty sure Johnny's mom wouldn't be comfortable with him leaving the first year they were both free.

He didn't want to leave them either.

LA felt more like home than Jersey did now.

Johnny felt like home.

And he couldn't just up and leave when Kreese was out there and Silver and Barnes.

"Breathe," Johnny whispered in his ear and Daniel shivered.

Apartment.

They had to get an apartment as soon as the tournament was over.

"Daniel this is delightful," Mrs. Brown said, holding her plate of pie.

"Please give us your mother's number," Mr. Brown said pushing a piece of paper across to him with a pen.

Daniel took in a deep breath and let it out writing down uncle Louie's number.

"She's uh, taking care of my uncle right now."

"We'll figure something out. But this is delicious," Mr. Brown said pointing at the pie with his fork.

"Oh! Round two?" Mrs. Brown asked turning towards a cabinet and pulling out a cake.

Daniel leaned heavily back against Johnny inwardly groaning.

He was going to die.

How had Bobby survived living in a castle made of sugar?

Johnny laughed softly and it tickled the back of his head.

"It's why you gotta say no to some of it. This is endurance, not a race."

"I now know for next time," Daniel said with a sigh.

Chapter End Notes

Ohio Lemon pie
Lemon meringue pie
Blueberry pie inspo
Gingerbread skeletons

7 ghosts

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Halloween had arrived and his mother might have gone overboard.

She'd decorated the house in spiderwebs and pumpkins for the party.

She'd even gotten king-size candy bars in case any kids came trick or treating. She kept trying to stick some of them into Johnny's bag. To take a few home with him.

She hired a bartender to work on bubbling punch and alcoholic cocktails out in the garden and got cupcakes and sweets from the Browns and a catering company had made themed finger food.

They sat in her kitchen with newspaper down carving pumpkins, they had hours before the party, while catering and party planners set up outside.

Johnny was already dressed up, he was going to do the guy's make-up when they arrived in a couple of hours.

He wasn't sure if he was also doing Jessica's.

"So you're a ghost?" she asked.

She was dressed up in striped baggy clothes with a red sash around her waist and a blue coat.

She also had a red floppy hat.

She almost looked like a pirate.

"I am and who are you?" he asked.

"Jeanne Baret. She disguised herself as a man to study botany and is considered the first woman to have circumnavigated the globe," Laura said popping a piece of pumpkin out with her fingers.

"Think you're going to study botany ?"

"I've thought about it. But I've been talking to Lucille a lot and I think it'd be nice to do something that would've helped me before."

"Like what?"

"Some sort of resource for single parents or guardians trying to do it on their own and struggling. Like free childcare and just, building a safety net. The neighborhood where your shop is, it's a very nice neighborhood. It has a good community. I was thinking of paying them like a grant to babysit kids through lessons. Gardening at the garden shop, meditation and about trees at your shop, pottery with Earthworks. Stuff like that. Provide snacks. It's more of a sketch of an idea than a real one."

"It sounds nice Mom. I'm sure Mr. Miyagi would like it."

"Not Daniel huh?"

Johnny frowned.

He didn't know.

He hadn't seen Daniel with kids that often. He'd been good dancing with kids in Okinawa but they'd mostly hung out with Kumiko.

He carefully sliced through his pumpkin and shrugged.

"Don't know. I'll ask him."

They continued carving and he tried to remember the last time they'd carved pumpkins together.

He had to have been really young, maybe back when the florist was open, that first apartment.

They hadn't been able to afford them after it had closed, and then when she married Sid, he paid someone to carve pumpkins.

He remembered the first year his mom recommended they do it as a fun family activity and Sid had wrinkled his nose, saying it was gross and why do it when they could hire people to do it?

But it was nice. Nice to sit with her and listen to her ideas and just enjoy her home. To see her decorate the way she liked, to finally have the chance to be herself again. And he knew it was taking time. Time to get used to who Laura Lawrence was again.

He was sure it was an adjustment.

Not to have people making her egg white breakfasts and freshly squeezed orange juice and carrying it out to wherever she was.

No one to remind her of her plans.

No place she had to be unless she wanted to.

It was like they were in the same spot. It was kind of weird. She could do anything she wanted and so could he. A crossroads for both of them.

She seemed to him to be thriving and it was nice.

"I heard from Gabriella you met Terry Silver," she said sticking her thumb against the side of her pumpkin and sending another piece flying.

"Uh, yeah," Johnny said.

She really was like a big sister, tattling on him and everything.

"Why didn't you mention it?"

"I'm working on it."

"That doesn't explain why you didn't mention it."

"I've already- It was sudden okay? Daniel was learning from him and-"

"Of course that was the fucking bastard bothering Daniel," she said sourly.

"See! No one told me that, so it was more of a rush to get Daniel out of there," Johnny said. "And then he freaked out and I freaked out and we're finally finding our footing again."

"You freaked out because?" she asked looking at him with a frown

He hadn't told her.

Didn't know how to tell her that Kreese had tried to kill him again.

He'd avoided her until the bruising healed.

She was finally happy. He didn't want to make her unhappy again.

He didn't want to worry her.

But he couldn't lie to her either.

"Because Kreese was there," Johnny said softly. "Hiding behind his damn cardboard cut out."

Her hand grabbed his and it was goopy with pumpkin.

"Did he-?"

Johnny couldn't meet her eyes and she stood up suddenly.

She was still holding her carving knife.

"He's a fucking bastard! How dare he try not just once but twice? I have half a mind to-"

"Mom, please put the knife down."

She blinked, stopped, laughed, and set it down.

"Take murder off of the table Mom."

"I didn't say it was on the table."

"It's in your look."

"Honey."

"You just got free from Sid and now you want to end up in jail?"

"They might not catch me," she said thoughtfully. "I've been reading a lot of murder mysteries. Tommy recommended them."

"Then you know that they're fiction. That they almost always catch the murderer and it all ties up neatly at the end of the story. You'd be on the run forever, Tell-Tale Heart and all."

She sighed sinking heavily back into her seat. Then sitting up suddenly and leaning towards him.

"You said you're working on it. You're planning something."

"I am. Daniel wants to compete. So my plan is for after."

"Can I help?"

"I mean you've got a part, for sure."

"And I don't even have to audition?" she asked hand to her chest with a look of fake surprise.

"I've been told I have a problem with nepotism, so no," Johnny said with an amused smile.

She laughed, "Okay, sounds great. As long as they're both out and that justice is served."

"With a big helping of revenge," Johnny said carefully prying out the last carved piece of his pumpkin.

"Mr. Miyagi is okay with this?" she asked raising her eyebrow. "He seems like a water and duck person."

"He doesn't know. Only necessary individuals are aware at the moment. Need to know basis."

"Daniel?" She asked returning to her pumpkin.

"Knows that I'm planning something."

"How many moving pieces are in this plan?" she asked glancing at the book he'd brought with him sitting on the coffee table. "This doesn't include faking your death to get out of prison does it?"

"No, of course not!"

"Just checking."

They moved on to safer subjects, finishing up their pumpkins and putting candles in them by the time the guys and Jessica arrived.

It was going to be weird for her to be gone in three weeks.

No longer part of their group, no longer a head of bright red curly hair amongst the guys.

Johnny knew he wasn't the only one who'd asked her if she really had to go.

He knew the guys had offered to come down to Ohio if that boyfriend gave her any trouble.

If he made her cry they'd be there in a heartbeat.

Johnny had asked her if she could stay until after the tournament, but she shook her head, lamenting it.

Told him at one of their café dates how much it sucked to have helped

Daniel train and not get to see the results.

Her family was expecting her.

She had grabbed his arm so fiercely, leaning in close.

"You have to call me and tell me what happens. Promise me. As soon as possible. All the details."

He'd promised. And he'd keep that promise.

He did their makeup when they arrived, it was similar to the skeleton look from the year prior, but no painted on teeth. He tried for something more ethereal.

Doing Jessica's makeup was harder than he thought it'd be. The guy knew to sit still. But she'd turn and start talking to one of the guys or his mom and she just wouldn't sit still. He definitely got make-up on her ear three times. But eventually, she was done and she got up, spinning happily in her grey and white clothes.

The guys were talking about all the fun stuff at school.

Midnight Halloween movie parties with black and white old films in the auditorium with breakfast thrown by the film club.

A zombie day where the art kids dressed up as zombies and shuffled to class.

It was festive on campus and they were enjoying it.

They had already been to countless Halloween costume parties, wearing the old skeleton costumes around campus, missing the rest of their skeleton crew.

Getting high with philosophy and physicist students and having deep conversations they didn't remember later.

Daniel and Mr. Miyagi arrived when Johnny was finishing Dutch's makeup and he arrived wrapping arms around Johnny, kissing the back of his neck.

When Dutch's was done, the guys left with Jessica to go walk around and eat snacks greeting Daniel warmly but knowing somewhere there was food.

Mr. Miyagi spoke to his mother about the idea she had and Johnny worked on Daniel's ghost makeup. It was distracting to put anything on Daniel's face. Even if it was a costume. He set the makeup aside and kissed him.

Daniel laughed.

"Aren't you worried about smudging it?"

"I can fix it later," Johnny said kissing him again.

Daniel had won their payment argument.

Not that it was much of an argument.

But he was paying Johnny now. And it was weird. Weird to get a paycheck in his account from Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees. He'd have to do taxes or something. Maybe Daniel could help. Or maybe his Mom had hired someone to do her taxes and she could have them do Johnny's too.

Johnny was setting his paycheck aside for an apartment.

Someplace close to the shop, Mr. Miyagi, and his Mom.

He'd been going out looking when he had free time. Collecting brochures for Daniel to look at.

He didn't want to pick anything that was going to fall apart. Nowhere with too much damage or mold.

Mr. Miyagi had taught him what to look for from when he'd helped at South Seas so now he knew all the signs to look for.

He also wanted to make sure it was a place he could drop a larger deposit on so they wouldn't have to pay as much in monthly bills. He thought that was a possibility anyway and then that would give them more room for Daniel to comfortably contribute. He had a feeling that if he paid for the apartment completely Daniel wouldn't like it.

Daniel pulled away and then broke into a fit of laughter.

"What?"

"You look like a sad clown now."

Johnny sighed.

"Okay, let's go fix this up," he said taking Daniel's hand and leading him down the way to his room, to his en suite bathroom.

He did look a bit like a sad clown when he looked in the mirror.

He washed the paint off his face and he turned to dry off his face, to start over, when Daniel was right in his space, fingers digging under the gauzy cheesecloth and the spray-painted clothing, hand finding his skin, his stomach, his chest, turning them and pinning him to the counter.

"We can lock the door, right? This is your room? Your bathroom? Then it should all be fine right?"

Maybe he'd said no a little more frequently than he usually did, based on the way Daniel was grinding against him like he'd been holding his breath until they'd had a moment alone together. But there had to be boundaries like not the Brown's kitchen or Mr. Miyagi's truck, or the shop while Mr. Miyagi was still there or Jessica was on the way or Mr. Miyagi's shower.

There'd been a lot of nos recently.

They hadn't really had privacy for a while.

Mr. Miyagi seemed extra concerned.

Kept checking in on them.

Daniel had started it. It was his fault even if Johnny wouldn't ever tell him that.

Daniel just burst into Mr. Miyagi's room, or anywhere really to talk to him. And now Mr. Miyagi just opened the door to their room to ask if they were ready for dinner or wanted to play a card game or to study kata, or if they were okay.

Johnny thought it was because they'd both gotten hurt under his watch.

Daniel studying with Mr. Silver, Johnny from Kreese and now he had to check that there weren't any monsters that had popped up in the last five minutes.

It was totally Daniel's fault though for starting it. Not even knocking and walking into Mr. Miyagi's room to tell him dinner was ready.

Finding him just about anywhere to talk about the shop, about how the day had gone, about his conversations with his mom.

To ask Mr. Miyagi what he wanted from the store.

Johnny still knocked. But he was pretty sure he was the only one still knocking on the doors. Now that the discord between Mr. Miyagi and Daniel had healed the boundaries were blurring, which meant nothing was happening.

Just a lot of breathing exercises and kata and showers.

"Yeah."

Daniel grabbed the washcloth from Johnny wiping off his own face, all of Johnny's hard work was gone in an instance but it was fine because he got to see Daniel's face.

The lack of privacy was one of the reasons they'd decided to spend the night with his Mom.

She'd invited them to spend the night. Reminded Johnny that he had a room and they could do breakfast which would be nice.

She said Daniel could spend the night too. That was fine. Then she'd leaned over her red lips curling up in that mischievous look she got sometimes to say "And there are condoms in your bathroom."

He'd nearly left right then from their breakfast date, turning bright red and burying his head in his hands.

"Just please do laundry before you leave," she said with a knowing smile into her coffee.

Her room was on the other end of the house. He had a feeling she'd picked the specific floor plan on purpose. And now that he knew why and that Daniel instantly took that opening, that offering, went straight for it he felt like maybe they were too obvious, too easy to read, and it was embarrassing.

Daniel pulled away to go lock Johnny's bedroom door.

He came back, pulling off his ghost costume, the different layers, and setting it on the chair.

Johnny flicked off the bathroom light, setting his costume carefully aside.

Not moving fast enough from the way Daniel's hands were on him, helping him out of the rest of it, tumbling them onto the bed.

"You remember tomorrow right? No plans all weekend?" Daniel asked.

Johnny blinked. Trying to focus on the conversation and not the hands-on him. He needed to find more apartments to look at fast, or else Daniel was going to take advantage of his mother's open-door policy and she'd just smile into her wine and coffee every time she saw them and he'd die of embarrassment.

"Yeah."

"After work, I'm going to drive us to where we're going."

Where they were going.

So it was a trip.

Daniel hadn't explained anything.

Johnny had tried to think of what Daniel possibly had planned. But he didn't have a clue. He'd have plenty of time to think. He had a feeling he wasn't going to sleep at all that night.

Even though they had a party to get to. touching Daniel was too tempting to avoid, a chance. The opportunity was too good to pass up.

He'd do whatever Daniel wanted on their trip, but not now.

He flipped them over, shifting Daniel under him, enjoying the look on his face, leaning down to kiss him.

He'd try to keep them quiet. There was a party starting outside that door after all.

Getting ready again took a little bit of effort to get the look right but Johnny managed it, reworking their make-up and making sure the ghostly look worked, before unlocking his door and returning with Daniel out to the party.

They got snacks, candied apples, and finger food, mocktails because even though his mom was a cool mom, there were kids at the party, and the person she hired to man the bar was carding with a fierce look in their eyes like they could spot a fake ID a mile away.

Johnny didn't even try, just accepted his dark purple almost black drink and hooked his arm around Daniel.

It looked like they hadn't missed too much. Not his mother's toast at least.

His mother looked happy as she thanked everyone for coming, for her housewarming gifts, for the friendship, for the support through her divorce, and for being there. She turned her glass to Johnny's little group of ghosts, to the guys, and held up her glass smiling warmly in their direction.

"I know you boys have your own families that love you greatly, and for good reason. While over the years we didn't get to spend too much time together, I know from Johnny's stories about your adventures and all the fun and joy you've brought into his life. For that, I'm forever grateful. You even came to me to tell me something was wrong when I hadn't wanted to believe it. Helped me when it wasn't your job or even remotely close to a responsibility you should've even considered. But you did. A divorce isn't easy no matter what, but Sid made it hellish. I do not know what I would've done without you. It wouldn't have been easy for sure. I remember the first time I met the four of you. I went to talk to Johnny and didn't realize the four of you had snuck in. I didn't even know at that point that you had to sneak in. But for half a minute I wondered if I'd been gifted four more boys. Like I just hadn't looked close enough and had somehow collected four more without even realizing it. But that's what did happen. Johnny didn't have brothers, not by blood. But he has you and that chosen bond is stronger than anything else. You have grown into fine young men who I'm immensely proud of, as I know your own families are, and I'm grateful we are a part of each other's lives."

He heard the guys sniff, knew if he looked closely he'd see the tracks of tears through their makeup.

When Johnny had been little before Sid the Halloween tradition they had was dressing up and going out trick or treating. He never had any request on what to wear because he knew they couldn't afford to buy him a costume.

He'd looked once in the store, saw how much they were, and never asked.

No superheroes, no monsters, no movie characters.

No costumes made by someone else.

Instead, they went through their closet and went to work.

One year they made his costume out of Papier-mâché, out of old recycled paper and newspaper and they painted it because they'd found the painting kit the couple who owned the florist shop had gotten him when he was younger. They'd been cleaning, downsizing because they had to move and found all the crafting and art supplies they'd given them to keep him entertained in the corner of the shop.

That costume had been his favorite.

They'd worked together to make him a bunny mask because that was the first year where he got to really have a choice.

He'd gotten to hold a bunny in his arms at the petting zoo and the bunny had actually liked him.

His mom said it was because he was so sweet and calm and he'd liked that. Thought that if people didn't like him, at least the bunny had. Saw something good in him.

He liked Halloween over every other holiday because it meant time with his mom, she usually got the evening off and could take him out.

No one bullied him because he could hide behind a mask or behind make up and no one paid attention to him.

And every house, their doors opened and they put candy in his pillowcase. And he and his mom would share on the ride home, when there was a home or in the car when there hadn't been.

They'd gone the first year together after moving in with Sid, before Sid said Johnny was too old. He'd been studying magic that year, so he'd gone as a magician. The first purchased costume he'd ever had, they'd picked it out together.

It had been nice, but it wasn't the same.

He'd missed making them, putting something together.

He realized it wasn't the costume exactly but the time they got to spend together, and that had been one of the warning signs that things were changing. Not just the big house but the loss of their traditions.

Instead, Sid threw parties. And he wore costumes that Sid had someone else pick out for him. Because as Sid had said for years, it wasn't like he had friends to hang out with, so what did he care?

But when he had made friends, even though they'd been too old to go trick or treating they still did. A group costume that Johnny had worked hard to figure out. The five of them sitting on the floor of Bobby's room trying to come up with something and Johnny had put a few things together from Bobby's closet and they'd liked it.

Sure they could've bought something fancy, something modern and new, in style or in fashion, but they'd liked Johnny's design.

He'd been so happy that they'd liked it. So relieved.

It started a new tradition and it made his heart feel full to see them all together still. Like that old tradition had grown and hadn't died like it had felt so many other things had because of Sid, or because of bad luck. And it was a relief to have Daniel at his side, that he hadn't ruined Halloween for him or Mr. Miyagi, that they could still enjoy it together.

Chapter End Notes

> Please use caution when researching Jeanne Baret. I was going to link to some articles but depending on the source, her secret didn't stay a secret for the entirety of her journey, and the content from once she made it to Tahiti and beyond can be triggering. (Be especially careful of the NPR piece) This is why I'm not linking a source this time. It wasn't a peaceful voyage but she did get rewarded with a pension later in her life with a document that regarded her highly for her hard work, botany skills, and for circumnavigating the globe and there is a plant named after her. Inspiration for Laura's outfit is from sketches of Jeanne Baret.

Roots

Daniel couldn't find Johnny.

He wasn't in their bed, which happened sometimes but not often. Usually, Johnny got up second, like his alarm was Daniel.

He wasn't in the garden reading.

He wasn't in the kitchen.

He wasn't anywhere.

Johnny usually told him he was heading out. Would kiss him and let him know he was going somewhere and would see him later or left a note. He went out to the lot out front to see if the Avanti was still there.

There was a black car sitting out front and a man was putting Johnny's things into the trunk, the bag that Daniel had planned to pack himself for their weekend getaway, he just hadn't had time yet.

The man shut the trunk.

"Hey what are you doing? That's Johnny's," Daniel said.

"Yeah, whole point," said a familiar voice behind him and Daniel spun.

Chozen brushed past him, holding the bonsai that he carefully put into the darkened back seat.

Johnny was in there, Daniel knew it he just couldn't see him. Couldn't find those blue eyes in the darkness.

"What are you doing here?"

"He nearly died," Chozen said.

"I didn't-"

"Didn't keep safe," Chozen said shutting the door and leaning against it, blocking Daniel from Johnny.

"You tried to kill him with a knife," Daniel said.

"I did, not to hurt, motivate. Motivate you to fight. But you not fight enough. Not strong enough. So now I come and get Johnny-san. Take somewhere safer. Somewhere peaceful and quiet. Johnny-san like Okinawa, take to Okinawa. Far from your," Chozen waved his hand in a circle towards Daniel. "danger."

Daniel stepped forward, "Just let me talk to him."

"No need."

"I don't want him to get hurt."

"Too late."

"You hurt him too!"

"Accident. You led him straight to enemy. Straight to Kreese. Didn't fight back, didn't fight for him." Chozen pushed off the car and pointed a finger at Daniel. "I warned you. You didn't listen. I said You take Johnny-san into dojo, but not defeat his enemies. They will come back. Must squash like bugs. His enemies will become yours. Old sensei will come back, bite harder. I was right. Came back. Bit harder. Hurt Johnny-san."

"I didn't mean to. I was trying to learn how to keep him safe."

"And instead became a cobra. Left your dojo and joined other dojo. Betrayed dojo. Betrayed Miyagi sensei. Betrayed Johnny-san. Worst of all betrayed self," Chozen said shaking his head.

"I just wanted to go somewhere else to practice-"

"Excuse. Silver stroked your ego. Thought maybe false things were real. Stranger saw promise. Wanted Silver to be right. That bad man thought you had heart. That you were champion. But you're a coward and stranger lied. Silver lied. You learned nothing."

Daniel stepped towards him. Like hell he'd let Chozen kidnap Johnny. He held up his fists.

"I learned plenty."

"How to destroy enemies? It's not Miyagi sensei's way. Did not befriend enemy either. Pour oil on fire. Made bigger. Failed. Failed Johnny-san. Nearly died. Yet you think you should keep him?"

"Yes!" Daniel said. "I was tricked. I was upset because I was scared. I owe him an apology and thanks for- for coming when he did and I'll learn. I'll learn how to stop Kreese next time."

Chozen let out a mirthless laugh.

"Did not even try, and think next time. Think will defeat Kreese but not even think of Silver. Must defeat all to be safe. But you are scared. Too scared to fight. There will not be next time."

He turned and opened the back door to the car.

Daniel tried to see in, to see Johnny and couldn't.

"Wait," Daniel said rushing forward, heart-pounding, if Chozen left with Johnny he'd never see him again.

"Don't worry," Chozen said sitting down in the backseat. "I will treat Johnny-san like prince. Live happy life. Just away from you. Safer. Like you thought about. Make inner wish come true."

The door shut and the car drove off.

Daniel ran to the Ford to try and get it started, to give chase, to get Johnny back. But his keys kept slipping out of his hands, he couldn't find them under his seat. He cursed and cursed and tried again and again.

He woke up startled, Johnny gently shaking him awake. The light was on. For a moment he was confused. He didn't know where he was.

It wasn't Mr. Miyagi's. But Johnny was there looking down at him with concern in those blue eyes.

He reached up, pulling him down to him, wrapping his arms around him, feeling his solid weight and breath and heartbeat.

"You're okay," Johnny said softly, arms wrapping around him, under him.

Daniel let out a breath of laughter.

Johnny looked up at him from where he'd rested his head on Daniel's chest.

"My nightmare was about not being able to find you," Daniel said softly. "And Chozen."

"I'm not going anywhere," Johnny said then tilted his head thoughtfully. "Except wherever we're going tomorrow. But that's together. Are we going somewhere where I might get lost?"

Daniel's pounding heart settled and he shook his head.

"Sneaky. I'm not telling you a thing. You gotta wait."

Johnny sighed, turning his head to the side and resting it back on Daniel's chest, listening to his heartbeat.

"What time is it?" Daniel asked.

"Four-thirty," Johnny said softly.

Daniel lifted his hands and ran them through Johnny's hair.

"Want to go back to sleep?" Johnny asked.

"No."

"What do you want to do?"

"Just lay here with you."

"Okay."

Daniel woke up squinting at the sunlight streaming in through Johnny's window.

It smelled like pumpkin.

They'd moved.

Johnny's arms were still around him but he was no longer laying on Daniel, he had moved so he was on his side with Daniel in his arms.

Johnny didn't move much in his sleep and the light was off. So Daniel must've fallen asleep first and Johnny must've turned the light off again and moved.

He tried to roll over, it was difficult, it seemed when Johnny fell asleep with a purpose it became a steel trap.

Daniel huffed, wiggling, the arms around him tightened and he squirmed.

He wanted to see Johnny's face. But it was hard to do when all that muscle was keeping him in one spot.

He never thought the muscle he liked so much would turn against him in such a way.

It was comforting right up until he tried to move, then it was like a finger trap, the more he tried to escape it the more Johnny held on.

"You're awake aren't you?" Daniel huffed. "Let me roll over will you?"

Johnny laughed softly on the back of his neck, pressing his lips there.

"You wiggle so much in your sleep I wasn't sure you were awake."

"Excuses," Daniel said pushing the arm over him up and rolling over frowning.

"Sleep better this time?"

"Yeah, until I woke up trapped."

"Hurt, scared or annoyed?" Johnny asked softly.

"Annoyed and frustrated."

Johnny kissed his forehead.

"I woke up on the other end of the bed when you had your nightmare. I figured part of it was because you weren't on me, you know? So I figured this way you'd feel me in your sleep. I think it helped."

"Probably did," Daniel murmured looking around the room in the daytime.

He wondered if Johnny wished this had been his room. If his mother had lived here and it'd been the two of them, instead of a mansion with Sid. If his mother had gotten a better job, one with better pay and benefits. What kind of life he could've lived?

It would've been better for sure. It would've been nice to have come over more.

It was a little more private than the paper screen doors at Mr. Miyagi's. But it felt like going backward.

Daniel wanted to go forward. Together.

He pushed himself up, a new goal in mind, to try Johnny's ensuite bathroom. He kissed Johnny gently before pulling out of the warmth of his embrace and prepared to snoop. Curious to see what Ms. Lawrence thought Johnny needed.

What products and scents she'd gotten.

Floral.

Everything was floral scented.

Lavenders. Chamomiles.

Sleepy scents. Relaxing scents.

Oatmeal.

There was bubble bath on one of the shelves, razors, and shaving cream. Expensive stuff he wanted to try.

The towels were soft as well, plush.

He almost felt like he was staying at a hotel. A fancy hotel.

He opened one of the drawers. Condoms and lube. Different types, like she hadn't been sure what to get, or thought he might as well try different types. Daniel stared. He tried to remember if his mother had ever bought him condoms. Was that a thing parents did? Maybe?

Johnny had said there were condoms in every single bathroom at Jimmy's house.

Daniel wanted to try them. Compare. But she'd know right? If those boxes were opened.

It wasn't like Daniel didn't have condoms or lube. He kept some in the Ford, in his desk and bedside drawer.

Johnny was usually right that Mr. Miyagi's place probably wasn't the best place...or any of the other places Daniel tried to float ideas across at. Okay, jump his bones was probably more accurate.

He closed the drawer.

Opened it again.

Closed it.

Frowned and with difficulty, turned to shower.

It was a nice bathroom. Everything was nice.

He felt a little bad.

Ms. Lawrence had set it up for Johnny. Like she'd hoped but would never ask Johnny to live with her.

It was all meant to be lived in. But Johnny had picked Daniel and Mr. Miyagi.

She'd set up a lovely home. Something so starkly different from the mansion.

Normal but nice. Cozy.

He remembered his mother said that some parents go through a nesting phase, where they try to make everything perfect and safe for a child.

It was kind of like that. But not for the child version of Johnny.

She'd set up it for him now.

Which Daniel knew his mother wouldn't do for him. She'd set out the childhood stuff that he'd outgrown and didn't play with anymore.

It was like she didn't want to pressure Johnny to stay but wanted to make it comfortable enough that he could if he wanted.

She could've just made a guest room. A nondescript space for any guest who wanted to spend the night. Or had a couple of guest rooms. But instead, she made space for Johnny. She'd painted the walls, filled the bookshelves with books that he liked, photos, and music.

The bed was more comfortable than Daniel's own. The bath mat was plush, the carpet of the bedroom was soft, there were clothes in the closet that she'd bought so he wouldn't ever have to bring anything. He could show up any time and stay for as long as he wanted.

He thought, once upon a time that that was how the apartment in New Jersey would be for him. And then after a while, South Seas would be that way. But the earth was ever-shifting beneath him.

He envied Johnny a little. That his mother was there. That she could create this nice space for him. That he had a mother who embarrassed him by filling a drawer full of condoms and lube. That painted his room even though he was 18, made a safe space for him to come to, a home if he ever needed it.

Daniel felt a bit like a seed in the wind, like the way dandelions become, that some kid had picked it up and blown on it and he'd been separated from everything in that one breath.

They would just have to come over and spend the night more often.

After the tournament. After the danger was over.

Daniel didn't want to accidentally lead Silver to Ms. Lawrence's doorstep.

He'd never be able to forgive himself.

He wrapped a towel around himself and pushed open the door to the bedroom.

They'd do dinners. Get an apartment and she'd come over too. And they'd spend the night when it was too late to drive home and they'd sleep in that nice soft bed.

Daniel dried his hair while looking over the bag he'd brought with him, half tempted to open that closet and grab one of Johnny's shirts.

If Johnny wasn't there he might.

Daniel turned towards the bed, Johnny had left the comfort of the bed.

The bedding was gone as well. Whisked away.

Well, then Daniel would just take a look.

See what clothes were in Johnny's closet.

He flicked through the clothes on the hangers. It kind of looked like she picked things specifically to show off his eyes. To make them bluer.

Nice dress clothes.

Nice lounge clothes.

There were a couple of band t-shirts, and Daniel flicked through those, curious. Then moved onto flannels.

He sighed, it'd be weird.

Ms. Lawrence would know.

It'd be awkward.

He changed into the clothes he brought with him.

He'd steal Johnny's clothes some other time.

He hung his towels back up and walked out into the hall to follow that smell of pumpkin.

Ms. Lawrence and Johnny are in the kitchen. She'd made pumpkin muffins that she set out on a plate for him, smiling warmly at him.

It was nice.

A snapshot of what could've been.

Picking Johnny up for a date and hanging out at her place just like the times Johnny had hung out at his.

Maybe he would've been less intimidated by Ms. Lawrence if he'd run into her in this home instead of the mansion.

Instead of meeting the staff first.

It would've felt....normal.

Shortly after breakfast, Jimmy picked Daniel up. They'd talked about it the night before because Daniel wanted to get some things from the boxes in one of Jimmy's guest rooms.

At the mansion, Jimmy led Daniel through the halls towards the room with the stuff from their apartment. He leaned against the door frame and Daniel walked in and was hit with the smell of home. His mother's perfume and he felt his eyes water.

"Looking for something specific?" Jimmy asked.

Daniel blinked rapidly and brushed off tears. "Yeah, uh Ma's recipes, there's a recipe box and some cookbooks."

"Right," Jimmy said walking into the room and wrapping an arm around Daniel's shoulder. "Well it's been several months since we packed it all up, so I'm not sure where it is, but I'll help you look."

Daniel wanted to tell Jimmy he didn't have to waste his time helping Daniel go through his old stuff to find a recipe box. But just looking at all of it was overwhelming and there was sincerity in Jimmy's voice.

"Thank you," Daniel said.

There were a lot of boxes, but somehow both more and less than he expected. Furniture covered with sheets, their sofa, and their TV, their lamps, his mom's bed taken apart and set carefully aside. Boxes of their kitchen things, living room stuff, the old photo albums, the books that his mother read and kept and his father's favorite books they hadn't been able to let go of, clothing, bedding, towels and just everything, carefully packed away.

It was weird to be going through boxes and finding things that he knew where they were supposed to go in a place that no longer existed.

Two places now.

He asked Jimmy about his classes, about the still open case with Cobra Kai and Ms. Lawrence.

Asked about safer subjects to focus on then the overwhelming feeling of how he felt like the boxes around him and all the stuff in them.

Displaced, untethered, and unsure where he'd be going.

Jimmy talked about Jennifer, about how over the weekend he was planning to ask her out. There was an event she was interested in and he'd managed to snag tickets. He sounded excited.

The case though was all a flurry of movement now that Silver had been found and Daniel noticed that Jimmy spoke slowly, cautiously about it with Daniel. Carefully tip towing like he was worried just the mention of Terry Silver would hurt Daniel.

Daniel was pretty sure he could handle hearing his name.

Seeing him again on the other hand...that Daniel wasn't ready for. But there was time before the tournament and he hoped that'd be okay. Time for him to forget all about Silver and focus on training and getting him out of his life.

He felt relieved, relieved he hadn't sunk deeper into the trap.

He'd gotten scratched up, but without a support system, without people at his side caring and pointing things out, so many people at least, he might've drowned in it.

It would've been exponentially worse.

It sounded like Jimmy had a plan, or the team he worked with had a plan. Enough evidence to do something.

They just needed to find people first. People who wouldn't be swayed by Silver's money to look the other way or sabotage their plans.

Jimmy didn't go into detail, but he sounded confident. Felt like he had a hang of taking out the trash he said with a rueful smile like he was thinking of Sid.

It took two hours to find his mother's cookbook and recipe box and when they found it they sat on the only available space in the room.

"What's the plan?" Jimmy asked.

"It's for this weekend."

"Romantic getaway?"

"Yeah."

"You know we have these large picnic baskets that are insulated, want to borrow one? We use them for festivals," Jimmy asked. "They've got cases so they just look like big bags, you can't tell they're picnic baskets. Johnny said you weren't telling him the plan. So it might help."

"That would be perfect actually," Daniel said flicking through her recipes. Looking at his mother's careful handwriting. He was finding everything he wanted easily, setting them aside, each one he wanted to make.

Jimmy glanced over the cards Daniel set aside. "That's a lot."

Daniel laughed softly. "Yes. But it's like a set and we'll be gone the whole weekend, so I figure this is the best idea."

"Johnny is going to become so spoiled," Jimmy said with a soft smile, almost like it was a good thing. Like he was glad someone was trying to spoil Johnny.

"He cooks too," Daniel said amused.

"What's he make?" Jimmy asked curiously.

"Okinawan food," Daniel said with a laugh. "He apparently found all the places where they sell the special ingredients and he wrote down all of Yukie's recipes. All the things she taught him. You should see Mr. Miyagi's face when Johnny cooks it. His face lights up. It's very sweet."

"Is it weird?" Jimmy asked.

"What?"

"They're both so quiet. Like I'm pretty sure if you didn't talk wouldn't they spend the whole day just completely silent?"

"They talk. I came home late once, you know, from when I was studying under Silver and I tried sneaking in and I was being all quiet and the two of them were sitting out on the wooden walkway drinking tea. They were talking about Mr. Miyagi's life. Johnny was asking him about what it'd been like crossing the ocean by himself to another country away from his family and friends and then to find that new home at war with a country that claimed his home as part of it. Mr. Miyagi talks but it takes a while for him to open up. And I'm never sure when he's comfortable talking about things. But he talked to Johnny about it. He really only talked about Okinawa when we went. Before then I didn't even know his father had been alive still. And I think I only learned about his wife and the war because I came by on the anniversary. I just stood there and listened. I didn't want to interrupt."

"I don't think they would've minded."

Daniel shook his head. "If I'd walked in and sat with them I would've started asking Mr. Miyagi a billion questions. Rapid-fire. Johnny just listens and lets Mr. Miyagi speak."

"You do too. You know you're important to him. To both of them."

Daniel knew because they always welcomed him to join them, always made space for him, and listened. But Daniel liked those quiet moments where he got to see something else, a different part of their day, what they did without him and it was so peaceful that it had been like a salve after practicing at the Cobra Kai dojo.

Jimmy stood up and dusted himself off scooping up the cookbook and the cards.

"Come on, let's get you that picnic basket. What's are you planning to drink?"

"I don't know, water?" Daniel shrugged following him down the hall. "I've been a bit focused on dinner."

Jimmy laughed. "You're throwing a romantic dinner, that you're cooking and you're going to just drink water? Okay, so Italian right? How about wine?"

"I don't know if you've seen my face, but I can't even pretend to get alcohol unless it's someplace you know they don't card and won't look at my face."

"Daniel Daniel Daniel, have you forgotten where you are?" Jimmy asked shaking his head. He opened a door, was gone for a few minutes, and came back with a boxy bag with a strap that he handed Daniel "Picnic basket is in there."

He then motioned for Daniel to follow down the halls past the kitchen where Jimmy opened a door and headed downstairs into a basement.

"This isn't like The Cask of Amontillado is it?" Daniel asked standing at the top of the stairs with a frown.

"You know I thought you were going to sleep through English class, didn't realize you remembered some of the short stories. You always looked so bored."

"Hey, the only one any good at reading aloud was Johnny. Listening to everyone robotically read was incredibly boring. Don't tell me you weren't also bored with it."

Jimmy shrugged. "I read ahead and ignored everyone reading. Here take your pick," he said standing in the center of a wine cellar and holding his arms out. "We don't keep anything my parents would miss in here."

"That seems impossible."

"They have a bar with a wine fridge," Jimmy said with a shrug. "That's where all the stuff they keep for special occasions. This stuff is fair game. We've even got a couple of barrels of aging bourbon, scotch, and rum. But there's no way you could get that to your date easily."

Daniel carefully set the bag on the steps and walked around, it was almost like a library, with tall shelves filled with bottles of wine and other alcohols.

"This is a lot of booze."

"We host a lot of parties," Jimmy said.

"They're good parties?"

"Yeah? You weren't scared that first time? With Ali?"

Daniel looked through the wine types he recognized. "In the moment it was overwhelming, but now I look back at that party fondly. Ma was happy I was getting out and spending time with people and that was nice, but what makes me happy now is that I kissed Johnny then. I'm glad I did."

Daniel knew Johnny probably didn't count it as a kiss, not their first kiss. And they'd had better ones since, a lot of better ones. But he'd liked having their own little world in Jimmy's house where nothing else had mattered except that he put his mouth on Johnny's as fast as possible. That need had only gotten worse over time, but it'd been a wake-up call for him, a spark of those feelings, the first true inkling.

Daniel picked a red wine and held it out to Jimmy. "What do you think?"

Jimmy studied the label. "What's the base tomato or cream?"

"Tomato."

"Then this is a good choice," Jimmy said with a smile.

He helped Daniel pack up the wine carefully in the picnic basket and walked with him back to his car. "Want me to drop you off at Mr. Miyagi's or back at Ms. Lawrence's?"

"Mr. Miyagi's, if that's okay. I'd like to get some of this cooking done before tomorrow."

"Of course, not a problem," Jimmy said with a smile.

On the drive back to Reseda he talked to Jimmy about the east coast versus west coast. About similarities and differences.

"Do you get jellyfish that wash up on the shore here?" Daniel asked.

"We do. Actually, both Tommy and Johnny have been stung by Jellyfish."

"Seriously? When? Where?"

"Tommy's beach house," Jimmy said. "I wasn't with them the first time when Tommy got stung. But the second time we were all hanging out and Tommy's uncle was around because we were younger then. Johnny went out surfing and came back and walked very stiffly up to Tommy's uncle and said "sir, I've been stung by a jellyfish." I swear we all freaked out more than he did. Tommy's uncle's a doctor and took care of it, but he was so damn calm that it was practically surreal. I remember asking him if it hurt and he said "Yes." and I thought damn Johnny is tough as nails. But the longer I got to know him, I realized he's just very good at hiding."

"Yeah. I-I worry that Kreese hurt him worse than he's letting on."

Jimmy glanced at him.

"Probably. But Johnny's kind of like an oyster. Hard as hell to get to open up. But if you get it to open up on its own it's easier. And you've managed that. He didn't shut down after Kreese this time. Instead, he's put whatever plan he has in motion. I think it's because of you. And because of uh...Silver. He's got a goal. He would've just spent his whole life avoiding Kreese until Kreese decided to find him again if that ever happened. Would've just thought it was his fault everything happened. But because of you, because of everything with Silver...well if he's anything like his mother he's going to salt the earth so he doesn't come back."

"What if he gets hurt because of-"

"Nope, stop that," Jimmy said shaking his head. "Those two are not your fault or your responsibility. You can't let yourself take the blame for other people's actions or take the fall for them. Only your own. And hell we kind of all know what it's like to be betrayed by a teacher. You got the crash course of Cobra Kai in like a month and a half. We did that shit for five years thinking it was normal. Not the same of course. I'm sure Silver made it a different type of hell. But that destroy your enemy shit? We're lucky that didn't send us down a path to just constant jail time you know? We're lucky he didn't make us all jumpy at our own shadows. But we're healing. And you will too. It just takes time and you gotta give yourself that time. Just like you gotta give Johnny time."

Daniel sighed, folding his arms across his chest and sinking down in his seat. "I don't normally get nightmares, but all of this gave me one."

"It can get pretty bad."

"Chozen came and took Johnny away."

Jimmy laughed. "I'm sorry about laughing, but seriously that's your nightmare? Not Kreese?"

Daniel pushed himself up. "I'll kick Kreese's ass if he tries anything again. But Chozen had said something before I left and it's been rolling around in my head every since Kreese popped up again and I froze."

"What'd he say?"

"He told me I had to defeat Johnny's enemies or they'd come back. Not just defeat but squash them. Or else, essentially after they finished licking their wounds they'd come back and be worse and look what happened, they did."

"Hmm," Jimmy said thoughtfully. "I really don't think Chozen has some special way to see into the future. Because Kreese's attack was a window of opportunity right? Wrong place at the wrong time? They were focused on you. Dutch said that. You and Mr. Miyagi. They didn't care about the rest of us. They only went after Johnny because he was your boyfriend, not because he was Johnny. They were after you. So your nightmare Chozen is wrong. Besides, there's no way anymore that Johnny would let himself be taken away. It may not look like it but he's putting down roots. He never used to, but he is for sure now. He's getting comfortable. Look at him the next time he's curled up in Mr. Miyagi's garden with a book. See how relaxed he is around you, look a little closer. He's relaxed and peaceful. He used to be ready to go at any second. Mapping out his escape route, you could see it in his eyes. He still does it sometimes, but more out of a habit I think than actually planning it anymore. Hell just look at your own room. He wasn't taking up any space in that room when you guys first moved in with Mr. Miyagi like he wasn't sure if he was welcome to stick around. But look around again. There's no way Chozen could take him away from you. Even if he got knocked out again he'd run straight back first chance he could."

Daniel thought about it quietly the rest of the way to Mr. Miyagi's and he did feel better.

Daniel carried the basket and his mothers cookbook and recipe box into the kitchen and set them down. Then he headed to their room and pushed the door open.

He looked around, at Johnny's bedside table, his bonsai, the lamp he'd bought and the pile of books, the whale shark on the bed, his clothes in the closet hung up next to Daniel's, clothes in the drawers, his music mixed in with Daniel's, photos they both liked set up on the shelves together. Johnny with his mother at graduation, all of them at graduation together, Daniel and his parents when he was little, with Mr. Miyagi, all of them in Okinawa. Photos with the guys in New York and from their other adventures. The polaroids from the snow sculptures. A notebook and folder that were Johnny's on Daniel's desk. Their sanshin's sitting together, leaning against one another in the corner. Little things from their trip to Okinawa and things from New York City mixed together. He hadn't noticed it happening, what originally had been a room completely overwhelmed by all of Daniel's things lifted from the South Seas Apartment Complex and settled into Mr. Miyagi's guest house was no longer the same as it had been with Johnny's things still living in his bags in the corner, or in the trunk of the Avanti, it was now a blend of the two of them.

He smiled warmly. Jimmy was right. Johnny's room at the mansion had barely been him. Sparse. But he had made himself at home and Daniel had been so worried about Silver he hadn't even noticed. He carefully shut the door and turned back to the kitchen, rolling up his sleeves. He had a lot of work to do.

Scampagnata

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Daniel said goodbye to Mr. Miyagi was trying to pull Johnny out the door.

They were taking the Ford and Daniel had filled the trunk and hadn't let Johnny look inside.

Johnny told Mr. Miyagi to have a good weekend, thanked him again for babysitting the bonsai, and had reminded him that some of the guys and Jessica were still around if he needed anything. They were taking Bobby's little siblings trick or treating because that was when all the kids got to go, on the weekend after Halloween.

Jessica said she was excited to dress up and take them trick or treating, but Johnny had warned her that they usually mapped out all the dentist and doctor houses. They loved Tommy's house because his uncle gave out Halloween mystery booklets that you started at the beginning and worked through to solve a themed mystery. Like a workbook and mystery novel in one. And he gave out raisins.

Pretty much everywhere on their list gave out non-candy. Apples and mini bags of baby carrots. The Brown house on the other hand gave out popcorn balls and king-sized candy bars. Then she was supposed to go to some party with them on campus, but they'd still only be a half-hour away if Mr. Miyagi needed anything. He'd bookmarked all their numbers in the shared phone book.

"Johnny-san, Miyagi okay. Go. Have fun."

"Right, sorry," Johnny said as Daniel huffed, grabbing his hand impatiently and pulling him the rest of the way out of the house.

He forgot that Mr. Miyagi had lived alone for a long time and was used to it. He hoped that Mr. Miyagi would call Yukie and have a relaxing weekend without them, but worried he'd get lonely. Maybe they should get Mr. Miyagi a cat or dog. Adopt one of the animals from the sanctuary.

He sat down in the passenger seat of the Ford while Daniel started the car then handed over the hachimaki Mr. Miyagi had gotten Johnny for his birthday.

"Are we sparring?"

"I don't want you to start guessing, so cover your eyes."

"I could just close them."

"True, but I'd rather you not see. Not even a peek."

Johnny took the hachimaki and tied it around his forehead. He turned to Daniel.

Daniel flicked it down over his eyes and kissed him.

"How long is this going to last?" Johnny asked, thinking maybe he should've put his seat belt on first as he felt around for it, belting himself in, carefully.

"Awhile, so get comfortable," Daniel said.

Daniel played music on the radio while he drove and it was odd. Strange not seeing where they were going or where Daniel was but hearing him singing along to the songs on the radio, occasionally talking about music, the bands he liked, the one's he hadn't thought he'd like but ended up liking from the collection Johnny had brought with him from the mansion. After about a half-hour, after Johnny was sure they were close to being out of the city or were already out of it. He was trying to think of where they were going, what direction they might've headed off in, when Daniel's hand found his thigh, and Johnny jumped.

"Sorry," Daniel said but there was laughter in his tone like he was amused. "I guess you can't sense me in a car."

He was talking about the balance wheel.

Johnny huffed.

"On the balance wheel, I can feel you moving. In the Ford, all I feel is the Ford. I was listening to you sing and didn't notice."

The last big secret Daniel had kept had been Terry Silver.

This though was supposed to be a challenge. A do anything the other wanted because Daniel had won their race. But Johnny was pretty sure it was just a date.

The win didn't have to be a date. It could've been anything. Johnny would've gone along with a date anyway. He'd gone to do things he hadn't thought he would've enjoyed with Daniel and had learned it was usually fun. It felt a bit like a waste. Had expected something else. At the very least that Daniel would've asked to get out of his chores for like a month. Not a secret weekend date.

He couldn't think of what he'd have done if he'd won though. Maybe he'd have ended up in the same boat of deciding on a date. Something Daniel would like but might not have been interested in on his own. What though he didn't know. Daniel was down for anything.

He thought he might fall asleep if he had to keep wearing the hachimaki like a blindfold for much longer.

"You can see now if you want," Daniel said giving Johnny's leg a squeeze.

Johnny pushed the hachimaki back up to his forehead.

They were driving through a woods.

A quick glance at the clock showed they'd left nearly three hours ago and the trees were huge.

"Stop that," Daniel said.

"Stop what?"

"You're trying to figure out where we are."

"Well, then I'm going to need a distraction aren't I?" Johnny said turning towards Daniel.

That kind of worked. Just focusing on Daniel, wearing his flannel, driving at ease in the Ford almost like he belonged further north as they drove through the forest. He hadn't let Johnny pick out his own clothes, hadn't let Johnny pack. Just asked for the keys to the Avanti and had to promise he wasn't going to drive it, just wanted to get something out of it. Wouldn't let Johnny look in the trunk of the Ford.

Johnny had ideas now that they were in the forest. It was hard not to. He was pretty sure they were going camping.

Which sounded nice.

Right. Don't start solving the mystery yet.

Let Daniel have his fun.

Daniel parked his Ford and headed to the trunk where he gave a backpack to Johnny.

"I can carry more," Johnny said after slipping the bag onto his back.

"You can carry more on the way back," Daniel said holding three different bags, closing the trunk.

Johnny didn't even have a clue which one his tent was probably in.

Maybe they weren't going camping.

Stop. Let it be a surprise.

Even if every hint pointed to camping or a lodge. But he doubted they were staying at a lodge, they were too expensive.

He couldn't stop.

He couldn't even hold Daniel's hand, because both of his hands were too full.

He shoved his own hands in his red jacket pockets following Daniel down the trail, taking in the gigantic trees.

Sequoia.

Damnit.

He was trying so damn hard. But he knew where he was and he knew they were camping and why had it been such a big deal?

Johnny would've gone camping with him any time, it didn't have to be a bet in order to get him there.

It also seemed unfair if it was a win for Daniel to carry everything.

Shouldn't Johnny have been carrying everything?

"You sure?" Johnny asked after a while as they continued down the path.

"I'm sure," Daniel said.

Daniel had brought his hachimaki, maybe they were going to spar. In the woods over 3 hours away from home.

Why? They'd already agreed they'd spar with Dutch as chaperone. Or was it just an easy blindfold?

Daniel was too quiet, though he was muttering to himself.

He'd ask.

"Are we sparring?" Johnny asked.

"Nope, unless we want to," Daniel said heading off on a small path that wasn't as clear as the others.

Johnny followed him to a clearing.

Daniel set his things down carefully in the grass and stretched.

"We're allowed a small fire," Daniel said. "If you want to look for wood. They made a big deal about bringing in your own wood. Something about invasive bugs."

Johnny nodded setting his bag down in the pile and heading off back into the woods in search of pieces of wood to build a fire with. He found and kept looking.

Most of the parks had firewood you could buy, but he assumed Daniel had a reason for sending him off before it got dark to get firewood.

They'd left Mr. Miyagi after lunch and Johnny felt bad, but the sun set earlier in November and it was already starting to get dark.

Were they really going to spend the whole weekend in the woods?

Daniel had complained about sleeping on the floor in Okinawa, could he handle a tent on the ground?

Did he even know how to put up a tent?

Was he aware that California had bears?

That any food needed to be hung up?

Johnny was going to have to throw Daniel over his shoulder and run away from a bear, wasn't he?

A bear at least would be a welcome change.

It would just want their food.

No karate feuds.

No honor.

No Ali.

Nothing.

Just a bear wanting food.

So simple.

With their luck, Silver and Kreese would be taking Barnes and his friends out karate camping to learn how to live off the land and self-reliance. But Kreese would never venture three hours out of LA for a field trip.

Once he found enough wood and things to use as tinder he walked back the way he'd come.

Daniel had set up Johnny's tent and had set out a blanket with a picnic basket and was in the midst of pouring wine.

The sun was setting and it was as Tommy liked to call it, golden hour, and it was what Daniel looked like, golden. So damn beautiful that Johnny froze on the edge of the clearing like he understood the old stories of men who'd walk into the woods and see a nymph and fall in love immediately. To go mad with it and chase them through the woods until they turned into a tree or a flower. He hadn't ever gotten it before. But Daniel looked so at peace, humming to himself that if he had gotten up and bolted Johnny would've chased after him, refusing to lose sight of the brunette.

His dad probably took him camping.

He probably went with that large family of his and knew what to do.

Johnny probably didn't have to worry about Daniel and bears trying to steal their food.

He might try and fight them for it though, he might still have to grab Daniel and run away from a bear. But only because Daniel would try and fight it, depending on what it was after, what kind of food he'd brought. Pizza for sure. Daniel really was particular about his pizza. He also loved his mac and cheese.

Daniel stood up, dusting himself off and clapping his hands.

"Alright, where'd he go? Did he get lost? Maybe he saw a pretty flower and is still out there staring at it."

Accurate. Just not a flower. Better.

One foot in front of the other. Don't get caught being a creep. It's why nymphs turned into trees. Because the guys were creeps. The wood is for a fire for when it gets dark. Don't let nightfall with you stuck at the edge of the clearing staring at Daniel. Even if when he stretches his flannel rides up and exposes skin, and he's rolling up his sleeves and ruffling his hair, judging his handwork like a piece of art not knowing he himself is the art.

He stepped into the clearing, swallowing hard feeling like that first lunch where he sat down next to Daniel. Like all the words he wanted to say had flown off. He picked something safer.

"Where do you want these?" Johnny asked.

"There," Daniel said pointing to a spot cleared of any grass, that someone else before them had used for a fire pit.

Johnny walked over setting up the wood the way they did for the beach bonfires.

He hadn't grabbed enough for tinder.

Daniel knelt down next to the wood. He pulled a bag in close and pulled out a stack of paper. He started ripping it up and put it under the wood, pulling out a packet of matches, dragging one across the side, and tossing it on the paper, gently coaxing the small fire until it was bigger. Focused and calm.

He looked up at Johnny and grinned.

"What'd you burn?" Johnny asked.

"All the copies of the tournament form Barnes kept giving me. Silver gave them to me too. I ended up with a bag full, I just kept shoving them in the back of the Ford. Figured this would be...cathartic."

"Is it?" Johnny asked.

Daniel stood up and nodded. "Yeah."

He walked back to the blanket on the ground and took off his shoes settling down on it, motioning to the other side.

Johnny wondered if he'd ended up back in Okinawa for a second, back in the nightmare of quiet tea ceremonies where everyone just stared at him.

He could not handle a weekend of Daniel being silent. He didn't think Daniel could handle an entire weekend of being quiet. Both of them would be miserable.

Johnny copied Daniel, taking off his shoes and setting them aside, sitting down on the other side of the blanket.

Daniel was pulling things out of his basket. A small dish with a lid on it that he set carefully in the middle of them and he got out plates and a serving utensil. He removed the lid.

"That does not look like picnic food," Johnny said. It looked messy, some Italian thing, cheesy and saucy.

"Melanzane alla parmigiana," Daniel said. "We'll eat it on the bread, like a sandwich."

"What is it?" Johnny asked holding his plate as Daniel sliced it and put it on the bread.

"Eggplant parmesan," Daniel said.

He set his own plate aside after finishing making their sandwiches and opened another container.

"I also made croquettes, pasta salad, and there are fruit and cherry tomatoes. I also brought wine."

"How did you get your hands on wine?" Johnny asked.

Daniel had made too much food. Johnny wasn't sure they'd be able to eat it all over the weekend.

"Jimmy," Daniel said, handing Johnny a glass.

"When did you cook all of this?" Johnny asked

"Yesterday while you helped your mom clean up. Ma left her recipe box, it was at Jimmy's so I got it with the wine and I thought we could do scampagnata even if it's the wrong season. But it's California where I'm pretty sure seasons are made up. Like it's a snow globe only always sunny skies and smog."

"No smog here," Johnny said.

"True," Daniel said looking around at the tall trees with a warm smile. He held up his wine glass turning to Johnny. "Cin Cin"

"Cin Cin?" Johnny asked gently tapping his glass to Daniel's.

Only Daniel would bring actual glassware camping. Actual wine glasses. Real plates. Real silverware.

Johnny always used things that weren't as breakable and were more clunky, thicker, not elegant.

"It's kind of like the sound the glass makes," Daniel said, "It's followed by alla nostra salute."

"Alla nostra salute?"

"Yup, to your health," Daniel said taking a sip of the wine and set it aside to pick up his sandwich and eat.

Everything was delicious. The parmesan and eggplant sandwich, the croquettes, the pasta salad. It was like they were prepping for a marathon. He realized after popping a cherry tomato in his mouth.

Were they prepping for a marathon?

A race through the woods?

Or was this just an Italian thing?

Daniel was talking about how weird it was to walk into one of Jimmy's guest rooms and see all the stuff from their apartment. All of his mom's stuff.

Johnny took Daniel's hand and held it gently in his own.

When it got dark they packed up the meal, putting everything carefully in a metal box at the edge of the campsite with a lock Daniel had to keep it safe from curious animals. Daniel had come prepared which was a relief.

It was cooler in the woods and they moved to sit a little closer to the fire, wrapped up in another blanket Daniel had brought.

"Is this Mr. Miyagi's beach towel blanket?" Johnny asked amused.

"He gave it to me, said it's useful to have a beach blanket."

"Does he not believe in beach towels?"

"You have to admit those are scratchy, and this has multiple purposes."

"I'd think a towel would be cheaper."

"I think there's a secret meaning to everything he does. Maybe there's a secret meaning to this," Daniel said in a tone that made Johnny laugh, flopping onto his back.

Daniel laid down next to him.

"What do you want to do?"

Johnny turned to him. "What do you mean?"

"Do you want to stay in LA?"

"Yeah. You?"

"I think so."

"What about Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees? Do you want to work there forever?" Johnny asked.

Daniel sighed. "I kind of want to get it so it can run on its own and then I think I might go to college or something for a business degree or maybe not, Maybe a trade school? I think I want to work with cars."

"Yeah?" Johnny asked pushing himself up and looking at Daniel.

"Yeah. I've always liked cars and I like helping Mr. Miyagi work on his cars. I mean I like the bonsai too. But-"

"It's Mr. Miyagi's dream, not yours."

"I don't know if I've got a dream really, but I kind of want to try it. I might hate it, but I like math and I know that's a component."

"You should do it. Or give it a try."

"There's a lot I want to do after the tournament and that's one of the things."

"Like what else?"

"I-" Daniel looked nervous, taking Johnny's hand and holding it within his. "I know you like living at Mr. Miyagi's and you find it peaceful, but I was thinking after the tournament- I want to move out of Mr. Miyagi's. I want to try and find an apartment. I want to move together. I want us to have our own space. I want to be able to wake up next to you in a big bed and I don't know set something up for the guys for when they visit, but I want our own space. So we're alone at least most of the nights of the week."

Johnny laughed softly.

"What?" Daniel asked sitting up and looking down at him.

"I've been collecting apartment ads."

"You have?"

"Yeah. Anything else you want to get off your chest?"

Daniel chewed on his bottom lip looking at Johnny.

"Yes."

Daniel sat up all the way with a serious look on his face.

Johnny moved, sitting across from him, watching as Daniel shut his eyes, taking a deep breath and then taking his hands again, rubbing his thumbs over Johnny's knuckles.

"When you walked into Mr. Miyagi's workshop I thought you were going to start a fight. I thought things were going to be bad. Like you were pissed I kicked you in the face, that you lost, that Kreese...I thought you were there to be pissed at me. But then you apologized and I was so upset over everything that I didn't accept it. I was too stunned. I truly never thought I'd see you in Seven Seas, and it'd kind of been a fear that had sparked. I always feared you'd cross that line, but you never did. You never followed me home in the dark, never past that gate. I mean you knew where I lived, but you'd never threatened me in my home or at Mr. Miyagi's workshop. And I'd been scared that that line you wouldn't cross was gone. But I'm so glad you came to the workshop, that you apologized. You didn't just apologize in your words but in your actions. I thought you were some spoiled rich kid from the Hills and you aren't. I mean your mom is trying really hard to spoil you now." Daniel laughed softly. "But you aren't who I thought you were and I'm so glad. Because the real Johnny Lawrence isn't the one I built up in my head, he has my back and it brings me comfort. I like watching you read whatever book you've found. I like how you interacted with my mom and with my grandparents and how you are with kids, and all the stuff you do that you do when you think no one is looking. No, not like. I love it. All of it. I love teasing you and watching you turn red. I love hanging out with you and the guys. I love watching you and Mr. Miyagi sitting in the garden drinking tea. I love how you spend time with your bonsai, making sure it's getting the best sunlight, moving it around Mr. Miyagi's house, around our room so it's catching sunlight. I love doing kata together, practicing on the balance wheel, I love dancing with you. I love how you enjoy my cooking. I love the way you pick out flowers. I love every time you frustrate me, hey don't give me that look, you have to admit it's kind of fun now. I know you're teasing when you do it, you always meet me where I am. I love that you're full of surprises and that you let me in, and I'm so glad you did because I love you," Daniel said lifting his hands from Johnny's to his cheeks brushing tears off of Johnny's cheeks.

There was so much he wanted to say and he didn't know where to start. He'd thought about buying flowers for months.

Camilla in pink, white, and red, red chrysanthemums, daffodils, daisies, heliotrope, holly, honeysuckle, white jasmine, yellow lilies, morning glory, red roses, small sunflowers, red and yellow tulips, and yarrow.

There were too many. Too many that meant how he felt. He'd bury Daniel in flowers on accident. But now he couldn't say it all, too overwhelmed that Daniel had said it.

"I love you too," Johnny said.

He was lucky he'd managed those four words. That he wasn't a blubbering mess. That would've been awful if he'd just been unable to say anything and just kept crying. He hadn't even realized he'd started crying until Daniel's hands were on his face.

Daniel smiled, so fondly that Johnny's heart ached, leaning forward kissing him.

He didn't know what to do with the fact that Daniel loved him. He'd been so overwhelmed in his own love that he hadn't even thought of it being returned. He'd assumed he'd say it first, but had been trying to not say it too fast. Swallowing it back down every morning and every night, at breakfast and in the shop, on their dates, when Daniel made dinner. He had swallowed those three words back down so many times that it'd felt foreign on his tongue but also like breaking through a dam. The rest of it. All the things Daniel did that he loved, all the moments that combined, all their adventures and awful moments together, it'd take time to organize those and tell Daniel he loved him in all those moments too, but he'd figure his way there.

It was a long kiss. The kind where Johnny lost track of time and didn't care, but there was a question rolling around in his head, that was threatening to put an end to the kiss, even though he was too breathless to really ask. But he'd try.

"You won the bike race."

"That I did," Daniel said with a grin, leaning back into kiss Johnny.

"You said Whatever the other wants, what do you want?"

Daniel sat back.

"I changed my mind."

"You changed your mind?" Johnny asked amused.

Daniel looked out at the fire with a frown.

"Well in the moment I wanted sex, but I won't rope you into sex out of a bet. That's not how I wanted- I'm not going to challenge you to sex. I mean I still want to, always kind of want to, but it should be nice and romantic and not because you lost a bike race, like you should have a say in what you're comfortable with. I don't want it to be out of like coercion. So it's just a weekend of being stuck with me," Daniel said shrugging.

"I wouldn't have said no," Johnny said. "I say no sometimes because we're not in okay places to do anything. I already told you we're on the same page but places like Mr. Miyagi's truck just feels wrong, right?"

Daniel turned back to him eyes wide.

Johnny kept going. "I mean, this is romantic. You made a picnic, a ton of delicious food. We're camping, which I like, in a nice woods, we've got a fire, and the stars and we're alone. Really all I ever want is to be with you. I think we could make chores romantic if we wanted."

Daniel leaned in close. "Are you sure?"

"Well I don't trust that I know what I'm doing, depending on what you want to do. I got the cliff notes version, and I did not come prepared for anything because someone pushed me out the door and told me not to pack or bring anything except myself."

"I didn't say it that way."

Johnny felt his ears burn. He hadn't said it that way. If Daniel kept looking at him the way he was Johnny's tongue would tie up in knots and nothing else would come out of his mouth. He wouldn't say what he felt like he should.

"The point is," Johnny said looking up at the star-filled sky trying not to lose his nerve, feeling Daniel's eyes burning into him. "What exactly did you want to do? Or I guess, what can we do without two of the three components the guys told me about in our 'talk'. The stuff we've been doing?"

Daniel sat back a little with a smile on his face. "Okay, now I have to know, what did they tell you?"

Johnny glanced at him. "They repeated the importance of lube, condoms, and going slow."

Daniel laughed. "Well they're not wrong, it's just missing some other things, is that all they told you."

"Almost, they did mention a little of how it worked, just not details," Johnny said with a frown turning his attention back to the fire. "It devolved into them telling me how no one believed their reason for asking which was 'I have a friend who likes a guy' so they started to complain about that and I pushed them in the lake."

Daniel shifted back, standing up and dusting himself off going to grab one of his bags, his backpack out of the tent, and setting it carefully next to the blanket.

"You've never gone through my desk or bedside drawer have you? Or looked in the glove compartment of the Ford?"

"No."

Daniel sat down next to him unzipping his bag. "I am maybe a little over-prepared...always... But, if you've changed your mind, that's also okay."

"Always prepared?" Johnny asked picking up the box of condoms Daniel set out on the blanket and next to lube. "Were you a boy scout?"

"I don't think this is part of being a boy scout," Daniel said with a laugh.

Johnny set the box down and kissed him, his hands on Daniel's shirt, drawing it up, curious what he'd look like in the firelight, under that waning moon.

Daniel took it the rest of the way off, setting it aside, stripping and setting everything in the grass. Johnny worked on his shirt, unbuttoning it, not nearly fast enough as Daniel went straight for his belt.

"You said you wanted to do everything. That you have a list?" Johnny asked.

"I do," Daniel said giving him a heated look. Looking up from where his hands were working. "But only if you want to."

"What are you thinking of... for... now?"

He always made talking so difficult.

"I would like to have sex with you, show you things that your cliff notes skipped. The good parts," Daniel said kissing his neck.

That was very clear, especially with where his fingers had moved to.

"Okay."

"Yeah?"

"If it hurts you let me know okay?"

"Okay."

"Or if you want to stop."

Johnny nodded. "How should I-?"

"Get comfortable," Daniel said gently.

Johnny laid down, which was kind of weird. He was naked in the woods. That was...new. Exposed. Daniel was opening his box. His hand came warmly to Johnny's knee and he felt nervous, listening to the fire crackle, yup too much. But maybe he wasn't alone on that.

He pushed himself up watching Daniel, focused.

"Are you nervous?" Johnny asked.

Daniel blinked then turned back to Johnny, fingers slick with lube like he was playing with it, though Johnny was pretty sure he wasn't.

"Kind of," he said leaning over Johnny's knees to kiss him. "I don't want to hurt you."

Daniel's non-slicked hand gently pressed on the side of Johnny's knee and he moved so Daniel could find space between his legs. He kissed Daniel again, wrapping his arms around the back of his neck.

New wasn't bad, but it took some adjusting, breathing slow, mindful.

Daniel moved slow, glacier, he almost told Daniel he didn't have to move so slow, but he was being so mindful with his fingers. Like there was an additional purpose Johnny didn't know. There probably was he thought.

Daniel was kind of like a good book. No matter how many times you re-read the pages there was always something new to learn, something you didn't notice at first glance. He had misread him at first, and that'd been on him. All the things he once disliked he had understood. He had read the first line wrong, misunderstood it. But after taking the time to go back, to get to know him he loved everything now. Adored him. His chatty nature, the way he didn't back down from a fight, the way he could so easily rile him up with a little bit of teasing and how Daniel would meet him there, game for anything.

They hadn't known each other when they met, just assumed based on one interaction that that was all the other was. Assumptions that created a one-dimensional shadow to hate, to project upon. And it wasn't accurate. It wasn't true. There was so much more to the both of them. A whole history of life and personality and actions that if they'd just calmed down and looked closer-

Daniel touched something and Johnny pulled away from the kiss to arch with a heady moan, hands flying to grip Daniel's arms.

Was that what he'd been going for?

What the hell?

Bobby and Dutch were fired for not giving Johnny the right information.

Daniel followed Johnny back down, to where he was squirming on the blanket, suddenly very relieved they were in the middle of a woods away from anyone and anything. He gasped out a curse.

Daniel looked so damn pleased with himself. Insufferable.

There were stupid myths about going blind from touching yourself too much, but maybe the location had been wrong. Maybe everyone just assumed it was a different spot, not where Daniel's fingers were.

Johnny wanted Daniel closer, but he didn't know exactly how, just that there was too little of him, especially because he was sitting between his legs looking smug, watching Johnny come apart like he was methodically taking Johnny apart, purposefully enjoying the way he writhed.

He was too far away.

"Ready?"

Nothing was connecting, scattered across his mind like the stars in the sky, millions of lightyears apart.

Anything.

Everything.

Whatever.

Together.

He grabbed Daniel's arm and tugged. Daniel leaned down, pressing against him, kissing his chest, his neck, any skin that came close to his lips. He said embarrassing things which didn't help him focus. Any thoughts that came together were scattered by Daniel's soft voice on his skin.

Johnny, reached out, now that he was closer, finally, gently pulling him up, towards him, kissing him, interrupting Daniel's whispers.

Daniel's hand trailed down his side, hooking under his thigh and pushing one of his legs higher up, a little further apart.

"Still okay?" Daniel asked, pressing his forehead to Johnny's.

"Yeah," Johnny said pulling him back into the kiss, like he was starving, like he hadn't been kissed in centuries. Until Daniel pushed himself in and Johnny's head went back down to blanket with Daniel kissing his neck, one hand on his leg the other running along his torso, like he was trying to calm him.

"Let me know if I need to stop."

"Just, give me a second," Johnny covered his face, breathing carefully.

How Daniel was staying so still Johnny didn't know. Probably meditating or something. Maybe they could try meditating on the balance wheel back to back. He'd need to take meditation more seriously if that was the trick.

Daniel was quiet. Too quiet. Almost like he wasn't there. Though Johnny was acutely aware that he was there. He brought his hands down and saw Daniel, sitting back, breathing intently, eyes shut. He was meditating. Or close to it. It helped to know he wasn't the only one overwhelmed.

Johnny reached out gently to Daniel's hand, slipping his fingers between Daniel's, nodding when brown eyes met his. Daniel leaning down to kiss him again.

Johnny had been right. Daniel was stunning in the moonlight, in the firelight, under the stars together. He could see them all so easily, all the constellations they'd seen together at their first date to the observatory, which hadn't felt like a first date. They'd settled so comfortably with one another that it felt like the drawing Yuna had sent them.

An old married couple while also honeymooners at the same time. New and old all at the same time. Comfortable and still learning. Adjusting for one another.

A star shot across the sky and Johnny remembered someone had mentioned it.

A meteor shower.

He hadn't thought anything of it because the smog in LA and the lights usually meant there wasn't much to see. Or it'd be cloudy. It was always cloudy.

He'd never had a chance to see one, a shooting star, even though he'd always desperately looked.

All his wishes used to be the same, for his mother to be happy, to make friends. Hopeful at every birthday where his mother stuck a candle in whatever food they had. It felt like his wishes always went unanswered. Year after year. When he was older he hadn't known what to wish for.

Now he felt like he had everything he wanted. But he did know what he'd wish for.

For Daniel to be happy and safe.

To stay with him as long as possible.

To love him as long as he could.

Long past them being old and grey.

Chapter End Notes

Scampagnata means picnic
Eggplant Parmesan
croquettes
Quick Italian Cheers lesson

I was going to have them hang up the food in a bear bag but then realized it'd probably break all the stuff Daniel packed and read that it's outdated and people have gotten injured attempting it. But that's easily solved by food storage boxes that Sequoia National Park says they have at practically every campsite, so that solved that problem and made it much easier lol.

All the flowers Johnny was thinking of, some have multiple meanings, but here's what he was going for:
Camilla in pink (Longing For You)
Camilla in white (You're a Flame in My Heart)
Camilla in red (You're Adorable)
Red chrysanthemum (I love you)

Daffodils (Unequalled Love)
Daisies (Loyal love)
Heliotrope (Eternal love and Devotion)
Holly (Domestic happiness)
Honeysuckle (Bonds of love)
White jasmine (Sweet love)
Yellow lilies (Walking on air)
Morning glory (Affection)
Red roses (I love you)
Small sunflowers (Adoration)
Tulips in red (Passion, declaration of love)
Tulips in yellow (Sunshine in your smile)
Yarrow (Everlasting love)

The best prize of all

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Johnny was usually quiet, so hearing him be loud in the woods was thrilling. Every sound Daniel got was like music to his ears. He wanted it to last forever, but he knew it wouldn't.

Johnny did shut his eyes at one point which worried Daniel but it was just for a split second, his gaze shifting to something beyond Daniel, past him.

After, he didn't want to move. Wanted to just be completely boneless. But he cleaned up and started to tug on Johnny figuring they should sleep in the tent but Johnny pulled him back. That stubborn immovable person. Kind of why he wanted to be like Bobby and be able to pick Johnny up and move him. Show him how it felt to have some giant of a man throw him over his shoulder like it was nothing. But Daniel was pretty sure he wouldn't get much taller than he was now, so his best bet was strength because when Johnny wanted to be like a boulder he would become one and couldn't be moved.

He was worried that if Johnny was too tired to move he'd catch a cold or something as it got cooler through the night when the fire went out. But he laid down next to Johnny like Johnny wanted, pulling the blanket around them and taking his hand.

"Look," Johnny said pointing up at the sky.

A streak of light shot across the sky.

"Did you see that?" Daniel gasped.

"Yeah."

Another shot across the sky. That was why he'd shut his eyes. He wanted to be a little annoyed that Johnny had gotten distracted, that his focus had left Daniel in that moment, but he'd wanted it to be romantic and he didn't think he could've asked for a better night. Good food, a beautiful location, just the two of them, and a meteor shower.

The problem now was that they couldn't come back to the woods every single time. And it hadn't been a free woods.

He'd paid for all the permits to spend the weekend in the woods and to build a fire.

It wasn't necessarily cheaper than a hotel even.

Okay, it was cheaper than a good hotel.

A lot cheaper than the kind of hotel Daniel wanted to stay at. Which was why he'd put so much effort in. Even though Johnny slept on the beach and didn't complain about sleeping on the floor, he'd wanted to tell him he loved Johnny in a romantic way.

The guys had said Johnny had a tent, but Daniel hadn't known whether that was an emergency thing or if Johnny liked camping. So he'd wanted to up everything else. Get away from everyone and everything.

It was nice, the way Johnny pulled him back into his arms. He could almost fall asleep there. But he refused. He'd made the inside of the tent really nice. Like a nest and that nest was calling, it was warmer than the blanket on the ground.

Daniel should've pulled Johnny into the tent, but he hadn't been able to wait. It hadn't even crossed his mind. Plus he liked the idea of having sex under the stars. Their actual first time, which seemed to have gone well.

There were so many shooting stars.

"Is it a meteor shower?" Daniel asked tilting his head back to look at Johnny.

"Yeah."

"Can't believe you were watching a meteor shower instead of paying attention," Daniel said with a fake pout.

Johnny ruffled his hair playfully. "Just be happy I didn't interrupt you to show you. I was tempted to."

"Good to know I rank second to a meteor shower."

"You know that's not true," Johnny said.

He did.

He knew that Johnny wouldn't have let him do that if he hadn't trusted him. If he hadn't liked-no, loved him as much as he did. And Daniel kind of had known that Johnny loved him back on some level. Probably had for a long time if he sat back and looked back at their time together.

How much Johnny fussed over him from the start, tried to be less intimidating in everything he did, worried about scaring Daniel, worried any time he got hurt. Staying behind with him without looking disappointed while Daniel's knee was healing.

Any space Johnny retreated into, Daniel took up, until there wasn't any space left, clearly. Letting Daniel touch him everywhere, letting Daniel in, in more ways than one.

He rolled onto his side, looking at Johnny his hair all mussed, and fondly moved it from his forehead.

"I know."

The blue eyes he loved found his and his heart almost hurt.

Johnny loved him.

Accepted his love in return.

He wanted to move in with him, already was looking for places because he wasn't bogged down in paperwork related to the shop, wasn't doing their bookkeeping while also training for a tournament. He'd seen that opening that needed to be done and had done it, wordlessly, preparing in case because Daniel had been clear when Daniel hadn't realized he'd been clear.

He'd thought Johnny would want to continue to live at Mr. Miyagi's because it was so obvious how much he loved it there. How safe he felt. But he'd heard Daniel's complaints about privacy, about wanting somewhere just the two of them, the frustration of having on the weekends six guys in one room that barely fit all of them. And he'd just wordlessly picked up that thread that Daniel couldn't follow and started the process.

It was things like that.

The way Johnny didn't just listen to him but also heard him. Something that thrilled him from the start. Picked up the things that Daniel couldn't keep juggling and took care of them.

Grocery shopping when Daniel, dinner on the nights where Daniel got waylaid, did chores Daniel never in a million years would've expected Johnny to even know how to do.

All those daydreams seemed like a reality, something within his grasp. A place for him to put down roots, something he craved so much. He'd worried that it'd be hard to replant Johnny, to uproot him from Mr. Miyagi's, and maybe there'd be some adjusting. Trying to figure out what to do on nights where they both were busy and got home late, too tired to cook. Mr. Miyagi always cooked when neither of them did, but maybe there was an easy solution to that, take out. Simple solutions.

They'd work through any problem that came up together.

Daniel pushed himself up, looking back down at Johnny. "Let's go in the tent huh? So I can put out this fire? Before Smoky the bear comes and chides me for not preventing forest fires."

He watched Johnny drag his attention away from the stars and back to him.

"You okay?" Daniel asked.

He hadn't asked earlier, hadn't checked that he hadn't hurt Johnny. He'd thought Johnny had, well, he'd finished and sounded like he'd enjoyed it. But maybe he'd been overwhelmed afterward. Maybe having sex on the hard ground had been a bad idea. His knee was bothering him a little, who knew how Johnny was feeling. Maybe he hadn't moved from the spot because he'd pulled something or it'd hurt and he hadn't said anything. He'd told Johnny to tell him, but maybe he had kept it to himself like he kept-stop, talk to him.

"Are you hurt?" Daniel asked.

Johnny pushed himself up onto his forearms, the blanket slipping down to reveal all the red marks that would bruise later, he hadn't even realized he'd done that much.

"I'm not hurt," Johnny said looking at him amused. "I'm fine."

Not great huh? Daniel felt great. Practice makes perfect and-

Johnny was sitting up slowly, like he was reacquainting himself with his body. Thoughtful.

"Are you sure you're okay?" Daniel asked.

Maybe it'd been a big ask. He would've been fine with the roles reversed, figured that would happen eventually. But other than once Johnny followed Daniel's lead along the way so he just assumed it'd be best to show him first. Plus he'd wanted to do it...for a long time.

"You seem concerned so I'm just going slow," Johnny said. "We'll see if I'm sore in the morning but I seem fine at the moment."

"Did you hate it?"

There were things on Daniel's list he figured they'd try and might not like and that was fine, but he kind of expected this to not be one of them.

Johnny blinked giving him a look. "Daniel," He said softly, reaching out and pulling him into a soft kiss. "It was good. Which I thought you knew."

"Well you didn't move, so I thought-"

Johnny laughed softly. "I wanted to enjoy the stars with you. Then you got worried and I thought I should be careful getting up in case there was something else I didn't know or hadn't noticed. I'm going, but I'm taking this," Johnny said pushing himself up and wrapping the blanket over his shoulders, then dipping back down to crawl into the tent.

Daniel sat there a little stunned. It wasn't like he forgot Johnny was naked but he kind of forgot. They usually slept in t-shirts and shorts because while it was hot in LA they never knew if the guys would be over or Mr. Miyagi would come in and Daniel hadn't even computed that Johnny might not put his pajamas on. That he'd just go straight into the tent, unhurried and unbothered by being naked.

"You staying out there or something?" Johnny asked amused. "What's happening? Are you okay?"

Daniel scrambled up, putting the last of their stuff away.

Johnny was waiting for him, head in his hand laying on his stomach watching Daniel hurry.

That look.

Daniel felt the heat in his gut return, as he put out the fire.

When would they have an opportunity like this again? Maybe they could go again? Would that be too overwhelming? Would Johnny be okay with it? Could try a different position. Mark another one off the list. Spend the entire weekend going at it like rabbits.

He stepped carefully into the tent in the darkness, eyes adjusting to the moonlight without the fire, to the chill of the night air, Johnny had moved, curled up under the blankets, and as soon as Daniel zipped the tent shut warm hands pulled him down into another kiss.

In the morning he woke up and sat up trying to remember what the plan was.

He was going to heat up breakfast over another fire. They had enough wood to make another fire because Johnny had taken his wood gathering duties seriously and probably had procured too much. Then he'd planned for them to go hiking through the forest. There were specific trees he wanted to see and some falls and a pretty overlook. But Johnny looked so peaceful with his hair messed up and curled up, a sleeping Adonis by his side.

He wanted to spend their entire day in the tent enjoying each other. But then if Mr. Miyagi or anyone asked how their weekend went all Daniel would have to say for himself was they had a picnic. There needed to be a buffer. Things that they'd do as well. Otherwise, he might be too easy to read.

He leaned down kissing the top of Johnny's head, watched as he mumbled something in his sleep, waking up but not there yet, reaching out, arms going around Daniel's waist, pulling him back in. Daniel shifted back down, laying next to him, and kissed his nose.

"It's cold," Johnny said.

It was chillier than the valley but Daniel had packed with that in mind, but he supposed when he'd sat up a bunch of cold air had filled the void he'd left.

"Sorry, you hungry?" Daniel asked.

"Mmm," Johnny said burying his face in Daniel's neck. He felt lips on his neck.

There wasn't a rush. He was a little hungry and he needed to reheat the torta rustica he'd made with breakfast in mind. Which meant starting the fire again. But it could wait. It wasn't that late. They could still walk around the park, enjoy the ancient sequoias at least. Besides, it was nice to just be there with Johnny, the way his hand felt on his hip, a warm comforting weight.

His heart felt full in that tent, in the warmth of the sleeping bags and blankets he'd lugged from home, with Johnny. No threats or worries, no concerns about the tournament that he still didn't want to do but had to do. Had to stand up to his fears and show them he wasn't going to back down so that he could continue to have moments like this, where he could just go somewhere with Johnny and not worry about everyone he'd left at home, worried when his back was turned monsters wouldn't come and destroy it all like a toddler and a carefully crafted sandcastle.

He pulled back a little studying how peaceful Johnny looked.

"I love you," Daniel said softly, hand to Johnny's cheek, running his thumb over his cheekbone.

Blue eyes flicked open so awake Daniel nearly jumped.

"I love you too," Johnny said.

Daniel smiled kissing him then pulling away again. "Want to go hiking? Breakfast?"

"In that order?" Johnny asked with a frown.

"Breakfast first," Daniel said with an amused smile.

"Maybe we should get dressed first," Johnny said. "Did you pack clothes? Or just food?"

Daniel laughed. "I brought clothes."

"Did you pack me clothes?"

"Look for yourself," Daniel said rolling over and pulling the backpack towards Johnny.

Johnny sat up, wrapping one of the blankets around him, digging around in his backpack looking at what Daniel had packed. One of his sweaters, a green one, and a pair of dark jeans. He turned to his own bag putting on layers, ending in his orange puffy jacket over another flannel and jeans.

"Going to open the tent, brace yourself," Daniel said leaning over kissing Johnny again, who was looking at his Walkman, eyes wide, but tilted his head up to kiss Daniel back. "Packed that in case you couldn't sleep."

Johnny had let the blanket fall from his shoulders and Daniel was tempted to not bother, they don't really need to go anywhere. They could stay right there, just drive around a little before leaving. That'd still count as seeing the woods right? If they never left their tent? No. They had to see them.

Pulling away was difficult but he did, stepping out into the brisk November morning.

It felt more real. Like it actually was November.

A taste of autumn in the air verging on winter. Cool and crisp.

He breathed it in and stretched, finished his morning routine, and started the fire back up carefully putting the pan the torta rustica was in into the fire.

It was so nice.

Johnny popped his head out of the tent dressed in the clothes Daniel had picked for him, dressed for warmth. Cozy.

He took his bag with him to finish getting ready.

When Johnny got back breakfast was done and Daniel had finished packing up the tent. He'd heated up water and was mixing instant coffee with it into mugs when Johnny sat down next to him.

"I didn't know you were so proficient at camping," Johnny said taking the mug offered to him.

"Used to go with my Dad and Mom, and then my cousins and aunts and uncles. We'd go at least every summer and fall," Daniel said. "What about you, you're the one with a tent and you did a good job setting up the fire."

"Ah, the tent was originally for emergencies," Johnny said. "Some teacher when I was younger said we need food, water, and shelter to survive, so I made sure I always had some in the trunk of the Avanti. Then the guys liked camping so I'd go with them sometimes, and we'd have parties on the beach with bonfires. I like camping. It's nice."

Of course, it was from emergency preparedness. Everything was always so...sad. But at least Johnny did like camping and did have good memories of it. And they could keep adding to it. More new good memories, so that one of being prepared just in case, could become so distant it felt like a bad dream.

He pulled the pan with the torta rustica from the fire and carefully sliced it to put on plates. "Think of it like quiche, a cheesy, vegetable-filled layered pie with a little bit of egg. Ma puts salami in it but I went with ham because that was cheaper."

"Everything is delicious, like always," Johnny said after taking a bite.

Daniel smiled warmly. He asked Johnny about the apartments he'd looked at so far, what he wanted from an apartment, working out that dream list while they ate, cleaned up, put out the fire, and made sure they left nothing behind.

Johnny took all the bags from Daniel, stubborn as hell carrying it all back down to the Ford so that they could go straight to exploring and then go home.

Daniel tried three times to help Johnny carry things but he ducked out of reach each time, reminding Daniel that he'd said Johnny could carry it the way back. That he'd won the race, so he might as well get something out of it since it'd been too enjoyable to have felt like a lost bet. But Daniel followed him back to the Ford, hands in his pockets feeling like he had won the best prize he'd ever get. Johnny's heart.

With everything locked safely in the trunk of the Ford they headed out onto one of the trails, holding hands and looking up at the giant sequoia. They walked down the paths, stopping to look up at the one marked with a sign General Sherman. Johnny had grabbed a brochure at one of the buildings he passed and flicked it open, "It's the world's largest tree. It's 275 feet tall."

Daniel tilted his head back. He was so used to the tiny bonsai now that it was overwhelming to see a tree that big. That old. He felt tiny.

Johnny gave his hand a gentle squeeze and they continued on through the forest, looking at all the trees, just enjoying the walk, talking about apartments and trees and Johnny was asking him if he'd looked at colleges or trade schools yet and when it was time to go it felt too soon. Though Daniel was tired, and pleasantly so. They sat in the Ford eating a quick lunch of leftovers before they left, driving back towards LA, the Valley, and Mr. Miyagi's home.

Chapter End Notes

torta rustica

275 feet is 83 m

Scattered to the Wind

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

November passed quickly, too quickly as they tried to fit in as much time with Jessica before she left as possible. Daniel and Dutch went running with her every morning and Johnny met them for breakfast before they'd head off to their shops and Dutch to his classes.

At one of these breakfasts, Dutch was more jittery than normal. Like he'd downed 10 espressos before he'd sat down. He was listening to Daniel and Jessica talk about winter family traditions but looked like he was going to burst.

"Sorry," Johnny said interrupting a comparison of snow days and how high the snow got. "Dutch, you got something you want to say?"

He let out a breath, leaning forward excitedly as Jessica and Daniel blinked surprised and turned to them.

"I head out in March."

"Where to?" Johnny asked.

"Seoul."

"You got picked from your class?" Johnny asked.

"I did," he said smile small and fond. That little spark of being proud of himself. Waiting for someone else to be proud of him too. Happy for him.

Johnny wondered when the last time he'd seen his parents. When had he gotten the news? Had he been waiting for someone to tell? He'd worked so hard. He'd come over to chaperone with Korean textbooks, studying Hangul, working in little textbooks with more energy than Johnny had ever seen before. He'd asked Johnny to help him find books on Korea and they'd gone to a bookstore and filled up Dutch's arms with books.

Johnny stood up a big grin on his face. This couldn't be done in half measures. Dutch stood up and Johnny hugged him in a tight bear hug. "That's fucking great Dutch! You did it! Congratulations!"

Dutch was beaming when he pulled away in time for Jessica and Daniel's curiosity to turn their focus on a new topic. Dutch and his trip. A thousand questions, a flood he was more than happy to answer. He patted Dutch's back squeezed his shoulder and returned to his seat. Dutch sitting back down to answer the questions.

"Where are you staying?"

"Not sure yet. There's a two-week orientation in Incheon before we head out to Seoul."

"Where's Incheon?"

"It's an island near Seoul where the airport is."

"Are you going anywhere else?"

"My teacher has family on Jeju, so I think we're going to visit there. It's a volcanic island and you can hike the volcano, so I kind of want to do that. And there are mermaids."

"Mermaids?"

"Haenyeo, they're like all over 60 years old and don't use any gear to dive into the ocean to fish."

"Sounds like something Mr. Miyagi would find cool."

"Right?"

"What are you excited for?" Johnny asked.

Dutch thought about it for a while, then looked down at his coffee, tapping his fingers against the ceramics. "It kind of feels like everyone has...or...is going on these adventures. And maybe I don't do anything exciting while I'm there. But it'll be a chance for me to get out there and do something for me. Something I haven't- I traveled a lot as a kid with my parents but never got to enjoy it, just dragged from one spot to another and they were always busy, and I didn't want to travel when I got older unless it was with my friends. But I want to now. Because I think I can make it fun. I think I can meet new people and try new things and get better at the things I already know. Even if it's a small adventure I want to have one. Like everyone else."

Johnny waited until Dutch's eyes met his again and smiled, "It's going to be amazing Dutch. A wonderful adventure and you're going to have a blast. I expect phone calls from time to time."

"Of course," Dutch said launching into a detailed explanation of the itinerary he had so far from his teacher.

It was bittersweet. Johnny was excited for him but he'd miss Dutch. But at least he was leaving after the tournament. It was starting to feel like they really were all parting ways. The guys still came up on the weekends, still trained with Daniel and Johnny.

Mr. Miyagi had come home from fishing one morning and saw them trying to spar with Jessica following along with a confused look on her face, and had laughed, carefully correcting stances and leading them all through kata. The look on the guys faces was a delight and Jessica loved it. And it was nice, nice to all be together in those moments, but when they weren't there, Johnny would find Daniel in the kitchen chewing on his lower lip looking at the calendar with a deep frown, counting down the days till that red circled day, lost in thought, tense.

Johnny did his best to pull him back into the now, to focus on their busy afternoons at the shop, all the kids who came because Mr. Miyagi had started doing classes and their parents always for some reason thought it was just for kids until they got hit with that same calming atmosphere that Mr. Miyagi exuded and then they sat with their kids following along and always left looking so much better than when they'd entered the shop, holding their kid's hand and their bonsai that they'd worked on together. Tried to bring him coffee while he poured over their books, doing the math and tallying everything up, or when he was on the phone calling suppliers to ask where shipments were or to order more. Bringing him and Mr. Miyagi lunch with Jessica who'd come and sit with them in the back and just talk.

It'd all be over soon, too soon.

Jessica's going away party came faster than Johnny was ready for it. They had dinner at Mr. Miyagi's with the guys and her, a traditional Okinawan meal that Mr. Miyagi painstakingly made. It made Johnny a little homesick for the island he'd only lived on for a month, of the friends there separated by an ocean.

They took her out dancing and then dropped her off at her apartment. They were supposed to leave, supposed to say their goodbyes there but it felt wrong. To just say goodbye in the dead of night. Johnny took a look around and saw the same reluctance to leave mirrored in the faces around him.

"How about I make some tea?" Johnny asked.

That tearful look in Jessica's eyes blinked away.

"Uh, yes, thank you," she said directing him to where everything was.

It wasn't like she was leaving forever. Heading only to Ohio. But it felt so far away. Like she'd get swept away by the cornfields to never be seen or heard from again. He didn't want that to happen. For it not to be an end but a happy branching off the same tree they shared. Still within reach.

Wherever Daniel and he moved they'd have to set aside a lot of money for their phone bill. Calls from Kumiko in Tokyo, Yukie, Chozen, and Sato and the other villagers from Okinawa, Dutch in Seoul, Jessica in Ohio, and everyone else, all their friends scattered on the wind. They'd have to set up a calendar, a schedule to be home to hear about their adventures, the two of them sitting on the couch listening to the receiver together to hear about their newest adventures, hopefully, much tamer than their own had been so far.

He worked his way through the cabinet, picking out tea while the water boiled. He was going to miss this. Going to miss their cafe dates where they talked about anything and everything. Stopping by Earthworks to pick up pots for the bonsai. The couple of lessons Jessica had given them, to teach them how to do it themselves. Daniel had made a wobbly bowl and Johnny had attempted a vase. They weren't perfect, definitely handmade and they'd keep them for as long as possible because the memories of trying to learn how to do what Jessica did had been such a delight. There'd been so much warm laughter in that shop and it wouldn't be the same without her there. It would be like a splash of color would be gone, leaving everything a little greyer.

"Need help packing?" Johnny asked when he brought out the tray full of tea for everyone. He set it down, passing the tea out and pointing at the guys. "They packed up all of Daniel and his mother's things, as well as all of Mr. Miyagi's when their apartment complex was demolished and my stuff when I moved. And we packed them up to go to school. Practically professionals at this point."

Jessica smiled warmly at him. "Yeah, if you don't mind. I've got my clothes but I got to ship stuff back to Ohio. Stuff I wanna keep that won't fit, you know?"

Johnny nodded.

They'd have to do this again at least twice more.

Once for him and Daniel and their new apartment when they picked it out and for Dutch for his trip to Seoul.

All of them would be on different paths, doing different things.

He was trying to focus on enjoying the moments and balance them with preparing for the future. For Daniel's birthday and the tournament and their new apartment.

He'd been shopping with his Mom, walking through furniture stores where she discussed all the things she'd learned moving into her own place. She offered to cosign so it'd be easier, though it already was easy when Johnny told the realtor, the same one they'd used for the shop that he could afford the down payments.

She'd looked at him suspiciously when she'd asked where he worked and he told her Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees.

She looked at the bonsai on her desk and then back at Johnny.

"My mom gives me an allowance," he said.

That didn't help, she'd folded her hands on her desk.

"Getting your own place is a big step."

"It won't be my own place-"

"Even with a roommate living on your own in LA isn't easy. It can get expensive, especially for all the things you want, even though you said Reseda is okay."

"I live for free at my current place and I have like no bills or debts, so I've just been saving my allowance and my paychecks," Johnny pulled out one of the brochures for expensive apartments he'd seen, setting the page down on her desk, tapping it.

She looked at it eyes wide like she was trying to figure out the best way to let him down gently and to tell him his aspirations were great but unrealistic.

"I've got enough to pay for that right now. On my own. No roommate needed. But it's not in the right area."

She looked at the apartment and then back up at him.

"Last time you were here-"

"My mom won her divorce," Johnny said with a shrug.

"Then why do you want to be in Reseda? We could move you to Malibu with this kind of money, or Brentwood park, or hell Paradise Cove Bluffs."

It had been a long conversation, but she'd finally understood and they were on the same page and now that Daniel was joining them to look it was a lot easier because he talked numbers and she knew to focus on rent and not the security deposit or a couple of months rent, to adjust for the kind of money Daniel actually would have to deal with, which opened a lot more doors. And Daniel looked so delighted, happy as they looked around at the apartments the relator took them too because they had already poured over so many places, nixing things that didn't work, trying for that wishlist Daniel had wanted. A place where they'd have a safe spot to park their cars, lots of natural lighting, an extra bedroom, a nice kitchen, as soundproof as possible.

Robust security.

They had a couple of other places to check out still but Daniel had ones he liked and it sounded like by 1986 they'd have their own place.

Johnny finished his tea and rolled his sleeves up to start packing the ceramics that Jessica wanted to take home, knowing in a few short months he'd be doing this again. And then again a few months after that. A lot of boxes were in his future. A lot of packing.

With the six of them helping Jessica it took only a few hours to pack up everything she wanted to keep.

They still didn't leave.

No one made a move to go.

"Mind if we take you to the airport tomorrow?" Johnny asked from his spot on the floor.

"That'd be nice," Jessica said softly. "My aunt's busy. She's coming up in a couple of days anyway. I was going to go on my own."

He was glad he'd asked. Glad they hadn't left. The thought of leaving her in the middle of the night to head to the airport on her own in the morning...it felt too sad. She needed a send-off. A reminder that despite a rough start she'd made friends who'd miss her. To remind her of all the good adventures they'd had together.

"We can play card games until then," Tommy said, pulling out a deck from his pocket.

Johnny laughed softly. "We also should probably get some sleep."

"That is what coffee is for," Jimmy said waving him off.

"Sleep is for the weak, who needs sleep?" Dutch asked with a smile taking the deck from Tommy's hands and shuffling it.

"Blackjack? Poker? Old maid?" Bobby asked.

"Let's start easy," Jessica said. "Blackjack."

"Easy she says," Dutch said with a laugh.

"Is go fish more your style?" Jessica asked with a grin.

"How about we make things interesting?" Daniel asked.

"How?" Johnny asked.

"Winner picks breakfast. Loser buys or makes it."

"I like it," Jessica said.

"You would not have said that six months ago before Dutch learned to cook," Bobby said with a laugh.

"The best I could do was toast," Dutch said with a shrug. "But now I make a mean omelet."

"You've also been learning to make Korean food from your teacher," Tommy said.

Dutch grinned. "My pajeon and japchae are getting quite good. But I doubt you want either for breakfast."

"What was the thing you made when you came to my house? That was good," Tommy asked.

"Bibimbap."

"Wait you cooked for Tommy? Why weren't we invited?"

"You guys had stuff to do at home and he held boards for me so I could practice and I accidentally kicked him, it was like apology cooking."

"Yeah, be glad it wasn't you. It fucking hurt. Dutch's kicks are killer now. I was black and blue for like a month."

"I still think it's unfair. I taught you how to make an omelet and now you're cooking more and I don't get to try it?" Bobby asked with a frown, tone exaggerated, mock hurt.

Dutch sighed, passing him the deck. "Fine, give me a damn minute to see what Jessica's got in her kitchen still."

"I've actually got a lot, my aunt said she'd take the leftovers. So I didn't worry about it," Jessica said.

They played a round of blackjack before Dutch came back with a flat pancake-looking thing with slices of green that he cut up and a sauce.

"What's that?" Jimmy asked. "Smells good."

"Pajeon, it's a green onion pancake. Though there are different ones, but with what Jessica had, this is what I could make," Dutch said.

The look on his face was neutral but Johnny could tell he was nervous for them to try it.

Johnny took a piece, dipped it, and popped it into his mouth.

He smiled at Dutch. "It's really good."

Dutch grinned, relaxing and sitting down to enjoy the wave of compliments and to be dealt into the next round.

They played until well after midnight, Jessica beating all of them until there were cries that she had to be cheating and she laughed delighted saying they were just upset they'd lost to someone with better luck.

She wanted pancakes from the cafe down the street for breakfast and Johnny lost.

They fell asleep in the living room near the door on the floor. An unspoken agreement, with Jessica helping Johnny pass out blankets and pillows.

Daniel curled up next to him under one of the blankets. He'd had a sad fond look on his face the whole night.

Johnny kept holding his hand under the table while they'd sat around playing and when the lights went off he ran his fingers gently up and down Daniel's arm that was around him. Goodbyes weren't easy, and Daniel had already said too many in his life. Which was why Johnny was determined they'd see Jessica again. He'd already gotten her new-old address and phone number and put them in the book by the phone. They'd stay in touch for sure. They'd visit her in Ohio. No more goodbyes.

In the morning he gently kissed the top of Daniel's head when his alarm went off to go get breakfast.

Daniel rubbed at his eyes, determined to come with him even though Johnny whispered to him that he could keep sleeping.

But it was Daniel and he was stubborn, so they got ready and headed out around the sleeping guys and down to the cafe where Johnny had met Jessica all those months ago, ordering the fancy pancakes they'd added to the menu and the stuff the guys had wanted. And coffee. Lots of coffee.

The lady working chatted with them warmly while they waited during the sleepy morning.

They filled up a bag with breakfast and their hands full of trays of coffee and headed back.

"I'm going to miss her," Daniel said softly.

"We'll visit."

"Ohio?" Daniel asked wrinkling his nose.

"Maybe after Chicago?" Johnny asked. "That pizza you're willing to try but also don't want."

Daniel sighed and nodded. "We'll visit her. But she better also visit."

"I'm sure she will," Johnny said gently bumping his shoulder against Daniels before they climbed back up the steps to the apartment and set up breakfast, slowly waking everyone up. They sat around eating, quietly, drinking their coffee until it was time to go.

They took Dutch's van and dropped off all her boxes at the post office, before driving her to the airport.

Johnny felt for a moment that it was like Okinawa again, awkwardly standing around, but this time he wasn't leaving.

"You'll call?" Dutch asked pulling away from their hug.

"Until you go to Seoul," Jessica said with a frown.

"I'll send you a phonecard," Bobby said with a laugh, "So you can call and bother him like we're all going to while he's over there."

"Thanks."

"I look forward to our next pie war," Bobby said hugging her.

"You'll let us know if you need anything right?" Tommy asked when it was his turn.

She smiled. "Promise. And you'll let me know of the adventures these weirdos get into right?"

"Always," Tommy laughed.

"Let us know how your classes go and if that boyfriend fucks up again," Jimmy said.

"And you'll let me know how things go with Jennifer?"

Johnny gave her a big hug when she came to him picking her up. "Safe travels, call when you get home safely."

She had tears in her eyes. "Take good care of Daniel and all of them will you?" she whispered.

"Of course. I always try to. And I'll keep you updated."

"You better."

He set her back down and she turned to Daniel, hugging him fiercely. "Kick Barnes's ass for me."

He laughed softly. "I will."

After a few more hugs she turned with her suitcase and waved heading off into the airport.

"What do we do now?" Dutch asked.

"Focus on the tournament," Daniel said with a sigh, running a hand through his hair.

"That we can do," Bobby said with a smile, arm around Daniel's shoulder and another around Dutch's, turning them towards the van. "But first, let's do something fun. How about the beach? Just an hour?"

Johnny smiled softly. Bobby didn't want them to get bummed. He got that. He just needed a little help, because they would cry if they didn't get going now. He threw his arm around Jimmy and Tommy's shoulders.

"I think that sounds great. Ice cream maybe?"

It was cheap. What you do for kids who are sad. But they perked up. Ice cream and the beach. They were California boys, after all, they couldn't stay too sad if the beach and ice cream was promised, or at least they could at least get there and be sad later.

He'd buy them all ice cream, however much it took to help.

He felt like he'd need at least a gallon himself.

He glanced back, trying to spot one last glimpse of Jessica, but she'd already disappeared into the crowd.

Maybe two gallons.

Chapter End Notes

Haenyeo
Hallasan (the volcanic mountain Dutch wants to hike on Jeju) pajeon

Overwhelmed

December rolled around and Daniel was so focused on the upcoming tournament and training every second he wasn't working at the shop that he just didn't think about anything else.

Silver was looming in the future like a giant storm cloud and it was hard to see past it the closer they got. It was hard to focus on anything in the now.

Plus Jessica was gone.

He still saw the guys on the weekends and Dutch went running with him but he missed her.

They all did.

But he felt like there wasn't enough time to get everything he needed done. He had applications for families who wanted to drop their kids off to study bonsai. He had to make class lists to give to Mr. Miyagi. He had people he had to call. Sellers who weren't sending plants on time. Or who forgot deliveries. He had to field calls about the article that wanted to know more than he thought was necessary about Mr. Miyagi. Or people who wanted to know more about the shop in general. Hours were fine, orders were fine. But nosy people weren't. And maybe, at a different time Daniel would happily sit there and chat away with a stranger over the phone who mispronounced Mr. Miyagi's name for the fifteenth time even though Daniel corrected them every time. But he was tired.

Add to that practicing? He got up early to run with Dutch. Did kata in the evenings after work after getting home, sparred with Johnny with Mr. Miyagi around or Dutch.

He did like that. Johnny would strategize, shift out of the way, adjusted in the moment. It was a challenge every time and Daniel knew he was getting better, but he was starting to wonder how he'd ever won in the first place and that worried him. If it'd been a fluke the last two times then what would happen with a guy out for his blood?

It felt like his life was a game of Jenga and every time he had to do anything he was adding a wooden block to the top in the hopes that the whole thing wouldn't come crashing around him.

After work one night Johnny drove him home in the Avanti but didn't head to Mr. Miyagi's. He was driving them south, away, in the wrong direction.

It took a while to notice.

"Where are we going?" Daniel asked and Johnny laughed.

"You just noticed?"

"Well, I don't normally pay attention to where we're going. What's happening?"

"What's tomorrow?" Johnny asked.

"I don't know Wednesday? A shipment of new trees for Mr. Miyagi to make into bonsai?"

Had they made plans? Shit had he forgotten something important?

"The date Daniel?"

"I don't know."

Of fucking course he forgot something important. He wracked his brain trying to remember anything on the calendar and couldn't.

"Tomorrow is December 18th. Ring any bells?" Johnny asked glancing at him looking amused.

"No."

"Your birthday you dork," Johnny said laughing. "You forgot your own birthday?"

"I-" he had. He really had.

"Where are we going?" Daniel asked.

"You'll see," Johnny said, shaking his head amused. "You clearly need a break."

"I don't need a break, I need to keep training the tournament-"

"Daniel, you need a break before you break. The tournament is a big deal and I know that. But you can take your birthday off from training to spend time with your boyfriend and let him try to spoil you."

Daniel started to protest but swallowed it back down.

Protesting that, whatever Johnny had planned, would be like shooting himself in the foot.

Johnny had clearly planned something for him and that was well worth focusing on instead. He was overwhelmed on every front. He did need a break. A nice change of pace. Johnny was right.

Daniel had paid attention to nothing but training with Mr. Miyagi and the guys and Johnny. Working through strategy and going to the library with Johnny to read through their sections on karate and strategy. It was exhausting.

He was exhausted. He wanted to just get everything over with. Just pick him out a bed at the local hospital and get it ready. Get the ER team ready and have the ambulance on standby. He wasn't ready but he was ready for it to be done. The time leading up to it was torture. Which...knowing Silver might've been part of the point.

Johnny pulled the Avanti up in front of a well-lit building and parked.

He grabbed two bags from the trunk and then motioned for Daniel to follow.

It was a hotel.

A nice hotel.

Johnny talked to the receptionist and got their key leading Daniel to the elevator.

They kept going up.

The doors opened and he led Daniel down a hall, opening a door with the key he'd been handed like it was no big deal by the receptionist, like 18-year-old kids just showed up all the time to book rooms at their fancy hotel.

Maybe they did. Maybe kids from the Hills did stuff like this. Just dropped everything in the middle of the week to stay at a hotel. Maybe this was the type of life the guys led. Tired of being at home? Stay at a fancy hotel a half-hour away. Daniel wasn't even sure if it was a half-hour. He'd been so lost in thought. Going through his to-do list in his head that he hadn't noticed until they were nearly there that they'd gone in the wrong direction, that nothing was familiar. Hadn't even known the date.

Daniel took a few steps into the room, letting the door shut behind him, and then stopped. It was like an apartment. There was a living room space and doors. A balcony. It was a suite. Daniel had never stayed in a suite before.

There were also flowers everywhere.

Red roses, tulips, and a whole lot Daniel didn't even have a clue what they were.

"Johnny what did you do?"

Johnny was setting their bags down on a coffee table in front of a cozy-looking sofa in front of a TV. When was the last time Daniel had watched TV?

With his mother. Before Okinawa.

He wanted to curl up on that couch and not move, flicking through more channels than he'd had at South Seas. Maybe more than he'd ever had access to in his life.

There were plush robes hanging up and slippers.

"Well I was going to pick out 19 flowers, but went with 19 bouquets instead because I couldn't decide," Johnny said. "You haven't told me your favorite flower yet, so I just-" he trailed off motioning to all the bouquets.

Ali had given him a flower on Halloween, but no one had ever given him a bouquet except maybe his mom for graduation, never more than one, hell not 19 all at once.

What was going to happen when he turned 50? Was Johnny going to get him 50 bouquets? There'd be nowhere to go. The ratio of flowers to people would just be overwhelming. Where would the guys sleep? On a bed of flowers? Even they might complain about that.

He'd have to start saving now to make sure their home was big enough. Get the apartment and then immediately switch to saving for a house.

Was he supposed to take all of these home?

It'd be a waste to leave them.

But was there enough space at Mr. Miyagi's house for all of them?

He'd have to leave some in the shop.

He walked up to one full of red roses and smelled, walking from bouquet to bouquet, smelling them.

"I also booked you a spot in the spa tomorrow," Johnny said. "And we have dinner reservations at the hotel restaurant."

It was too much. Too many flowers, too nice of a hotel, hell a spa? Johnny did know that he'd have been happy at some flea-ridden hotel right?

Okay maybe not. Daniel did like nice things. But he also could handle not nice things. A middle ground. But Johnny had gone straight for the stars. He leaned over a vase full of lilies feeling tears prick at his eyes. A spa sounded nice, a break sounded nice.

"What about the shop? Mr. Miyagi can't handle shipment day on his own yet and Jessica's in Ohio," Daniel said.

"Dutch is covering for us. Mr. Miyagi knows and Dutch is going to be there first thing to help out," Johnny said. "We have the day off."

"We have nowhere we need to be?" Daniel asked in disbelief.

"Nope."

"Nothing we need to do?"

Surely there was something they had to do, something they'd missed. There were always things to do. Bills to pay. Calls to make. Orders to fill.

"Nope."

Daniel turned it over in his head a couple of times.

Nowhere he had to be, no training.

Just the two of them.

It'd been well over a month since the last time it'd been just the two of them and now with the tournament fast approaching he thought they wouldn't be able to get away again any time soon.

Not until it was over.

And it was about to hit and hit hard.

All that stress. It was building up.

The fear of facing Barnes in front of a crowd.

Seeing Silver again.

He took a deep breath trying to hide how shakey it felt.

It'd be nice to be away from it all again, to have dinner with Johnny somewhere nice.

The problem was he was dressed for work, which meant dirt.

"Did you by chance pack me anything nice in my bag to wear for our dinner date?" Daniel asked turning and walking towards their bags.

Johnny shifted, hands in his pockets.

"You dress up when you go out to eat with my Mom, so I picked one of those. I think it looks nice, but I've been told my fashion sense is abysmal."

Daniel would have to disagree with whoever had told Johnny that, but maybe he was biased.

He liked Johnny in everything he wore or didn't wear. Hmm that might be on the table for their day off.

He found one of his nice button-ups carefully packed and smiled warmly at Johnny.

"Let me go change and then dinner? Is that what you have planned?"

"It's anything you want to do, it's your birthday."

"Then dinner," Daniel said turning to find which of the doors led to the bathroom.

He took a guess and it paid off.

The bathroom was massive.

He'd never been in a hotel room that had a living room.

He hadn't even seen the bed yet.

He was stunned.

Everything was beautiful and massive.

The bathtub was huge and there were bath salts and oils, a little list they recommended with ratios for relaxation, for softening skin, to be soothing.

He changed, messed with his hair for a little bit, and washed his hands getting rid of any dirt underneath his nails.

He'd wondered why Johnny had looked so nice. He always looked nice, but he'd dressed up for work, black slacks, and a button-up, shiny shoes. Like he'd forgotten where he worked.

He'd somehow managed to stay nice which was a feat in and of itself. But he'd just spent the day helping Mr. Miyagi and carrying bonsai to people's cars. He'd wondered why Johnny had been adamant about driving Daniel to work.

He couldn't believe he'd forgotten his birthday and had missed all the signs of Johnny being up to something. The button-up and shoes at work should've been a tip-off. The cufflinks. Like he was waiting out the clock till they could leave to whisk Daniel off to their important event.

Which was a hotel. Privacy.

He'd booked a day at the spa for tomorrow.

Relaxation.

Things Daniel wanted but hadn't had a chance for.

He looked nice, it was the kind of look he picked out himself when he was going to meet Johnny's mom. Some of the places they met were nice. Fancy. With valet service.

Daniel always told them he'd park his own car because he couldn't afford the valet service, but he looked forward to his time with Ms. Lawrence. Liked sitting with her and trying new places. It was an excuse to dress up and hang out. And she always was adamant about paying.

He'd felt bad at first but then she'd given him a look the first time they'd tried a more expensive place and he'd tried to find the cheapest thing on the menu.

"Part of the fun of being a divorcee is doing things that would make Sid roll in his grave."

"Did he die?" Daniel asked eyes wide, shocked that no one had mentioned it earlier.

She laughed.

"No, but he'd hate me going out to a place like this for brunch and taking anyone under the age of 40 he wasn't trying to schmooze, and it's a delight. A delight to eat something more than egg whites for breakfast and salads or juice for lunch. So please let me pay, when I pick a place like this, get what you want."

Daniel had struggled with that for a few minutes. Not sure what to say. "Only if you split it with me," Daniel said.

She'd studied his face and then nodded. "Deal."

Every time they ordered two things and split them.

Something sweet and something savory. Or whatever weird thing they found on the menu that they had to know what it was.

It helped. But he was determined that if he got to a spot where he could afford a place like that he'd be taking her to lunch or dinner.

As thanks for always being there. For listening to him talk her ears off for hours without any complaint.

Johnny smiled warmly at him when he walked out and held out his hand.

Ever since Daniel had confessed he noticed more the quiet ways Johnny told him he loved him. It was a look that shined through his whole face, in his eyes, and in his smile when he held out his hand, it was how he would notice what Daniel was doing at the shop and helped or get him something to drink or snack on, it was how he'd on slow days, or really slow moments because they hadn't really had a slow day yet, Johnny would sit next to him like there was nowhere else he needed to be, nowhere he wanted to be except next to Daniel, it was waiting for Daniel in the mornings so they could go together, the way he leaned against his car or the Ford.

Now though he was shouting it without making a sound.

The room, the flowers, he was pretty sure once he got those 19 bouquets home and sat down with Johnny's book of flowers he'd go weak in the knees.

Anyone else and they'd just be pretty flowers, but with Johnny he knew they meant how he felt.

All the sentiments he was struggling to say. But it was how he was looking at Daniel like he was the luckiest man on earth, which felt silly because Daniel was, they couldn't both be, could they?

He took Johnny's hand.

He'd listened a little too damn well to Daniel. Knew how exhausted he was, how much he'd wanted to get away like it was an itch in his skin that he just couldn't do anything about, how he'd been dreading making dinner that night because he was so damn tired. Everything in him screamed that after the tournament things would be different. He just hoped, clung to it like a lifeline, desperate that things would be for the better. That he'd finally be able to breathe again.

Special Occasions

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Maybe it was too much. He had a lot planned, for the day, for the weekend. But he excused it because there was a lot that they'd wanted to do that they just hadn't had time for. They hadn't gone out to eat together on a date in a long time, Daniel always looked at hotels like he wanted to stay in one even though they lived in LA and were only a half-hour away, talked about it sometimes, and so many other things.

So Johnny had asked his Mom what the best place was to take Daniel to relax.

She'd suggested Bel-Air.

It was expensive, but after everything Daniel had been through it was worth it. Especially with how happy he looked.

Sure he expected an earful on how much it'd cost. But he just wouldn't say.

He'd never let Daniel see a bill or price.

Easy.

Dinner was courses, a set menu that he'd already paid for, so it wouldn't be a problem.

Same with the spa.

The maître d' met them at the front of the restaurant and took them to their reserved table.

Daniel was looking around at the photographs on the walls and then turned back to Johnny smiling warmly. He half expected Daniel to hook his leg around Johnny's like he had at Spago but he didn't. He knew Johnny wasn't going anywhere.

It felt like it'd been forever since they went to Spago. Too long since they'd had a dinner date.

No menu was brought out just the course list. No pricing.

Daniel studied it with a frown.

"Wait, why aren't there any numbers? What are you getting?"

"It's a set," Johnny said. "We get all of it."

Daniel's eyes widened and he looked up at Johnny horrified.

"That's too much food."

"Some of it will be small. I also told them it's your birthday so you'll get a second dessert."

Daniel's hand had been hovering over the basket of bread they'd been brought and he brought his hand back.

"Eat whatever you want and however much you want. If you don't like something, don't worry about it."

Daniel nodded eyes back on the menu curiously going over it before the first course.

A cold soup was brought out on a bowl of dry ice so the whole thing smoked, crackled, and popped and Daniel stared at it brown eyes so big, playing with the dry ice with the edge of his spoon intrigued almost as much as he seemed interested in eating the soup, running his fingers through the fog that flooded the air around him with wonder.

Once the ball got rolling it didn't seem to stop.

They were brought a tiny salad all wrapped up in a slice of cucumber like it was a bite-size salad and Johnny carefully cut it into smaller pieces watching with almost a laugh as Daniel pulled the toothpick holding it together loose and popped the whole thing into his mouth. Definitely easier than what Johnny was doing. Smarter.

Course after course came, with a sorbet palate cleanser part of the way through.

It was fun to sit with Daniel as he studied everything before him, then glanced over at the set menu, trying to piece it all together, tasting it slowly, thoughtful. Telling Johnny how he thought it was made, anything even remotely close he'd had of in his life.

It'd been a while since he'd seen Daniel that animated.

Ever since Jessica had left, ever since that date circled on the calendar came closer and closer Daniel had gotten more serious, quieter.

Johnny knew it was going to be a nightmare. If he had his way Silver and Barnes would already be in jail, banned from ever stepping foot in the Valley. He'd already have started the Rube Goldberg machine he'd created. But Daniel was prepared to fight. Though Johnny knew he didn't want to fight. Daniel didn't want to even step foot on that mat again. But he was grimly determined. Worried about Mr. Miyagi, and the shop, about Johnny. All the things he wanted to protect, forgetting that it flowed both ways, that Mr. Miyagi cared and also worried about Daniel.

He wasn't alone, but sometimes Daniel drifted, lost alone at sea until Johnny reached out, leading him carefully back to shore. He hadn't pulled away but had pulled more inward, quieter, and Johnny blamed Silver for it, blamed Barnes.

But now, now he was all smiles. He was eating his main course, talking about the proper way to season vegetables which the chef had done. Full of praise, more awake and alive than he'd been in weeks.

Dessert was eclairs and Daniel's second dessert, his birthday dessert which they wouldn't tell Johnny over the phone, was a chocolate soufflé.

He told Johnny about some time his mother had tried to make one in Jersey and how he hadn't been allowed to move through the house for what felt like hours for fear of it sinking, the way his mother fussed over it.

After dinner and dessert they headed back up to their room. Daniel grabbed their set menus and a packet of matches on their way out, arm hooked in Johnny's.

They had the elevator to themselves on the way back up to their room and Daniel kissed him warmly.

"Too much food?" Johnny asked thinking back to when they'd gone camping over a month ago and all the food Daniel had made for that. Maybe he'd done the same thing.

"Yes, but it was delicious."

"What do you want to do now?" Johnny asked as they stepped off onto their floor, getting the key ready.

"Watch TV?" Daniel asked. Like he wasn't sure if Johnny liked watching TV.

"Sounds good," Johnny said opening the door. "Why don't you pick something. I'm down for anything, except a horror film."

Daniel scooped up the remote and dropped down on the couch with a bounce looking pleased.

Johnny sat down next to him, arm behind Daniel on the couch, watching as Daniel flipped through channels.

They'd never watched TV together he realized with surprise.

Johnny wasn't sure if Mr. Miyagi even had a TV.

He never saw the man watching it.

Johnny used to watch shows with the guys. Weekly watch parties, sometimes with Ali.

Growing up they hadn't been able to afford one and he'd felt lost among the ways his classmates used to find common ground. He hadn't seen nearly anything they talked about. He didn't know the characters they drew. Unless it was from a book. But they didn't know the characters from his books unless they'd been adapted and then they were different from how he'd imagined them. It didn't connect.

Sid had several TVs and at first, he sat Johnny down in front of them telling him proudly which shows he worked on but then Johnny never could find where the invisible line was. Between when he watched too much TV or was in the way and why didn't he sit in front of one of the nice TVs like other kids? It was constantly shifting. Eventually, Johnny gave up, read his books, and stayed out of the mansion as much as possible.

Daniel started off leaning against him when he found a show he wanted to watch and then after a while sunk down to rest his head on Johnny's lap. Johnny ran his fingers through Daniel's hair watching the show.

It was difficult to not freeze up in fear of the future, of knowing what was coming and being unable to stop it.

Johnny wished he could trade places with Daniel. To take this one fight off of his hands, off his shoulders. It was so heavy, so painful, all the safety nets were gone, the lines had been crossed and it was bound to be worse.

Johnny didn't know what he'd do during the tournament. Someone would have to hold him in the audience, keep him back, stop him from punching Barnes in the face or Silver.

He didn't want to go. He didn't want to watch. But he also had to. If he wasn't there it'd be a million times worse. Plus he had to start that machine. Get the ball rolling when it was time.

But he didn't want to see Daniel get hurt.

There was no way to walk onto that mat and leave unscathed.

Johnny never had, no one ever had.

Every tournament ended with the guys fixing up their injuries. Even in the tournaments where Johnny did his best, the times he'd won, he still had to sit and bandage his hands, his feet, put ice packs to bruises.

He always ached the following day. But the comfort of winning, of having done his best and it being good enough, got him through the pain, at least until he'd see Kreese again. Until Kreese squashed that feeling by telling him all the things he'd done wrong. How it wasn't perfect. Like he never had won a shiny trophy or beat anyone else.

There was something to doing your best and winning. Satisfying. And if Daniel was walking into that tournament Johnny would cheer him on. But this was stacked against him, a rigged game, twisted for the utmost bloodshed and pain.

Maybe they'd get a TV. Maybe they'd sit around a couple of times a week and watch a show they liked, maybe they'd get a VCR and rent movies to watch and make popcorn.

After a couple of episodes, Daniel sat up and stretched turning off the TV looking satisfied.

Relaxed in a way he hadn't seen Daniel in well over a month. He picked up the glossy brochure about the spa and sunk back into the cushions. It'd explain the facial, the massage, the hot stones, the wraps that were all part of the package. The choices he'd have to make like what kind of stuff he wanted put on his face or what type of massage he wanted.

"I'm going to get ready for bed," Johnny said.

"Okay," Daniel said flicking through the pages.

Johnny picked up his bag and headed off to the bathroom, grabbing the robes along the way.

He hung up the robes on the back of the door and set his bag on the countertop staring at the large tub.

Johnny started to flick on the shower then stopped, plugged the tub and filled it with warm water, adding salt and oil. It felt nice when he tested the waters and he walked over to the door, opening it.

He stripped and sunk into the warm water.

It was like a well-laid trap.

If the hotel room wasn't too big, if Daniel wasn't too engrossed in the brochure or if he didn't turn on the TV again.

Daniel had hinted at wanting to bathe together on multiple occasions so he'd leave it as an option.

Johnny was still trying to learn how to enjoy baths.

He used to when he was little. It was like a treat. He had hazy memories of their first apartment and bubble baths and her laughing, piling bubbles on his head like a hat, trying to see how tall she could get them.

He preferred fast showers because he could be in and out and going.

A bath was letting your guard down. But he hadn't had his guard up, really up in so long, but some habits were harder to break than others.

How was he supposed to make it look normal? An easy invitation? To not look disappointed if he waited too long, should he call out to Daniel?

He figured Daniel would see the door open, investigate and Johnny wouldn't even really have to invite him in.

He leaned his head back and shut his eyes.

He should've offered.

It shouldn't have been hard to say I'm going to take a shower, or a bath, want to join me?

But it felt weird.

Embarrassing.

Maybe he should switch it over to a shower and just chalk it up as a loss.

He opened his eyes ready to lean forward and jumped at the brown eyes looking at him from the edge of the tub.

"You've gotten quieter," Johnny managed trying not to show how startled he was.

Sneaky.

Johnny was used to listening to the creaky floorboards of Mr. Miyagi's where he could hear Daniel anywhere he went, not the modern tile of the hotel.

If Daniel realized he could sneak up on Johnny in the hotel there'd be no peace.

Daniel leaned over and dipped his fingers in the water like he was leaning out of a boat on a lake, or on the water's edge somewhere, not a bathtub choosing a spot between Johnny's thighs.

Maybe Johnny miscalculated.

"You want company?" Daniel asked innocently.

Innocent as a man caught holding a bag of money outside of a bank and the plans to steal it in his own handwriting in the other hand.

Johnny shifted back trying to look more at ease and less nervous than he felt. "Yes."

Daniel shifted to sit on the edge of the tub unbuttoning his shirt, unhurried.

Johnny wanted to grab him and pull him into the water but he waited while Daniel carefully folded his clothes and set them aside before his eyes turned back to Johnny, taking in everything before turning carefully, thoughtful. He stuck his feet in the water but didn't get in.

"You going to join me?" Johnny asked.

"I'm trying to decide what I want."

"Okay."

"Leaning against you would be nice, but then I won't see your face."

"A true dilemma," Johnny said with a laugh.

Daniel turned to him, leaning down with his hand on Johnny's shoulder and kissing him, before sinking the rest of the way down, turning, back to Johnny, leaning against him.

"Maybe we should get a bath this big in our apartment," Daniel said thoughtfully, shifting so he could lean his head against Johnny's chest.

Johnny wrapped his arms around him.

"We could try," Johnny said trying to think of which apartment had nice baths from the ones he'd looked at. "Or we can just stay at hotels every once in a while."

"While visiting people sure," Daniel said running his fingers over Johnny's arm that was leaning over the side of the tub.

"I mean we can do this," Johnny said motioning towards the suite.

"It's too expensive," Daniel said tilting his head back to look up at Johnny. "Special occasions."

"A special occasion can be anything," Johnny said with a grin. "Saw a cool looking bird is a special occasion. Saw a kid tie their shoe for the first time."

Daniel laughed softly. "I mean like this, this is fine."

"Ah I see, Tuesdays," Johnny said.

Daniel groaned. "You know what I mean."

"I do," Johnny said leaning his head down and kissing between Daniel's neck and shoulder. "But you should expand your special occasion definition. I want to celebrate everything with you."

"Like what?" Daniel asked, voice soft and low.

"I want to celebrate getting our apartment. I want to celebrate when you solve whatever happened to that shipment of trees that got lost. When you figure out how to deal with parents that are annoying. When you help Mr. Miyagi figure out "What is that sound?" in one of his old cars. When you master a new kata or move in karate. When you pick a school. When you get into a school. When you pass a test. When you fail a test. When-"

"Everything," Daniel breathed. "Got it."

Johnny wrapped his arms around him.

"It's all cause to celebrate."

Daniel shifted to look back at him. "What about you?"

"What about me?"

"Most of that was celebrating me. We can't just celebrate every little thing with me and not you."

"Why not?"

"It's uneven," Daniel said turning back.

Johnny rested his head on Daniel's shoulder. "Hmmm. We can celebrate when my plan works."

Daniel pulled away twisting to look at him. "A plan you won't tell me about."

"You've got enough on your plate."

"But I'm worried about you."

"And I'm worried about you."

Daniel sighed. "This is why I should've faced you."

"We'll have to get a tub you can move around as you like," Johnny said with a soft laugh.

"Silver is dangerous Johnny. Everyone warned me and I fucked up and now you're-you're what lighting matches and throwing them at him in the hopes he just catches on fire?"

Johnny tilted his head thoughtfully.

"You know I didn't try that method. Maybe I'll give that a shot."

Daniel huffed, splashing him with water.

Johnny caught him and pulled him back against his chest, wrapping his arms around him, so he couldn't move, just enough strength to make it more difficult.

"Listen, let's not worry about Silver or his friends tonight or tomorrow? Not worry about plans, or kata, or karate, or what I may or may not be doing. I know saying don't worry about it or don't worry about me doesn't do anything. It won't help you. You can't magically stop worrying. I can't magically stop worrying. Instead, let's just try to focus on something else as much as we can. Let's make another list."

"Another list?" Daniel asked.

"Let's go places. When we're not busy. I like this getaway once a month at least. Last month we went camping, this month we're here. I know we want to visit Jessica at some point, do we want to drive there or fly?"

Daniel got quiet.

Johnny tilted his head to try and see him better. He was chewing on his bottom lip thoughtfully and then brought a hand up to his lips.

"Let's drive. We could stop at places along the way."

"Perfect. Okay, next. How do you feel about going to Korea?"

"To visit Dutch?"

"Yeah. I mean not right away, but after he's gotten acclimated, knows his way around?"

"Will that be expensive?"

"Don't know. We might not have to worry about that one."

"What do you mean?"

"Well, the guys also were talking and want to go. His parents might get our tickets. Or...well...the plane."

"They have their own plane?" Daniel asked turning around so suddenly that Johnny barely avoided getting headbutted.

"The peacocks didn't scream ridiculous wealthy?" Johnny asked amused.

"I mean they did but he drives that van, it's...hideous."

Johnny laughed softly. "Yeah, but it's a good van."

Johnny had gone with Dutch to pick out the van. He originally looked at small expensive sports cars. The kind that Johnny never even dreamed of affording but knew Sid had several of. Things that went fast and he remembered Dutch asking to test drive one. Johnny sitting in the fancy seats with him while his hands wrapped around the steering wheel.

His parents were supposed to take him. Had promised to be there, his 16th birthday. But instead, they'd sent someone with a blank check to him. Told him to get whatever car he wanted.

"Could race in it," Dutch had said a wild look in his eyes, a smile that was scarier than friendly.

Johnny could see it.

Dutch racing down desert roads outside the city, going as fast as he could trying to leave everything behind. All those feelings. Everything that was confusing. Everything that hurt. The loneliness. To just disappear on the road, to go nowhere but as fast as possible. No destination meant not stopping to let those feelings catch up. Outrunning everything.

It'd been the nicest test drive of Johnny's life. But Johnny knew with a car like that, luxurious and fast Dutch wouldn't last. He'd keep going until something else stopped him. A patch of ice, some armadillo or tumbleweed in the dark.

A race that would lead him into the wrong lane at the wrong time. It'd be pouring oil on the already raging fire that Dutch barely contained as is.

"Can't fit a lot in it," Johnny said carefully trying not to sound like the car was bad.

It was a beautiful car. He just thought it was Dutch signing a death sentence.

Dutch looked around the car thoughtfully and nodded.

"Yeah. No room for babes."

"Or friends," Johnny said.

They looked at other cars after that, veering away from the fancy luxury cars much to the salesperson's disappointment.

Dutch stepping into their shop with that officially stamped note from his parents and a blank check had made the salesperson glow with excitement and after Dutch changed his mind they were trudging after the boys like they were bored.

They looked at all sorts of cars, Dutch getting into ones he liked, settling into the driver's seat with a frown, then he'd turn around and count the seats. Like he was looking for a space for where Bobby would sit, where Tommy would go, and Jimmy.

Most cars would fit the five of them, even if it'd be a tight squeeze in the backseat.

He looked at SUV's, sat down in one, and then turned to Johnny with a frown. "This feels like a soccer mom. I'm not a soccer mom."

"We'll find something. There are other places we can go and look," Johnny said.

"I forgot there were!" Dutch said eyes wide. "Shit, my parents recommended this place, but if I'm not getting something fancy, we could go somewhere else."

"Anywhere in mind?" Johnny asked following Dutch who'd scrambled out of the soccer mom car.

"Thanks but no thanks," Dutch said to the salesperson before grabbing his helmet for his bike and hurrying off with Johnny following.

They ended up visiting five different dealerships before Dutch laid eyes on that van. It was practically a minibus and as soon as Dutch had seen it he'd turned to Johnny with a grin, a real smile.

"It's almost like I'll be Fred, from Scooby-Doo. My own van. My own Mystery Machine. Look! It's got enough seats for everyone plus more friends, or girls."

"Or both," Johnny said.

It was Dutch's version of a big table.

He didn't cook. Or at least he hadn't.

He didn't host.

His parents didn't like people coming to the house. The guys almost never went and Johnny had been an exception but hadn't realized he was an exception until he'd already gotten used to it.

But Dutch could drive.

He could pile all their friends into one car, even if they bickered over long car rides.

He could help people move.

He could make sure people got home.

He could make sure no one felt lonely or missed out on the fun or left behind.

He'd bought it with the hopes of filling it full of friends he loved and cared about. And he got to subject everyone to his music.

Johnny thought he'd been counting the seats not just for them, not just to make sure there was enough room for Bobby, Jimmy, Tommy, and himself. But also, in case his parents wanted to come along too.

He could fit everyone he cared about into one place.

"Well if his parents are letting us fly out on their plane then of course, not a problem. It'll be fun," Daniel said.

"Do we want our trip to Ohio to also be a group trip?" Johnny asked.

"A road trip with all the guys?" Daniel asked thoughtfully.

Johnny shifted to grab the shampoo and to flick on the hand-held shower head and waited until it got warm before wetting Daniel's hair.

"What are you-"

"You just want to sit in here and not bathe?" Johnny asked amused.

"I'm going to wash your hair. Or you worried about catching a cold in this...freezing 80-degree weather we've got?"

"Fine," Daniel said tilting his head back.

Johnny made sure all of Daniel's hair was wet before turning off the showerhead and leaned it carefully back on its perch before moving onto shampoo, working it into Daniel's hair.

"I like the idea of traveling with the guys. But I also want to do a road trip just us," Daniel said, brown eyes looking up at him.

"Okay. We'll do both then," Johnny said.

"But we get our own room wherever we stay," Daniel said. "If we're going to be stuck together all day in the same car, I want our own room. They can share a bed with us some other time. I do not want to cram five to six of us in a tiny motel room every night."

"Fair," Johnny said leaning over and kissing Daniel's forehead before going back to washing his hair.

"I want to go back to Jersey again sometime."

"As long as I don't have to get in a car Louie Jr. drives ever again, I'm fine with that."

"I want to go for a winter holiday sometime. I know not this year, but maybe next year? Maybe...maybe after the new year? Nonnio's birthday is then and everyone goes to celebrate it. It's this huge thing. I didn't go this year because, well, I was a bit busy kicking you in the face and dealing with the fallout. But it'd be a good time to see everyone again and you could wear the sweater Nonnia made you."

Johnny paused in his work. He'd been trying to be as soothing as possible, and that seemed to unleash something curious.

"Is there something special about that sweater?"

Daniel started to pull away, Johnny caught the flush on his cheeks.

Oh hell, it did have more meaning to it.

He was not getting away.

Johnny was not walking into Jersey full of LaRusso's and the rest of the giant family Daniel hailed from wearing a sweater that meant something and not know what it meant.

It probably wasn't something bad based on the blush on Daniel's cheeks and the way he was starting and stopping his explanation.

"I-well-er-it-Nonnia doesn't make them for everyone. It means she likes you."

"You setting me up to get into a fight with your cousins?" Johnny asked.

"No! Of course not. Not you. But the jealousy will be a delight to watch."

Johnny grabbed the showerhead again rinsing off his hair, switching over to conditioner.

"As long as I'm not walking into something weird."

"No, of course not."

That sounded like a lie. Too squeaky. But hell he'd look good in that sweater.

Maybe it was to show off.

It could be fun.

Plus Nonnio and Nonnia were nice.

"Okay," Johnny said, moving on to soap while the conditioner soaked in, or whatever it was supposed to do.

In the morning someone would work on all the tense muscles on Daniel's back. All the knots from everything. A professional who knew what they were doing.

Johnny shifted back a bit, not that Daniel had left him much space, and kissed Daniel's back, running a finger along his spine.

He'd be good.

He wouldn't leave a mark for the massage therapist to find. He'd save that for later.

Plus it might distract, might hurt if a bruised love bite was pressed on while working out a knot.

Daniel shivered despite the warm water they were in and Johnny washed his back with soapy hands, focusing on the expanse of Daniel's back. Smaller than him but solid from all the work he'd been doing.

"I forgot to ask," Johnny whispered in Daniel's ear as he moved his hands to wash Daniel's sides and up his front, dragging his fingers up his stomach and ribs and chest. Slow and methodical, feeling almost as much as he cleansed. Teasing as he went. Slow.

"What?" Daniel asked arching into his hands.

"What do you want for your birthday?" Johnny asked hand going back down and resting on Daniel's thigh. "I got you things but I didn't actually ever ask."

Daniel turned, eyes darker and hooking an arm around Johnny's neck pulling him into a kiss, as he turned.

Johnny's hand slid between Daniel's leg. Daniel moaned into the kiss, rolling his hips, before seemingly changing his mind and pulling away struggling to take slow deep breaths.

"No?" Johnny asked.

"Yes, and No," Daniel managed. "I do want to have sex with you in a tub, but also in a nice bed. It's going to be a while before we have a bed to ourselves in a private location with thicker walls, and like we did at your house but we-it's different right?"

Johnny smiled softly grabbing the showerhead again. "Okay, let me get the conditioner out of your hair," he said flicking it on and motioning for Daniel to turn back.

Daniel took the soap and continued washing all the spots Johnny hadn't gotten to yet.

"The answer to your question," Daniel said softly when he finished leaning his arms on Johnny's knees, tilting his head back, brown eyes meeting Johnny's. "Is always going to be you."

"Even when we're 50?" Johnny asked amused, running another pass through Daniel's hair, making sure he got it all.

"Especially when we're 50," Daniel said.

"You're going to get sick of getting the same thing every year," Johnny said rinsing Daniel off.

Daniel turned, getting up and moving carefully to face Johnny, finding space for his legs, taking the showerhead, and leaning up and close to wet Johnny's hair.

"I like traditions," Daniel said, fingers slipping through Johnny's hair and his eyes slid shut, wrapping his arms loosely around Daniel's waist.

"Hmm."

"I mean we shouldn't do this every year," Daniel said.

"The bath or the hotel?"

"The hotel."

"It's not that expensive," Johnny said.

Daniel laughed. "That is a lie."

"I've spent my whole life without a lot of money, or with money with a warning tag on it that every time I touched it, it felt like it was venomous or cursed. We couldn't afford to do anything before and then everything else, any request to do anything felt like having to purposefully step on broken glass so I had to decide whether it was worth it or not to walk over it. It usually wasn't. But this, doing things because I want to, because it makes you happy which makes me happy, because it's nice to get away and have a nice meal with my boyfriend and stay somewhere where we don't have to worry about other people, because I get to spend time with the man I love," Johnny looked up at Daniel whose hands had stilled in his hair. "It's worth every cent."

Daniel leaned down and kissed him, gently cupping his face, and Johnny pulled him close, flush against him.

"You always spend too much money on me," Daniel breathed when he pulled away. "My knee-"

"My fault."

"Okinawa."

"I wanted to go too."

"I know you're putting more money down for the apartment,"

"It's where we're going to live. I want it to be somewhere that will last. Where you live should be a place to relax and recuperate. It shouldn't stress you out."

"Stubborn," Daniel huffed, hands sliding down to Johnny's shoulders.

"You know I'm right," Johnny said with a smile.

"I do. But I don't want to feel like I'm not contributing. I want this to be equal."

Johnny blinked at him in surprise. "Do you not realize all the stuff you do?"

Daniel rolled his eyes. "Yeah, I make dinner sometimes."

"You do all the bookkeeping for the shop. You do payroll. You handle all the phone calls. You handle the fax machine we got. You talk to the customers. You-"

"That's work stuff," Daniel said shifting back up to finish washing Johnny's hair and then grabbing the soap.

"You-"

How could Johnny explain how much Daniel had helped him? If Daniel hadn't shown up in California he'd still be studying at Cobra Kai.

If they hadn't gotten closer he would've continued to blame himself for losing, would've believed every word Kreese had said. Without Daniel, his mother would probably still be married to Sid. Johnny probably would've slowly become an alcoholic to cope. He'd become a permanent fixture at Jimmy's cousin's bar. He'd probably have gotten arrested already. Celebrated turning 18 but being in jail.

He'd have pulled away from everyone he knew and loved, slowly, over time until he was all alone.

He had everything he had because Daniel kept grabbing his hand and wouldn't let him slip away, wouldn't let him slide down into the murky depths.

It might've taken time, years, decades to sink to the bottom, but he wouldn't have held on.

He'd have given up, become a shell, like a cicada skin. The creature who did all the screaming, who made all the sound long gone, and the shell just barely hanging on, a clear husk left behind like the ghost of a memory of a person. Just the bits left.

Maybe the whole thing felt uneven, looked uneven from the outside.

Johnny paying for expensive bills, for treats like fancy hotels, for 19 bouquets. Maybe it looked excessive like Daniel was letting Johnny pay for everything and sliding into an unequal debt. But Johnny was grateful that his heart no longer felt cold, felt warm and beat so strongly in his chest and there was no price tag for that.

Having Daniel by his side, holding his hand from long before they started dating, carefully helping him back onto the path like it was easy, loving him when he'd felt so worthless, wanting him when he didn't think anyone would.

That kindness had changed Johnny's whole world.

Chapter End Notes

80 degrees Fahrenheit is 26.6 Celsius

Mac and Cheese

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

The look Johnny gave Daniel when he asked what he contributed to beyond work and cooking nearly made his heart skip a beat.

The things he'd said about not having money, how stuff like this made him happy too, maybe that was the point. Like how his mom used all the "for a special occasion" stuff every day after they found out his dad was going to die. Because every day they were together was a special occasion.

Maybe that was how Johnny felt.

Something similar.

That everything was special specifically because they were together and if he had the money it might as well be used.

He gingerly rinsed out Johnny's hair thoughtfully while Johnny looked for words.

He was going to try and make an effort to stop, to be even more in the moment. Because Johnny was right there and was up to do anything. And as much as he wanted to have sex in a big bathtub he was pretty sure the water would get cold before it was over and it wouldn't be pleasant. The last time had been on the ground.

Johnny hadn't complained but it had bothered his knee a little, he could only imagine what the bathtub would do.

He wasn't 19 yet but already was starting to feel old. Maybe not old exactly but more sensitive with the upcoming tournament that he needed to be in peak health and perform at his best. Which meant he was being careful of his knee. It didn't really bother him anymore but he was worried about it. Worried it was a weakness that'd be exploited. That even though it felt fine it wasn't.

He was worried that it'd suddenly lead to his downfall. That he was being held up by strings that were fraying and if he didn't do his best to keep his knee in the best care he could, he'd collapse at the tournament and be broken apart.

He'd liked Johnny's hands on him, and he was going to do the same thing, but he was going to look.

He hadn't looked in Okinawa. He'd behaved. He wouldn't this time. He was going to touch and he was going to enjoy it, indulge. He shifted to make sure he was more comfortable, not on his knees, sitting across Johnny, letting their legs get tangled up. It'd been nice to sit with his back to Johnny to lean against him, but it was better to look at him and be able to touch more than just his knees or the arms leaning against the edges of the tub.

Johnny moved Daniel's hand from one of his pecs to over his heart, covering his hand in his own.

"Without you and everything you and Mr. Miyagi did for me, I'd be on a different path. I-I'd have pulled away from everyone, slowly over time because of Kreese and Sid. I would've believed everything. But your kind chatty nature, this hand that never let go of mine, always looked for me...I feel better. I know it's a process. I've been told it's a process. But you helped me start it. Every time you grabbed me and pulled me in, kept me at your side, you kept everything from turning to grey."

Daniel knew he was bright red, turning away from the blue eyes on him, but Johnny leaned forward, closer to him.

"I needed help and you helped me even though you didn't have to. Even though you had every reason to turn away and never interact with me again. Every small kindness felt like more than I deserved but I so desperately needed it and just didn't realize it. Just by being you, you make my world a better place. I love you," Johnny said cupping the side of Daniel's face, pulling him back in so he could look Daniel in the eyes, running his thumb over his bottom lip.

"Not just because of that. You're smart and resourceful and you stand your ground for what you believe in but know when things are too much when things go too far. You're a good person. There's so much I love and I'll figure out how to tell you all of them over time. It won't always be flowers. I'll try not to bury you in them. But there's a lot you do that I don't think you realize you do that just makes my life better and I wouldn't change a thing. I'll make you a list sometime."

The water had already started to cool and it was going to get cold and they were going to be miserable. But-

Daniel parted his lips and licked Johnny's thumb, a quick flick, taste of his skin. Johnny's thumb pulled away to be replaced by Johnny's lips. If he was lucky maybe he'd enjoy those lips elsewhere. If he hurried. He didn't want to hurry. But he also wanted to hurry. Johnny's hair was done, check. Pecs...maybe another-

Johnny took the soap from him and pulled back, out of their kiss.

"How about I finish up here and then meet you in the bedroom?"

Johnny's voice, his eyes, were carefully restrained, those cracks that Daniel never bothered to hide. Lust. Want.

Daniel smiled kissing Johnny, a quick peck then stood up, the water streaming off of him, leaving Johnny in the bath. Feeling blue eyes on him.

He wouldn't leave completely. Not yet. He stepped out carefully onto the thick towel and grabbed another to wrap around himself, drying off and taking one of the robes off the back of the door.

It was softer than he'd thought at first glance.

There were toothbrushes individually packaged. Johnny probably packed one for him, somewhere but Daniel didn't want to leave. He wanted to be there, a reminder to hurry, to not leave Daniel waiting too long.

He brushed his teeth at the sink watching Johnny out of the corner of his eye. There wasn't a shower curtain in the bathroom. It was freestanding in the middle of the room, large and it looked comfortable for Johnny. Big and deep enough for him. Daniel could see him sitting in there with a good book.

They'd have to make sure there was a nice bath with enough space. So Johnny could sit in there with a book, and Daniel could join him.

The question now was, did he want to do the same thing as they'd done camping or something different? He replayed that night in his head more often than he'd ever admit to anyone. The problem was while there were other positions, he still wanted to see Johnny's face, still wanted to be in charge, today, tonight, this time.

It felt like a missed opportunity to try something new. To work on that list. But he'd liked it, like a recipe he'd found and tried and wanted to make again. Especially since they didn't get to do it that way often. It was usually something quicker, quieter.

He couldn't dally any longer. If he did he'd just be leaning against the counter watching Johnny finish his bath and that did feel a little weird. So he stuck his feet in the slippers and walked out to look for the bedroom.

He pushed the door open that he hadn't looked in before. There was a big bed and a dresser, a couple of bedside tables and a phone, some lamps.

He closed the curtains, turned on a lamp, and flicked off the overhead light before flopping down on the bed face first, arms spread wide. It was almost as nice as Johnny's bed at his mother's house. He rolled over then sat up. He hadn't packed. Had Johnny brought condoms or lube? He looked through the drawers, opening everything he could find. He found a black box in the corner, unassuming, and opened it. Condoms. He sat down holding one. That wouldn't be enough. He frowned and chewed on his bottom lip.

Oil might work but he didn't have any of that. And he'd rather be careful. He'd have to ask Johnny if he packed any. Though! He could look in his own bag. Daniel went to the other room and grabbed his backpack and brought it into the bedroom. He carefully pulled out his clothes setting them aside. They were all nice clothes. Comfortable but stuff Daniel would wear to meet Ms. Lawrence. His toothbrush was packed, his brush, his toiletry bag but not what he was looking for.

Maybe he could get dressed and buy some? Somewhere?

What was taking Johnny so long? He'd scare him if he went back in there.

Daniel flopped back down on the bed. He could pull back the covers.

He got up, pushed back the covers, and sat down, looking at the art on the walls. He pulled the blankets around himself, the robe was a bit much. He took it off and set it on the floor.

Johnny came in setting his own bag on the edge of the room next to Daniel's and leaned down, hands on either side of Daniel's hips kissing him warmly.

He tasted minty on Daniel's tongue.

Johnny's fingers went to the tie of the robe around his waist, slipping it off his shoulders and letting it fall onto the floor, adding his own to the pile. There was something he'd been looking for and couldn't find.

Something he thought he should do, something other than touching Johnny's chest, his torso, his sides, his hips, that expanse of skin, soft from the bath oils beneath his fingertips.

Want. He wanted everything. He shifted gently pushing himself up, pushing Johnny down, rolling them, watching as Johnny's head landed on the pillow, blonde hair haloing.

He had permission to touch everywhere. To feel Johnny. He knew where Johnny liked to be touched. Where to kiss him to get his breath unsteady. There was still plenty to learn and like a scientist using the scientific method Daniel was more than happy to run every test over and over again to see the results and feel pleasure at the payoff.

He slid his hand between Johnny's legs, wanting to hear him again when Johnny's hand stopped him. His face was flushed. He twisted and grabbed something he'd set down on the bedside table that Daniel hadn't paid attention to.

He'd forgotten about the- condom? Daniel had a condom. Now Daniel had two. He laughed softly, picking up the other he'd found. Johnny looked a little confused. Daniel studied them both. He'd use the one Johnny gave him. Keep the other in case. He set it aside on the bedside table. Maybe he'd put it back later. There'd been a lot of them. It had to be a thing. He got ready then remembered the lack of lube and sat back with a frown.

Johnny pushed himself up.

"What is it? What do you want to do?"

"Sex," Daniel said simply. "But we need lube."

Johnny laid back down. "It's okay."

"It's not okay," Daniel said leaning over Johnny, preparing to share all the warnings his godfathers had given him, all the safety, the ways to avoid hurting a partner or oneself, the dangers of not taking it seriously. But Johnny knew that. It was on the list of things Bobby and Dutch had told him. A warning about half measures. And Daniel knew Johnny had had sex with Ali, was sure from the way they'd talked at the party that it'd always been as safe as possible. He wouldn't just ignore something fundamental.

He slid his hand back down between Johnny's legs.

Oh.

"That's why you were in the bath longer," Daniel said softly.

He sat back again curious, heart pounding. Johnny had prepared already. Had brought lube in his bag, had already-was ready for him, waiting. He wondered if Johnny would've done that if he'd stayed if he could've watched, if, did he find it when he'd prepared? He hadn't heard him. He was pretty sure he would've heard if he had.

Johnny gasped as Daniel's fingers moved, he was so pink. Blushing while Daniel sat between his legs curious and fascinated, so stunned he couldn't move. Couldn't follow through with the next steps. All the words all the thoughts had short-circuited. He just watched Johnny in the soft light of the hotel room, the way his lips parted, the easy way everything worked. How easy it was to find it because he knew where it was. To watch in better lighting how Johnny reacted to it.

"Daniel," Johnny had pushed himself up, gently pushing on Daniel's hand away, he was breathing hard, those abs easy to see from how tense he was, struggling to focus, needing to say something, almost so far gone.

Daniel leaned forward to hear him.

"Are you going to-"

Right. He'd gotten lost. Distracted. He wondered, if he could move Johnny, lifting one of those long legs over his shoulder, testing it, it might work. It might be a deeper stretch if he leaned down to kiss him, But he didn't seem bothered. Maybe he was more flexible than Daniel had realized.

All that training.

He sunk down into him, kissing him listening to him with every move.

In the morning Daniel woke up to the sunlight streaming in through the curtains.

Johnny was still sleeping.

Maybe it wore him out. More than anything else they did.

More than hiking or rock climbing or karate.

He kissed Johnny's temple.

Nineteen.

He held Johnny close, feeling the soft rise and fall of his breath, his steady heartbeat.

Daniel had never celebrated his birthday without family. Without his mother. Even though he'd had cake with Mr. Miyagi, even though he'd gone to chase after Ali, he'd still had breakfast with his mother, had still sat with her on the couch to talk about the day when he got home, to blow out more candles and make a wish with her singing to him.

She was in Jersey though. And this year instead he had Johnny and a day at a spa.

He'd probably have cake with Mr. Miyagi and Johnny and it'd be a quiet birthday.

A quiet nineteen.

His final year of being a teen.

After a while Johnny began to stir, slowly rolling over, he rubbed sleepily at one of his eyes and yawned. Daniel would never get over how he looked in the morning light, after letting Daniel have him. Messy hair and covered in love bites, but so relaxed and languid, unhurried. He was unhurried on normal mornings, but it became more so on mornings after. Like all he wanted to do after was cuddle and in the mornings to continue that cuddling.

Endorphines. Euphoric.

"Want breakfast?" Johnny asked, voice heavy with sleep.

"You don't look like you're going anywhere soon," Daniel said amused.

Johnny's eyes had met his for a moment before shutting again. He looked tired but so relaxed.

"Mmm jus' a moment," he yawned.

Johnny took in a deep breath and stretched, a full-body stretch before curling back in towards Daniel. "Room service?"

Daniel nearly protested. He didn't want to think of how much that'd cost. But he also felt like Johnny. He didn't want to get up and move. He didn't want to put on real clothes until he had to, until his appointment.

"Is there a menu?"

"Yeah."

"Where?"

"Drawer," Johnny said.

Daniel rolled over amused when Johnny's arm wrapped around him like he was worried Daniel was going to leave, or like he didn't want him to leave the bed yet. Maybe he was worried Daniel would fall out of bed, but that'd only happened almost once and it was because the hotel room beds in New York had been too small for the two of them.

He rummaged around the drawer finding the binder about the hotel and rolling back over flipping through it in search of room service.

"What do you want?"

" 'merican breakfast."

Daniel glanced at the menu, scanning it, shifting onto his back, Johnny curling up over his chest.

It included pancakes, eggs, sausage or bacon, and juice.

"How do you want your eggs?"

"mmm."

He was falling asleep again.

Daniel looked over the menu again. He could just get different things and then when Johnny actually got up he could pick or share. There was a phone barely within arms reach and he leaned over as carefully as he could to not disturb the sleeping blonde and put in their order. It'd take a half-hour. He glanced at the clock. He could spend twenty minutes like this.

Twenty minutes of Johnny fast asleep again.

Daniel knew he'd been sleepy when they went camping. Had slept in. But he usually didn't unless he was sick. He gently pressed the back of his hand to Johnny's forehead. He seemed fine. He pulled the blanket up and around them.

They had plenty of time. He could eat, shower, and be ready for the spa.

Was Johnny coming or was he going to continue sleeping?

He ran his fingers along Johnny's spine, over his back. There was still tension there. But it wasn't nearly as bad as it had been the first time he'd touched Johnny's back. It looked like their roles reversed.

Daniel was now the tense one in need of a massage.

He wondered how long they had the room for. While he was at the spa would Johnny check them out and wait for him? Or would he find Johnny still curled up in bed?

He puzzled over his day, not letting himself look too far into the future, turning around and trudging back to the present every time he found himself heading towards that ominous tournament date and the prep he needed to do for it.

He pulled himself gently out of Johnny's arms when there were ten minutes left and put on one of the discarded robes, made sure he wasn't too scandalous looking, and shut the door to the bedroom to go out and wait in the living room for their food. He thanked the person who brought it up and pushed it the rest of the way in the bedroom where Johnny was finally sitting up, blinking around blearily.

They sat on the bed eating, Johnny stealing some of Daniel's bacon, but passing over sausage as a trade, drinking coffee before leaning over to kiss Daniel.

"Happy birthday Daniel," Johnny said when he pulled away.

Daniel smiled.

After breakfast, Daniel showered while Johnny cleaned up their breakfast, returned it to the cart, and put it outside their room.

He wasn't joining Daniel for the spa day. Which made Daniel wonder just how expensive everything had been. How much had he spent on Daniel?

There was no getting any of it back and Johnny wouldn't want him to, so he was determined to enjoy it. To enjoy his massage and seaweed wrap or whatever they were going to do.

Daniel didn't like being alone. He liked having someone to talk to.

But there was something peaceful about walking into the spa and going through the motions to put on a new robe, to laying down and thinking of absolutely nothing while someone worked out the knots in his back like he was made out of bread dough.

The warmth of hot stones, the sounds of their zen tapes, all the goop they put on his skin, the work they did on his face, his nails until he felt like a new person almost.

Wrapped up in a robe sitting on a chair waiting for some fancy water letting the mask part of the facial set.

He understood why people like Ms. Lawrence had once-a-month appointments. The closest his mom got was getting her nail and hair done. One day he'd have to pay for something like this for her.

"How was it?" Johnny asked when he got back. The room was almost all packed up, but he was still in a robe, unchanged, not dressed.

"Very nice," Daniel said laying down on the couch with a satisfied sigh. "When do we have to leave?"

"I moved back our check out. As long as we're heading home by 5 we're good."

"Really?" Daniel asked turning to look at the TV.

He could spend his birthday doing absolutely nothing and that sounded delightful.

"Yup," Johnny said sitting down next to him. "What do you want to do?"

"Watch TV?"

Johnny smiled flicking it on and sitting down next to him.

Daniel curled up next to him, head in his lap.

They ordered lunch and it felt like such a wonderfully lazy day, to just sit around with Johnny doing nothing. Just breathing, just being.

"We've got a couple of hours before we have to leave," Johnny said softly. "Anything else you want to do?"

Daniel didn't want to move. But there was plenty he wanted to do. He rolled onto his back looking up at Johnny.

Johnny laughed softly leaning down to kiss him, letting himself be pulled down into a deeper kiss, the show on the TV forgotten and Daniel focused on tasting Johnny and the feel of his tongue against his own, on getting rid of that robe and spending his afternoon enjoying time alone with his boyfriend.

After a shower Johnny got ready, finished packing and cleaning up the last of their stuff, the last two bouquets ready for them to carry down to the Avanti. The other seventeen waiting in the backseat.

He returned to kiss Daniel gently on the forehead.

"Ready to go home?" he asked scooping up one of the vases and holding out his hand.

"No," Daniel whispered.

He wanted to stay in that hotel forever. Just keep having sex with Johnny and getting room service and watching TV. He didn't want to return to the real world. He didn't want to leave. He got why Johnny had booked a hotel. Why he'd booked such a nice one. They had no responsibilities there. Didn't have to clean, though they didn't leave a mess. They didn't have to worry about cooking or anyone hearing them, or anything at all. Plus the food they bought was good.

He got up with a sigh taking the held-out hand and the other bouquet. He followed Johnny to check out and back to the Avanti breathing in December in LA. Smog. Listening to the radio with Johnny as they made their way back up north towards Reseda and to Mr. Miyagi's home.

He was looking forward to seeing Mr. Miyagi. But he'd also enjoyed the middle-of-the-week vacation they'd had. They'd done absolutely nothing and it'd been wonderful.

Johnny parked and Daniel took his bag walking with him back up to the house.

It smelled like mac and cheese. Tears pricked at his eyes. That homesick feeling washing over him.

Johnny gently nudged him forward, to keep him moving and not just stuck in the doorway.

"We're home Mr. Miyagi!" Daniel called, swallowing down that watery prickly feeling.

He'd told Mr. Miyagi he liked mac and cheese. Told everyone. And the thought of Mr. Miyagi making him mac and cheese was heartwarming, but it also made him miss his mom.

Johnny carefully pulled the bag out of his hands and set it on the floor with his own, putting his hands on Daniel's shoulders and walking him towards the kitchen, guiding him, coaxing him carefully until he caught sight of the curly brown hair of the woman standing at the kitchen over the stove. Heard her talking to Mr. Miyagi a mile a minute in her thick New Jersey accent.

He ran, darting around the table and carefully around Mr. Miyagi, throwing his arms around her.

"Ma!"

She smiled, turning to him, hugging him back tightly.

"Hi honey! Happy Birthday! Did you have fun on your birthday so far?"

He nodded into her arms, eyes filling up with tears as he breathed in her perfume, holding on tightly hoping it wasn't a dream, hoping it was real and she was as solid and there as she felt.

"I missed you too," she said softly kissing the top of his head.

Chapter End Notes

> 100 chapters...I was not expecting this to be so long when I started it and it's still going. Wow. Thanks for sticking along this journey with me so far.
>
> I didn't know a good way to fit this in because I don't think either of them is fully aware of it. But ever since Silver snuck into Mr. Miyagi's Johnny checks all the security measures they implemented, checks the fireplace even though there's a grate every night before bed, and sleeps lightly because he's concerned there will be a break-in again. Essentially he's also been very stressed about everything and concerned for Mr. Miyagi and Daniel's safety. So when they went camping he slept in a little because the only real concern were bears. The hotel, on the other hand, no one except Laura and Mr. Miyagi know exactly where they are and he picked a secure hotel and locked the door so Johnny went back to sleep because he feels 100% safe. Thus it went like Breakfast? Oh Daniels' got that, back to sleep. (Though Daniel is still partially right, they both left less stressed).

Photographs from Before and Now

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Johnny nodded to Mrs. LaRusso and picked up their bags to unpack. It'd be quick. Most of it just went back in the bathroom or into their dirty laundry hamper. Or the flowers that were filling the backseat of the Avanti that needed to be brought in. Which was maybe too much once he saw them all together. So he carefully carried them into their room, one by one frowning at the lack of space. When they were all crowded together in their room it was more obvious that he'd overdone it.

He'd liked the idea of getting him a bouquet for every year. And then he realized he didn't know which flowers Daniel actually liked. Maybe he'd do a bouquet with the number of flowers from now on. Twenty bouquets in a small apartment next year would for sure overdo it while twenty individual flowers in a bouquet was a paragraph, a speech, not a whole book.

He set the last one down then turned to return to the kitchen where Mrs. LaRusso was speaking soft to Daniel, still hugging him tightly. Mr. Miyagi was sitting at the table drinking tea and he smiled warmly at Johnny, pouring him a cup of tea when he got close.

"How'd you get here?" Daniel asked pulling away.

"I flew. Laura paid for my ticket and picked me up. I'm staying with her for a couple of days while I take stuff out of Jimmy's house and move it to my new apartment."

"You're staying?" Daniel asked, stunned and happy, hope filling his voice.

"You would not believe the flood of job offers I got all of a sudden," Mrs. LaRusso said shooting a warm knowing smile to Johnny. "Someone has been talking me up to every high-level position in the valley. Your uncle Louie got sick of the phone ringing off the hook."

Daniel turned to look at Johnny who lowered his gaze innocently picking up his tea.

He'd wanted to pay for the flight, to send the guys to pick her up, had thought about having her arrive early and pick her up himself, but his mother had jumped on it. Pounced as soon as he mentioned that he wanted Mrs. LaRusso in town for Daniel's birthday.

He was pretty sure his mom booked her first class and had them give her a bottle of wine as soon as she got settled on board. She'd listed off all the fun things about her picking Mrs. LaRusso up. They could catch up, talk, she'd have someone to go out with, they could get a manicure, they could go back to their lunch dates, and she'd finally have someone to drink wine with. Girl's night for like a week.

He also knew his mother missed their dinner parties and was excited to not be in that new house all by herself. He was trying to talk her into adopting a pet from the sanctuary. Maybe a kitten or puppy. Heck, even a turtle if she wanted it. Though for some reason he could see his mother with chickens.

He hadn't been the only one working on finding a way for Mrs. LaRusso to stay permanently. He'd asked the guys to look.

They'd agreed on a few things.

It had to be a steady job that she'd like, that paid well.

It had to have benefits.

It had to be interesting. It couldn't be boring.

It had to be worth moving back. Away from her family.

Something so that she'd stay.

A job that wouldn't keep sending her away.

The Browns had bought the blueberry pie recipe from her, had offered her a job and an apartment above one of their bakeries.

He knew Dutch had found a couple of computer and tech jobs like the one she'd gotten when she'd moved into town the first time.

Jimmy had found a couple of jobs in his family business and with their contacts.

Tommy's aunt had found some spaces in the local magazines and at his Uncle's hospital.

He knew his mom had also been looking. Forwarding Mrs. LaRusso's information to pretty much every nice place she knew.

Johnny didn't have a clue which one she'd accepted.

All that mattered was she was here. That that void she'd left in Daniel's life was refilled. That she couldn't be pulled away suddenly like that again.

He'd made sure to cover his bases.

He talked with Tommy's uncle about Louie Sr.'s condition, what was needed to take care of him. Turned out it was something included in his health care, just no one had filled out the paperwork, hadn't been aware of it. No one had even told Louie Sr. or his family that it was an option.

He'd had an awkward conversation with Louie Jr. over it, helping him walk through the paperwork so that they could get the help they needed and free Mrs. LaRusso from her familial duties so she could come back home without feeling guilty.

He'd been prepared to anonymously pay for one. But this had been better.

The paperwork had just been a pain in the ass. And he had to keep faxing things to Louie Jr. to make sure it was done correctly.

Essentially a go-between between Tommy's uncle and Louie's family. He'd done it in the morning while Daniel was out running with Dutch.

He'd get up when Daniel did and then when Daniel went to meet Dutch or Dutch came to pick him up he'd drive to the shop to use the phone and the fax machine. It had been so frustrating. Had taken a couple of months of making sure the correct forms were filled out. Going through bureaucratic nonsense that Johnny knew if he threw a wad of cash at it'd go away. But if he did that he had a feeling Louie Jr. would get pissy at him. It was the worst part of his day. Partially because it was hard to get Louie Jr. to focus, to not start talking, to stop puffing up his chest over the phone line about how much better Jersey was to California and what did a fancy pants beach boy know about hospital paperwork? Was the fancy pants beach boy going to school to become a doctor? He thought all Johnny did was tan on the beach, probably didn't know how to work at all. How was the shop going? Was he actually helping or just leeching off of Daniel's good idea? If Louie Jr. came up there it'd be an overnight success, and maybe he would. Maybe he'd show Johnny the LaRusso way.

Johnny always tightened the cord into his fist and then worked his way through his deep breathing exercises, pacing as much as the cord would allow. The kid's dad was sick. He was taking his frustration out on Johnny even though Johnny was helping him and more importantly he was trying to help Mrs. LaRusso and Daniel.

He did a lot of deep breathing exercises. He always had a cut off for how long he was on the phone with Louie Jr. And once that cut off time hit, he gave Louie Jr. something to do, some document to read over, some paperwork to look at, told him he'd talk to him tomorrow ignoring the snide comment he always got in response, hung up and would go for a run or to the gym. Something to get rid of the itchy annoyance that flooded his skin so that he could meet Daniel and Dutch and feel a little more grounded, a little less frustrated.

He was grateful to Tommy's uncle who would when they met up solemnly make him a cup of coffee and agree that the whole process was utter nonsense. Especially over the phone, for people, he didn't know too well. Then they'd sit and go over the next steps, and check over the paperwork to make sure it wouldn't get rejected. Because that had happened, and Johnny had had to start back over from the beginning.

He had rolled his plan around in his head a lot. He knew how much Daniel missed his dad. How much he just lived with that pain. And that he missed his mom. That Mrs. LaRusso's sudden disappearance from LA, the loss of her and the apartment had cracked something in Daniel.

Johnny knew what it was like to lose your home, but even though he'd been blocked from his mother, had watched her fly out and go on trips, he'd never lost her. She'd never been dragged away to the other end of the country and trapped in the muck of family illness. The never-ending sinking quicksand. But he knew that every time she'd left for long stints of time he'd missed her. He could only imagine how Daniel felt. The way that pain was an additional weight he carried.

It was part of everything though. Part of his bigger plan. But this one was older. Original. Ever since he'd seen Daniel's face fall when the woman at Seven Seas told him his mother had already left. The disbelief, the pain, the shock in that moment. The feeling of being abandoned, left behind.

She filled bowls full of mac and cheese and they sat around the kitchen table. She caught Daniel up on everything. On Uncle Louie, his grandparents, Louie Jr, New Jersey.

Daniel reached out to Johnny and held his hand under the table, talking almost as much as Mrs. LaRusso. Telling her about the shop, excited about the bonsai, telling her everything she'd missed.

Except for the big thing.

The tournament and the pain and the suffering.

He skipped the return of Cobra Kai and the new enemies who'd appeared who had nothing better to do but harass Daniel.

After dinner, Mr. Miyagi brought out a cake full of candles and Daniel looked so happy. So relaxed. So cheerful.

It was almost like before Okinawa. Almost like before Silver had sunk a claw into him.

It was a simple chocolate cake but delicious and they sat around talking until it was late.

"Where are you staying?" Daniel asked.

"With Laura at least for a bit. Her new place is wonderful."

"It is," Daniel agreed.

"Do you want to go stay with them?" Johnny whispered softly.

Daniel turned to him. Thinking about it seriously.

Johnny could repack their bags. They could go stay with his mom. He knew she wouldn't mind. Or if-

"Not tonight," Daniel said softly to Johnny before turning back to Mrs. LaRusso. "How are you getting back there?"

"That's how," Mrs. LaRusso said motioning towards the door and the knock that sounded.

Johnny stood opening it to find his mother holding a gift. She leaned forward and kissed him on the cheek.

"Have fun on your romantic getaway?" she asked quietly a teasing, knowing smile on her lips.

Johnny flushed red.

She smiled squeezing his arm before walking past.

"Daniel! How does nineteen feel?" she asked.

"Normally I'd say the exact same as every year before, but today feels so much better Ms. Lawrence," Daniel said warmly.

"I'm so glad," she said passing the box over to Daniel and taking a seat, warmly greeting Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny sat down back in his spot and Daniel opened up the box, pulling out a blue silk tie and fancy cuff links that sparkled in the light of the kitchen. "Wow Ms. Lawrence, this is-"

"It's part of a set," Laura said. "Your mom and I were talking about suits and I like your Dad's powder blue suit, but you should have one that fits you now, so sometime, when you're up for a day of shopping, your Mom and I are going to buy you a nice custom suit. We'll go out for brunch or lunch or coffee and go shopping. But you'll get to pick something that feels like you."

"And shoes," Mrs. LaRusso said smiling warmly.

"That will be nice, thank you both," Daniel said looking between the two of them.

Johnny was pretty sure his mom had been in the same boat as him. Had probably tried to buy Daniel something too expensive and had to reign it in.

Johnny had failed. But his mother had managed it.

They were probably lucky she hadn't just bought them a house across the street.

After sitting around and talking a little more, they promised to come by Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees in the morning then left left and Mr. Miyagi smiled.

"Happy birthday Daniel-san," Mr. Miyagi said passing his gift across to Daniel. "Boxes come too."

Daniel opened the box from Mr. Miyagi first and Johnny watched him pull out a watch, a nice one, and quickly telling Mr. Miyagi how much he loved it and about how his last watch had broke at school and he hadn't bothered to get another one and Mr. Miyagi nodded, smiling warmly.

He then passed over three packages.

One from Okinawa that Daniel opened with a frown like he was worried someone had sent him a curse. On top was an envelope he opened, full of photos of Johnny and Daniel, from all the photoshoots, a couple of magazines, and clippings from advertisements.

He passed it to Mr. Miyagi to look at and pulled out something wrapped carefully in cloth.

"Hmm. Good photos," Mr. Miyagi said flicking through them. "Yukie say very popular." He laughed softly at some inside joke. "Say popular with girls and Chozen."

Daniel unwrapped the cloth and held a black belt. "It's from Sato and Chozen," Daniel said. "Chozen wrote this one should fit."

Johnny couldn't tell whether Daniel was touched or annoyed. Somewhere teetering between.

He pulled out a carefully wrapped box that he unwrapped. He held it, eyes wide. It was covered in Japanese but it was clearly a camera.

"Ah, Yukie sent Fotorama, like poloroid camera," Mr. Miyagi said.

Daniel set out box after box of little film cartridges.

Johnny leaned over to read the note.

Capture memories.

He passed it to Mr. Miyagi to read the instructions. Mr. Miyagi put on his glasses and popped the box open, reading the instructions and setting up the camera while Daniel continued to open his gifts. There were more snacks, different ones from what they'd sent for Johnny's birthday.

The next thing was from Kumiko, a black jacket. This way at least one of you has a nice vintage leather jacket.

Daniel laughed softly setting all of it aside and moving to the next box from Newark. He pulled out candy from Nonnio and jars of jam.

Cassette tapes from his cousins and a sweater. It almost matched Johnny's and Daniel was frozen staring at it as he pulled it out of the box and held it in front of him. It was green.

Clearly, there were more to these sweaters than Daniel had let on by the absolute shell-shocked look on his face.

There was a click and whir, a flash of light as Mr. Miyagi got the camera set up.

Daniel carefully folded up the sweater with all the snacks and treats from home and set it aside with the stuff from Okinawa before turning to the next box.

It was from Ohio, from Jessica. She sent a long handwritten letter that Daniel after a couple of lines he set aside and pulled out a box of chocolates with something pale brown in the center and little holes in them.

"What's that?" Johnny asked.

"She calls them buckeyes. Chocolate and peanut butter."

"Take pictures," Mr. Miyagi said waving between the two of them. "Take few, maybe send few to Yukie. Hmm?"

Daniel nodded leaning in close to Johnny and smiling brightly. Johnny leaned in close, arm around Daniel's waist. Mr. Miyagi took three. Then Johnny took the camera from him and Daniel moved over to sit close to Mr. Miyagi who beemed proudly, happy. Johnny followed Mr. Miyagi and took three. They sat and waited for them to develop. Mr. Miyagi took two of each. And Daniel took the final ones.

"Happy Birthday Daniel-san. Good night, sleep well," Mr. Miyagi said. Heading off with his photos.

Johnny cleaned up and then filled his arms with Daniel's gifts, to carry off all the non-food back to their room. The food and snacks going in the kitchen. Daniel got most of his gifts, which left Johnny with just the envelope of pictures and magazines from Okinawa and the instant photos.

"Where do you want these?" Johnny asked them up.

Daniel was hanging up the jacket in the closet.

"Just stick them in the desk drawer," Daniel said.

Johnny opened the drawer.

"Wait!" Daniel said and Johnny glanced at him, then in the drawer.

There were a lot of magazines in there. Well worn. He realized he'd never opened the desk drawer before.

Why did Daniel sound panicked?

They were just magazines.

Unless they were skin mags.

Johnny set the photos and stuff from Okinawa down on the desk and frowned.

Daniel was allowed to like what he liked, to look at what he liked, but the way he usually talked made it seem like Johnny was the hottest person Daniel had ever seen. And Johnny liked that. Preened a little that Daniel's liked him so unequivocally. But now he was curious but like a bad curiosity. The kind where the answer might bother him, the kind that would eat away at him if he didn't find out the answer.

Was it women? Men?

Were they all the same? Were they different?

Johnny never bought any because he didn't trust that it would go well. With his luck, it'd be found and he'd either get beaten for it or made fun of depending on Sid's mood, or both. And he would for sure have told his mother. His mother might not have cared, but it would've felt awful with Sid directing that ship. So he'd never-he'd seen them, but-

What was Daniel into? Something other than Johnny's Californian blonde hair, muscles, and blue eyes?

Daniel was moving towards him, babbling about how it was nothing, just old magazines and he was blushing. He was red. There was something in these magazines that Daniel jerked off to. He picked out one off the top. It was well worn. A favorite? Oh god, did he actually want to look?

Daniel wasn't stopping him, wasn't asking him not to look. He just seemed highly embarrassed.

Maybe he'd learn more about Daniel, what he liked. He set the magazine down on the desk, he'd find his answer easily, just like someone did with a book. A book of poetry with a favorite poem in it. How it would open to that poem immediately. Like he expected it opened to a specific page.

It was an article with photos...with...him?

This was tame though.

There wasn't anything hot-it wasn't a skin mag?

It was just Johnny?

Wait, this was the magazine he'd been in.

Daniel was talking again, Tommy had given it to him, then his aunt had given him the others. Others?

Johnny looked back in the drawer.

They were all the same publication.

He opened one of them, it fell open to pictures of him. The next one, the same thing. There was an envelope. He picked it up and pictures of Johnny fell out. All the modeling photoshoots.

If Tommy and his aunt had given Daniel an embarrassing amount of photos of Johnny, why was he so red? Like it was- Johnny looked back at the first magazine, of him on the beach, glistening.

Oh.

He felt his ears burn.

He had his answer. He really was Daniel's type.

He did not know what to do with this information, sitting down in the desk chair a bit overwhelmed.

He'd never looked at the magazines.

Hadn't really even bothered to check the photos.

Never realized people might like the pictures enough to-

"Hey," Daniel said softly. "I got these after I realized I liked you and before we started dating. I-I didn't always-"

He was standing awkwardly in front of Johnny.

Tommy had mentioned that it was popular. He'd just never thought of it in that way. But he supposed people got off on anything if Cosmo was to be believed.

It was a lot of photos. A lot of Johnny.

Was it better? Worse somehow? Should it feel worse? It really didn't. It'd just been a surprise.

He knew Daniel thought he was attractive but this was...on a different level. Would he have done the same? If their roles were reversed? If he had photos of Daniel like that?

Maybe.

Probably.

It was a thought.

It was a lot of thoughts.

He leaned back a bit looking at Daniel who Johnny didn't think he'd ever seen him look so embarrassed. Standing there trying to figure out what to say, how to explain.

Curiosity and ego were floating to the top as he moved the desk chair so he could look at the photos again.

"Which one's your favorite?"

Daniel looked at him like he wanted to bury himself in the garden, but Johnny wrapped an arm around Daniel's hip, pulling him in close. He wasn't going anywhere. It'd be a way to learn more about what Daniel liked. Daniel turned his eyes towards the photos, towards the magazines on the desk, and pointed to one. One of Johnny without a shirt, glistening, flexing.

He could arrange part of that. Not the beach or the glistening.

He let go, worked on the buttons on his shirt and Daniel turned to look back at him, eyes wide.

Johnny shrugged out of it and leaned back a bit, flexing, watching as Daniel reached out, to run his fingers over Johnny's abs, swallowing hard. He looked mesmerized. Which was an interesting thought, an interesting realization.

Maybe he could just distract Daniel by taking off his shirt and flexing.

That'd be a dangerous thing to know.

Or maybe a good thing to know.

If Daniel started to panic over something he could take off his shirt.

Would that even work?

Maybe he could try.

Next time it looked like Daniel got overwhelmed, he'd take off his shirt. See what happened.

He'd originally thought all of his muscle scared people off, like the colorful way a frog warns that its poisonous.

But instead, it seemed to draw Daniel further in. Not deterred at at all.

"Can I touch you?" Johnny asked.

It took awhile or the question to register for Daniel.

Johnny watched as the fingers touching his tense muscle paused and Daniel looked up at him, like he had to drag his focus back into the moment.

"Yeah," Daniel said.

Johnny gently pulled Daniel closer by his hips, guiding him to sit on Johnny's lap, shifting to stay as tense as possible while Daniel's fingers ghosted across his skin. It'd be an interesting experiment. To see who could hang in the longest. If Johnny flexing or Daniel under Johnny's hands.

He looked in the drawer, Daniel had mentioned something when they went camping, about how Daniel left stuff in his desk drawer, and yes, there was lube, that'd help just make things gentler.

Daniel's fingers were pressing into his muscle, curiosity peaked and distracted. Which meant he wasn't focused on Johnny's hands.

Johnny moved carefully. They'd had a busy afternoon and he worried Daniel might be a bit too sensitive, but he didn't hiss or look uncomfortable when Johnny touched him, wrapping his hand around him.

He moved his hand. This he knew. Knew how Daniel liked Johnny's hand on him. The worry was that he'd be loud. Too loud for Mr. Miyagi's house.

Maybe it was a bad idea.

Maybe this wasn't the place to do this.

But it was too late.

Johnny had already opened that box.

Daniel gasped, rolling his hips into Johnny's slick hand.

Johnny wondered if he could try something else.

Carefully.

He wanted to kiss Daniel but kissing him would block his view. And that was kind of the point. But he was being noisy and what Johnny wanted to try probably wouldn't help. He slid his hand along Daniel's spine, slowly and purposefully heading down, a note of his idea, hopefully enough for Daniel to get it. Fully understand what he wanted to try.

"Is it okay if I-?"

Daniel nodded biting his lip pushing his hips back towards Johnny's fingers, moaning as they went in, gripping hard onto Johnny bucking his hips between his hands.

Johnny kind of got it. The mesmerized look Daniel got some time when touching him, the distracted lust filled curiosity. If it was anything close to the same feeling that he had now, watching Daniel grinding on his fingers and into his hand, then he got it.

Daniel seemed to want too much at once. To take in Johnny in his gaze, to feel him, to also close his eyes and muffle his moans as he chased his pleasure, as Johnny felt around curiously until Daniel guided him to his prostrate. Johnny had had to look it up, standing awkwardly in the health and sex section of the library hoping none of the librarians he knew found him. He'd not found it on his own, and he figure it'd take practice, but it'd be fun type of practice with Daniel.

Daniel ended up kissing him, a crushing desperate kiss full of tongue and muffled moans, trying to stay quiet.

They really needed an apartment. Their own place so that Daniel's lips and Johnny's wouldn't get bruised as they tried to contain everything. Somewhere so that they could be as loud as they wanted. So that they wouldn't have to hold back.

Daniel didn't last long and collapsed into Johnny, breathing hard as Johnny slowly pulled his hands away.

"Pictures can't do that," Johnny said softly.

Daniel gently pushed himself back up looking at the mess on Johnny, slowly catching his breath.

"True, but this is an image I would want to keep."

Johnny swallowed hard. "This is only available live and in person."

Daniel laughed softly grabbing tissues off the desk to clean up Johnny's abdoment and chest.

"Thankfully I've got a good memory."

"Are you sure? If I didn't have an idea of what you used some of these for I'd be worried that you kept them all to remember what I looked like," Johnny said teasing,motioning towards the desk, the photos.

"As I was saying earlier. I got those before I got the real thing. For when I missed having you by my side while I slept. Before I got to fully see all of you. When all I had was my imagination and hope that you liked me back."

Johnny glanced away as a small seed of unease that had hidden under the ego and curiosity bubbled up, something he needed to squash before it sprouted fell from his lips. "Is it as good as you imagined?"

Daniel's hands grabbed the sides of his face and pulled him into a warm kiss. "Better."

Chapter End Notes

Pictures of the 80s Fotorama and more info on it can be found here.

Mr. Miyagi is going to keep two of the photos for himself with the other photos he has of him and Daniel (like the one he looked at so sadly in KK3. I wanted him to have more happy photos) and send the other two to Yukie with a long letter.

Daniel didn't finish reading the letter from Jessica because it's like five pages front and back, but he will read it later. It's pretty much all about Ohio and being back home and a recipe to make buckeyes. Here's a recipe for buckeyes

Also couldn't figure out how to fit this in but when learning about how to put a gi on Sato and Chozen learned that Daniel didn't have his own black belt despite being at that level. Chozen had asked Johnny about the All-Valley, and Johnny mentioned how the black belt Daniel had tried to put on at the tournament was too big for him so he didn't know where Daniel had gotten it from. Thus the gift from Sato and Chozen. An actually decent gift.

Tryouts Take 2

Chapter Notes

I'm going on hiatus again for about two weeks. (Fun busy this time.)

I hope you have a wonderful Halloween! 🎃

See the end of the chapter for more notes

On Saturday Dutch showed up took one look at Daniel and shook his head telling him to change. He brushed past and into their room going into the closet and picking out an outfit and pushing it into Daniel's hands. T-shirt and shorts, tennis shoes.

"Are we going running again? I thought we took the weekends off?"

"Just go change Daniel," Dutch said leaning against the desk.

Johnny handed him the envelope from Okinawa and Dutch flicked through the pictures, the magazines, and the advertisements.

Daniel sighed walking off to the bathroom to change.

He knew the guys were in town but he hadn't seen them yet. Hadn't heard from them. He was a little bummed. He'd wanted to tell them about Johnny getting him 19 bouquets and that his mom was back in town.

He'd also thought they'd do something for his birthday over the weekend, but it looked like he was back in workout mode and he was disappointed.

He'd enjoyed his week.

He felt like he'd had a mini-vacation from worrying about the future but now the gears were moving again. But it was fine. He couldn't take too long of a break. He had to keep moving forward. Barnes wasn't going to take it easy on him.

He met Dutch and Johnny out front, wishing Mr. Miyagi a good Saturday and then following them to the van, getting in with a sigh.

Johnny sat down next to him as Dutch drove, talking about working at the shop for Daniel's birthday. Something about how he hadn't understood how busy the shop was. How now that the holidays were on the horizon the shop was swamped. How it was kind of weird to be alone with Mr. Miyagi. But how pleased Mr. Miyagi had been.

Dutch shook his head with a soft laugh.

"You guys do a lot of work in that shop and I didn't even realize it."

"It's mostly because of Daniel's hard work," Johnny said.

"You really have made Mr. Miyagi's dream come true. You should be proud of yourself. We had lunch together and were talking and Mr. Miyagi just absolutely glows when he talks about you, Daniel. He's immensely proud of you."

Every time the door opened to Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees Daniel was relieved. Happy that Mr. Miyagi's dream, his retirement was paying off. He'd worked so hard, had lived such a rough life but was always so calm, so helpful, so kind, he deserved the best, and the fact that Daniel had helped him with that, the fact Mr. Miyagi viewed him as a partner was the proudest part of his life.

Dutch drove them to a park and parked and Daniel got out and stretched.

Back to the same old same old.

Back to preparing.

To that crushing weight of the tournament.

He headed towards the path but Dutch put his hands on Daniel's shoulders and turned him, moving him in a different direction.

They walked across the grass towards a field where Jimmy, Bobby, and Tommy waited sitting at a picnic bench chatting.

There was a cooler and a grill nearby.

"You ready Daniel?" Tommy asked.

"For what?" Daniel asked confused.

Were they having a picnic?

Jimmy jerked his thumb behind him pointing across the field at a group of guys in jerseys kicking around a soccer ball.

"What?" Daniel asked dumbfounded.

"We blocked you from playing at school, but we found an intramural team with an opening. You're trying out," Bobby said smiling warmly at him. "We owe you that at the very least."

Daniel stared at them eyes wide. "Seriously?"

"Yup," Dutch said hands on his shoulders. "They play a couple of times a month and do matches and stuff. We're going to play with them today for fun, but the goal is that you join."

"We've been watching the local teams for months waiting for an opening, and finally there's one. One of their players moved to Canada, so if you're up for it, then we'll do our best to make you look good."

"Figured you could enjoy it after the tournament."

"Yeah we did warn them that you had a karate tournament coming up," Tommy said with a soft laugh. "The captain thought that was cool. Asked if you could do flips."

"Not like Johnny can," Daniel said softly, still stunned. "But it's gotten better than it was."

"Ready?" Johnny asked.

Daniel nodded. He couldn't believe they'd found him a soccer team to try out for. He'd given up on his dreams to play soccer in LA. He kept sinking into the karate sandpit and every time he crawled out of it something shoved him back in.

The guys introduced him to the others on the team. It wasn't their full team, just the ones that were free that weekend. It was a lot of people to meet but they shook Daniel's hand and quickly moved on to play.

It'd been a while since Daniel had gotten to play with a team. He hadn't gotten to do anything soccer-related since...he couldn't remember the last time. But it was like riding a bike he supposed. Once he was on the field, once the game began he was running, darting around the other team, jumping out of the way, focused on the ball, paying attention to where his teammates, the rest of the guys, and a few other players from the intermural team were. Passing the ball, catching it with his feet, kicking it up and across the field towards a waiting teammate.

He'd missed it. He'd missed running for fun, chasing after a ball, working as a group, working with people with a goal in mind.

Karate was a solo sport and one that usually ended up bruised from hits that were almost always personal.

Soccer was a community.

The morning bled into the afternoon and Daniel lost track of time until hands were clapping on his shoulders and they were sitting around to take a break, to have lunch. It'd been a workout, but it'd been a fun workout.

Karate and all that training had made him lighter on his feet, faster. It all lent itself perfectly to soccer.

Tommy handed him a sports drink while Jimmy set up at the grill making lunch, grilling hot dogs.

"So," the team captain said sitting down across from Daniel. "Don't know if your friends mentioned it but we've got an opening. We play across California and sometimes travel across the country for games if we do well enough in our matches. It's a commitment, and we know you're busy until what? Mid-January for that karate tournament? What was it again Bobby? All-stars?"

"All-Valley," Bobby said.

"Right, so after that," the captain said pulling out a printed-out calendar, and a packet of paper. "You want in?"

Daniel took the paper, all the games and practices, and locations. He'd had so much fun. He had forgotten how much fun it was. How much he'd missed it.

"Yes," Daniel said.

"Awesome man. My number is on there, I'm just going to need your contact info and emergency contact and whatnot. Get that to me in a couple of weeks. There's a list of stuff for the membership and a fee for team uniforms and for like gas to get to the places. Just a little bit of paperwork and then we'll see you after your tournament. It'll be cool to have a black belt on our team. Good luck in your match," he said clapping Daniel on the shoulder before walking off back to grab some food.

Daniel sat holding the welcome packet looking back at the guys.

"He looks so happy it kind of hurts to look at him," Jimmy said with a laugh.

"Congrats man," Bobby said.

"Guess we've got soccer games to add to our calendars, you'll have to give us the dates and locations," Tommy said.

Johnny filled two plates with food, grilled hot dogs and chips, and fruit then sat down next to Daniel passing him a plate.

"I'm sorry it took so long."

Daniel blinked up at him. "What do you mean?"

"Playing soccer together. It took a long time. I waited for your knee to heal and then we went to Okinawa and then got busy."

Daniel gently squeezed his hand. "It doesn't matter how long, it's wonderful. I had a lot of fun playing with everyone and am excited to be a part of a team again."

Johnny smiled softly back, squeezing his hand.

"Sorry again for ruining your chance to join the school team in the first place."

"Consider that debt paid," Daniel said smiling warmly.

"So I mentioned your birthday was this week," Bobby said setting a large box onto the table. "And my parents made you a cake, so I didn't get a chance to. They beat me to it."

Bobby lifted the lid and Daniel stared at a cake covered in shaved chocolate and mini cookies sticking up out of the icing.

"What flavor is it?" Tommy asked sitting down with his plate of food.

"Cookie dough," Bobby said. "I was going to make you a pirate ship. But maybe I'll make you a pirate ship next year."

"That reminds me," Jimmy said putting out the fire of the grill and sitting down to join them. "So we got you a gift, it's twofold."

"Twofold?" Daniel asked.

"After the tournament, we were thinking we'd go to San Francisco, so we're going to drive up together and you get your own room, and we'll explore. But the trip is on us."

"We thought it'd be fun, a way to celebrate it being over," Tommy said.

"And we'll be off from school," Bobby said. "So we can leave Friday morning and then drive up."

"It's like a six-hour drive," Dutch said.

"So what's the second part?" Daniel asked.

"Ah, well we were talking to your mom," Jimmy said popping a chip in his mouth with a crunch.

"And she mentioned that your grandpa has this big party in January, sometime after the tournament."

"Yeah," Daniel said.

"So we've booked you tickets to Newark from San Francisco to go. We'll drop you off at the airport and then cover you for a week or so at Mr. Miyagi's so you can go."

"There is one question though," Dutch said leaning close.

"What?" Daniel asked.

"Are you wanting to take Johnny with you?" Tommy asked. "We booked him a ticket but we can also keep him entertained while you're gone."

"I'm not like a toddler," Johnny said with a frown.

Dutch slapped Johnny on the back, hard. "We know man, but you've been honeymooning with Daniel for months. If he leaves you're going to get mopey. If we're sending Daniel away we're not going to leave you to mope."

"Do you still want to go?" Daniel asked Johnny.

"I mean, sure. It was on our list," Johnny said. "If you and your family will be okay with me coming along."

"Of course," Daniel said. "Nonnio and Nonnia will be happy to see you."

"Okay, then where do you want to stay?" Tommy asked digging a notebook out of his pocket and a pen. "So we can book the place."

"Oh no thank you," Daniel said quickly.

Tommy looked up at him surprised.

"If we stay at a hotel my whole family will get offended," Daniel said. "My uncle booked a hotel when he was getting a divorce thinking it'd keep things from getting awkward and every time he drops the kids off the family gives him the cold shoulder and mutters about how he was too good to stay with anyone. We have to stay with someone."

"Really?" Johnny asked like Daniel had just pointed to a mountain and told him to climb it in five minutes while carrying a bag full of dictionaries. Resigned to have a bad time.

"Yeah, but there is a loophole," Daniel said. "I can call my godfathers and see if we can crash with them."

"That's a loophole?" Johnny asked.

"Well, they're on the same street so we'd be within walking distance. And they've got a guest bedroom. It wouldn't be crowded like with my aunt or uncles. And," Daniel smiled softly patting Johnny's hand. "You wouldn't have to worry about getting stuck with Louie Jr."

"You sure that's going to be okay?" Bobby asked.

"Oh yeah, of course! My godparents are family so it counts," Daniel said.

"And they'll be fine that you're bringing Johnny to a family thing?" Dutch asked as Bobby started slicing up the cake and passing out slices.

"Nonnia knitted Johnny a sweater," Daniel said.

"Oh, from that package you got for your birthday?" Tommy asked looking at Johnny.

Johnny nodded thanking Dutch as he was passed a slice of cake.

"It was a nice sweater, but what does that have to do with anything?" Jimmy asked.

Daniel looked down at his cake with a frown. "Nonnia doesn't knit for anyone."

"Okay? Keep going, we're not getting it," Bobby said taking a bite of the cake motioning to Daniel with his plastic fork in a circle.

Daniel shifted uncomfortably.

How could he mention that his Nonnia and Nonnio essentially looked at Johnny and were like ah yes, nice blonde California boy, we're keeping him? That no one got a sweater like that when they were dating? That Nonnia and Nonnio had jumped twenty steps ahead, past dating for years, past a first apartment, straight into married? He supposed he'd have to warn Johnny eventually because he'd hear. His cousins, his aunts, and uncles wouldn't be quiet about it.

"They're like....family only?" Daniel said.

"Like a letterman?" Jimmy asked.

"Or like a wedding gift?" Tommy asked with an eyebrow raised.

They laughed. But Daniel didn't laugh. He poked around at his cake.

The laughter around him stopped and he felt the sudden silence, the eyes on him.

"Johnny, what the hell did you do when you visited Newark?" Dutch asked.

"Did you propose?" Bobby asked.

All their eyes were on Johnny.

"I didn't do anything!" Johnny said hands up. "I just met them is all."

He was pink, startled. Daniel set his fork down and rubbed at his own face and groaned.

"No one proposed. Nothing happened. Just Nonnio and Nonnia liked Johnny and...I don't know. But it's like a thing okay? Like if Johnny doesn't go Nonnio and Nonnia will be asking where he is and why didn't he come with me and they'll worry that something happened and their feelings will be hurt. And I want him to come. But as soon as everyone sees him, my cousins, my aunt, and uncles they're going to talk. Because no one outside of the family gets a sweater like that until they've married into the family and sometimes even then it's like....delayed. Nonnia sometimes, she doesn't like people, she's hard to please and she won't make one for people until like they've been married for a while. So the fact Johnny was sent one now, before we even have been dating a year? I just turned 19, Johnny's 18, like no one this young gets these sweaters. And Nonnia sent me one that matches. It's like she's saying I expect both of you to show up in these and everyone will know. Like the whole family will take one look, and the fact they're matching? My parents got matching sweaters for their fifth wedding anniversary. Before that-Nonnia is like skipping ahead and it's sweet and terrifying. I like that she and Nonnio like Johnny. But that's a lot of pressure to put on a relationship. Because Johnny's only met them and Louie Jr. and it's-"

Johnny gently turned Daniel towards him, pulling on him gently.

"Okay, a bigger deal than I thought," he said.

He was pink, ears burning red.

The guys were quiet.

"But it's fine."

"It's fine?" Daniel squeaked. "How's it fine? Like we can't get married, so like is that why Nonnia made them? I don't know what she's thinking. Like maybe after a couple of years. Sure we live together, but we live with Mr. Miyagi. We've only known each other for a year and we were awful to each other at first-"

Johnny pulled Daniel closer, into his arms, resting his chin on top of Daniel's head.

"I guess I've got to go to Nonnio's birthday, should I pretend we're married around your cousins? Or partners I guess is what- is that what people call it?"

"How are you so calm? Why aren't you refusing to come with me? It's weird. I told Ma, it's a lot, even she knows it's a lot. That it's weird. But Nonnia was adament. Nonnia has like 5 other sweaters that she was supposed to make and she made you one and one for me. I already have a sweater. I didn't need another. But she made me one anyway."

Johnny hummed thoughtfully and Daniel frowned. How was he not freaking out? Anyone would be freaking out. Running for the hills. Daniel wanted to run for the hills. He also wanted to watch his family bicker and get jealous over the fact his Nonnia liked Johnny that much. But he expected Johnny to freak out.

"Wow," Jimmy said softly. "I thought my family was complicated."

"Right?" Dutch said with a laugh. "Man I always thought my parents would put pressure on my relationships. I never even fathomed someone's grandparents being the people you have to impress."

Daniel pressed at Johnny trying to push away, to look at him, to give him an out, a chance to escape what was bound to be a weird family event.

Johnny pulled back only a little, gazing at him, he didn't look uncomfortable or panicked. Not like he was going to run which Daniel had expected. Had thought he'd have that startled deer in headlights look.

"I guess I'm just too charming for the LaRusso family," he said with a grin. "Your grandparents want to keep me."

"Yeah, for me," Daniel said.

How was he fine with it? It wasn't just an ego boost. It wasn't just a light thing. They expected Johnny to stick around. A long time, with Daniel. And Daniel wanted that but, the future wasn't promised.

What if Kreese and Silver and Barnes got their wish?

What if the tournament left Daniel broken beyond repair?

What if Johnny got hurt again?

What if something happened down the road?

It wasn't a simple stamp of approval. There was more to it.

Daniel sighed pressing his forehead into Johnny's chest.

"Well you are my favorite LaRusso," Johnny said. "Wouldn't go with any other."

"The only other one you've met is Louie Jr."

"Like I said, you're my favorite."

"Do you not get how big of a deal this is?"

"I get it. What does Nonnio want for his birthday?"

"I don't know. Ma usually gets him something from the both of us."

"Well, that won't fly anymore."

"What do you mean?"

"Well now that Nonnia has made us a unit, then it's got to be from us. We've got to pick something out. That's how that stuff works right?"

Daniel hadn't even thought of that. He'd planned to just let his mother pick something. But Johnny was right. Maybe he should skip it this year. Send Nonnio a card from the hospital after the tournament. Maybe he'd let Barnes get a bunch of good hits in so that he'd have an excuse not to go. No, if he did Barnes would kill him.

"What's he like?" Bobby asked.

"Saltwater taffy," Johnny said.

"You should take something from California," Tommy said.

"We'll help you pick something out."

"Gotta make a good impression on your new family," Dutch said with a laugh.

They started talking about potential gifts, each passing out ideas and Daniel looked at Johnny, smiling and no longer blushing. It'd been something overwhelming, something he thought might scare Johnny off, or make him uncomfortable. But he was taking it in stride, like it was fine, not a problem, totally normal for a large Italian family in New Jersey to adopt you as family before you even started dating their grandson. Johnny's hand found his again, giving it a gentle squeeze and Daniel relaxed. It would be fun. They would make it fun.

Chapter End Notes

Cookie dough cake

You Still Have Time

Johnny grabbed a 6 pack of beers from the Avanti and the board game Clue that he shoved under his other arm. He eyed his go bag and his bonsai, but his arms were too full, he'd have to come back, before walking up to the beach house.

It was quiet.

Only one other car in the lot.

He walked up the painted steps to the house and shifted everything in his arms to push the doorbell.

Tommy opened the door.

Usually, he was dressed nicely. 364 out of 365 days Tommy cared about how he looked, how he was perceived. But not today.

Never this specific day.

He stared at Johnny for a moment then stepped ever so slightly out of the way.

Johnny headed to the kitchen to put the beer in the fridge, knowing there was an 80% chance it was full of Chinese food.

Tommy followed him listlessly and Johnny looked around, to see if there was anything he needed to do, anything that could be done.

"Didn't think you'd come this year," Tommy said softly.

"I'm your ride," Johnny said.

"Where's Daniel?"

"At his mom's."

They'd spent the weekend helping Mrs. LaRusso set up her new apartment. Taking everything from Jimmy's to her new place, putting everything in its new spot.

Though Laura, was unhappy Mrs. LaRusso was moving so far away. Complained that there was a perfectly nice empty lot only like a block away from her house.

He was pretty sure she was just going to miss the company. The girl's night sleepovers, having a wine buddy who could cook so well and who was fun to talk to. He had to remind her multiple times that it was better than Newark. She was really only ten minutes away.

He had to tell her to put her wallet away when she said she could just buy the lot, in case Lucille changes her mind.

It was a nice apartment. Two bedrooms, two baths, with its own terrace garden that she was excited to grow herbs on, an actual pool that Daniel was delighted by, and plenty of space. One of the first things to celebrate, after cooking them all dinner in her new kitchen as thanks, was to have Daniel over for the night.

"Why didn't you go with?" Tommy asked.

"He hasn't had alone time with his mom since before summer. They need time to themselves," Johnny said.

Daniel had stood awkwardly in their room asking if Johnny would be okay for the night without him. Johnny had been trying to figure out how to explain he wasn't going to be there that night either.

He just smiled and told Daniel he'd be fine, teased him asking if Daniel would be okay if he needed to take the whale plush with him.

Daniel had said he could sleep by himself, but he did pack the whale shark into the Ford.

Johnny had helped him carry his stuff out to the car leaning against the door as Daniel faltered. Excited to spend time with his mother, not wanting to leave Johnny, worried about Mr. Miyagi. Johnny had leaned over and kissed him. Told him to have fun with his mom. They had a lot to catch up on. That everything would be fine. To not worry. Teased him for a moment when he looked back at Johnny breathless from the kiss if he wanted Johnny to grab one of the magazines, in case he was worried he'd forget what Johnny looked like.

Daniel had flushed bright red, smacking Johnny's arm without any real strength to it. He knew Daniel was taking the photos from Okinawa to show his mom, the photos from New York, stuff that his mom had missed. But he recovered quickly pulling Johnny in for another kiss. "I told you now that I've had the real thing I don't need it anymore. I've got enough memorized and in my memory to outshine those."

There was something in that tone that sent a shiver down Johnny's spine, Daniel grinning when he pulled away again, another quick kiss a sweet see you later before driving off.

"Want to go now or do you want to start with Clue?" Johnny asked turning to Tommy.

"Clue," Tommy said.

Clue was meant to be played with a minimum of three players, but Johnny and Tommy had figured out a system years ago to up the challenge for when it was just the two of them, during this yearly tradition. It just required them to dump about a third of the deck into a mystery pile as they played.

Johnny carried the board out to the table near the balcony and set up the game.

Tommy sunk heavily across from him, grabbing a blanket and wrapping it around himself watching Johnny set up the board silently.

There was one other tradition that he had to get over.

The answer was always no even though Johnny never understood why.

"Want me to call the guys?"

Tommy was quiet. As quiet as he always was, every year. Probably as quiet as he had been those years before they'd become friends.

Their first year of being friends Tommy hadn't shown up for their hang-out time and he'd asked the guys who'd shrugged, too into their game at the arcade.

They all went to different schools.

Didn't know each other's schedules, had other friends and other responsibilities.

Maybe he's got homework.

Could be grounded.

Probably got sick, you know how late he stays reading those mystery novels.

But Johnny got worried.

Tommy planned a lot of things and was so organized that it seemed strange that he wasn't there. He'd gone to Tommy's aunt and uncle's house and Tommy wasn't there. His aunt quietly shook her head, not telling him where he was, just saying no when he asked if Tommy was home.

Johnny had been to the beach house once before, so he took the bus to the nearest stop and walked the rest of the way to the private beach, around the security gate and he knocked.

He hadn't known what to expect. Figured Tommy probably wasn't there.

Maybe he was out with other friends.

Maybe there'd been a book signing that he got tickets to last minute.

Maybe he'd found cooler friends.

The door had been unlocked and open, the late December wind whistling through the house.

Johnny had gone in, not even thinking about it.

Not even realizing how stupid it was to walk into a house with the doors open.

He didn't want to start a mystery novel in his life, but he was worried.

He found Tommy sitting on the balcony looking out at the ocean.

"Hey, you okay?" Johnny had asked, knowing immediately the answer was no.

His shoulders were too slumped, too pulled inward. Too pale.

Tommy had jumped but didn't turn to face Johnny.

Johnny sat down next to him out on the balcony, letting his legs hang over the edge. They'd sat silently next to one another watching the tide and the horizon.

"Want me to call the guys?" Johnny had asked after a while.

Tommy had whirled wide-eyed, panicked. "No!"

Johnny had known Tommy had been crying. But it was starker when he turned to face him.

There were things you didn't feel like sharing sometimes. Large gaping wounds that even after years of being alone you didn't trust other people around. Johnny had understood at the time. But now he thought Kreese had exasperated it. Had made it seem like asking for help, for asking for a shoulder to cry on, for people to be there was a weakness. And that's why they all held so much in. Why Dutch never mentioned how much it hurt that his parents weren't ever home. Why Bobby didn't complain about losing the number one student position to Johnny or the pressure he was under at home to be a good older brother and how Jimmy had struggled for so long to tell his parents he didn't want to take over the family business.

"Maybe later," Tommy said quietly in front of him, bringing the blanket up over his head.

It was a first. A first that Tommy would let this spread past the two of them. That maybe the guys would know.

He wondered if it was because of Daniel. Because he'd seen how they were with him. Because they'd shown that despite everything Kreese had tried to teach them, that it hadn't all stuck. That they'd shaken a lot of it off. Had snuck a bunch of stuff that Kreese never would've approved into their lives, into their friendship.

They played a round of Clue, Johnny getting up partway through to get Tommy a cold beer popping off the cap and flicking it into the trash on the other side of the room. The ghost of a smile on Tommy's lips.

"You remember when I got stung by a jellyfish?" Tommy asked taking a sip.

"Yes," Johnny said.

It'd been one of the first times Tommy had invited him over. It'd just been him like Tommy was testing the waters of friendship. Trying to figure it out. They'd raced on the beach and Tommy ran into the water and let out a howl of pain. Johnny had rushed after him.

"You carried me out, hotwired my uncle's car, and drove me to hospital."

He hadn't been old enough to drive yet. Hadn't had a license. His bike had been totaled by Sid.

He hadn't gotten his motorbike yet, it was all Johnny could think to do.

He'd read how to hotwire a car in a book at the library. That and how to pick a lock.

He'd studied it in case he needed to make a getaway.

But instead, he used it to steal his friend's uncle's car to get him to the hospital.

Lifeguards usually had kits to deal with jellyfish stings, but Johnny hadn't known that at the time, hadn't dated the lifeguard yet. Though because it was a private beach there wasn't a lifeguard.

In hindsight, it'd been very stupid. He should've called Tommy's uncle and told him what had happened, but he'd panicked. It was one of the things that had earned him ace degenerate. Hotwiring a car and stealing it.

Tommy had told all the guys and it'd become a bigger thing.

He'd returned it, apologized to Tommy's uncle who'd stared at him in shock as he explained what had happened at the hospital, telling him how he'd gotten them there.

He'd expected Tommy's uncle to tell him to never come around again. That he wasn't welcome. But his hand had come down on his shoulder.

"That was dangerous," he'd said.

Johnny was used to the hands on his shoulders being bad. Sid trying to crush his shoulder beneath his hand, Kreese's fingers digging in.

"I'm glad you both got here in one piece and you got him here so fast. Next time, you can call emergency services, but a man of action makes a good leader, a good friend."

Johnny had been stunned. Tommy's uncle wasn't going to tell Sid. Wasn't all fire and fury and pissed. And when Tommy's aunt arrived all worried in tears she'd thrown her arms around the both of them.

He'd expected to be yelled at.

No one did.

Instead, they bought him dinner, and then four of them had it in Tommy's hospital room.

It was how Johnny had met the lifeguard he'd dated that one summer. By taking lifeguard training so he'd know what to do. Learning how to remove the stingers from the wound, how to properly clean it, how to know whether it required a trip to an emergency room or if it didn't.

"It was so vastly different from the time you got stung," Tommy said with a sigh, hand around the beer. "You were out in the water then quietly came out and beelined straight to my uncle who was on the balcony. All of us were setting up for lunch and you said, 'Sir I've been stung by a jellyfish.' Calm as could be. Which I don't know how because it hurts like hell. But I think I know why now. After this summer."

Johnny lowered his gaze to the board. He'd learned long before Sid how to hide his pain, how to not cry when he got hurt, because it always drew more attention. More ire. He'd just perfected it with Sid and Kreese. How to swallow that pain deeper.

Tommy moved on to his second beer. Handing it over to Johnny to open, watching the cap fly through the air before taking it back.

"I brought flowers," Johnny said.

"Thanks," Tommy said, voice small and tight.

It had taken four hours of sitting on the balcony that first year for Tommy to move on. For Tommy to realize Johnny wasn't going to budge. That his patience had no end, that he wasn't going back to playing arcade games with the guys. That he knew something was wrong.

He'd gotten up, put on his shoes, and shoved his hands into his pockets and Johnny had followed.

It was a long walk.

Too long from the beach house, up the winding roads, walking along the sidewalk, head down to the cemetery.

Loving parents

Johnny had taken in the dates, did the math. Tommy had been young. They'd been young. The same day.

"Car crash," Tommy said quietly.

The first thing he'd said in hours.

Johnny stood next to him as Tommy stared hard down at the stone, at the words, crying as quietly as he could, trying to make it seem like he wasn't. Johnny eventually reached out and pulled him into a hug. He'd been unsure for too long, unsure whether to hug him or not. Whether a guy who spent the day alone, away from his family, who kept it from his friends would want a hug. But it'd helped. Uncorked something.

Johnny came back every year. Met Tommy at the beach house. Brought Clue or a board game, something to do while Tommy worked up the courage for his visit. When he got his Honda XL 600R he drove Tommy there. Then would drive him in the Avanti.

He learned that his aunt and uncle stocked the fridge with food, knowing Tommy wanted to be alone that day, to mourn and to take his time, their numbers tacked up on the fridge, a reminder that they were there if he wanted them there. But he never called.

It was one year after too many beers that Tommy told him his biggest fear, why he spent most of it alone, why he didn't tell his friends, why he hadn't told his classmates.

"I'm scared that one day it'll just be me. That everyone will leave and I'll be dying all alone with no one around to visit or care and I'll die forgotten, out of time before I should be."

Johnny had grabbed his hand. "You won't be alone."

"My aunt and uncle are the only family I have left. There's no guarantee that they'll be around forever-one day-"

"You can't get rid of me."

Tommy had looked at him so startled.

"I'll be there."

"What if we stop being friends?"

"Never."

"What if we don't see each other for a long time?"

"Then call. I'll come immediately. No matter what."

Tommy had looked stunned.

All the arguments dying on his lips.

Johnny had been serious.

Even if they'd drifted apart if Tommy needed him if any of the guys needed him he'd make it.

He'd get there.

But he hoped it never became that.

He hoped that he'd see them more. That they wouldn't drift apart. And now he knew they wouldn't. He knew he'd see Tommy often. That Daniel wouldn't let it happen. The guys wouldn't let it happen. They were all holding onto one another too tightly to let it happen. And maybe Tommy got that now too. Understood it when he said maybe.

Tommy won and after his third beer, he gave Johnny a nod. "Okay. This year...call them."

Johnny nodded, hand going warmly to Tommy's shoulder, before getting up and calling. He wouldn't tell them why they needed to be there. That was for Tommy to tell them when he wanted when he was ready. But he told them to come, to bring beer. That there was plenty of Chinese food. Maybe they'd spend the night so to bring something to sleep in. Then he sat down next to Tommy an arm around his shoulder.

"I thought I wanted to be a detective," Tommy said quietly as he held one of the cards in his hand. "I wanted to solve mysteries. But I think I don't want to do that anymore."

"No?" Johnny asked.

"I think I want to be someone who makes bigger changes, a bigger impact, who has more say in the world we live in."

"Yeah?"

"I liked student government. I think-I think I may try and do something similar."

"FBI still solves cases."

Tommy let out a sound that sounded amused, dropping the card on the table. "I'll think about it."

"Figuring out your identity?"

"Yeah. I hate that class. Because they want you to be honest. Which means I tell them...I write...I say... that I'm an orphan. I don't feel like an orphan. It's a technicality. I have my aunt and uncle. But I also don't have...It's just a lot of the little boxes they want to categorize us in, some of it's...painful. I've rewritten my final paper thirty-five times. I don't know what to write. Hello, I'm Thomas, I go by Tommy. I'm a college freshman who likes detective novels and I'm an orphan. It sounds like AA."

Tommy lifted his beer and wrinkled his nose with a frown.

"Tommy, student council member of his high school. Organized planner, well-loved by his classmates, popular with the girls even though he rarely dated any of them because he was worried about losing their friendship and he's a bit of a perfectionist. He likes detective novels and solving mysteries and thought he wanted to be a private detective like Batman he has decided maybe he wants to work on bigger problems with the government. He's studied karate and is a great friend whose observant and shows up. He's going to do great at whatever he picks and if he doesn't get too worried, too scared, then he's going to make tons of new friends in college, and watch out he's probably going to be your valedictorian. You should sign up now for his study groups, you'll want to have said you knew him when."

Tommy laughed, a real laugh brushing away tears with his palms.

"I'm sure the other guys are also struggling with that project," Johnny said softly.

"You think? They've known what they wanted to do. Jimmy's wanted to be a lawyer for a while and Bobby's wanted to be a pastor. Their family...their lines are a little stronger you know? Hell, even Dutch knows who he is."

"You're 19 Tommy. You're not meant to fully know who you are yet. You're still at the beginning of your story. You're not even a fourth of the way through. There's still so much to learn about who you are and who you want to be. And yeah, it's different, it sucks. It really does suck, and if you're not ready to talk about it, not to an impersonal class of 1000 or so then you don't have to. They can't make you. You can leave that in the drafts for yourself to explore. You don't need to cut yourself up and show your wounds to your classmates or your teacher or anyone if you don't want to. Except maybe a doctor or professional if it gets bad. Only people you like or trust and in your own time. The point of the class, in my opinion, after having read your reading and syllabus and listening to you all, is to try and better understand who you are because you're on your own for the first time.

"You're not living with your aunt and uncle. You're not surrounded by people you've always known, your classmates who've known you since you were little. You're one in the crowd now. You're not part of the student council, you're no longer under the same scrutiny or pressure. You can discover who you want to be, what you want to do. You may realize that you were wearing masks. That you were doing things because everyone else was, or there are parts of yourself you hid away but didn't realize it was actually okay, just because you hadn't found the right people, or the right space to spread out, to take up space.

"I think they want you to claim the parts of yourself your proud of. To stand tall and say this is who I am. But no one needs to know everything. You can stand in that spotlight and say "I kicked ass in student council, organizing a trip to New York City with a bunch of kids from California, no one got lost and no one got left behind because they couldn't afford it." Because that is badass Tommy. We had 100% attendance on the senior trip because you made sure everyone came. You can say "I was unanimously voted prom king by my entire grade" because everyone knew how much work you put in because you knew everyone in our class. You talked to everyone, even people who you didn't particularly like. You still listened to them. You put the work in, the effort and it came back. It crowned you king. You don't have to say that when you were little your parents got into a car crash and died. You don't have to tell them that you're hurting or scared. You can take your time to deal with that. You have time. It may take your whole life, but you keep putting one foot in front of the other, you keep your head up, even on days when it's hard, and when it's too hard you know I've got you, that we've got you. Because that's how it works. We know you've got us if things go bad, and you need to know we're there too."

"Damnit, Johnny." Tommy sniffed.

Johnny smiled squeezing his shoulder gently. "And they're all going to be here too. Because you asked."

"I never asked you to be here," Tommy whispered.

"I know. But you can't get rid of me," Johnny said.

"Even though we're not cobras?"

"Especially because we're no longer cobras."

Tommy nodded thoughtfully sipping at his beer.

"What would you write?"

"Me?"

"Yeah, ace degenerate," Tommy said with a soft laugh.

"It depends on the audience I guess. To myself, after Okinawa, it was: not as evil as I thought I was."

Tommy turned to him eyes wide. "You are not evil."

"I was pretty brutal for a while there."

"But evil, Johnny that's, that's harsher- you never, a guy-" Tommy was stumbling, offended on Johnny's behalf. He smacked Johnny's shoulder. "Seriously that's what you thought?"

"Yeah," Johnny said. "Between Sid saying I was worthless and Kreese- when Ali broke up with me and how I hurt Daniel-"

"You carried me to the hospital! You showed up every year and sat with me even when I didn't say anything, even when I told you not to tell anyone, evil people don't do that. An-an evil person would've told Kreese or the guys and I would've been made fun of, but you didn't- you never said a word."

"That's why it depends on my audience."

"But you are an important audience to yourself! You need to be kinder to yourself!"

"I'm working on it. Things have been better. That's why I said after Okinawa. I needed that. I needed a chance to leave what I was used to. I guess kind of like college for you guys. A chance to be somewhere where almost no one knew me and had a chance to actually know me. And now I feel like I have a better handle on it. Especially after you guys helped my mom. After she divorced Sid. That was like a sack of bricks sitting on my chest constantly."

"Anytime," Tommy said.

Johnny turned to him, tilting his head so Tommy's eyes met his. "Same for me, being here, anytime."

He heard the sound of cars coming up the lane and Tommy scrubbed at his face.

Johnny got up to open the door.

Bobby looked at him, a million questions in his eyes, followed by Jimmy and Dutch but Johnny didn't say a word just holding the door open.

At least this year there'd be more people to play Clue together. They wouldn't have to keep cutting out part of the deck.

Jimmy was carrying a bunch of beer that he carried off to the fridge.

"Damn that's a lot of Chinese food."

Tommy slowly made his way towards them sitting down at the island in the kitchen.

Johnny got a glass and filled it with water, setting it down in front of him.

"You sure you don't want me to cook you something, Tommy? I could get steaks, grill something," Jimmy said.

"Maybe next year," Tommy said softly.

Johnny smiled, gently patting his shoulder and sitting down next to him. It'd take time to heal, especially such an old deep wound and it'd never go away, but it needed to be cared after, and this, all of this was a good step. One in the right direction.

They played another round of Clue, ate Chinese food, and then Tommy stood up turning to Johnny.

"Ready."

Johnny nodded putting on his red leather jacket and grabbing his keys to the Avanti.

The guys followed quietly and Tommy sat up front holding the bouquet, the bonsai on his lap, glancing at it then at Johnny like maybe he got it. Understood the comfort of the weight of a tree you can hold in your hands, in your lap. Something small and ancient, alive in the purest way.

The guys sat quietly in the back, talking softly about school, about taekwondo as Johnny drove the road he'd taken for the last five years, once a year with Tommy.

It wasn't his road, it wasn't his path, but sometimes it helped to have someone take that road with you. Sometimes it just helped to have someone silently next to you when you needed it, to know you weren't alone, that you were seen.

He parked and followed Tommy up that familiar path, standing a little away while Tommy visited. While the guys read the tombstone, did the math just like Johnny had, how long it had been that he'd held that pain in on his own. That they hadn't ever asked or talked about. Had known instinctively not to pry, to just wait. Until Tommy turned, the smallest sliver of an invitation, and they surrounded him, pulling him into a warm comforting embrace. One Johnny was sure he'd needed for a long time but was just too hurt to reach out for it, too worried about being weak with the words of Kreese in his head, too worried about ending up alone. But he wasn't. They weren't. They had each other. They'd sit together and eat Chinese food at the beach house and they'd play Clue and they'd spend the night and they'd be there, whenever he fell, to turn around and take his hand, to help him back up. Just like they did for each other, every step of the way. Year after year.

Strike First! Strike Hard! No Mercy!

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Daniel couldn't sleep. Johnny had fallen asleep, at least for part of the night, until Daniel had sat up, frustrated, unable to sleep. It seemed to wake up Johnny who looked at him bleary-eyed.

"The tournament?"

He supposed it was obvious. Everything else in his life was great.

His mother was back home and she had a new apartment that was warm and cozy and better than the apartment at South Seas. He'd even gotten to see her at least once a week.

They'd closed on an apartment of their own for after the tournament, one that his mother, Ms. Lawrence and Mr. Miyagi had given their stamp of approval on when they'd narrowed down the possibilities. It had been fun to see the look on the realtor's face when they showed up with the three of them.

Soon they'd have their own space and then it'd just be Johnny and him. Together. No one they knew on the other end of the walls. And they could do anything.

He had friends.

He saw Ali at least once a month.

He talked to Jessica on the phone for an hour at least once a month.

He got postcards from Kumiko.

The guys came by often. He saw Dutch almost daily.

The guys had even offered to spend the night, offered to spend the week, so he wouldn't feel alone in that time leading up to the tournament. But Daniel already felt like he was suffocating and the only thing that helped was kata with Mr. Miyagi and holding onto Johnny and feeling grounded.

But it was the night before. The night before the final end of this nightmare that had been dumped on his lap.

He hadn't wanted it.

He wanted it gone.

He didn't know what would happen.

Would he have to lie about his age to get in?

Johnny rubbed soothing circles on his back, had offered just about anything to help with the stress and Daniel hated that he'd turned him down, but he couldn't enjoy it. Couldn't focus on him. He told Johnny that they'd do something when it was over. They'd go somewhere or break in their new apartment. Which was a weird way to say it but even though it'd been odd Johnny had still gotten the message and blushed.

Now though Johnny's arm had wrapped around his waist as he was moving, sitting up, pulling Daniel against him.

"You'll be fine," Johnny said softly.

"Will I be?" Daniel whispered. "Will we all be? They're going to crush me so they can open more dojos, so they can erase Mr. Miyagi, torment him, and they-they said they were going to kill you."

"I'm not scared," Johnny said.

"I am!"

"It's okay. It's okay to be scared," Johnny said. "But you got to keep moving."

Daniel sighed.

He was sure Johnny had lived in fear for most of his life, always kept moving, he ran when in a dangerous situation unless he got backed into a corner until Kreese got his hands on him and trained him to fight instead.

Daniel went to fight mode first. Came up swinging. But he was scared he'd freeze instead and then it'd be over.

He buried his head against Johnny.

"I only won one of those fights, really, and even then, barely."

He meant the tournament and the deathmatch.

Chozen hadn't put his all in.

It'd been a show and now that Daniel knew, his confidence had been flagging.

He was pissed.

He was also terrified.

Would just get rooted in the spot as he realized what awaited him?

It'd be like the other tournament but worse.

He didn't know how but it would be.

He feared it'd be a blood bath.

"You've improved so much, you just need to trust yourself," Johnny said, fingers still running up and down his back. "But you need some rest before a tournament."

Daniel got that, but sleeping wasn't easy. His mind was going every which way.

Reminding him that technically the crane kick had been illegal so he hadn't even really won against Johnny.

He doubted Silver would let him get away with that again.

That Chozen had faked his loss.

Johnny hummed a thoughtful note before leaning back, wiggling out of his t-shirt. He set it aside in the bed and Daniel stared at him. Didn't he remember that Daniel could barely focus his static-y panicked mind and couldn't enjoy anything? That the whole tournament had ruined everything? Made him a stressed guy who could barely focus?

He'd burnt eggs yesterday morning. Eggs!

Johnny pulled him back in, back into his arms, shifting down and laying down, taking Daniel with him, running his fingers through Daniel's hair.

"Breathe Daniel," Johnny said softly. "You can't do anything about it right now."

Daniel wanted to protest, wanted to say that thinking helped, if he could just think of a solution, some way out then it'd be okay.

He was thinking about running to Mexico with Johnny and Mr. Miyagi. Kiss their nice new apartment goodbye.

But the arms around him were holding tight, biceps.

Daniel put his hand on Johnny's arm feeling the taut muscle.

He ran his fingers along his arm, pressing in occasionally, there was no give, not like normal.

It wasn't soft, squishy, he was flexing.

Daniel had once thought he was a peacock and that Johnny was something else because they weren't on the same wavelength, Johnny couldn't tell that Daniel was flirting.

But this was almost like a peacock, sending up those colorful feathers. Instead of feathers though he was flexing his muscles that Daniel liked. He ran his fingers along his arm he was flexing almost all of them, his pecs, his abs.

Daniel ran his fingers over his skin.

If Daniel didn't love it, he'd consider it unfair.

Unfair that he was the one doing all the training and he wasn't decked out in hard muscle.

Johnny spent his time sitting in a garden oasis reading and was still built like a marble statue. Like the statue of David in Florence. Or better. Well worth a whole city throwing a fit that he'd been secured into a museum safely and demanding a beautiful replica for them to look at, to gaze upon still.

He glanced up at Johnny saw the amusement in his eyes in the moonlight.

"Maybe in each of our fights I should've just taken off my shirt," Johnny said.

Daniel's face burned.

Would he have fought Johnny if when they went to fight on the beach if he'd not been wearing a shirt? If he'd seen all that muscle hiding under that red leather jacket?

His mouth went dry.

Maybe.

Maybe he would've still rolled around in the sand with him, not realizing why he had to get closer, why he felt a need to touch the tough angry blonde.

A need to play with fire, to let it lick his fingertips until they burned, as long as he got to touch to his heart's content.

He buried his head against Johnny's chest.

"A dangerous idea."

Would Daniel have gone weak in the knees?

Or would he have pounced?

Both, probably both.

He might've still sucker-punched him though. Ruining any chance at that moment.

He listened to Johnny's steady heartbeat, his steady breathing.

He smelled like his soap, his shampoo, his aftershave. A combination that Daniel enjoyed.

He liked the way the muscle felt under his hand, his fingertips, his palm. He wondered what Johnny did that kept him in such good shape. He babysat and worked at an animal sanctuary and at the bonsai shop. He'd seen Johnny return from the garden shop with soil slung over his shoulder a couple times a week.

Was that it? It couldn't be.

He wanted to figure out all of Johnny's secrets. How he worked. He wanted to stop by the animal sanctuary and see him with the animals. See him with the kids he babysat.

He yawned. Let his eyes shut, just for a moment, running his hands over Johnny's muscles. After. After it was all over he'd enjoy it more. In the light of their new apartment. On the couch, they'd picked out. In the kitchen. Their bed, maybe in the shower or bath, heck why not both?

The arm around him felt comforting, safe, the hand in his hair was soothing.

The panicked rhythm of his heart had slowed.

He breathed.

Daniel woke up surprised he'd fallen asleep.

He looked at Johnny, muscles no longer taunt but relaxed as he held him in his sleep.

Daniel didn't want to move. Gently poking around at Johnny at the relaxed muscle that gave way under his fingertips.

He didn't need another trophy.

He had something better.

He had this and he didn't want to go.

He didn't want to put on his gi, the black belt from Sato and Chozen, his hachimaki from Mr. Miyagi.

He didn't want to go to the All-Valley.

He wanted to stay in Johnny's arms, safe and secure.

He kissed the skin near his face, Johnny's sternum.

One more hurdle.

One more fight and then...then he hoped he'd be free. Free to start his life.

Johnny had been collecting trade schools and college pamphlets with good business programs, things and places he could study, where he could apprentice. He just hadn't had the mental space to look at them yet.

But he could kiss him. He wanted that. To put it off a little longer, so he pushed himself up, wiggling a little out of the loose grip, and kissed Johnny's forehead, his nose, his cheeks, waiting for those blue eyes to bat open, to fall upon him, to take him in. And then there he was, waking up, stretching underneath him, shifting with a yawn and the arms wrapping around him again, finding his waist once more.

Daniel leaned down and kissed him.

Johnny kissed him back sleepily, waking up more.

He pulled away and grinned when Johnny's blue eyes were looking up at him.

He cupped the side of Johnny's face, he hadn't thought he'd sleep through the night. Figured he'd be too wired until it was over and then he'd either be in the hospital or he'd pass out. But even though his nerves were starting to rev up again there was something about Johnny holding him close that had helped. That reminder that Terry Silver and John Kreese wouldn't get all that they wanted. Not without a fight and that Johnny wouldn't take it. Not any more. And neither would Daniel. And he remembered that Johnny had his own plan. Something to help.

"Can I get a hint?" Daniel asked.

"About what?" Johnny asked letting his head fall heavily back on the pillow like he was disappointed that Daniel had moved too far away to kiss.

"Your plan."

"No."

"Why not?"

"You've got enough on your mind, enough on your plate. You should focus."

Daniel lowered himself down, lips barely brushing against Johnny's. "I know what I want to focus on."

Pink blossomed, spread, slowly reddened and Daniel grinned.

"There are better things to focus on don't you think? So why don't you add something else for me to focus on," Daniel added.

"Sneaky," Johnny muttered. "No, but just, I don't know, you might not like it, so like just don't get mad."

Mad? What could Johnny do to make him mad?

"See? This is why I didn't want to say anything, I can see the gears working."

Johnny looked bummed like he'd been tricked into sharing his last cookie with someone.

Daniel leaned down and kissed him. He hadn't had a lot of focus, a lot of energy, but maybe he could get something going, quick, simple, and absolutely so pleasant that it'd hopefully get Daniel through, release some of the tension in his shoulders until he got home again with Johnny.

The first time Daniel had walked into the All-Valley he'd been overwhelmed.

Neither he nor Mr. Miyagi knew how it worked.

They didn't understand the point system.

Nothing.

He'd thought Mr. Miyagi had known, it'd been his idea after all. Had been so shocked he hadn't known. That Ali had to fill them in on everything.

He hadn't even had a black belt.

Now as he stood next to Mr. Miyagi watching the matches he cringed. Barnes was giving him a preview. The way he was brutalizing his opponents. He heard the ref give a warning, no more groin shots.

Daniel had plans he wanted to accomplish that night, but it sounded like if Barnes got his way he'd be sitting with an ice pack between his legs rather than anything else. Just like these other poor guys.

Maybe it'd be karma for that cheap shot he gave Chozen in Okinawa. But this was worse.

It kept happening.

Despite the ref's warnings, Silver and Kreese were laughing on the other side of the mat delighted in Mike Barnes's brutality. And they had the gull to be handing out stupid yellow t-shirts like it was a professional sports game. Like anyone would want their stupid t-shirts.

They called Silver up to the stage to talk and Daniel felt his blood boil.

Everything he said was fake.

But the crowd was eating it up.

Just like the dumb t-shirts.

"I've always lived my life by the rule that if you get you give."

Bullshit.

Silver gave nothing.

He hoarded his own wealth.

The t-shirts he was giving out were to try and entice people to like him.

It was all a ploy.

The only get to give ratio was the fact Daniel had won last time and now Silver was getting revenge. Even though it didn't make sense because Daniel had won against Johnny. And not in a battle against Kreese. Hadn't even known Silver existed.

Daniel couldn't listen to it anymore, turning angrily to Mr. Miyagi.

"It's all lies Mr. Miyagi. All of it! He doesn't mean any of this."

"Hai Daniel-san," Mr. Miyagi said with a nod.

"Today it's time for me to give back," Silver's voice continued.

"Really Mr. Miyagi? Now he's going to give back? He looks like he's being the nice guy right but he's not. He's not."

"-Sensei Kreese-"

"I can't Mr. Miyagi. Great? He's not great. He lied. Said the guy was dead. He tried to kill Johnny. Twice. He shouldn't even be here. He should be banned for life. They all should."

Terry Silver stopped his prowling of the mat, with his microphone walking towards Daniel, eyes on him as he spoke.

"Honesty, Compassion, and fair play," Silver said with a grin.

It was all lies. Nothing he said was true.

He had a fake persona for the people in the audience, for those in the tournament, but Daniel knew now.

Daniel knew it was all lies, it was all fake and Silver wanted nothing more than to watch him squirm, to see him in pain.

Daniel didn't want to be there.

Couldn't believe people were cheering on the bastard.

The referee started to explain the new rules as he walked onto the mat across from Barnes.

Sudden death.

What the hell?

Three minutes of fighting and if it was a tie if there were no points then it'd be sudden death?

Where was he, Okinawa again?

Based on the laughter in Silver's eyes this was the point.

They were going to torture him for three minutes and then win.

He felt fear flood through his veins.

That was it wasn't it?

They were going to draw this out.

Take a point, lose a point.

Daniel ran out of the ring the first time Barnes came kicking after him.

The second time he tried to defend, lost a point, and then felt his heart sink.

Barne's would have to do something unsportsmanlike, and sure enough a kick to the groin sent him to the ground.

This was going to be hell. Three minutes of hell.

He'd have to be fast, faster than he was, but then he wasn't fast enough. Dodging as much as he could until Barnes got his next point and Daniel went down again.

He tried desperately to get a point but his fist barely grazed Barnes as he tumbled to the mat.

Daniel knew something was coming, that point had to disappear somehow. Sure enough, he hopped up and punched Daniel in the face.

When Daniel stood up Barnes was wild, chasing him off the mat and into enemy territory. Daniel didn't realize it until he slammed into Silver's chest

"And now the real pain begins Danny-boy"

He was laughing. Delighted. Having fun.

And he was right, it was grueling.

Barnes was going for hits, lots of hits that didn't count, that won him 0 points, that didn't move the needle or get him disqualified. Though it didn't make any sense why the ref wasn't calling it. Why no one was telling him to stop.

Barnes was drawing it out and Daniel was stumbling as he got back to his feet.

He fell to the mat again as sudden death was declared as Mr. Miyagi flew to his side calling out to him, shouting to reach through beyond the pain to be heard. Louder than Daniel had ever really heard Mr. Miyagi speak.

He told Mr. Miyagi he didn't want to be there, that he was scared, that they should just go home. He wanted to be back in bed with Johnny. Wished he hadn't left that day, hadn't ever gotten out of bed.

"Must not lose to fear!" Mr. Miyagi shouted.

"Yeah well, I'm afraid! I'm afraid of him alright?"

It felt like an understatement. Win or lose Barnes wouldn't leave him alone. Or Silver. And then someone would come after them. And then someone else. Johnny had been right he attracted danger, and it was always worse. He couldn't imagine the person coming after Silver. Whoever Daniel would have to deal with next. It made him feel sick.

"Hey! You stay focused. You train ever since summer. With friends. Work hard. Harder than ever before. You study with everyone. Work hard. Daniel-san you best karate still inside. Now time let out."

Daniel stared at Mr. Miyagi, still hugging his ribs, looking out into the crowd.

He'd waffled about wanting Johnny there. About wanting his mother there.

He knew it'd be bad. Had thought about telling them not to come. But there they were.

Johnny sitting next to the guys. His mother, Ms. Lawrence.

He spotted a girl with curly blonde hair, standing up in the stands, yelling at him to get up to kick that guy's ass.

Ali.

She looked pissed.

He nearly laughed and it hurt.

But she wasn't alone. A redhead was standing next to her. Shouting as well. He could barely hear it over the crowd.

"Kick that slimeballs ass, Daniel!"

Jessica Andrews.

He felt tears prick at his eyes.

She was supposed to be in Ohio.

What was she doing there?

Daniel's eyes turned back through the crowd finding Johnny's blue ones.

His jaw was set like he was struggling to stay seated. Like he wanted to get up and move.

He was sure if he looked close he'd see that the guys were holding Johnny back, keeping him down, in his seat.

Johnny was mouthing something.

Not yelling.

Not shouting.

He wouldn't.

But Daniel knew what he was saying, had studied this lips so much, watched him so closely that he could make out the words from across the room without needing to strain to hear him.

"You know what to do. You've got this."

He focused on it rather than Barnes who had thrown himself down on the mat to yell at him, trying to taunt him back up.

All Daniel had to do was fight.

Johnny had the rest of it covered.

Whatever the rest of it meant.

Daniel got up.

Johnny was right.

Mr. Miyagi was right.

It all fell into place.

He'd been trying to fight in a way that wasn't him.

He knew what to do.

He had to do what grounded him, what was the base of his karate.

Kata.

Barnes looked at him wide-eyed like he didn't understand what Daniel was doing.

Like it scared him.

Like Daniel knew more than he seemed, which he did.

He just had to wait.

Instead of rushing in, this time he'd let Barnes rush in. All he had to do was be patient. It was one point. Win or lose. Johnny would do whatever was needed next. One point and even if he lost the ref would stop the fight. One hit and it'd be over. He'd made it that far. He just had to breathe and follow the well-worn movements he'd practiced for so long. To be the version of himself, to do the karate that he liked, that Silver had tried to cut out.

Barnes rushed in and it was so easy to see what to do. How to send him falling to the mat. Like in all those books, all the practice with Johnny and the guys, to use the momentum against him and send him to the ground. He got the point. A quick hit, like he almost didn't believe it. But he did it.

He bounced off the mat, holding his injured side and throwing his arm around Mr. Miyagi, pulling him into a hug.

He didn't care.

He knew it wasn't Mr. Miyagi's favorite, but he needed to hug the man.

Finally.

"The winner, defending his title Daniel LaRusso!" the announcer said and Daniel hobbled overtaking the trophy.

Barnes looked up at him and looked about ready to charge. Red and furious.

Daniel felt his heart jump into his throat until a shadow fell on him and Johnny stepped onto the mat in front of him.

"Stay back," Johnny said.

"So kind of you to step out of the crowd, you're next, we may have failed with Daniel, but with you-" Kreese said stepping up onto the mat. "And with all of our dojos-"

Johnny didn't move, didn't budge from where he stood in front of Daniel, blocking Barnes, standing in the way, ignoring Kreese, like he wasn't worried.

Daniel wanted to grab him, pull Johnny away, somewhere safer but instead Silver stepped in, laughing.

"Well Danny boy, so you won the tournament. But that doesn't mean you're rid of us. We'll still open Cobra Kai everywhere. You will know no peace. You or your boyfriend. We will grind you and your sensei to dust."

"It's over Silver," Johnny said moving forward, towards them. Barnes moving back out of the way. "Checkmate."

"Checkmate?" Silver asked incredulously.

"You own a company called Dyantox, right? You may want to call and check in with your board and staff. I heard Dynatox is undergoing a very intense investigation that I think will have it tied up in litigation for...how long Jimmy?"

"Oh decades for sure," Jimmy said. "Until it's run out of funding for sure. What with all the allegations of illegal waste dumping overseas."

Silver looked startled for a mere second before recovering.

"I have dealt with that before, it's all hearsay, after all the DA and I-"

"Oh, I'm sure. But there's also the whole bribing of that DA, a Mr. Cole I believe? I think he's already given a statement about it. Dinners at your mansion I believe. But that's not all," Johnny said turning and holding out his hand to a man walking forward out of the crowd in a suit. "I would like to introduce you to a dear friend. He works with the United States government and our military contracts. He recently told them he wanted to expand stateside and was offered to set up anywhere at all that he wanted. The government told him, to make it easier to just pick an already established dojo and it could be his. For pennies. You would not believe which one he picked. Mr. Silver please meet Mr. Sato, the new owner of Cobra Kai and all of its properties, backed by the United States military."

"That's impossible," Silver said eyes wide.

"You can't do that you little-"

Daniel pulled on Johnny, trying to pull him back and out of the way of Kreese who was red with fury, fists raised, but Johnny stayed rooted in his spot. Before Kreese made it he fell to the ground hard, like all the control he had over himself was gone, like strings suddenly cut on a puppet.

"I guess you are Kreese. I heard you are a very bad teacher. No worry. I will be a much better replacement," Chozen said looking down at Kreese with a frown.

"There's something I'm forgetting," Johnny said thoughtfully. "Oh, right. Mr. Sato, and Chozen are from Okinawa. Their root karate is the same as Mr. Miyagi's. Which means his karate will continue to flourish in the Valley for a very very long time. Long after you both have been forgotten."

"How dare you. Do you have any clue who I am?" Silver asked stepping into Johnny's space, grabbing the front of his shirt.

"A sad old man with too much time on his hands that spent months stalking a 19-year-old?" Dutch asked throwing an arm around Daniel's shoulder.

"A man who broke into and entered the home of a decorated war veteran?" Tommy asked.

"A guy who hired a karate "bad boy" to terrorize and abuse a war veteran and his student? Who trashed their bonsai shop?" Bobby asked.

"A man who threw thousands of dollars to ignore his business and get revenge on an under 18 all valley karate champion for a tournament where you make no money and is only in the Valley?" Jimmy asked.

"A liar, a manipulator, and a man so focused on a petty project that he took his eyes off his defense and failed everything the dojo he owned taught," Johnny said. "But I suppose we should remind our ex sensei and the ex-owner of the creed they taught us, one final time since they seemed to have forgotten it."

"Strike first!"

"Strike hard!"

"No mercy!"

Daniel's ears rang from the shout the ex-cobras gave that echoed through the gymnasium.

"I will get my revenge," Silver hissed.

"You won't. You underestimated Daniel. You underestimated Mr. Miyagi. You underestimated me. You left yourself open and I just did what your dojo taught me," Johnny said.

"You stupid bastard. None of this will stick. You're just a stupid kid, with stupid friends who will be hurt because of you. Because you're worthless, because-"

Chozen punched Kreese in the face.

"Nephew," Sato said with gentle admonishment.

"He talks too much," Chozen said shaking his hand. "That was me trying uncle."

Chozen stepped around Kreese and towards Silver, putting himself between Johnny and Silver.

"You, big guy, not get it yet? You lose. And look your escort arrived."

Silver glared at Chozen, then with worry at Kreese, before turning to see police officers arrive.

"What-?"

"Oh, I forgot to mention," Johnny said holding up a recorder. "When I came to get Daniel out of Cobra Kai, I reordered our whole conversation. The one where you admitted to everything, boasted about your plans, and of course the attempted murder. . It's been passed around. Everywhere. I gave it to the police. And my lawyers or well- my mother's lawyers have a copy for their cases. Your board was given it. The realtors. The board of the All-Valley. The lawyers suing Dyantox. Really I feel like it's a good piece of evidence for your character. You and Kreese."

"You-" Silver said turning, pale, trapped, searching.

He stormed, hands coming towards Johnny, reaching.

Daniel moved, sweeping Silver's leg out from under him, having gone unnoticed, Chozen on Silver's other side, pinching something.

He fell like a sack of bricks.

Johnny stepped back unphased, out of the way.

"You'll just dig yourself deeper. I don't recommend it," Johnny said.

Silver opened his mouth but Daniel didn't pay attention, focusing on Johnny until it was finally over.

Until long after they were hauled away.

Chapter End Notes

Fact about David in Florence was given to me by a tour guide. She told me that the people who lived in the city missed seeing his beauty every day after he was put into a museum that a replica had to be made to keep them happy. He was originally meant to be put on a roof but then was considered too pretty to put so far away from view so he was put outside in a plaza, but then brought inside a museum for safekeeping and it upset everyone to not see him anymore.

Squishy muscles flexed versus unflexed again, but hey I found a video explaining it so here's a link to a guy showing the difference: link

Worth More Than A Trophy or Tournament

Daniel was speechless.

It was fascinating to see.

Despite the pain, something Daniel brushed off when Johnny offered to bandage him up in the locker room, too much in a hurry to see their friends and to leave.

Daniel had seemed determined to just stare in surprise at everyone Johnny had gotten to come.

To watch the red and blue lights fade off into the distance with all his (their) tormenters lugged off.

He was holding onto Johnny's hand so damn tight, almost bone-crunching, but Johnny knew he must've felt untethered.

That high of winning after an awful time, awful months.

The relief of it being over.

Finally.

It'd been a lot of work but it'd gone smoothly. From minor details to larger ones.

He'd sat in with Mrs. Douglas and the committee after his initial confrontation with Terry Silver and had set the tape down on the desk, playing it for them, feeling sick to his stomach but gritting his teeth to sit through it.

Mrs. Douglas had looked at him in horror and they'd jumped to call the whole thing off.

Johnny had asked them to wait.

He made a special request because the whole thing was unfair.

Not just to Daniel but to all the karate students in the valley who'd been working hard all year long and who were going to be beaten by Barnes on his rampage to get to Daniel.

"What do you suggest Mr. Lawrence?"

"Make two first-place trophies," Johnny had said. "Give one to whoever wins the tournament, I bet it's Daniel. But then erase Barnes from the tournament and give the first second and third place to all those who fell behind Barnes."

"That's unusual."

"They deserve to be celebrated for all their hard work. After we leave, after Daniel wins, make the announcement. Daniel is 19, he doesn't really qualify and Barnes should be disqualified for bad sportsmanship."

"Shouldn't we just block Daniel from competing at the gate? Save him the...pain?"

"Barnes will still be in there tormenting your other competitors," Johnny said. "This way the façade continues, but those who aren't part of it still get rewarded and acknowledged for their hard work. Daniel plans to fight. Please let him. I also highly recommend you have medics on call in the audience."

"You think it'll be that bad?" Mrs. Douglas had whispered, voice tight.

Johnny tapped the new rules on the table. Pointing at "sudden death".

"Silver wouldn't have made this rule change if he didn't plan to use it."

"But the only way to do that is to spend three minutes without getting a point. It's practically impossible. You'd-you'd have to be willingly malicious."

"Exactly," Johnny said. "That's what they want."

"We should stop this," Mrs. Douglas said. "None of these kids should be put in danger."

"They shouldn't. Daniel shouldn't," Johnny agreed. "But if we don't catch him here, if that mask doesn't fall, then he can escape into the wind. Let me lay my trap and then he'll be gone. They'll all be gone."

They'd agreed, becoming his co-conspirators to catch a bigger fish. They'd do what they could to protect the tournament goers, to play pretend, be harsher refs, and keep Barnes in line as much as possible, but act like they didn't know that who Terry Silver was.

They didn't cash his check.

Mr. Miyagi had taken Johnny and Daniel fishing several times since they'd moved in.

In early grey dawns, a lesson on patience and waiting.

It had been as boring as Daniel had warned him.

But Johnny got it now as he set his trap, as he watched Silver move in, focused only on the bait.

He hated that he was using Daniel as bait but Daniel was going to do it no matter what Johnny said.

Silver was going to go after him even if Johnny scooped Daniel over his shoulder and ran, which he'd thought about nearly every night. Of just bundling Daniel up in the bedding of their bed and carrying him off to the Avanti and taking off into the night, somewhere out of Silver's reach.

But he'd learned with Sid, learned in Okinawa and returning home, to stop running.

To stand his ground.

He learned it from listening to his mom, the way that she'd turned, all fire and fury on Sid to protect what was hers, to take what she was owed, and then some.

Johnny knew he knew how to do that too. To stop running, to turn and face Kreese, to face Silver.

Somethings happened easily without him meaning for it to happen.

The snowball of telling everyone in their community to be on the watch for Silver and Barnes had spread without him needing to do anything.

As soon as the waitress had seen Barnes try to fight him, clearly the aggressor, it'd spread like a wildfire through the Valley.

The papers that Johnny had printed out at the fax and printing mom and pop shop were taken from his hands by their neighbors and through word of mouth carried on to their friends and families until it circled back.

The waitress came into their shop one afternoon to talk to Johnny. To tell him Silver wouldn't be able to open a shop anywhere in the Valley without someone hearing about it, telling them and then Johnny.

He'd mentioned it to the realtor while out looking at apartments.

Talking about the creeps in Daniel's life who wouldn't leave him alone when she asked why security was such a big deal.

Maybe Johnny had put it a little higher on the list than normal people did. But he wouldn't look at an apartment unless there was a security guard somewhere on the property. One he could hand over a picture of Silver's face to or Barnes and say "if they show up call the police".

She'd gotten quiet as he talked, not telling her everything, just enough.

That he'd broken into their house and was tormenting them.

That the police hadn't done anything yet.

That they kept breaking into the shop.

"Johnny," she'd said so quietly.

She'd once said she'd had a son their age. And he could tell now that she was thinking about it.

About her kid trying to make it out on his own only for some rich bored guy to torment him every time he tried to get comfortable.

Breaking in.

Sending other people to harass him.

Threatening him.

She'd called Johnny back to her office a week later.

"I talked to the head of our department, and my friends and well... rivals, I guess at other agencies," she said. "You said you had a flyer with this guy's face on it?"

Johnny had one for Silver, had a picture of Kreese he'd used to show the police as well, and the stupid ad in the karate magazine with Barnes.

He passed all three to her.

He didn't have any photos of Snake or Dennis, but he'd been asking around, looking for security cameras in their neighborhood.

The waitress at the restaurant had one.

She'd pulled the fight for him.

It was grainy.

Not great quality.

But it was good enough.

He passed that over as well.

She smiled.

"Don't worry, they've been blacklisted. They won't be able to buy a property in LA. No one will sell to him. And at the rate the conversation is going, it might be all of California. Except maybe the desert."

She'd patted his hand. Reassuring.

He'd also given all of it over to Jimmy.

Jimmy was kind of acting like it was his birthday. Which amused Johnny because they'd celebrated his birthday in style months ago. But as Johnny brought him more and more evidence he just grinned at Johnny.

Like he'd brought Jimmy the moon or something.

He knew Jimmy would make even more copies.

He was organizing multiple cases.

Running between classes and the company he was interning with.

Johnny got to meet the guy, one of his godfathers he supposed who was working on the case for his mother.

He'd shaken Johnny's hand and then clapped his shoulder telling him not to worry they'd get to work and legally there'd be nothing Silver or Kreese could do.

Johnny had an idea though, from that new rule in the All-Valley.

Maybe it was dangerous.

Maybe it was a bad idea.

"Any way we can drag it out? Painfully as possible? Waste his money?" Johnny had asked.

"If we're fast we get his money or at least a lot of it."

"I don't want his money," Johnny said. "I want to waste it."

He'd laughed.

"You are your mother's son. In her case, I advised against it. But with this- I'll see what I can do."

Jimmy had grinned like Johnny had just recommended the most fun night of his life.

The part Johnny didn't think Daniel would like had been that morning after Daniel had left with Mr. Miyagi to prep, to do some last-minute meditation in some woods before driving to the tournament.

Johnny had driven to international arrivals and waited.

Dutch had called the night before to say that he'd picked up Jessica.

He'd sounded pretty happy to have seen her.

He'd driven her out for lunch to meet the guys before taking her to his mom's house.

Told Johnny they'd nearly cried.

Again.

It'd only been like a month, but they'd missed her.

Her aunt was out of town and it was a surprise.

It was a little awkward but his mom had made it sound like fun when he'd called to check in after talking to Dutch.

She'd taken Jessica out for a manicure with Mrs. LaRusso.

Whispered into the phone that the two of them were very chatty and there was no getting a word in edgewise with the two of them together. But she sounded delighted by it.

"Haitai Johnny!"

Johnny had turned to the familiar voice. Hopping out of the Avanti as Kumiko came running.

He caught her in his arms.

"Look at you! Tokyo is treating you well!" Johnny had said.

She looked good.

Confident, happy.

She squeezed his biceps.

"And look at you in LA! I can't wait to see everything! Also neither can Chozen."

Johnny looked past her at Chozen who looked the opposite of Kumiko. Like he hadn't slept on the flight. Neck pillow still around his neck, dragging his suitcase, wrinkled and tired, also lugging Kumiko's suitcase by the looks of it.

His eyes met Johnny's and then he let out what Johnny could only assume as a whole bunch of curses in Japanese and Okinawan, turning away and fixing his hair.

Sato laughed ruffling his nephew's hair, messing it back up, before coming forward and shaking Johnny's hand.

"First long flight," Sato said. "Learning experience."

"He means that he got a first-class ticket for him and Yukie but economy for Chozen and I. Chozen couldn't sleep, was too curious about LA, asked me about a billion questions and finally fell asleep like an hour ago," Kumiko whispered.

"Johnny-san," Yukie said finally setting her luggage down and hugging him. "Too long."

He hugged her close.

It had been.

He carefully took her luggage when she pulled away and Kumiko's that she'd taken back from Chozen, then Sato's, and put it all in the trunk of the Avanti. Chozen fought him for the briefest moment before letting Johnny take his luggage as well, and add it to the trunk.

"Yours?" Sato asked running his hand over the side of the Avanti.

"Yes," Johnny said holding the door open to the passenger seat with a hand out to Yukie who smiled. "You should see Mr. Miyagi's collection of cars. He repairs a lot of classics."

"Can't wait," Yukie said.

Sato, Kumiko, and Chozen sat in the back. Chozen squished between the two.

He drove them the long way with the top down.

The tour.

He drove them along the coast for a bit so they could see the pier, the palm trees and he saw Kumiko's eyes wide pointing out the trees the ocean. Chozen's arms were crossed but he was looking, eyes wide.

Johnny drove them down the sunset strip, slowing down for the highlights, so they could get a good look at the Hollywood sign and rolled into Reseda, slowing outside Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees, pointing out the shop. He told them he'd show them around more after the tournament.

Sato made a sound of approval.

He thought about driving them through the Hills, taking them out for lunch. But instead, he took them home. To Mr. Miyagi's because he knew Mr. Miyagi had been up early to make them welcoming lunch boxes. Had flitted about the house, singing and humming, absolutely delighted to have them in his home.

Johnny parked the car and watched as they got out looking at all the cars.

Chozen pointed at Daniel's yellow Ford.

"What is that one?"

"That's Daniel's car," Johnny said. "A gift from Mr. Miyagi."

"It fits," Chozen said shaking his head.

Johnny popped the trunk as they took in the lot, in the cars, all glistening and well polished in the LA afternoon sun.

He grabbed their bags.

They hadn't been that heavy and he managed to get them all in one go, carrying them off to the house.

Chozen's surprisingly was the heaviest.

Mr. Miyagi had asked him to leave the door open.

The security off.

He was adamant that it'd be okay because of the tournament.

Johnny pushed the door open with his hip and was grateful for it. Grateful that he didn't have to set it all down until after he was inside.

They walked in after him, taking off their shoes and looking around.

They stopped to look at the medal of valor.

"What's this?" Kumiko asked.

"Mr. Miyagi's medal of valor, from the war," Johnny said setting the bags down off to the side.

Mr. Miyagi hadn't said whether they were staying or not.

Johnny thought he wanted them to stay.

But he also knew that maybe it'd be better if they stayed at a hotel.

Daniel and Chozen sitting at the same table for breakfast for at least a week seemed like it was a fight waiting to happen.

And he had a feeling the guys would also want to spend the night.

It'd be a full house.

He didn't think there'd be enough room.

He didn't know where Kumiko or Sato would sleep.

He just sort of assumed Mr. Miyagi would give his bed to Yukie or they'd share. That Chozen would end up on the floor somewhere.

They hadn't built enough guest rooms for everyone.

Johnny started the tour. Showed them the kitchen, the bathroom, the garden, and the balance wheel that Sato stood and admired for a while.

Mr. Miyagi and Johnny had talked about the part of the plan that required Sato. He'd wanted permission before moving forward with it. To make sure it wouldn't hurt or disappoint Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny had asked while Daniel was out jogging with Dutch one early morning.

"I want to get rid of Cobra Kai for good."

Mr. Miyagi had hummed into his tea, waiting for Johnny to explain.

"I-I don't think Daniel would like it but I think someone has to uh...Tommy and Jimmy had a word for it....a phrase. Hostile takeover."

It sounded awful but Mr. Miyagi just waited. No judgment, no negative or approval.

"I was thinking that one of the guys, their family...or Mom could buy it, while they're distracted. But no one wants it. So I was instead thinking maybe...do you think Sato would be interested in expanding overseas?"

Mr. Miyagi had looked surprised only for a second before leaning back thoughtfully with his tea.

"He's got government contracts, right? Those are steel tight according to Jimmy. So if he asked, with his money and the government backing he could take all of them. The dojo we studied in, and all the others Silver threatened. It'd be a lot of work. But no one would learn Cobra Kai in the valley again."

Mr. Miyagi hummed.

"Yukie plan visit. Maybe bring Kumiko. Chozen say vacation time soon."

"You think it's okay Mr. Miyagi?" Johnny had asked hopefully.

"Hai Johnny-san. Good idea. You call Chozen or I call Sato?"

"I think it's best if you call Sato. I'll pick them up when they arrive at the airport."

Mr. Miyagi smiled, bright and warm.

Johnny watched Mr. Miyagi look out at his garden, and Johnny had a feeling he was thinking of dreams he hadn't let himself have.

Dreams beyond the bonsai shop.

Dreams of a home full of old friends, an old love.

Maybe Daniel would forgive him for inviting Chozen over the ocean if he saw Mr. Miyagi's face.

Other pieces slide into place right on time. Jessica came with the guys unnoticed by Daniel, slipping into the stands.

Ali came as well. They still hadn't talked much but Johnny was glad she came for Daniel.

He needed the guys to hold him back. Because every time Barnes's got a cheap shot in, a penalty, he started to get up and hands held him down, held him back.

He bit the inside of his cheek until he bled.

Bit his lip.

He was the one who'd asked the ref to go along with the charade, but he wanted to yell at the ref to put a stop to it.

He wanted to run down the stairs straight to Silver. Punch him in the face. To kick Barnes in the face. To spring the trap early.

Silver had taken his eye off the game, focused only on Daniel and forgotten that in the wings, waiting, were a bunch of angry boys from the Hills with their well-to-do parents, pissed to learn what they'd learned in Cobra Kai. Pissed to learn that they'd broken bones, bruised their ribs, done dangerous stunts all because Kreese had asked. And even more, to Johnny's surprise, they were pissed on his behalf as well.

He knew if he wanted to, if he asked, it could be so much worse. That if he explored the spider webs of his friend's family connections, the money they could collectively spend, he could send everything down a darker path. He knew because sometimes when they talked about it, late at night he knew he'd heard the guys whisper about people they knew or had heard of. Ways people disappeared. But it seemed too easy.

Johnny wanted to tell Kreese. Wanted to tell Silver, the problem with taking boys and trying to mold them into monsters was that when you fucked up they'd bite and it'd hurt like hell.

If you went after anything they cared about more than themselves, then like dogs of hell they'd drag you back with them. Show exactly what they'd learned. And Johnny would not let them get away with those hits, those punches, the fact they'd dared touch Daniel. He didn't want it to be quick.

If Johnny had his way, and he was pretty sure he would get his way, they wouldn't see the sunlight outside of a yard for years to come. Until long after they were old and grey.

But hey, at least they'd have each other.

And that belief that this would work kept him from crushing the hand holding his while he waited. While he bounced his leg, while he listened to the girls yell to Daniel. To kick Barnes ass.

Knowing that Yukie, Kumiko, Sato, and Chozen were hidden elsewhere in the crowd so they'd go unnoticed.

While he watched Daniel roll on the mat.

He'd win.

Johnny knew that in his bones.

Because even when Daniel was scared, even when he was backed into a corner, it was always within the eleventh hour that he came back swinging.

It was always when you thought he'd go down and stay down that he came back up. And when those brown eyes met his he knew without a doubt. Knew he'd win. Knew that Daniel's own karate, the kata he'd done would take care of it.

Johnny looked over at Daniel as they reached a red light in the Avanti, on their way home after the tournament. Alone for a moment, to breathe on the way over, collect themselves.

"You did great," Johnny whispered. "It's over now."

Daniel blinked and turned back to him. "I can't believe-"

Johnny waited while he organized his words.

"Are they really gone?"

"Not completely, but all their exits have been cut off. They'll be let out for the lawsuits, and for those there are many. You would not believe the amount just for Dyantox that Gabriella dug up."

"What will happen if-"

"We'll win," Johnny said gently lifting the hand trying to crush his gingerly up to his lips.

It wasn't as bloody or bruised as Johnny's usually were after a tournament.

Daniel had only got the one shot in really, the only one that mattered.

"What do you want Mr. two-time champion?"

They both knew everyone would be at Mr. Miyagi's.

Everyone would be waiting for them. But sometimes, especially if it was a big one, like Johnny's last tournament, driving around helped.

Johnny had needed it, to be calm cool and collected.

Daniel shifted over.

"You."

"Daniel you got kicked and punched, everywhere. I don't think that's a good idea," Johnny said, knowing his ears were burning.

What sort of monster was Daniel?

Johnny had expected like ice cream, or a burger and fries, or hell a beer.

Though he was pretty sure his mom was making root beer floats as they spoke.

At least one of those shots had been to the groin.

Johnny thought at the very least he should pull over somewhere and get Daniel some ice.

"How about some ice instead?"

"The house is going to be full isn't it?" Daniel asked, he'd pulled his hand free and it was on Johnny's thigh as he leaned in close.

"Yeah. The guys will probably spend the night and I'm sure Yukie and Sato...to be honest, Mr. Miyagi said he'd figured that out but I haven't a clue where they're all sleeping."

There was a high with tournaments. A high after any sort of competition. But usually, the guys Johnny fought with didn't go after him like Barnes. Usually, Johnny was the one who knocked them down and after a cold shower, he usually found some sort of balance.

He'd just never realized what that was. They he was striving towards balance.

He'd known about the high but with Kreese barking orders, he never actually followed that ride.

What had Daniel even done the year before?

"Pull over somewhere," Daniel said.

It was a terrible idea.

An awful idea.

But Johnny pulled over near the beach.

One that was usually empty.

Horrible idea.

Daniel was going to hurt himself.

Just driving over a bump in the road would've hurt him.

Johnny had driven so carefully.

But Daniel was getting out of the Avanti, hand still holding his ribs, his abdomen like for a second the endorphins had made him forget he was in a pain and he was walking out on the beach, taking off his shoes.

Johnny followed after him as Daniel stood in the tide looking out at the dark water.

Johnny stuck his hands in his leather jacket pockets taking off his shoes and socks following closer.

Daniel cupped his hands around his mouth and shouted.

It was practically a scream.

Like he'd uncorked something, a shaken-up bottle of soda he'd forgotten about that had just rolled around in the bottom of the car.

So much for being sneaky.

But maybe he'd changed his mind.

He turned back to Johnny.

"I did it."

"Yeah, you did."

"I beat him."

"Of course you did."

"I won."

"Two-time champion."

Daniel reached out and grabbed Johnny's jacket and pulled him towards him, into the water.

Daniel pushed himself up kissing Johnny.

"Do you know what got me through everything?"

"Your stubbornness? Inner bonsai strength?"

Daniel laughed softly.

"I gave up on myself. But you never did. Mr. Miyagi never did. The guys never gave up on me. Jessica never gave up on me. I- I didn't want to get out of bed to go for those runs, but Dutch would come, even after Jessica left and he'd drag me out of bed. All I wanted to do was stay there with you. But he got me going, got me moving, never left my side, just like Jessica didn't when she was here. And I can't believe she's here again. When did she get into town?"

"Couple of days ago. She's been staying with my mom."

Daniel shook his head with a soft laugh.

"The guys came every weekend. I called them at school you know. Sometimes. And they listened. Even though they were busy with school. They didn't rush me off the phone. Didn't say I gotta study Daniel. They listened. I'm sure I tanked their study time. But sparring with them, with you, it helped. I wavered. I thought I'd fall apart. I was scared when I realized what Barnes was doing. What Silver told me. That it was for sport. The whole thing was entertaining to him. To them. But then I listened to Mr. Miyagi. And I looked in the crowd. And I wasn't alone. Not anymore. Not like I was. And that is all you."

"It isn't. Everyone showed up because they care."

"No Johnny Lawrence. I'd have let people go. You and your ex-cobras show up and didn't stop showing up. There's no escape from them. None of you will let me fall, you won't let me fail, and-"

There were tears in Daniel's eyes.

"I'm grateful for it. For Ma being here, for Jessica being in the audience. That hug from Kumiko afterward. Hell, it was kind of cool seeing Chozen."

"I'm shocked. I thought you hated Chozen."

"I do not hate Chozen. I just, you know what? He's better than Barnes, any day."

Johnny laughed gently cupping Daniel's face in his hands.

"You are amazing you know that?"

"I am not."

"You are. Everyone always tries to stack the deck against you and even when you're scared, even when you want to throw away the towel and run away you find that strength and you get up and you win. Every single time."

"Johnny."

"If I was a betting man I'd bet on Daniel LaRusso every single time."

"Well, you have to."

"I have to?" Johnny asked amused.

"Because you love me, of course, you have to."

Johnny laughed. "You are right. I do love you. Which is why I really think I should get you some ice or that green stuff from Mr. Miyagi."

"Not yet," Daniel said.

"Stubborn."

"Isn't that a quality of mine you just complimented?" Daniel asked pressing close.

"You're hurt."

"And I can think of a few things that can distract from the pain."

Johnny kissed him gently.

"Like what?"

Why'd he ask?

He should stop asking questions like that. Because Daniel always told him. And it always made his brain short circuit. But he followed Daniel down the beach anyway, grabbing their shoes, walking along with the tide towards the pier, to the space under it, heart pounding so loudly that he was sure Daniel could hear it. The frantic beat.

He sat down in the sand, gently helping Daniel down, wondering if he'd be okay, watching him for any burst of pain. But he was riding that high again.

It'd hit later.

It'd hit and it would all drop out from under him.

The pain, the bruises from the punches and kicks.

Daniel wasn't moving carefully. Like he couldn't feel it. Was too distracted.

Johnny hadn't even taken off his shirt. Which had worked, the night before when Daniel hadn't been able to sleep.

"You know what's a better prize than that trophy?" Daniel asked looking down at him, eyes looking impossibly dark. Nearly molten.

"Knowing you kicked ass?" Johnny asked.

Daniel laughed, kissing his neck. "Your heart is the best thing I ever won."

Johnny didn't know what to say. Stunned. He'd half expected something dirtier, from the track Daniel was on.

"Hey," Daniel said kissing him gently, settling down into the sand next to him.

His hand was brushing something wet from Johnny's face.

Tears.

Daniel smiled warmly at him like it wasn't a problem. Like those tears were fine, that the lump in his throat was okay, that there was time.

That was part of it. Everyone always told Johnny to hurry. To be better yesterday. To jump and they expected it as soon as the first syllable left their lips. But Daniel always waited. Or slowed down when Johnny needed it. Always turned around to look for him, always came back and got him, kept him by his side. Chased after him when he headed off on his own.

He didn't think of himself as a prize, and would, if he could get around the lump in his throat, tell Daniel that his heart didn't have to be won. That he'd given it to Daniel as soon as he'd realized how he felt.

His friends had helped, but somewhere along the way because of Kreese, because of Sid, even though everything along the way had helped, he didn't have much self-worth.

Not when it came to comparing himself to winning a tournament.

A tournament that Kreese had tried to kill him over.

To have Daniel say he was worth more than that, even though he knew that on some level, to hear it, to hear he was worth more than a plastic trophy, it was something he'd been waiting to hear but hadn't realized it.

He'd been told that second place was good.

That he'd done a good job.

But no one else had told him he was worth more than the tournaments.

That he was a worthier prize, worth more than that event.

He'd based all of his worth on it for so long.

Kreese had based all his worth on it. So had Sid.

He wrapped his arms around Daniel.

"Oh Johnny," Daniel said softly, gently rubbing his back. "You are, really you are. Worth more than any stupid prize from a tournament. Worth more than first-place trophies. To me, the trophies are just nice. Proof that I overcame hardship. Markers that each hardship is done. Like the end. But I don't have one for Okinawa. This last one is kind of tainted, haunted by Silver and Barnes in a way that its shiny little plastic gold man can never recover from. I wondered why you didn't set your trophies out. Why you kept them in a box in the back of your closet. I didn't get it. But now I do. I kind of don't want to see it. Which is why I gave it to Ma. I get why because Kreese tainted all of them, didn't he? Every win, even the ones you were proud of. The thing I'm excited about isn't that trophy but the fact that in about a week or so I get to move into a nice new apartment where everything is ours, where I get to finally have the time and the mental space to look over all that stuff to study mechanical engineering or at least pick something car related, where I'll have the mental focus to pay attention to you rather than just holding onto you for dear life. I look forward to sleeping through the night. Or working my way there again. I know it'll be okay because I have you because I have Mr. Miyagi because I have the guys. Hell, you made sure Ma was here. I'm looking forward to the future. I didn't think I would, but I am Johnny. Because it's got you in it."

Johnny thought he was holding on a little too tightly.

He should've been gentler.

He'd seen how many hits Daniel had taken. But it took a lot of effort to pull away to sit up again.

He lifted his hand to scrub at his eyes but Daniel beat him to it, fingers brushing tears aside.

"'m sorry."

"What for?" Daniel asked.

"I'm supposed to be celebrating you, your win. Not crying."

"Hey, it's been a lot. Not just for me. You think I didn't notice that before you'd come to bed that you'd check every nook and cranny of Mr. Miyagi's place? Made sure the doors and windows were locked? That the alarm was on? Everything you did to make sure Silver and Kreese and their karate minions were gone? I'm sure it's been just as emotionally draining, exhausting."

Johnny nodded. "I'm glad Chozen knocked me out before your fight with him."

"Yeah, why's that?"

"Watching you fight alone is hell."

Daniel laughed softly. "Upset you weren't on the mat? Missed it? Wished you'd signed up?"

"No. But I wanted to punch that bastard in his stupid face."

"Just think of how well you're going to sleep tonight."

"You do realize all the guys are going to be in our room tonight right?" Johnny asked with a soft laugh.

"I know I'm going to pass out, no snoring or guys joining our bed will keep me up, but you- maybe I can do something to help with that hmm?" Daniel asked his lips on Johnny's neck.

Johnny didn't know what to do, where wasn't Daniel bruised? He chose to run his fingers ever so gently on Daniel's back, a ghost of a touch because he knew he'd been kicked there, punched. Just not where or how big of a space it was. Daniel would be black and blue come morning. But he wasn't going to let it stop him though, not from following Johnny back down into the sand as if he didn't care that they were going to get sand everywhere.

He supposed it was because he wasn't actually in the sand, Johnny was.

But it was easy to ignore for the moment, easy to be distracted by the sound of the tide and kissing Daniel, warm and whole, and in the dark under the pier all the bruises were invisible and he could just touch him, solid, steady and safe.

Finally safe.

Peace

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"Can I drive the Avanti?" Daniel asked.

"What? No," Johnny said.

"Think you can drive?"

"Of course!"

"I've been trying to get you up for ten minutes. You look like you want to live in the sand for the rest of your life."

"Whose fault is that?"

"I think you should let me drive the Avanti."

"You know about maybe a half hour or so ago I was thinking about how much I loved that you don't rush me. I forgot that you do this."

"I'm don't rush you-"

Johnny laughed sitting up and getting his clothes. "You do, camping and this."

"They're both outside! I don't want you to get sick! I mean if you want to just lay around nude everywhere, I'd-"

"You're thinking about it."

"I am! We're about to have our own apartment and well..."

"We have friends who will not pay attention to a sock on the door Daniel."

"Friends who've come from Okinawa, Tokyo, and Colombus Ohio to see us."

"One day I'm going to do this to you," Johnny said. "See how you like being rushed to get dressed and moving."

"I look forward to it."

"No whining, you owe me for this."

Daniel burst out laughing.

"Fine, one I O U for cuddling. If you let me drive the Avanti you know you could just recover from the passenger seat."

"You'd still be rushing me over to the car."

"Well, I thought you'd get pissed if we tried to do it in the Avanti...oh, oh! What's that look? Is the Avanti not off the table?"

Johnny's head was down, looking through the sand for his socks, changing the topic with a little mumble. "You sure you weren't a boy scout?"

"No, I'm just always prepared."

He was a bit distracted, thinking about how much car sex opened up their options.

"Boy scout."

"Come on up you go."

"I'm up I'm up."

Daniel nearly laughed, couldn't stop smiling as Johnny dumped sand out of his shoes and put them back on. He knew he should fix Johnny's shirt. Knew he should help fix his hair. Make him a little less obvious. But he liked it a little too much. Seeing Johnny a mess. Knowing he'd done that. Caused it.

He dusted sand off of Johnny's back, walking with him back up to the Avanti. It wasn't what he'd wanted to do on the beach exactly, but he had to admit that everything, just like Johnny had said, hurt. But they'd have time to try again, to make up for it. And it'd still been fun. Always was.

Johnny fished around in his pockets for his keys and started up the Avanti.

"Anything else you want?"

Daniel settled into the passenger seat, knowing he was grinning like a Cheshire cat, pleased as punch. Johnny's collar was crooked. He'd messed up his buttons, fumbling in the dark.

"Nope."

"They're going to think we fucking died," Johnny said looking at the time with a sigh.

"I doubt that," Daniel said, dusting some sand out of Johnny's hair.

"Hey, can you wait till we get to Mr. Miyagi's? I'm going to have to vacuum the seats."

"I figure you'll have to vacuum them anyway," Daniel said letting his hand fall down to Johnny's thigh. "Maybe I'll put a towel in here. Oh, wait there's one in the trunk still right? Well, that's going to make clean up easier next time."

Johnny's hand went over his and pushed it away, down towards his knee. "You're a damn incubus."

"And that would be?" Daniel asked amused, sliding his hand back up.

"Type of demon."

"A specific type?" Daniel asked as Johnny pushed his hand back down.

"Yes, and I'm pretty sure you know the type, I'd like to get us home in one piece."

"We've got to work on your multitasking."

"And maybe your beliefs in how many times I can go so quickly after one another after you already tried that on the beach. Let's not play that game while I'm driving. I'm pretty sure if you tried right now I'd faint. And then we'd die. So let's wait."

"Like an hour? Like when you go swimming?"

Johnny sighed and Daniel laughed, he couldn't help himself. He felt as light as air. The bruises, the pain wasn't bothering him. A weight had been removed from his chest. The stress, the worry, it was all gone or at least leaving and the pressure was subsiding.

Mr. Miyagi's house was full. Full of cars in the lot. Full of sound.

Daniel could hear it from where they parked.

The voices of people he loved talking on the other end of the doorway.

He grabbed Johnny before he headed in, dusting more sand out of his hair, fixing his shirt. He couldn't let Johnny go in like that.

Daniel hadn't expected Chozen to come barreling towards them followed by the guys with pure mischief in their eyes as soon as they opened the door.

Daniel was not ready for that. Whatever the hell they'd done.

"Have you really slept with all of them?" Chozen asked.

The question was directed at both of them.

Daniel blinked and glanced at Johnny.

He looked confused.

Then at the guys.

Bastards.

Evil bastards.

"They've spent the night for like the last five years," Johnny said.

"In your bed?"

"Yeah."

"And in Daniel's bed?"

"Yeah."

Daniel wanted to cover Johnny's mouth.

He didn't get the misunderstanding.

The bit lost in translation.

He was probably thrown because he hadn't been expecting it.

Still a little dazed from endorphins. Could you be dazed by endorphins? Maybe he shouldn't have rushed Johnny.

This wasn't going to go well and it was going to become Daniel's worst nightmare if the guys didn't fix it immediately.

Daniel tried to think of something to say.

Anything to curb the conversation.

Chozen looked stunned, stepping forward like he was about to issue a challenge.

"Then pick me tonight."

Oh god.

Fucking bastards.

He was going to kill them.

Did they not know how much work Daniel had done trying to keep Chozen at bay? And then as soon as Chozen landed on their shore the guys not only decided to fuck with him but didn't understand the repercussions.

Johnny looked confused.

Oh no.

Oh no no no.

"I never get to pick."

Chozen looked stunned, turning to the guys like he was about to start a fight. Defend some hypothetical honor of Johnny's.

"Chozen," Daniel said.

Chozen whirled back.

"You let this happen?"

"It's not what you think," Daniel said.

"They do rock paper scissors I think," Johnny said.

"Johnny-san," Chozen said softly. "You shouldn't- do you need help?"

He sounded worried. Did he think-

Johnny was fine.

If anyone needed rescuing from the antics of those fools who could barely stop themselves from bursting out in giggles then it was Daniel. He's the one who they always interrupted. They're the ones who always-

"How long?" Chozen asked.

Someone else put an end to all of it.

Daniel wanted a vacation.

Johnny tilted his head thoughtfully, doing the math.

Everything in Chozen's stance was uneasy.

"Five years?" Johnny asked. "Or would it be six now?"

He was asking the guys. Like he couldn't remember when.

"Does the first sleepover at my house count?" Bobby asked.

"I slept on the floor."

"Everyone but Bobby slept on the floor," Jimmy said with a shrug.

"I don't think that one counts," Tommy said.

Chozen looked absolutely horrified, which once upon a time seemed like fun. But Daniel knew the thread he was following. And they didn't know if they pulled that thread too much Chozen was going to break and punch them.

Defend Johnny's honor over a joke.

Hell Daniel wouldn't even blame him.

"You let this happen? You're fine with it?"

He was asking Daniel and Daniel swallowed hard.

"Johnny, could you get me some ice?"

Johnny looked at him before nodding and heading off.

"If I knew-" Chozen said, angry, hands curled into fists.

"Chozen, look at their faces," Daniel said.

Chozen turned with a frown.

"They're being dicks. Exploiting language. They don't fuck Johnny."

"Oh, shit."

"That's the disappointed face."

"He's pissed."

"Dude, it was just a fun game. Why are you ruining our fun?"

"Because Chozen's likely to punch you in the face if you wind him up too much. And this isn't funny. No Chozen. They just sleep next to us. Because they're pests. Think of it as a bunch of annoying brothers. Johnny is not being hurt or in trouble. Do you know how long it took to even-" Daniel sighed, frustrated. "They platonically share the bed and have ever since they met Johnny as like guards to try and catch Sid, Johnny's stepfather being an abusive asshole to him. And now it's a habit. A habit that means sometimes when they're over instead of just having Johnny sleeping next to me there's one or more of these dorks also in my bed. Or wherever we're sleeping. Somehow once we managed to barely fit all six of us into one bed. I've accepted that this is my life because they're his friends. And his oldest friends. Yeah, oldest Chozen. Those six years are it. He didn't have friends before these idiots. So they're precious even if they can be bastards. And they're my friends too, even if moments like this I start to question it. And sometimes, like when Barnes and Silver were shits, it was comforting having them in the room. It felt safer. So it's not what you think, but we're not changing or stopping it okay? I just need a bigger bed."

Chozen turned to look at them, fists uncurling, but not at ease yet.

"It doesn't make sense."

"What doesn't?" Daniel asked preparing himself for a headache.

He just wanted to get past this, stop to see his mom, to say hello to everyone.

Not be stuck in what was the guys hazing Chozen.

Did he deserve it yes?

This particular vein? No.

It would've been worse if Johnny had put two and two together.

"Why them?"

"Hey," Dutch said.

Something cold pressed gently against the side of Daniel's face and he looked up at Johnny.

"I trust them," Johnny said.

Chozen turned to him. "But they lie."

Johnny studied the guys curiously like he was trying to figure out what they'd done this time.

"I remember someone else I accused of lying who said they didn't actually lie but misled."

Chozen looked away from Johnny's gaze.

"They've had my back when I've been wrong, when I've been right, and they've helped me up and to keep going more times than I can count. Whenever I thought of giving up they wouldn't let me. They stuck by me even when I didn't think they would. They're irreplaceable. Even if they can be a pain sometimes. They're family. But they're tricksters, so be careful Chozen. Don't trust them until you get to know them better. But don't be mad at them. They've heard all about Okinawa and are probably trying to bother you because of everything. But know it's not totally malicious. They're just trying to rile you up. Be careful around the girls they might as well. Who knows what they've heard from Daniel."

Chozen looked a little stunned turning to Daniel, all the fight gone.

"You should eat something, I think they ordered pizza," Johnny said.

He was studying Daniel's face, only glanced at Chozen for a moment, before going back to looking at him full of concern.

"I'm okay," Daniel said softly.

"You haven't looked in a mirror," Johnny said softly. "We're going to have to make a big batch of that green goop."

"Well it does hurt a little," Daniel said softly.

"Yeah?" Johnny asked, kissing him softly. "How can I help?"

"Johnny, why are you covered in sand?" Bobby asked with a laugh.

Daniel heard the clap of Bobby's hand on Johnny's back.

He watched Johnny pull away red.

Dutch burst out laughing.

"Daniel, do you have no restraint? Even when your hurt?"

"I won, thank you very much," Daniel said sourly, holding onto Johnny before he could run away.

"Congratulations," Tommy said warmly.

"Thank you," Daniel said.

"Let's get you sitting somewhere so I can get to work," Johnny said.

"Because you didn't do enough work on the beach?" Jimmy teased.

"I hate you all."

"We love you too."

Daniel sat down at Mr. Miyagi's table where pizzas were set out and he grabbed a slice. The sick nervous feeling he'd had before the tournament had kept him from eating lunch and now that he was sitting near a pizza he was starving.

Johnny left his side to go get the first aid kit as the guys sat around, grabbing Chozen's arm to pull him down to join them.

"They are like Kumiko," he said sourly.

Daniel frowned.

Those four boys were nothing like Kumiko.

She was sweet and kind and, well they could be.

But he didn't think that was what Chozen was getting at.

"How so?"

"Kumiko lied. Told me Miyagi sensei would pick us up," Chozen said sourly, picking up a slice of the pizza. "Always teasing. Can't trust her."

"Who picked you up?" Bobby asked.

"Johnny did."

"Kumiko is for sure trustworthy!"

"How do you even know that? You've never met her before tonight."

"We talked on the phone."

"And you can just tell from a phone call if someone is trustworthy?"

"Chozen I think that's just teasing."

Chozen frowned into his drink when Johnny came back sitting down next to Daniel.

"Oh, not the green goop right now. That stuff smells Johnny, you know it smells."

Daniel knew it had been what Johnny was going for, but he'd kind of hoped for something different. Not to get gooped up in front of Chozen of all people. Everything was starting to balance and he didn't want it to dip on his end.

"You're black and blue, you want to be stiff and in pain once your high crashes?" Johnny asked with a frown. "At least let me get some of it."

"This is supposed to be a winning party. Celebration. Not a first aid tent. Plus, plus the guys are eating right?" Daniel asked waving at the guys desperately.

"I don't care."

"Yeah fix away Johnny."

"Already been on the other end of the goop."

"If we drink enough maybe we'll become numb to the smell."

"Oh that's a great idea, let me get more beer."

"Chozen you want another beer?"

"I-"

Chozen's eyes met Daniel's, a curious plea of do I trust a beer from these guys or worry they're going to spit in it or something worse.

Daniel's eyes flicked to Tommy who'd asked. There wasn't that trickster look in his eyes, just a regular question.

He nodded.

"Hai," Chozen said.

Tommy nodded and headed off to get more beers while Johnny lifted up Daniel's shirt.

Daniel flushed red.

Did Johnny not realize how crowded the house was?

Everyone would notice eventually. Sure sometimes he'd gotten patched up in front of his mom and the guys, but everyone together?

Daniel heard the sharp intake of breath from Johnny, a slight hiss. Like he had been the one hurt.

He felt lips on the back of his head then heard the sound of that awful jar of green goop being opened.

If he never had to see or use that goop again in his life he'd appreciate it.

No more guys who wanted to beat him up. But he had a feeling Johnny would ask someone for a jar of it and it'd be in their cabinet forever. For whenever, one of them got hurt.

"Damn," Bobby whispered. "It looked bad, but it is pretty bad. Almost like that first year when you tried to do that tournament in San Diego."

"Oh right, you came back all beaten up," Jimmy said shaking his head.

"Well that's because Kreese signed him up above his age and weight class," Dutch said with a sour frown. "So of course he got the shit beaten out of him."

"Why?" Chozen whispered, looking at them eyes wide.

"Let me go find that photo," Jimmy said getting up. "So you've got a better idea."

"Jimmy no need," Johnny said, a twinge of embarrassment.

Daniel smiled, it was probably pre-growth spurt Johnny. Tiny.

Going up against high schoolers, bigger kids.

His frown faltered.

"Kreese said he needed to learn how to take on guys bigger than him. Even though the older kids in our dojo were use to Kreese's methods they still held back a little against us, so taking him to a different city to fight bigger kids who thought he was just scrawny and their age, but at their level," Bobby began.

"Kreese also lied about what belt he had."

"Yeah snuck Johnny into a black belt tournament for high schoolers while he was middle schooler with an orange belt."

Daniel whirled on them eyes wide. Belts hadn't made sense to him before, not fully, but after reading all of the books on karate in preparation he knew how big of a gap there was between the two. He continued to shift, turning to look at Johnny.

"Was that your first tournament?" Daniel asked voice barely a whisper.

"I think it was my second," Johnny said.

"Right we all did one that was for our class weight and Johnny did really well and was super proud of all his hard work, and Kreese being Kreese-" Jimmy said returning and sitting down with that first magazine out of Daniel's desk.

Which meant he knew.

Which meant they all knew.

"That's Johnny?" Chozen whispered.

"Yup," Tommy said passing him a beer and joining him. "Five, oh no, six years ago."

"We're talking about that first San Diego tournament," Dutch said.

"Oh, the one where Kreese said "It's easy to be the biggest fish in a small pond, but you need to be the biggest fish even in a big pond," and then sent him into the ring to get slaughtered?" Tommy asked.

"Yeah that one," Jimmy said with a sigh.

"I don't know how Kreese got away with it, Johnny was clearly not in high school or the right belt."

"He bribed the guy at the front desk," Johnny said bandaging up Daniel's back and looking for more bruises he could get at easily. "And the refs."

"Seriously?" Jimmy asked. "Johnny, why didn't you say anything? I got to add that to the lawsuit!"

Johnny shrugged. "I forgot about it."

"You forgot about it?" Bobby asked. "You were-"

"I know," Johnny said gently. "But there was so much like that, it all blurs together."

"Johnny," Daniel said softly.

"Why did you not kill him?" Chozen asked. "You were baby baby." He pointed towards the picture.

"Okay I take it back, I like him," Dutch said with a grin.

"It's illegal," Daniel stressed.

"What if I kill him?"

Johnny wiped the green goop off of his hand and reached across the table patting Chozen's wrist.

Daniel watched Chozen stiffen at the contact, eyes a little wide, a little shocked. Off-balance.

"He's not worth it, this is better."

"How's it better?" Chozen asked stiffly, anger curling him forward.

"Death is quick. No one would know why. He'd be missed and mourned. But this way everything awful and terrible, everything he'd ever done will be dragged out into the sunlight for everyone to see and know and he won't be able to hide behind fake good intentions," Johnny said. "Neither he nor Silver can hide behind the fake personas they put on for the public, just like Sid."

"Damn," Dutch said quietly.

"Just like his mom," Tommy whispered.

"If I could make it worse I would," Johnny said, voice dark gently bandaging a bruise on Daniel's arm. "Because for this I will never forgive them."

"Johnny I'm fine," Daniel said, looking back at him.

"You couldn't sleep. You always sleep. You couldn't because of those bastards."

"Well you never slept," Daniel said. "Because of Sid and Kreese."

"I know," Johnny said softly.

"That wasn't good either, even, even if you were used to it. It wasn't okay. Neither was anything that happened." Daniel said stiffly. "I get Chozen's sentiment."

Chozen looked at him surprised.

"And yours," Daniel said gently patting Johnny on the shoulder.

"Just because I went through it, I know...I'm learning it's not good. But I also never wanted anyone else to go through that feeling. Especially you," Johnny said softly.

Daniel patted his knee gently. "That is why what I want to do right now is celebrate. Eat some of this pizza, whatever it is Bobby brought-"

"I brought a lot. My parents baked you a cake. I got these little cookies I made as a test. My parents wanted to come but they've got all this stuff to do. We're opening another store. But they show their regret in like tarts, bars, and other stuff. I don't even know what all they sent. Let me go get it."

"Mom's also making floats," Johnny whispered.

"If there's ever a day for a sugar crash today is it. Bring it," Daniel said with a grin.

He watched Johnny sigh, closing the green goop lid but pressing the ice pack adamantly into his hand, blue eyes flicking pointedly down, before getting up. "I'll get us floats." He kissed the side of Daniel's head, hand gently on his shoulder.

Daniel sighed, taking the ice pack and gingerly putting it in his lap.

Stupid Barnes and his stupid friends and his stupid cheap shots.

He glanced awkwardly at Chozen, suddenly flooded in guilt.

"Sorry for the cheap shot. You were a dick, but it didn't-it was all I could think of,"

Chozen blinked at him in surprise.

"I recovered."

Daniel nodded, taking a slice of the pizza out on the table, motioning for Chozen to help himself. He told him the joys of pizza, about how it was better in Newark, but how he was warming up to Californian pizza and this was pretty good. The guys chimed in, mentioning how it was from the place they always went, after tournaments with Johnny. How Johnny had picked the place.

Daniel smiled warmly as Bobby came back arms full.

Johnny returned followed by Ms. Lawrence.

"Hey boys, congratulations on your win Daniel," she said passing him a drink from the tray she was holding.

Passing out a root beer float to the guys.

"Mom this is-"

"Chozen right?" Ms. Lawrence asked.

Daniel watched Chozen sit up straighter.

Daniel smiled into his root beer float remembering that feeling. The feeling of realizing Johnny talked to his Mom, who that important pretty blonde was and the panic of every bad thing being known because if she could know who you were before being introduced it meant you'd been mentioned enough. Every bad deed, every poor interaction suddenly floating up to the forefront of your mind.

"Y-yes ma'am."

Chozen scrambled up, bowing quickly.

"How was your flight?"

"Long."

"Be nice to my boys, hmm?" she said before putting a root beer float in his hands.

"Of course, sorry, Ms...Johnny's... mom."

"Lawrence," Jimmy said, tugging on Chozen's shirt to pull him down next to them.

"Huh?"

"Her last name. Johnny's last name. It's Lawrence," Dutch said around a mouthful of pizza.

"Lawrence," Chozen repeated slowly.

"Laura Lawrence," Tommy said.

Chozen nodded.

She smiled turning to Johnny kissing him on the cheek. "I sat through the fight this time, I guess no need for a play-by-play."

"Right," Johnny said holding his drink a little lost looking,

"We'll find a way to adapt it, because I like doing this."

"Me too."

She put her hand on Johnny's shoulder. "You did well. I'm proud of you.'

"Thank you."

"Daniel?"

Daniel sat up a little straighter, wincing, a habit.

"I'm proud of you too. I'll give you a hug after you recover. Make sure you talk to your mom too. She was very worried, still is for you. She's been distracted by talking to Yukie and the girls, so make sure to pop over soon."

"Of course, thank you Ms. Lawrence."

"Eat first. I know for sure, once you get over there you won't get near the food for a while again," she said smiling warmly at them all before heading off to return to the others. He watched as she walked to the kitchen refilled the tray and for two of them added some rum she grabbed from a bag. Watched as she passed out the root beer floats, the spiked ones for herself and his mother.

Daniel sunk carefully back down, picking up another slice.

She was right.

He leaned against Johnny who returned to his side, as they ate pizza and the guys talked about Cobra Kai and asked Chozen about what he was going to do now. If he was going to teach, giving their advice for what would make a better teacher than Kreese. Daniel was surprised at how Chozen listened like he was seriously taking note of their feedback.

After pizza, a slice of what ended up being a lemon and blueberry cake with cream cheese frosting, and a couple of Bobby's tea cookies, infused with tea that Bobby wanted notes on he bumped his shoulder against Johnny's shoulder motioning his head towards where the girls were sitting out on the deck, out in the garden.

Johnny nodded getting up, setting their root beer floats down and holding out his hands to help Daniel up. Daniel took them carefully, feeling a little stiff, a little sore. That high Johnny had mentioned was crashing. He was sore. But he was determined to see everyone before fully crashing. Before curling up in his bed.

He grabbed the rest of his float and they walked over to where ladies were.

"Daniel!" Ali said with a grin. "Way to kick ass!"

"Thanks," Daniel said.

"Johnny," Ali said with a nod.

"Ali."

Jessica rolled her eyes hugging both Daniel and Johnny. "I missed you guys so much! We have so much to catch up on! The guys and I grabbed lunch today at...some burger joint, and it was kind of fun. We're going to have to do that soon. I'm in town for like two weeks. Also, how dare you for talking about the deathmatch and not mentioning Kumiko!"

"I know for sure I mentioned Kumiko," Daniel said as Jessica pulled away and Kumiko laughed.

"Yeah! Daniel how dare you not tell me about how cool Kumiko is!" Ali said gently slapping his chest.

"Johnny, why'd you hide her on the other end of the audience huh?" Jessica asked.

"I didn't want Daniel to see her and get thrown. I figured seeing you two would be about as much as he could handle for surprises."

Daniel wanted to argue that he was wrong, but he wasn't. Seeing Jessica had nearly thrown him. He probably would've thought he was dreaming or in Okinawa if he saw Sato, Chozen, Yukie, and Kumiko in the crowd.

Ali sighed, arms crossed. "I suppose that makes sense."

Kumiko hugged them both, gentler.

"They've been very kind, recommended we go dancing. Jessica said you guys knew a good place?"

"If Kumiko is in town then we absolutely have to," Daniel said.

"I'll talk to Dutch about it," Johnny said. "I don't know if we need tickets."

"I can't wait," Kumiko said warmly.

"We also have to show you around," Daniel said.

"You snooze you lose Daniel, we're showing her around," Ali said. "Tomorrow we're going to hit up the museums."

"Ali's invited both of us," Jessica said.

"It's a break from school, I'm sure you know," Ali said motioning towards the guys.

"She's also said we can have a sleepover," Kumiko said.

"She lives in a mansion!" Jessica said.

"It's going to be fun, but no boys allowed," Ali said. "You can get them back later."

Daniel felt a little sprout of jealously, then the gentle way Johnny took his hand.

"You better give them back," Johnny said. "You can't keep them."

Daniel knew he was teasing, it was in his stance, his tone.

He studied Johnny, studied Ali.

It was like they were having two conversations at the same time. He didn't understand it.

"You might have to fight me for them," Ali said.

"I'd rather not, you've got a mean right hook."

"Yeah, I do."

Oh.

He got part of it.

Ali was taking the girls to spend the night not just because she liked them, which she did genuinely, but so Daniel could sleep in. So he and Johnny could rest and recover from the fight and all the pain of everything.

It hurt his head.

Was that how they'd communicated before?

In layers?

The jealousy spiked and he held onto Johnny's hand tighter.

Johnny glanced at him then kissed the top of his head.

The girls talked a little more about dancing, about the things they wanted to do while they were all in town. It sounded like Kumiko would be around a month before she had to be back in Tokyo. They were talking about their classes, about performances, parties and learning about being in a new place with new people.

Johnny gently pulled on Daniel's hand, they'd see the girls more later. Their moms were standing on the edge of the garden.

His mom stopped mid-sentence rushing over and was suddenly frantic.

"Have you done any first aid care?"

"Yes Mrs. LaRusso," Johnny said. "I got him a couple of ice packs and put the green stuff Mr. Miyagi makes on a lot of the bruising. I'm sure there's more, but he's been...a bit stubborn. Nothing is broken or seems to be pulled."

"Lucille," his mom said.

Daniel blinked in surprise looked at the way Johnny recovered and then smiled, pleased.

"He really can be stubborn," his mom said. "Did you tell him he was going to be in pain tomorrow?"

"Ma!"

"Of course Lucille," Johnny said. "He keeps brushing it off."

Traitor.

"You know, maybe you should lock yourselves up in the bathroom and make sure you didn't miss a spot. Daniel's probably embarrassed to be fussed over in front of all your friends. You got to be very thorough. Plus maybe if he sees how much of him is bruised he might relent and let you help him," Ms. Lawrence said.

She said it seriously. Straight faced. But she winked at him when he looked at her.

"You know that's a good idea," Lucille said. "He's been through so much tonight you want to make sure it doesn't spill too much into tomorrow and the rest of the week while all of your friends are here."

Daniel swallowed hard. He didn't know how he felt about the recommendation. Maybe if it hadn't been from Johnny's mom. Maybe if he'd come up with himself.

"You did so well," Lucille said smiling at him. "I'm proud of my two-time champion. Don't worry we'll keep celebrating for a while."

Johnny seemed to have thought it over and Daniel felt a gentle tug on his hand.

Daniel's mom kissed his forehead. She was wearing the lipstick that left marks.

"Ma!"

She laughed rubbing at it. "Whoops, Johnny you might want to help get rid of that too."

Johnny nodded pulling him off towards the bathroom. On the way, Daniel glanced deeper into the garden. Sitting out in the garden lit by only lantern light was Mr. Miyagi, sitting between Sato and Yukie drinking tea. Even though Daniel couldn't see his face he knew Mr. Miyagi was smiling. That his heart was full and bursting. He thought he understood that. Felt it reflected, mirrored under everything else within himself, following Johnny. Peace. Happiness.

Chapter End Notes

Lemon Blueberry cake with cream cheese frosting recipe
some tea cookie recipes

Home is Where your Heart is Johnny was getting frustrated. Daniel was standing in the bathroom light arms crossed refusing to budge.

"I've seen it all before."

"It's different!"

"Okay well, will you do it yourself?"

"No."

"Daniel, you know how slow and how painful it is to recover without Mr. Miyagi's goop. This is like, magic, even you said so."

"You know that stuff reeks."

"I do," Johnny stepping closer into Daniel's space. "And I've already gotten a lot of it. So I don't understand, what's wrong?"

Daniel looked away with mumbled. "What if you don't want to sleep next to me tonight?"

Johnny wondered if he should take his shirt off.

It'd worked when Daniel hadn't been able to sleep.

But he feared if he did it too much Daniel would catch on.

"I can't sleep anywhere else," Johnny said sinking down onto the tile in front of Daniel. "Because you're in debt to me and I'm not giving up my spot until long after it's paid off."

Daniel looked down at him, confused.

"You forgot your promised I.O.U already? You also owe me many many many many millions of kisses. I plan to collect on all of those."

Daniel stared down at him. He never thought he'd have to work so hard to get Daniel out of his pants. But he still had a few tricks up his sleeves. A few things he knew for sure usually worked with Daniel.

He gently placed his hand on Daniel's hip and held his gaze.

"Please Daniel, let me see?"

Almost.

It was teetering.

Daniel was reaching out towards him- damn it wrong direction.

He'd probably fucked up. It was a very thin and almost constantly moving line that sent Daniel down a horny road. And Johnny already had learned beaten and bruised didn't seem to stop the guy. Daniel was gently cupping his face, thumbs on his cheeks. Johnny moved to kiss Daniel's hand.

"Let me take care of you."

"I don't want to see," Daniel whispered after a moment.

Like it was something hard to get out.

They all had made a big deal out of it, all the bruising, the beaten he'd taken.

Maybe it was overwhelming.

He could fix that.

"Come down here then," Johnny said.

Daniel waited only a moment before stiffly working his way down to the tile next to him.

"Close your eyes."

Daniel frowned at him.

"I'm serious, close your eyes, let me work, don't look."

Daniel sighed and shut his eyes. "Okay."

Johnny leaned in close, he had a wet washcloth and worked on the smear of red lipstick on Daniel's forehead.

"Not so bad huh?"

Daniel let out a huff. "You know that wasn't what I meant."

"I know," Johnny said kissing him. "Mind lifting your arms?"

He might as well take the time to re-check everything. If Daniel was nervous about seeing all the damage Barnes had done it'd be imperative that Johnny got it right in the moment Daniel let him.

Daniel started complaining but it was all steam. He still did as Johnny asked and Daniel studied his skin, the spots he's been able to reach earlier were still fine. But there were things he missed.

Johnny kissed his shoulder, in a spot that wasn't hurt, opening the jar and getting to work.

He'd try to be fast. Listening to Daniel complain. Kissing him frequently, when he could, working his way over everything he could see, checking for damage that was worse.

They were lucky. Lucky Daniel had instinctively moved to protect himself when he could.

He hated that. Hated to be relieved that it wasn't worse. Knowing the whole time Kreese and Silver could've told Barnes to break something and he would've. Not just taken him out but snapped something.

"Can you lift your hips?"

Daniel's complaints stalled for a moment as he pushed himself up.

Johnny worked quickly, stripping him down to check for more injuries.

"Why is it you're in such a rush to get me naked when I'm hurt?" Daniel complained.

"Just you wait."

"For what?"

"Till we move."

"Promise?"

"Promise."

It wasn't as bad as he feared, but everything still looked bruised.

"You don't want anything happening on a bathroom floor."

Maybe he could distract with talking.

"You don't know that, maybe it's on my list," Daniel said.

"Seriously? Should I just assume anywhere is on your list?"

"Yes."

Johnny sighed, "You do realize some places are just kind of gross."

"If I cleaned the bathroom?"

"Maybe ours."

"Aha! We will complete the list."

"How long is this list?"

Daniel got quiet at that. Thoughtful. Doing math. Johnny hurried to finish bandaging, finish checking.

"I'm going to assume that means it's long," Johnny said.

Taking clothes off of someone was easier than putting them on. Though Daniel thankfully wasn't as unwieldy to re-dress as the kids he babysat, who hated jackets and their pajamas.

"I hate this," Daniel said with a frown.

"Helping you get dressed? You made it seem sweet and romantic when you helped me with it."

"That was different."

"How?"

Daniel frowned. "because-"

"Could you get up a little?"

Daniel sighed pushing himself up a little stiffly. "You getting hurt, needing help. That's-"

"What?" Johnny asked grabbing Daniel's shirt to help him into it.

Daniel's eyes opened after Johnny got his head through. "You're tough. It's nice being needed or able to help you. You let me in. I like it. But I'm always getting hurt, and people are always after me. You, the guys, Chozen, Barnes, Silver. After a while, it's gotten...I'd rather ignore it. I'm getting tired of it. And-"

Johnny pulled the shirt the rest of the way down and stepped back, waiting.

Daniel was looking down at the tiled floor with a frown.

"What if you get tired of it? Tired of me coming home hurt? Tired of patching me up because I keep getting into fights? Because I'm not strong enough to end it at the start? It always draws out and gets worse. And that attempted revival of Cobra Kai...that hurt Johnny. Silver tricking me. Barnes being everywhere. He found us while out running. They broke into the house. You and every person out there that I love are in danger just by being around me."

Johnny sat down on the edge of the tub. "I know what it's like for pain to become part of the norm. Do you think the way I handle it is good?"

Daniel blinked looking down at him surprised.

"I don't complain. I don't let anyone make a fuss. I didn't ever tell anyone where it came from or who did it. You had to pry it out. If you hadn't my mom might still be married to Sid and I'd still be miserable."

Johnny reached out gently taking Daniel's hands in his. "I know I said I was worried I'd stopped you from getting away from the danger you attract by hurting your knee. But I didn't tell you that my thought then was to follow you around and have your back. That's still my plan. To be there. I want to fight by your side, not watch from the sidelines, not to find out about it later. I think we'd kick ass together. And yeah it sucks, but it's like that balance wheel. I know you've got my back. And I've got yours. I'm not going anywhere. I'll bandage you up with this stinky stuff every single time you come home hurt and sleep next to you. Just like I know you will. And the only reason I'll get tired of it is because I wasn't there by your side to help you through it."

Johnny stood up, gently pulling Daniel over towards the sink, throwing his arm over Daniel's shoulder.

"Look in the mirror."

"Johnny-"

"Go on."

Daniel sighed, and Johnny knew Daniel was looking at him, not himself.

"Yourself."

Daniel grumbled but did.

"Is that the same kid from Jersey, from Newark?"

"I don't know."

"That's because it's a trick question."

"Then how was I supposed to answer that?"

Johnny laughed softly. "Rhe guys were in this class where they were supposed to figure out who they are and it's not easy. But I think it depends. You are Daniel LaRusso, a two-time karate champion. You've won a death match in Okinawa. You used to just be this little shrimp from Newark New Jersey who talked a lot. And you still are a chatty Italian from Newark. But that's only part of who you are. You're no longer shrimpy. You kick ass. Make friends everywhere you go and enemies. But sometimes you turn those enemies into friends. Hell, you're moving in with one of them. Me. That's me."

Daniel laughed. "I got that part. "

"And I'm pretty damn excited about it."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah. I don't care that I may or may not be bandaging up your wounds. Who knows maybe you won't really get into fisticuffs with anyone for decades. Maybe it's going to get really boring. But I know I'm not going to ever get bored because you contain multitudes. You're better than a good book."

Johnny leaned over and kissed the side of his temple.

"Nerd," Daniel said.

"Hey. The point is, be nicer to yourself. We're all here because we love you."

"Chozen does not love me."

Johnny laughed. "No, probably not. But he's warming up and for him that's progress. So, are you ready to enjoy being with everyone? To be able to tell your mom that you're all bandaged up, finally, and can avoid some of that worry? And I'll finally stop pestering you because you're better?"

Daniel sighed. "Yeah, just one second."

Johnny watched as Daniel stood a little taller, looking himself in the mirror, shoulders back before turning back and kissing him and slipping out of the door.

Johnny smiled following him out into the room full of their friends and family.

Sato, Mrs. Larusso Lucille, his mom, Yukie, and Mr. Miyagi were still awake in the garden playing games and drinking something Sato had brought from Okinawa when they went to bed.

The girls had left with Ali leaving Chozen waffling between staying with the adult adults or going with the guys who were determined to camp on their floor.

The guys had looked at Daniel first, trying to determine whether or not to bring Chozen with them but eventually, Daniel sighed, a confirmation.

After a long night of talking to people of shouting which he hadn't done in so long, Johnny was ready for bed. He showered and let them all figure it out themselves. Whatever Daniel was comfortable with.

Johnny didn't care.

All he wanted was to curl up in bed next to Daniel.

After his shower, he did just that. Walked past the bodies and curled up in bed next to Daniel.

Daniel was sitting up, asking about things they should do since everyone was in town and the guys were giving ideas.

Chozen was sitting on the floor next to Tommy and near the door.

"Museums?"

"Ali said she's doing that."

"Ball game?"

"Oh, that could be fun."

"Tours of the studios?"

"Maybe."

"To the beach? The pier?"

"That could be fun."

Johnny wrapped an arm around Daniel's waist, laying down. He smelled like green goop. But also like Daniel, and he could ignore the green goop smell.

He listened to the soft chatter, the laughter.

It felt like home. But he knew the place didn't matter. The moments. The people. That's what mattered.

"Where do you want this Johnny?"

"What's it say on the box?"

"Kitchen."

"So where do you think it goes?"

"Kitchen."

"Yup."

Daniel and he had spent almost a week splitting their time working at the shop, cleaning up their new place, and packing everything up.

Daniel was adamant about labeling everything with a thick black marker sharpie. He'd even gotten Johnny's back when he had fallen asleep after a late night of packing at Mr. Miyagi's.

Mr. Miyagi's place had been easy. So had all of the stuff at Jimmy's that was already packed. But it'd still been exhausting.

Johnny still didn't have a clue what Daniel had written. He couldn't see it. But sometimes Daniel lifted up his shirt to look at his back and then seemed too pleased with himself. The guys had seen it. Refused to tell him what it said. He was going to scrub it off if he could figure out where the hell it was.

The girls had helped. Or offered to help. Kumiko and Jessica were helping. Ali was complaining.

Why did Johnny and Daniel get to move into a nice apartment like they had their lives together but Ali had to share a dorm room with a whole bunch of girls who hadn't ever shared space before and had guys over all the time? So really it was like Ali and her roommate were cramming three people into a tiny room that in the pictures looked cool and spacious but was actually a tiny dingy cell. And yet Daniel and Johnny had a whole ass apartment.

"Natural lighting. A fucking balcony. Sinks that don't drip."

"Johnny could fix that if it did drip. Not a problem," Daniel said putting their mugs carefully into the cabinets.

There was something in his tone, a type of pride that Johnny could fix things.

"Learned it from Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said softly.

"Hell, your fridge is already full!"

"Their moms," Jessica said. "I came with them yesterday."

"Jimmy too," Daniel said. "He filled it with drinks."

"Had to get around your mom's to sneak the beer in," Jimmy said.

"Spoiled. You two are absolutely spoiled."

"There's also a pool," Bobby said. "With water in it."

"Did you see all the cookies?" Kumiko asked helping herself to one, passing one to Chozen.

"That'd be Bobby," Daniel said.

"This is seriously unfair," Ali said. "Also who needs a bed that big? How'd it even get up here?"

"Mom did it," Johnny said with a shrug. "I don't know how she does it she always figures stuff like that out."

Daniel had picked it out. He and his mom had gone out after their little tea or brunch dates to look at the bed. His mom said it could be one of their housewarming gifts.

She'd laughed, leaning forward, voice dropped all conspiratorial to tell Johnny at one of their dinners that Daniel had taken the whole thing seriously. Had asked the staff lots of questions.

"He was looking for a bed...oh how did he put it....all his friends could sleep in but wouldn't feel too lonely when it was just him and his partner. It was very sweet. The staff always thought he was part of one of those orgy cults though."

He'd asked Daniel about it. When they were driving to pick up Kumiko and Jessica from Ali's days before they moved in.

Daniel was adamant he drive. Kept putting his hand too high on his thigh to be acceptable with guests.

Johnny wondered if they were playing a game of chicken. When would Johnny tell him to stop?

He was thinking of letting the game go. Let the girls tease Daniel about it.

"Heard you've gotten a new bed," Johnny had started.

"We have a new bed. Courtesy of your mom. Which is kind of weird."

"Beds are expensive," Johnny said.

"Yeah...they really are. I tried to tell your mom it was okay. I mean we have my bed and she wouldn't take no for an answer. She did that thing where she hooked her arm through mine and said We're already here there's no harm in looking. Which I didn't realize was this thing she does until I talked to my mom. But it's apparently a thing, a weapon she uses on LaRusso's. No harm in looking she says. And then my mom says we end up leaving with our arms full of something not knowing what had happened and not a penny from our accounts are gone. She spoils us. Ma said they went to look at decor right? For her place and she left with a huge painting that she liked and like table lamps. Stuff she didn't need but had liked. And your mom, right, she said It won't be here the next time, so how about I get it and then if you change your mind and don't like it we'll bring it back. Did that happen? No. And the receipt miraculously disappeared when Ma wanted to pay her back. Your mom is as sneaky as you. Anyway so we go in and she's chatting up the salespeople all friendly and smiles and talking about bedding and thread count and...."

He got quiet, his face was a little red. Johnny had looked over, put his hand over Daniel's.

"They asked who the bed was for, and she didn't outright say it, but the salesperson thought I was her son. Or well one of her sons. She joked that she had 6 of them, but it was for me really. For the boys still at home. I didn't think she'd ever... I mean..."

"You should try calling her by her name."

Daniel's hand nearly flew off his leg, stunned, "What? No! I can't!"

That'd been another conversation they'd had. His mother teased him that he was on a first-name basis with Lucille.

"Are you there with Daniel?" Johnny had asked.

She'd looked at him over her glass of wine, all mischief. "I never told him he couldn't."

"Mom."

"What?" she asked innocently. "There is only so much I can do to try and be less intimidating. He's going to have to get there himself. Besides, I do like him. I like him for you. And I like his family, the ones I've met. His grandparents seem nice."

"Did you meet them? How?"

"Oh no, not in person. Lucille gave me the phone, just shoved it in my hands because dinner was starting to boil over. I explained and apologized for taking over the phone and as soon as I said who I was they started gushing over you. And that is always top on my list of conversations. Easily can talk for hours about you. They wanted to know all about your apartment hunting. How it's going at the shop. If you like it. When you're going to visit again. You know getting along with the in-laws that's an important step."

"Mom!"

"I'm just saying, you're set, honey. A cute boyfriend who can cook and adores you and his family loves you. If the two of you can avoid getting into fights or starting I don't know karate wars then I think it's smooth sailing. And that's such a relief."

She'd seemed so sure, so happy for him.

"You can say it, it's just a name," Johnny told Daniel.

"It's rude! It's presumptuous," Daniel said parking in front of Ali's.

The door opened and the girls came out. Ali in tow.

"See, I'll show you. Ali, when did you get onto a first name basis with Johnny's mom?"

"Never," Ali said hopping into the back. "I'm coming with. My parents are going to the country club all day. I'd rather not answer How's college? 12,000 times."

"See?" Daniel asked. "I don't want to be the guy who called his boyfriend's mom by her first name without her permission."

Jessica leaned forward in the car, over the middle of the front seat, "Wait, is Johnny telling you to call his mom by her first name?"

"Yes."

"Then I think you can call her by her first name," Jessica said.

"Thank you," Johnny said.

"What? No. It's got to come from the person. It's like- okay so there was this kid in Newark with this nickname. But if you weren't given permission to call him by the nickname it was like super rude. Just because you give me permission doesn't mean it's not still rude. It just means I can call her her name around you. But even then if I start doing that I know myself and I'll fuck up and call her that to her face or like other people."

"Daniel it's seriously not that hard," Johnny said.

"Kumiko help me here," Daniel said when they came to a stoplight.

"It's Johnny's mother, surely he knows best."

"Yeah Daniel, Johnny never gave me that permission," Ali said.

"Outnumbered Daniel," Jessica said with a grin.

"I should kick you all out," Daniel said but there was no bite to it.

"Nuh-uh, we're going to the pier," Ali said. "I want some greasy deep-fried thing and ice cream and watch some gull try to steal someone's fries."

Daniel sighed, hand settling on Johnny's leg.

"Is that a common occurrence?" Ali asked.

"Oh all the time," Jessica said.

"Very much so," Kumiko said.

"What?" Daniel asked.

"You just casually feeling up Johnny."

"I am not."

"You are too. Laying claim."

"Am not."

"I always thought it was not wanting to lose track of him."

"How would he lose track of him? Daniel is your peripheral vision that bad?"

"Hey."

"Johnny, how long has he been doing this?" Ali asked.

"Almost ever since I apologized."

"That's nearly a year ago! Johnny, how the hell did you not know he liked you?"

"I thought he was just touchy with people," Johnny said stiffly.

"I should be the one offended," Ali said sinking back. "We were still dating then."

"Dating? You dated Daniel?" Kumiko asked in surprise.

"I dated both of them," Ali said waving her hand.

"At the same time?" Kumiko asked, eyes wide.

"No! I dated Johnny for two years, we broke up. I met Daniel over the summer, we became friends, and then started dating after...well it was kind of hit or miss whether I knew he liked it. Seriously Johnny, Daniel was much clearer with you than he was with me."

"Somehow I doubt that," Johnny said.

"I tried different tactics okay? Johnny didn't understand like 90% of my flirting, so I tried body language," Daniel said with a sigh pulling up to the pier and parking.

Johnny leaned over kissing him. "Sorry for not getting the memo."

Daniel wasn't actually upset. Johnny could tell that. He was just sparking back over the teasing. Probably uneasy about getting up the nerve to call his mom by her first name. A big step.

They walked along the pier.

Johnny got fish and chips from one of the vendors and the girls got tacos and burritos. Daniel stole some of Johnny's fish and chips.

All the tension in Daniel's shoulders from ever since Silver had broken into the house and Barnes had popped up seemed to be gone. A distant memory. At least in the bright California sun with some of their friends.

No one spent the night. It'd been shocking how fast the guys had unpacked everything. They were getting scary good at it.

They'd stayed until a little after dinner, then threw an arm around Chozen's shoulder and said they'd get him back to Mr. Miyagi's and see them later.

The girls headed out too and then it was just the two of them.

Johnny was dripping sweat. He wiped his forehead off with the bottom of his shirt.

He'd lugged a lot of stuff up the stairs, set up a lot of furniture, but it was officially a livable space.

"I'm going to take a shower," he said.

"...yeah, okay," Daniel said voice tight.

There were lots of parts to their new apartment that Johnny liked.

He liked the pool, liked that there was a rooftop space that the owner said they could barbeque on or host parties, he liked that there was security downstairs, that there was a balcony. That they had a nice kitchen that Daniel liked that looked easy to navigate. Liked that the bathroom had a tall shower.

He wouldn't have to bend down as he had been for...it'd been over six months. Other than the night at the hotel, in Okinawa, and at Mr. Miyagi's he had to crouch down to shower.

He rolled his shoulders under the hot water. It was nice to not hunch anymore.

He heard the door open.

He listened.

Silence.

"You should know both my boyfriend and myself are award-winning black belts in karate."

He heard Daniel laugh. "You thought I was an intruder?"

He heard Daniel moving around, the sound of clothing on the tile.

"You didn't say anything. I'd rather not flirt with an intruder thinking it was you. That'd be embarrassing what if they flirted back? I'd have to tell them whoops thought you were my boyfriend."

"New apartment with great security that impressed your mother and the guys and you think our first night someone would sneak in and the first thing they'd do is follow you into the shower?" Daniel asked pushing back the curtain and stepping in.

"Covering my bases," Johnny said pulling him close.

"And if you'd known it was me?"

"I figured it was you."

"But if you'd been a hundred percent?"

"Then maybe I'd have asked you if you were the one who put the lube in the shower?" Johnny asked pointing to where it was nestled in amongst their shower products.

"Why would you think I did that?" Daniel asked.

"It fits, but also knowing our friends, if you didn't do it then we're going to be finding lube and condoms everywhere."

"Sounds fun, like a treasure hunt. Could make a game of it."

"So you didn't stick the lube in here?"

"I did, but what if when we find some, that's where we have sex?"

"I feel like you know where everything is, that's an unfair advantage."

"You don't know that. You said so yourself the guys might've put some in weird places."

"Yeah, that was if you hadn't done this. But you said you did. Which means maybe they weren't that weird."

"Still could be fun."

"Hey," Johnny said cupping Daniel's face in his hands.

"Not fun? I mean you could hide some too-"

"Daniel-"

"Yeah?"

"Welcome home," Johnny said leaning down and kissing him.

Let in

Chapter Notes

> We are nearing the end of this fic. I want to take my time on the final chapters, so I won't be able to continue the daily posting in order to make sure I get everything the way I want.
> There will be at least two more chapters, I can't say for certain how many more exactly because sometimes I end up making more chapters than I expected. (I mean this is over 100 and I never expected that when I started lol)

"Daniel do you have the capacity to sit still for a long period of time?" Dutch asked. "Like not move a muscle?"

Dutch had come over for breakfast. Daniel didn't know when or how Dutch had made himself a key, or how he'd gotten an all-clear from security to not get stopped. But he was making them omelets so Daniel couldn't complain. He figured he should just assume they all had keys. Maybe Johnny had given them copies, in case. Daniel shouldn't have been surprised to leave his room, rubbing his eyes to start making coffee to find Dutch in their kitchen looking in their fridge. To look over and Dutch just ask "Want an omelet?" Coffee already was going. Maybe Ali was right. They were spoiled.

"Is it time for that again?" Johnny asked from where he sat holding his coffee. He'd only said "hey" to Dutch when he'd seen him. Like he wasn't surprised that their bubble of privacy was gone after one night. Maybe Daniel should've been grateful it'd lasted that long.

"Yeah," Dutch said with a sigh. Like whatever they were talking about was a hassle. A big chore that he had to do.

"You're parents said Daniel could join? Thought they were very particular about the whole thing."

Dutch slid a perfectly golden yellow omelet onto a plate and down in front of Daniel. "That's the frustrating thing right? I was always like Can I invite more friends? They were like Johnny is okay. But- remember what happened last time"

"What happened last time?" Daniel asked around a mouthful. Dutch had added a whole bunch of vegetables into the omelet, stuff Daniel liked, and damn if he hadn't perfected his omelet skills since the summer. Daniel might forgive him for essentially breaking in to make them breakfast.

"When I was little I begged my parents to let a friend come over," Dutch said turning back to the stove to work on the next omelet.

"He was in preschool," Johnny added.

"And they finally relented and this kid came home with me and we played and then the kid saw my parents he gave them this note from his parents right? I couldn't read yet I figured it was something like my child can't eat sugar or something like that because that was what my prissy preschool was like. A bunch of snotty kids who couldn't eat bread, or sugar, or have milk, not because they were allergic but because their parents read some stupid book and thought their kids should only eat like meat blessed by some traveling monk or something."

"I ran into a couple of those at one of my prep schools," Johnny said.

"Right?" Dutch said waving the spatula. "Like fine, live your life, but they're so prissy about it. Anyway, so the letter my parents ended up reading it aloud. Dear Mr. and Mrs. Dutch. My kid will continue being friends with your kid if you invest in my project. It's a startup for blah blah blah. Essentially send money home with my kid or they won't stay friends with yours. And the damn kid knew it too. That his friendship was a fucking transaction. I thought we were friends over some stupid coloring page thing we'd worked on together and we liked the same stupid cartoon and he'd shared like a snack with me. Didn't know his parents had seen me dropped off and were like go be nice to that kid, we'll give you a new toy if you befriend him. I was so pissed I bit the kid. Fucking hard too, had to get stitches. I was so hurt because my parents had warned me. So that was the last time I was allowed to have anyone over. And they reminded me of it every damn time unless it was Johnny."

"Because he took care of you when you were sick?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah, and my parents liked him because he never wanted to talk about business or money. They'd be like so Johnny what are you working on? And Johnny would be like karate with Dutch and the guys. How's school, Johnny? Good, we're learning xyz. What do you want to do Johnny? No clue. Park ranger? They liked it because everyone else would be like "I'm working on my stock portfolio, I'm studying this so that I can get into Oxford and I want to be a CEO for this stupid company." And Johnny was grounded and polite. He had all the skills to be a bitchy rich kid but never was. Which when my parents found out why, just like the rest of us, oh they were so fucking pissed. That bastard put his hands on Johnny? Yeah, that's what the whole damn lawsuit is over. Kreese did too? Yeah, that's what the other lawsuit is on. Why didn't you say anything? What was I supposed to do? Tell us. What would you have done? Adopted him. He has a mom. That's not how that shit works. Adopted both of them. You want to adopt like a woman your own damn age? How's that going to work huh? They didn't have a response to that. But it shocked them for sure. Money solves so many problems for them, creates more problems. But when they like people they get protective," Dutch sighed setting an omelet down in front of Johnny then turning back around. "Anyway, I think seeing everyone who showed up also kind of shocked them. I think they thought they were it, right? That they'd found out a secret, knew this cool kid who was a good friend to me, didn't realize how many other people had also known that. Because Johnny didn't know. Didn't realize, so like he didn't talk about his Abuela or her family, or the libraries or anything and I think they realized that meant Johnny didn't talk about them. And man, you'd think that'd hurt their feelings right? Johnny only talked about us guys. But they liked it. Made them feel like a best kept secret. Liked the look on Sid's face when they showed up. Were so damn smug over it. Like yeah you stupid mother fucker, your kid has powerful friends but doesn't gossip or name drop like a sniveling worm like you are. He lets people keep their privacy. And that's such a big thing my parents love. But they also saw the guys right? Like in a completely different light, because they saw how hard we worked on the whole damn thing and they were like Dutch why didn't you ever invite them over? You need to show all these friends you have. And I was like because you fucking told me not to! Hell, they still think I fucking bite people, I was like three years old! You can't blame my shit taste in friends and being tricked when I was three."

"Didn't you bite kids in elementary school?" Johnny asked.

"They deserved it. It's different. They tried to get me to eat bugs. I didn't want to, I liked bugs. They wouldn't leave me the fuck alone so we got into a fight. I hadn't learned how to do karate yet. So I did what I did know how to do. Bite. It's one of the reasons I did karate. For discipline and to learn how to fight without biting."

He sat down across from them with a sigh, digging into his own omelet.

"Listen, it's a big deal that they realized I've got friends that aren't out after favors. That they don't want it to just be Johnny. So Daniel man dress up, but comfortable and do whatever the hell you have to to sit still, okay?"

"Takes hours," Johnny said.

Daniel glanced at him, how serious he was, at Dutch eating his omelet.

"When?"

"Saturday, got to be there at 7 am."

"Okay."

"Yeah? You can do it?"

Daniel smiled softly reaching out and patting Dutch's hand. "It's important, right? I'll be there."

Dutch smiled, a warm smile like he'd been worried Daniel would say no. Dutch had been there for him, but hadn't realized it went both ways and not just for tournaments.

"You guys mind picking up Jessica?" Dutch asked.

"Sure. I think she's still at my mom's," Johnny said.

Dutch nodded.

"Thanks the house is going to be hectic."

"Need us to bring anything?" Johnny asked.

"Coffee?"

"With three Irish creamer cups and a packet of hot chocolate in it from the gas station?" Johnny asked.

"You know it."

"Got it."

"Daniel, you still want to do morning runs?" Dutch asked.

"Maybe not for a bit. I kind of want to relax, is that okay?"

"Yeah, that's fine. You've earned it."

"Thanks."

Their new schedule felt luxurious after all the stress and anxiety related to the tournament was over.

Not getting up at five am to run.

Not training in the garden late into the evening.

Daniel would get up to the alarm and would turn it off and then wake up Johnny. He learned that if he peppered Johnny with a bunch of kisses he'd wake up laughing, like it tickled, squirming out of the way. It got him up faster.

He loved their shower. It was so much bigger and he wasn't worried about being in there too long, worrying about Mr. Miyagi needing the bathroom. He liked that there was enough space for all his stuff. That by setting out sunblock on the counter Johnny was using it. Kumiko had brought him some night cream from Tokyo and he was trying to get Johnny to use that too, but that'd be a process. He'd be patient.

He liked that by the time he stepped out of the shower the apartment smelled like freshly brewed coffee, and his mug was set out for him at his place at the table. That Johnny would cook if no one else was there. Would set out those pamphlets about schools for him to read while he ate. But usually by the time he came out of the shower other people were over. Because it was still break the guys would be over for breakfast.

Bobby made cinnamon rolls, Jimmy had made corned beef and hash, Tommy made waffles and Dutch stuck to his eggs, though he was branching out to frittatas and quiches.

The girls came sometimes too, sitting at their table.

He never would've expected them all to show up so early, before work, while on vacation to sit around with them while they got ready for the day, talking. But he liked it. Liked seeing them before work, hearing about what they'd do for the day.

When Kumiko came she'd bring Chozen.

Chozen made them breakfast one morning. He'd come in with his arms full of bags and went to work quietly while everyone talked. It was like what Mr. Miyagi would make. Like what they had sometimes in Okinawa. But more. When he was done he kept setting more food onto the table. He'd made the eggs Mr. Miyagi had made sometimes, rice, soup, grilled fish, a cucumber salad, and pickles.

Daniel frowned. Chozen set most of it in front of Johnny. The bastard was showing off he could cook.

He set something that looked like beans in front of Kumiko on her rice.

"Hey," Kumiko complained.

"It's good for you. Eat it."

Kumiko frowned.

"Want me to list all the health benefits?" Chozen asked arms folded.

"I know what they are,"

"Then eat it."

"I'm on vacation."

"It's good for your bones. Dancers need good strong bones."

Kumiko sighed, rolling her eyes.

"What is it?" Johnny asked.

"Want to try it?" Kumiko asked.

"Uh sure."

"It's not popular with westerners," Chozen warned.

"But it's healthy right?" Johnny asked holding his bowl of rice over to Kumiko who picked a single bean up with her chopsticks and Daniel watched as sticky strings followed it before she set it on his rice.

"It's called Nattō," Chozen said. "Fermented soybeans."

"Can't believe you brought it with you," Kumiko said with a sour look on her face.

"Didn't have to," Chozen said. "Found it at the store with Yukie. She worried you're not eating healthy enough. Said Tokyo might be too much fast food."

"Since when did you and Aunt Yukie team up?"

"I've been helping her with her garden. And we have game night with Uncle three times a week."

Kumiko sighed and sunk back into her chair, mumbling.

"Is it good?" Jessica asked.

"It's healthy," Kumiko complained. "When we discussed coming to LA I wanted to eat burgers and ice cream and all the sweets and junk food. And Chozen keeps giving me health food."

Johnny was staring at his single bean then popped it and a bit of rice into his mouth, eating thoughtfully. "Not bad."

"Seriously?"

"Would you like more?" Chozen asked getting the container again.

"Hold it Chozen," Kumiko said. "Johnny want mine? We could swap rice bowls."

"Sure," Johnny said holding out his for Kumiko.

"Don't tell Aunt Yukie," Kumiko said quickly taking the plain rice. "I get it. Thanks, Chozen but hey, Johnny's eating the healthy stuff okay? It's a good trade."

Chozen frowned but nodded.

Daniel grabbed one of the beans out of Johnny's bowl of rice, trying it. Nutty, but texturally he hated it.

"Not for everyone," Chozen said, almost smugly.

"This is all delicious, thank you Chozen," Johnny said.

Chozen smiled, proud of himself, insufferably, in his stance.

Damn it.

Johnny was right.

It was good. Daniel ate bitterly, wanting to hate it.

Listening to everyone talk, trying the nattō, trying everything.

Jessica liked the nattō and split it with Johnny.

After breakfast, they went to the shop.

Jessica would hang out with Ali, with the guys, with Kumiko.

But Sato and Yukie would come to the shop with Mr. Miyagi. They would be there when they arrived.

Sato and Chozen would leave after an hour to go work on the dojo's.

They were repainting, changing out the mats.

Sometimes Yukie would go with them to help.

The guys tried to go once, but the memories of the place were still too strong. They warned Johnny and Daniel not to go. And Sato and Chozen never asked, never offered. Like it was something unspoken. Until the bad energy was aired out, until it looked different enough. Which Daniel appreciated because he didn't want to go. He didn't want to remember the way Silver would walk around him, the way he'd stalked him literally, and in the way he moved. He'd thought it had been his teaching style but had realized later that it'd been because he viewed Daniel as prey because it'd all been a game. He also didn't want to remember Kreese and his hands on Johnny.

They usually had lunch together though, some local shop where Johnny introduced them to the local staff who warmed up immediately because of Johnny's introduction.

And in the evenings they'd go home together, bidding Mr. Miyagi a good night when Yukie came to pick him up, having borrowed the truck for errands.

Mr. Miyagi had offered to let her drive one of the other cars, one of the classics and she'd laughed saying she liked the truck, that the other cars felt too fancy.

"Think she's staying?" Johnny had asked, a bit hopeful one evening when they drove home.

"I'd like to think so, but I think she's going back with Kumiko," Daniel said with a sigh.

He hated it. She'd be so lonely, especially with Sato and Chozen, annoying as he was, being in LA. It sounded like they were keeping Yukie from being lonely and if she went back alone that meant they wouldn't be helping her in the garden or having game night. And Mr. Miyagi was so damn happy they were there. Even Chozen. He'd laughed and said Chozen was working very hard.

Daniel assumed that meant he'd put Chozen to work.

Johnny made a sound rather than comment like he didn't like it but didn't know what to do about it, what to say. And Daniel got that.

At home they'd stop to check for mail, since everyone was in town it meant nothing but junk mail and bills, say hi to the security guards, and then they'd make their way up to their apartment, a quiet ride in the elevator. It was the same every day which let them meet a kid who lived four floors down with a dog bigger than her sitting patiently waiting for their floor.

"Bye Mr. Lawrence, Mr. LaRusso," the kid said as the dog rushed out as the doors open.

"That's kind of weird right?" Daniel asked when the door closed.

"Polite kid."

"But being Mr. LaRusso, some kid calling me that's kind of weird. I mean I'm only 19, hell you're 18."

"She's seven, we're ancient in her eyes."

"When I was her age-"

"Exactly my point."

Daniel rolled his eyes. "Okay yeah, I hear it."

They'd walked into their apartment which was Daniel's favorite part of the day. Tossing the keys into the bowl. Being home. Their home was so refreshing. Arms wrapped around him, pulling him back into a kiss, the door slowly clicking shut. A kind of kiss that was like it was more necessary than air, like it ranked higher on that list of needs, until Daniel was breathless when Johnny pulled away, "Welcome home."

That was something that was taking getting used to.

Johnny always liked kissing, always slow long languid kisses, but somehow he'd taken it up a notch now that they had their own place. The way they usually ended up on the couch, the door locked just in case their friends came over so they'd have a moment to get redressed or grab a blanket at least.

They ordered take-out for dinner more often than Daniel would let anyone know. Though Chozen had figured it out when he saw all the take-out flyers.

"I thought you cooked, pasta?" he'd said quietly, frowning at a take-out menu on one of the breakfasts where Bobby was making pancakes filled with cinnamon and chocolate chips.

"I do," Daniel said prickling.

"Hmm."

"What does hmm mean?"

"No ring. Not cooking. I think Johnny-san should've stayed in Okinawa," Chozen said quietly.

"What does that mean?" Daniel hissed.

"You met Ms. Lawrence yes?"

"Yeah."

"Got parent's permission. In Tomi village that's all you need. But you haven't asked."

"We're not even old enough to drink."

"Does not matter."

"I'm sorry Chozen I've been a bit busy fighting for my life. But it doesn't mean you can-"

"I will prove self a good alternative. In case. "

"You know just when I think maybe you're okay, you're a real-"

"I know," Chozen said with a grin.

He'd walked away and Daniel frowned. Utter bastard. Did he not realize he didn't have a chance? But he could make it look easy. Just coming in with plans, in their own damn apartment with the guys, with Kumiko and Jessica.

Saturday came and Daniel didn't want to get up early. But he did. He put on the suit his mother and Ms. Lawrence helped him pick out. It was sleek. He was surprised at how good he looked in it. The nice cufflinks he'd gotten for his birthday. Looking at Johnny in his royal blue suit.

Daniel didn't want to leave, wanted to rumple up that suit, put it on the floor, make a mess of it.

"Can't keep Jessica waiting," Johnny said gently herding him out of the apartment.

"We can be quick," Daniel said, turning at the door to look over at Johnny.

"With you, I don't ever want to be quick," Johnny said, stepping out of the apartment, locking the door.

"What about coffee?"

"We'll get coffee at the gas station."

"What about breakfast?"

"There will be food at Dutch's."

"What even is happening?"

"Pretend it's normal."

"What?"

"I'm not ruining his surprise."

Daniel groaned, following him to the car.

They picked up Jessica.

Johnny's mom came out, following her in a robe and fuzzy slippers.

She leaned over and kissed Johnny on the top of his head.

"You all have fun okay?"

"Daniel," Jessica said leaning forward whispering. "Do it!"

"What?"

"Call her by her name."

"No."

"Daniel do it."

"I can't."

"Hurry Daniel. Like a band-aid. Rip it off."

Daniel sighed, sitting up a little straighter.

"Thank you, Laura, I hope you have a good day too."

He felt like his heart was in his throat. Like he was going to be sick. He couldn't believe he'd said that.

She smiled and walked over to his side, leaning down slowly.

She was going to threaten him.

She was going to slap him.

He was dead.

She'd take Johnny back.

She'd-

She kissed the top of his head.

"Told you that suit looks good on you, have fun, Daniel."

Johnny was smiling, driving off, waving goodbye to his mom as Jessica burst out laughing. "Told you!"

"She-she was okay with it!"

"Told you," Johnny said.

"But why didn't she-"

"She said she never told you you had to call her by Ms. Lawrence," Johnny said.

"Oh that's evil and cool as hell," Jessica said. "Your mom is awesome Johnny."

"She is," he said with a smile.

Daniel sat stunned through the drive, through Johnny hopping out to buy coffee with Jessica, until they rolled up to Dutch's house and walked in through the front door.

It was a set of doors he'd never been through before and he was shocked out of his stupor.

Sid's mansion had been gaudy and rich, Jimmy's mansion was like a normal home but bigger, too big but all the space was used comfortably, Dutch's home was elegant but also rich rich.

The floor was marble, there was a spiral staircase at the entrance, behind which was a painting of Dutch sitting with his parents and Mr. and Mrs. P.

"Holy shit," Jessica said.

"Right?" Bobby asked quickly taking some of the coffee. "Wait till you walk through the hallway. That was a trip."

Daniel followed them down the hall, holding Johnny's hand.

It was a long hallway with paintings on the walls.

People Daniel didn't know, and then he recognized Mr. and Mrs. Dutch.

They weren't smiling, stiff for several paintings, just getting a little bit older, a little differently dressed, and then they were holding a baby and Daniel watched each painting as that kid and his parents got older until there were different paintings.

Dutch was on his own for a lot of them on one side of the hall and then he stopped suddenly.

Johnny was in the painting.

"You know how some families do like photoshoots? Christmas cards and shit?" Bobby asked.

"Yeah?"

"The Dutch's do paintings. Gigantic fucking paintings. And until this year the only guest has been Johnny."

He had always thought Johnny was gorgeous, but in a painting he was stunning.

"Daniel I had a feeling you'd get stuck here," Dutch said taking his coffee from Johnny. "But I gotta ask you to stare and appreciate Johnny later. My parents aren't very superstitious except in one avenue and that's upsetting artists."

"What?" Daniel asked moving, dragging his eyes away from the painting.

"My mom read The Picture of Dorian Gray as a kid and it freaked her out. She thought artists could trap your soul in paintings, and like she knows it's not really a thing, but it means she's still cautious around them. And it means one of the big rules is not to piss them off and thus not leave them waiting," Dutch said.

"Why didn't she switch over to photographs then?" Daniel asked.

"Didn't want to put an end to traditions," Dutch said with a shrug.

They walked into a big room where the rest of Tommy and Jimmy were, sitting at a big table eating breakfast.

"But eat first and remember it's going to be a lot of sitting still, hope you're ready," Dutch said, slapping Daniel's back. "Look they did remember coffee!"

"Hell yeah!"

"Thank god."

They sat down, eating pancakes, eggs, sausage, bacon, hashbrowns and muffins.

It was like a holiday at the LaRusso's. Where the food was just overflowing. That usually was when there were tons of cousins and aunts and uncles around. But this, it felt like too much for the seven of them. Everything was delicious though and the guys were asking Dutch questions.

"How long do the paintings usually take?"

"Hours.

"How'd you sit through it as a kid?"

"Mom told me if I didn't the painter would steal my soul."

"Shit Dutch that's fucking terrifying."

"Right?"

They moved into the conservatory where the artist was setting up her tools.

She glanced at them when they came in and Dutch positioned them on the chaise lounge that'd been brought out.

Jessica sat in her dress that she'd told them Laura and Daniel's mom had helped her pick out. Laura had also gotten up early to help her with her hair and makeup and she just was beaming.

"Your moms are so nice."

Dutch put his hands on Daniel's shoulders moving him to sit, totally focused, fixing Daniel's tie moving the guys around.

"So we gotta be quiet for this whole thing or?" Jimmy asked sitting down on the floor.

"Nah, we can talk," Dutch said. "Just you gotta perfect not moving."

"Oh thank god."

"Couldn't handle shutting up for a couple of hours?" Dutch asked with a laugh sitting Johnny down next to Daniel, stepping back, studying them, then stepping in again taking Daniel's right hand and putting it in Johnny's left. "You guys going to be okay like that?"

"Yeah," Johnny said looking at Daniel who nodded.

"Perfect, everyone comfortable?" Dutch asked taking his spot in the middle.

"Yup."

"Good to go."

It was long.

They talked a lot.

He heard the artist who looked very serious laugh a couple of times.

They heard all about the adventures Jessica had been having at Laura's. Apparently, Abuela had come over with Gabriella and had made dinner, had asked her about school.

Jessica was shocked they'd remembered her. Shocked everyone had. But it'd been nice.

Mrs. LaRusso came by often, after work and they'd have dinner together talking about the day and about Mrs. LaRusso's new coworkers.

She went out with Kumiko and Ali a lot too.

They'd go on drives, they took Kumiko to the Getty, several other museums. She'd seen her aunt a couple of times and made a few things at the shop and it'd felt like told times.

The guys started planning their next adventure, trying to think of cool places to take her and Kumiko.

"We're going to Newark in a couple of weeks," Johnny said.

"Shit really? For what?"

"Nonnio's birthday," Johnny said.

"Whose Nonnio?" Jessica asked.

"Daniel's grandfather."

"Wait, so is this a whole family deal?" Bobby asked.

"Yeah," Daniel said. "We're flying out with my mom."

"You guys mind keeping an eye on Mr. Miyagi and everyone for us?" Johnny asked.

"Of course, not a problem."

"Want us to babysit the bonsai?"

"Chozen offered," Johnny started.

Daniel tightened his hand around Johnny's.

Damnit Chozen.

"But Mr. Miyagi's got it."

Daniel relaxed.

Of course, Johnny wouldn't leave his bonsai with Chozen. Chozen had trashed Mr. Miyagi's garden in Okinawa. The guys would be picked over Chozen any day.

The bonsai was in their room, and before they'd leave for the day Johnny would move it into the living room.

He'd asked Daniel if he wanted him to do the same with his bonsai and now every day, when they left and came home from work Johnny, would carry both bonsai about the house.

He'd seemed so pleased when Daniel had said yes. Like his bonsai now had a friend. It was cute.

He'd also started a miniature garden on the balcony. Fresh herbs were growing that when they got back from Newark Daniel couldn't wait to use in his cooking.

He knew the bonsai were supposed to go to Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny had asked about it, like he was dropping them off with their granddad before their trip. But Chozen was sneaky.

"Oh, want to know what Daniel did today?" Jessica asked, excitement in her voice.

"What?"

"He called Ms. Lawrence by her first name."

"No way."

"How'd she react?"

"She kissed the top of his head. It was very sweet. But he looked like he was going to faint."

"She's intimidating!" Daniel said.

"Dude, she's like Johnny. If she hated you you'd know."

"What do you mean?"

"She'd destroy you. You'd be gone man."

"That doesn't make me feel better!"

Bobby laughed. "Be nice. What he means Daniel is that she's kind of like Johnny she can be intimidating but she shows you she likes you through actions and spending time with you. I don't know how she has enough time for it all. I mean we've been talking and hell, she's at my house playing games with my little siblings and having take out with my family, she sent all of us care packages while we've been at college. I've had lunch with her since I've come back, from what I've heard she takes Dutch out to dinner frequently, I'm sure there's more."

"She sent me flowers after my debate that got me on the student council," Tommy said. "And I mentioned off hand that my roommate leaves my room freezing and she sent me a blanket."

"She brings me coffee or tea when I'm at the firm," Jimmy said.

"In otherwords Daniel just think about it, do you see her a lot or not at all?" Dutch asked.

Johnny's thumb swiped over the back of his knuckles, a quick comforting movement.

He did see her a lot, nearly once a week or more.

At least a couple times a month he was invited to join her and Johnny for dinner at her place. Now that his mom was in town the next one was going to be all four of them.

She took him mattress shopping.

Helped him pick out a suit.

He thought of all the brunch and cafe meet ups.

"Lawrences seem to just show up in your life when they like you and make themselves comfortable if you let them," Bobby said. "And if you hurt someone they love they will bury you."

Daniel gently squeezed Johnny's hand.

He liked spending time with Johnny's mom. He'd kind of thought she'd been doing it all for his mom though, looking after him for her. But maybe she liked him. Approved of him and that felt good. That she liked Daniel for Daniel and liked him with Johnny.

He'd tell his Nonnia and Nonnio when he got home. When they asked how things were going. He got the guy and the parents approval.

Maybe...maybe Chozen was right. Ugh, gross.

He glanced down quickly at Johnny's hand in his. He'd start thinking about it. It was probably too early.

But his dad had told him when he was little that he'd known on the first date that his mom was the one.

It'd been a windy day and he'd lost his hat, some dorky thing he thought was cool at the time and she'd taken off her heels and chased after it, managed to get it after nearly crashing into a whole bunch of dogs and their dog walker. She'd brought it back to where he stood holding her high heels and she'd dusted it off and put it back on his head telling him it made him look handsome. They'd ended up having pie together that she'd made and brought with her in the park and just talked for hours. She laughed at all his bad jokes and she had her own that made him laugh. He couldn't stop thinking about her, came up with excuses to swing by where she was. She told Daniel that she'd kept cooking and baking things, finding her own excuses to see him. Would make him lunch.

There'd been a day where they'd ended up having the same excuse. Had made each other lunch, and laughed, sitting together with their sandwiches and pasta. They'd found their best friend in the whole world and Daniel had always wondered about that, what that felt like, but now he thought he understood.

Returning to Newark

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Johnny was looking at his bag with a frown. Daniel had already packed and was talking from the other room about food, trying to guess what Mr. Miyagi was making for dinner.

Fish. Had to be fish right? There was like an unwritten rule that 87% of the time if Mr. Miyagi was cooking it was fish. It was good fish but they'd collectively eaten a small aquarium's worth of fish since summer and Daniel was ready for pasta and risotto.

What did one pack when they were going to their boyfriend's grandfather's birthday where the whole family would be there?

Did people usually meet extended family after seven-ish months of dating?

They probably didn't usually move in together, so maybe the ruler people measured their relationships with was already thrown out the window.

It was going to be cold, right?

Newark in January had to be cold.

Daniel had mentioned snow. Lots of snow.

But how much?

More than the mountains?

Did Johnny pack his snowboarding gear? That was a snowsuit.

He doubted people in Newark wore snowsuits to just get around.

He'd dragged out his brown winter jacket and his sweaters. The one Nonnia had made was already in his bag. So far it was the only thing in there.

What books was he going to take?

Would it be rude to take too many?

It'd be nearly a six-hour flight, but Mrs...Lucille was going with them.

Surely he'd be expected to be a good conversation companion then.

What was he going to sleep in?

They were staying with Daniel's godfathers who Johnny had never met.

He was going to meet people important to Daniel.

He had to make a good impression.

He ran a hand through his hair and sighed, looking over at the two bonsai sitting on their shelf.

"Help," he said softly.

His mother had had him over for dinner the night before, Jessica was out with the guys so it was just the two of them and most of the dinner was talking about the trip to Newark.

A reminder of being polite that wasn't needed because Johnny knew as soon as he walked into a room full of people he didn't know he'd revert back to his country club charm mixed with the jump when told obedience Kreese had instilled. As much as it all sucked at least it let him coast through big events.

"It's a big deal," Laura had said.

"I know," Johnny said.

"You get along with Lucille and Daniel's grandparents. But getting along with all the in-laws will require work. And people talk. You've got the important people in your corner, but there might be people like Louie Jr. who will give you shit, or who might not like you. So here's what I want you to do. You remember what I told you when you were little?"

Johnny frowned. "Run into a shop and find an adult?"

"Yes, your adult this time is Daniel."

Johnny laughed.

"I'm not joking, If someone gives you shit you diffuse the situation and when you find a polite and private opening you tell Daniel. You do not let it fester. Dutch said that you daydream about being with Daniel until well into your 70's. If you want to get there you can't let his family be rude or mean to you. You be polite and charming to them and if there's anything bad you tell Daniel so it can get nipped in the bud."

Knowing Dutch gossiped about him and Daniel with his mom was a weird realization. He didn't know how he felt about it.

"But mom-"

"No but mom me, I'm serious Johnny. If they're shitty to you and Daniel does nothing then one I'll be shocked, and two I'll be pissed. It's his family. Think about it this way okay. Let's say I was still married to Sid and Sid was a dick to Daniel what would you do?"

Johnny frowned.

He normally avoided Sid.

Hid from him when he could.

If he'd have brought Daniel home and Sid had been rude or had hurt Daniel- he felt a little sick to his stomach.

"Hey, hey, okay bad example. Sid's a shitty example. No one in Daniel's life is like him, at least in his family. The point I want to make is that-okay Silver, right? You kicked Silver to the curb because he hurt Daniel. You'd do the same to anyone blood or not, right? Put them in their place? Like the guys?"

Johnny nodded.

"So that's gotta go both ways honey. If he doesn't stick up for you with his family then those 60 years you're daydreaming of are going to be hell several times a year. So what do you do if someone's a dick to you?"

"Diffuse and tell Daniel," Johnny mumbled. It felt silly.

"If you don't diffuse it, if you tackle it head-on then it could create more sparks. If you feel like you'll get physically hurt defend yourself, but I want you to get out of the situation as fast as possible and somewhere safer. I'm hoping it doesn't happen, that they all see how wonderful you are but because of your history and because of what you told me about Louie Jr. There's always a chance. I just want you to be prepared."

He knew she'd meant well but now he was nervous, nervous about making sure he made the best first impression he could.

He heard the door open and Daniel looked at him for a moment then at the empty bag.

"Are you thinking of just being nude all weekend?"

"No."

"I was going to say I wouldn't complain if it wasn't a family thing. Maybe before I start school we can get the guys to cover for a week and just be nudists. Lock the door and barricade ourselves in."

A full week? Never going to happen. A day maybe, a full weekend might be pushing it.

"I don't know what to pack."

"Can I help?"

"Please."

Daniel smiled going to their closet and pulling out warm sweaters, warm shirts that Johnny usually wore to the lodge.

"I suppose I shouldn't be surprised you're stuck, this is going to be your first real winter right? You're a sunny California guy. Wait. This is seriously your warmest jacket?" Daniel asked pausing on that brown coat.

"Yeah."

"We got to get you a warmer jacket. Actually, Jessica will still be here when we get back, think you could fit into her puffer jacket?"

"The pink one?" Johnny asked with a frown. "I think it'd be too small for me."

"We are just going to have to get you a warmer jacket when we get to Newark," Daniel said with a sigh. "But you're going to freeze as soon as we get there and the thing is you're not going to complain because you never do, your fingers are going to get frostbitten and fall off before you complain and then I'm going to freak out and you won't have said a word- are you sure you can't just try Jessica's pink puffy jacket on? I'm sure she'll be fine without it and I'm sure she's around. Like if I call Dutch or Mr. Miyagi I'm sure they'll let me know where she is and then just like that you can at least try it on."

"Will it help if I tell you beforehand that my fingers are cold?"

"Do you own gloves?"

"Bike gloves."

"You mean those little fingerless things? Johnny those won't protect your hands from a Newark winter! I should've taken you shopping before now, you think something is still open? Where do you buy winter clothes in LA?"

"Daniel, it'll be fine, if I need something I'll buy it when I get there."

Daniel laughed, turning to Johnny and cupping the sides of his face. "This isn't going to be the mountains, you're going to be walking down the street and it's going to be slippery and suddenly gravity is your enemy. Winter in Newark is a different beast."

"Won't we be inside with your family most of the time?" Johnny asked hooking his arm around Daniel's waist pulling him closer.

"We will, but I get sent on errands all the time. You gotta be a parent or volunteer to watch the younger cousins if you want to get out of last-minute grocery shopping. Plus Nonnia likes to do these day-long trips. Ma thinks there's going to be a shopping day."

"I don't mind watching kids."

Daniel blinked, like he forgot at least twice a week Johnny babysat in the evenings.

"You don't know these kids."

"I can handle kids."

"The little ones barely like me."

Johnny smiled kissing the top of Daniel's head.

"They're missing out. Now, what else do I need to pack?"

Daniel frowned looking at the suitcase.

"More clothes."

Johnny nodded pulling away and going through drawers putting clothes into the bag, Daniel sitting down on the edge of the bed.

"What else should we take?" Johnny asked.

"Just ourselves."

"What about a gift?"

"Not necessary."

Johnny liked having something. A gift. Something for Daniel's godfathers, for his grandfather and grandmother. It felt rude to not take anything.

"Not even for your godfathers?"

"Nope."

"I usually...it's a bit weird for me to take nothing. Feels weird I mean," Johnny said as he put a few more books in his bag

Daniel reached out taking his hand in his. "All you need is you."

They took the Avanti to Mr. Miyagi's, their bags in the backseat with their bonsai for Mr. Miyagi to babysit while they were gone. It felt a little weird to be leaving while all their friends were visiting, but they were all still going to be there when they got back. Plus the guys had promised multiple times that they'd make sure everyone had fun. They'd already made a long list of things to do with Jessica, Kumiko, Yukie, and Sato, and said it was fine if Chozen tagged along.

That was when they weren't fighting with Ali. Ali seemed to be swooping in frequently to hang out with Jessica and Kumiko and Mr. Miyagi had things planned too.

They were lucky they'd get to see their friends at all, with how much their time in LA was being fought over.

The guest house had been converted into space for Kumiko and Yukie to sleep almost as soon as Daniel and Johnny had moved out. Johnny had a feeling it was going to stay that way. Sato and Chozen slept in Mr. Miyagi's room.

Johnny wondered if the guys could build another guest room so Mr. Miyagi could have his own space again. Or so Yukie could stay with him. He was pretty sure they both wanted to marry. So why not? He didn't understand what was blocking their way. The late Mrs. Miyagi? Years of being apart? Sato?

They'd set up dinner in the garden.

Kumiko was laughing and Chozen had a sour look on his face.

"Miyagi carry," Mr. Miyagi said following Sato, reaching for what Sato was carrying.

"No no, I got," Sato said moving out of the way and out into the garden carrying plates with dinner.

Yukie walked past a playful smile on her lips carrying a large bowl.

Mr. Miyagi turned, realized she was carrying the last of the food.

"Miygai help."

"No no Miyagi sensei. Miyagi cook, you're all done," Yukie said with a warm smile, setting the bowl down on the table.

Johnny set the bonsai down safely next to some of Mr. Miyagi's bonsai at the edge of the garden.

"What is it?" Kumiko asked.

"Miyagi live in Hawaii before California. Boys ask what I remember how to cook. Thought tonight would be good night. Friend teach Miyagi. Pork and taro leaves, cook for hours so becomes soft, smoked," Mr. Miyagi explained as Sato put food on everyone's plate while Johnny and Daniel took their seats at the table.

"It looks good, thank you Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said.

"You excited to go to Newark?" Kumiko asked.

"I am," Daniel said. "I haven't seen all of my family in a while. We couldn't afford to go back last year and we were a bit busy, so it'll be nice to go this year."

"How about you Johnny?"

Nervous.

He was super nervous.

He was expecting a whole bunch of Louie Jr.'s and to hide somewhere with Nonnia and Nonnio. But it would be nice to see Daniel's family, the people who knew him from when he was little.

"Yeah. It'll be nice to meet all the people Daniel talks about and see Nonnia and Nonnio again."

"Isn't it going to be cold?" Chozen asked.

"Yeah, and this guy doesn't have a good winter coat. Which I don't understand. He goes to the lodge every year to go skiing or snowboarding but he has a cool guy jacket and not a real winter jacket. He doesn't even have gloves. We're going to have to go shopping as soon as we land. Or maybe there'll be extras at Nonna and Nonnio's."

"Who?"

"Daniel's grandparents," Johnny said.

"Why don't you have winter things?" Chozen asked with a frown.

Johnny took a bite of the food Mr. Miyagi had made.

"It's really good Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said.

"Normally I make fish, but next time," Mr. Miyagi said with a smile.

"Sid bought most of it. I didn't want to keep it. I think it all got donated," Johnny told Chozen with a shrug. "The jacket I kept Mom bought me. So whatever I'm missing I'll get when I get there."

Daniel's hand went to his thigh, then seemed to change his mind, arms wrapping around his waist.

"Prison is too good for Sid," Chozen said sourly.

Johnny helped himself to some rice. "I prefer knowing where he is. Where they all are, and that they're stuck there. How is the dojo remodeling going?"

"Lots to do. They were half through painting. But use cheap material. We have government contract. So spend more, make nicer. Cobra gone. Swap out mirrors. Almost like dance studio. Hmm?" Sato said.

"Lot of work," Chozen said. "Uncle wants to recreate balance board." He pointed to the pond in Mr. Miyagi's garden. "Kumiko comes sometimes to help. But mostly to practice while we work."

"Kumiko dancer. Good work ethic to practice even while on break," Sato said with a nod of approval.

Kumiko grinned and Chozen frowned into his food.

"See? I'm working hard."

"Making it hard to remove mirrors. Always dancing."

"It would make a lovely dance studio," Kumiko said. "I'm surprised you don't rent out the space for classes."

"Government want karate."

"But ballet and dance are very good. Coordination, agility, balance, flexibility. Chozen, next time you should try with me. I can teach you ballet."

"Again. No...thank you."

"Johnny, would you learn ballet if I taught it?" Kumiko asked, tone syrupy sweet.

Johnny thought about his schedule. When they got back he was babysitting, working, volunteering, and he was planning to take Daniel to school a couple of times a week when the semester started. He had time.

"Sure."

Kumiko gently smacked Chozen's shoulder with the back of her hand.

"See?"

"I took dancing lessons when I was younger, for the country club and to cotillions and debutante balls. It ended up being useful when I started karate."

"What are those?" Yukie asked.

"Dances, mostly for girls. They always needed a partner to show them off. So I usually was busy the whole season."

"Rich person thing," Daniel said.

"Not always, but yeah," Johnny said.

"Sounds like you were popular," Kumiko said.

"Sort of. It was all business. I showed up, I made the girls look good, talked when spoken to, but not much, and then I left. It was mostly country club girls who Sid wanted to impress their families. I was useful."

"Don't like that," Chozen said. "Doesn't sound good."

"But I do like dancing," Johnny said. "And Kumiko is a good dancer."

"Jessica and Ali have been wanting to take lessons. I thought it could be fun."

"Well if you find time, the guys wouldn't mind joining I can assure you," Johnny said.

Kumiko smiled, "They did mention that. And I got to meet Jimmy's friend...Jennifer?"

"She's nice," Daniel said with a smile. "Dutch usually knows some good places to go dancing. He might know where you can do a lesson."

"That's a good idea. I'll ask. And then we can show off when you get back."

"What are you guys going to do while we're gone?" Daniel asked turning to Mr. Miyagi.

"Work in shop. Yukie wants to help. Very excited," Mr. Miyagi said.

"It'll be fun," Yukie said smiling warmly. "Never have gotten to work in shop before. Miyagi sensei said neighbors nice."

"Johnny befriended everyone in the neighborhood," Daniel said. "They ended up coming over before the holidays to give us things. It was really sweet. And then they came to wish me well before the tournament."

"A lot of them ended up coming to the tournament," Johnny said.

"They did?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah, they sat in a group a little away from me, near Mrs. Douglas."

"I didn't notice. I'll have to tell them thanks."

"You had to be focused."

"I will keep working on dojo with nephew," Sato said. "We also need to decide on lessons. So think we keep doing same. Work morning. Drive to Miyagi-san's shop, eat together, go back to work, then come here for dinner."

"Except tomorrow," Yukie said.

"Tomorrow? What tomorrow?" Sato asked.

"Laura-san invite me to dinner," Yukie said with a warm smile. "We go out. So tomorrow I see you late."

"Oh, that will be fun!" Kumiko said. "Ms. Lawrence knows all the best places for food. She's very fun. Jessica's been staying with her and we had a movie night. Her home is very pretty. You would like it, aunt Yukie. Lots of plants."

"I hope you have fun," Johnny said.

His mother had mentioned it. Of taking Yukie out to some nice place for dinner and showing her around while she was in town. She'd been a little cautious about it because she didn't want to take time away from Mr. Miyagi's time with Yukie. She'd hesitated for a long time, before saying screw it and calling Miyagi's to ask Yukie if she wanted to have dinner. A girl's night. She wanted to thank Yukie for taking care of Johnny in Okinawa. Wanted to get to know her and be welcoming and hope that the woman would stay, or come back often. To start that relationship so she'd be able to book tickets there or to LA.

She'd told Johnny, "Mr. Miyagi's done so much, and I appreciate that they like this long-distance relationship they have and want to keep that going, but maybe I'm a sucker for romance, but I want them to be able to see each other more often. And it's a bit weird if I start thanking them by being a stranger booking plane tickets, but I want to make sure they see each other frequently. They can't just have a relationship of calls and letters. That's so sweet but like in a melancholy way. They deserve to be happy."

She'd ranted about it for a good hour before making the call.

Johnny agreed.

He wanted them to be happy and he hoped, secretly hoped that Sato having business in Okinawa and opening the dojo would open that gate. That Mr. Miyagi would fly back with him sometimes, or Yukie would. Selfishly he wanted Yukie to move to LA. But he knew Mr. Miyagi had bought her a house before they left. He kind of wanted them to be like snowbirds. Spend their winter in Okinawa and be in LA the rest of the year. Even though it didn't get cold in LA which kind of kept them from being snowbirds.

It seemed like it'd be lonely for Yukie. But it might also be nice, he didn't know, for her to have a big old house to herself after caring for so many other people, taking care of Mr. Miyagi's father when he got sick and was dying. Maybe it'd be nice to just focus on herself. He wanted her to do what she wanted, without worrying about how to get to where she wanted to be. So he was hoping Sato would keep flying her back and forth. He didn't know if Sato would stay, or if he'd leave Chozen in charge, or if they'd both stay, or if they'd pick someone else to take over. As long as Cobra Kai was gone that was all he cared about. And it was. It wasn't his problem anymore. He'd done his part to make sure no other kids fell into the same dangerous mindset. No one would be tormented like Daniel had or he or the guys.

They ended up sleeping at Lucille's. Driving over after dinner with Mr. Miyagi, leaving the bonsai and wishing him and everyone a good night. Johnny hadn't seen her new place yet and it was kind of weird. He'd just kept thinking it was the Seven Seas place again. He kept expecting to push through the gate and to walk past the empty pool, to give the dog a treat, and climb the stairs to their apartment.

But her apartment was nice, spacious, and homey. All the familiar furniture he recognized no longer crowded into a small space. It seemed to give them new life to see it in a new light. Her living room was comfortable, the familiar couch set up in front of the familiar TV, little tchotchke's he remembered in other places set out. The glass grapes in the bowl on the coffee table that had once been on the counter in the kitchen. Family photos set out. Colorful glass orbs, little glass animals, and colorful ceramic plates almost made it feel like a treasure hunt for things he recognized but they were in new spots.

Her kitchen was big and Daniel beelined straight for the fridge, opening it and it was full. Normal stuff. Milk. Eggs. Salad fixings. Fruit.

"Is that all still going to be good when we get back?" Johnny asked softly wondering if he needed to ask the guys to swing by like locust and clear out the fridge like they apparently had last time.

"We're only going to be gone a couple of days. It should be fine," Lucille said. "But if you get hungry help yourself."

Johnny nodded, still holding his bag, feeling a little uneasy. It was weird to just follow Daniel into his bedroom/guestroom right? Like super weird? She had another guest room. What was going to happen at Daniel's godfather's place? Would Johnny sleep on the couch? Would he be able to sleep at a stranger's place? Or would he be too uneasy? Would every sound wake him up if he wasn't next to Daniel? He wished he'd packed wine or something to give as a gift.

"Our flights pretty early, you two should go to bed," Lucille said motioning towards Daniel's room, smiling warmly and gently squeezing Johnny's shoulder.

"Thank you for letting us stay over," Johnny said.

Lucille laughed softly. "I should thank you for offering to drive us to the airport."

"Goodnight."

"Sleep well you two."

Daniel's room was different than his before. It was more of a guest room than Johnny's at his mother's.

He supposed it was because most of Daniel's stuff was at their apartment.

But it was comfortable and there were things of Daniel's. Pictures. It was where his mother stored all the photo albums and Johnny picked one up with a smile watching as Daniel belatedly realized what he was doing and ran over. "Hey, let's just go to bed huh?"

Johnny held the album up, out of Daniel's reach watching as he got frustrated, determined to get it back. Reaching for it, jumping.

"Shouldn't you be introducing me to your family? Telling me what I should know?" Johnny asked.

Daniel stopped his reaching and straining and his eyes moved away from the album to Johnny's face, he was close enough to kiss.

"You're serious? Not just trying to see embarrassing photos?"

"Sixty forty," Johnny said with a grin. "I would like a crash course in LaRusso's, but if I happen to see some cute photos of you as a kid, it'll be like a treat."

Daniel sighed, frowning. "Okay fine. You're right. But you gotta let me skip ahead of anything too embarrassing."

"Have an awkward phase?"

"Yes."

"So?"

"So?!" Daniel asked arms crossed as Johnny took a seat on the bed with the album. "Sorry, we couldn't all be pretty models who then moved on to being built like a freaking marble sculpture."

Johnny flicked the album over while Daniel sat down next to him, grumbling. Johnny sat the album aside quickly grabbing Daniel's face in his hands, startling him.

"We couldn't afford to get my hair cut very often and my mom didn't like how it looked when she cut it, she tried it once, so I rarely got it cut. I got made fun of for it all the time. But my mom would brush it out all the time to make sure it didn't tangle or anything. I hated how I looked, but mom put so much care into my hair and I knew we couldn't do anything about it. Unless I wanted to chop it off myself. If people hadn't made fun of me for it I don't think I'd have noticed or cared. And one day I'm going to get old and I'm going to get wrinkly and I'm sure I won't be as you say made out of marble forever. Anything could happen. I've seen pictures of you as a kid. You were cute. And here's the thing Daniel, you were a kid. Kids are kids. How they look is like kids. But you now, you in the future, no matter what I'm sure you're going to be the hottest guy around. You're already beautiful."

Johnny let go of his face and tapped the middle of Daniel's forehead with the tip of his index finger.

"We didn't know each other before, and I hear stories all the time of your life in Newark. These are the best ways to get to see them. To see the Daniel that was that became the Daniel I love. The building blocks that were there. I want to see it. To look for my Daniel in the face of young Daniel, see if your smile is the same, or if you talked with your hands the same way, because I can't time travel, this is the closest I can get. And I want to see all these people who you love and who loved you who I'm going to meet so that I can feel more prepared."

Daniel blinked at him, and looked away, blushing. "You're going to still be a hot old guy."

"You missed my whole point didn't you?" Johnny asked picking the album up and setting it on his lap.

"I didn't," Daniel said kissing him gently on the cheek. "Though now I have to ask your mom about your long hair."

Johnny felt Daniel's hand trail up his back, along his neck, and settle on the back of his head, fingers in his hair.

"Are you going to grow it out long again? You could you know."

Johnny frowned flicking to the first page of photos. He didn't know. They'd been a bit busy. It was getting a bit too long but was in an awkward phase. He couldn't tie it up yet.

He looked at holiday photos, summer trips to some lake, swimming in the local pool, a picnic. There were a lot of people. It took a while, but eventually, he'd was able to pick out Lucille and nearby somewhere he was pretty sure he could tell which one was Daniel.

"Okay, so whose important?" Johnny asked.

Daniel laughed, leaning over his shoulder.

"They would hate that question. But yeah, there's so many I get it," he said pointing to different small faces on the photograph.

This one aunt was married to this uncle and these were their kids. It went on and on, some were divorced. Some never had married. Some had. They flipped through the pages carefully and Johnny tried to remember tidbits, tried to remember who was who as they moved forward in time. As the kids grew up.

It really was a big family.

"Hey," Daniel said softly, voice in his ear different from before. Gentler. "You don't have to study or worry. You don't have to do this again."

"Again?" Johnny asked confused.

Daniel took the photo album from him.

"Stay up all night studying. You don't have to study at all. We know there's a lot of us. You don't have to like memorize names or whatever. They're going to like you because I love you and if not then they'll have to face me."

He was serious. Concerned.

"Okinawa," Daniel explained, carefully closing the book and putting it back on the shelf. "You don't need to do any of that, just get ready for bed and come to bed with me."

There was that flirty tone. The kind that Johnny knew was dangerous.

He kissed Daniel quickly, a fast peck before gathering up his stuff to get ready for bed, brush his teeth, and shower away the day of working in the shop.

When he came back Daniel was still up. Cozy in his bed, waiting. It was like a trap. One he knew. One he would willingly walk into.

What would their whole trip be like?

Boundaries and niceties weren't really one of Daniel's concerns.

Johnny flicked off the light, waited a moment for his eyes to adjust, and walked over to the bed, arms finding him fast and pulling him in. A nightmare if it was anyone other than Daniel, if it wasn't a familiar touch, a familiar warmth, and familiar lips.

Johnny started to wonder why he bothered dressing anymore. Clothes to sleep in seemed to be a waste of time. A formality. He'd forgotten about it when he woke up to the alarm they'd set, all tangled up against one another and he hoped Daniel's mother wasn't the kind to make sure they were getting up. To just throw the door open.

"See? That's a better way to spend an evening," Daniel said stretching and pressing his nose against Johnny's neck. "Better than staying up all night looking at old photos. You actually slept. I slept well."

He was right, but Johnny felt the nervousness curl back around him. It was a lot of people. A lot of people he didn't know. He was trained in knowing. Sid had the staff quiz him. Mundane shit about dull people who Sid deemed important. Ever since his first week at the mansion. It felt like a weakness to go in somewhere blind.

He wanted to rally, to find that fire, that desire to be so pissed at everything all the time. To mold it and turn it into a desire to be even better, to be so perfect that no one could find fault, but he knew it was impossible and he knew he was going to get up, get dressed, and then fly to a family he didn't know and sit under a microscope to be picked apart.

He'd rather just stay in bed next to Daniel. But then they'd be late.

"Yeah but now I don't want to go."

Daniel hummed an agreement into his skin and Johnny leaned over and kissed Daniel before getting up and getting dressed.

Breakfast was made by Lucille, she was already up, her bags packed by the door and she smiled squeezing Johnny's arm as she passed and kissing his cheek. "Morning Johnny, help yourself."

She'd made scrambled eggs and bacon and blueberry muffins. Johnny sat down, eating when she told him again not to wait while she and Daniel finished their planning. Until they checked and double-checked they had everything and piled it into the back of the Avanti.

It was becoming a frequent habit to drive to LAX.

Johnny hadn't been there so much in his life.

Sure he'd seen his mother off, but often Sid told him to say his goodbyes at home.

Johnny wondered if he was scared Johnny would make a scene.

Maybe he should've. When he was young. Maybe he should've cried at the terminal to not be left behind. For Sid to not take his mother with him. His mother's heart would've broken and Sid would've made sure Johnny knew not to ever do that again. But for a moment it might've forced Sid's hand. Societal niceties.

Johnny tried to carry the LaRusso's bags but they swatted at his hands. So he followed after with his own bag to the ticket counter and off towards their gate. Sitting and listening to them talk. He waited for a lull, turning to Daniel.

"Did you tell her?"

The words on Daniel's tongue died as he looked at Johnny.

"Huh?"

"Tell me what?"

"Your plans when we get back?"

Daniel had told him to remind him to tell her. Had packed all these brochures to tell her about his plans. Planning to tell his family as well.

"Oh! Oh right!" Daniel said turning and digging out the brochures, handing them over to his mom. "I'm signed up for classes next semester. I've also gotten into an apprenticeship."

"Apprenticeship?" Lucille asked looking at the brochure, brow furrowed.

"Yeah, so I'll be a part-time student on a business track and then I'll be studying mechanics the other days of the week."

She looked down at the brochures and then up at Daniel, "Really?"

"Yeah, Ma."

"And you want to?"

"I do."

She threw her arms around his shoulders. "It sounds like a lot of work. I'm very proud of you-" She pulled back all of a sudden and looked at Daniel again and then at Johnny. "What about the shop?"

"I'll still be there helping Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said.

"Is that going to be okay? Just the two of you? It's a busy shop." She sat back face steeling into a frown. "Daniel you can't just get bored with your business and foist it on Johnny."

"Ma! That's not-"

"I like working in the shop," Johnny said.

"What if you want to do something else?"

"Then I'll figure something out then," Johnny said. "But I don't want to go to school. Maybe that will change later but I like working with Mr. Miyagi."

She pursed her lips like she wasn't pleased but didn't have any arguments.

"I'm still going to be working at the shop," Daniel said. "Just not as much."

Lucille had no arguments for Johnny but had arguments aplenty for Daniel. Arguments that went in circles about Daniel and his responsibilities.

The flight attendant handed Johnny his snack and two for the arguing LaRusso's.

"Are they okay?"

"Yeah. I'll get these to them, thanks."

The attendant nodded and Johnny turned passing the snacks to them. The arguing stopped momentarily to thank Johnny before continuing.

Johnny didn't know what the flight would be like. He thought it'd be about what they were going to do. About Newark. Not a practically six-hour flight of

You spent all your money for school on that shop and now that you're bored you're going to leave it to Mr. Miyagi and Johnny and not going to take care of it or the bonsai while it's a busy shop and you're going to go work on cars instead. How is that helpful or useful? You're abandoning them!

Followed by Daniel's

"I'm not abandoning them Ma, I'm studying business that's going to help me run my business and I'm doing the apprenticeship because I like cars. I'm following a dream. And I can. And that's a good thing right?"

Johnny had tried to tell Lucille that he and Mr. Miyagi knew about it. That Daniel had talked to them about it. And it was fine. But she stopped him and patted his hand, squeezed it, and then went back to the never-ending argument that was exactly the same. Johnny moved on after an hour of realizing they weren't going to find a solution or an end to the argument to his book.

He'd finished it by the time they landed, by the time the argument had fizzled into quiet sulking.

He didn't get it. But Daniel had shifted closer to him. Arm through his. Frustrated and childishly stubborn. They were quiet as they headed out to get their bags. Quiet as they walked to find their ride, Johnny hoping fervently it was anyone but Louie Jr. Pretty sure that while Daniel had allowed Louie Jr. to pick them up Lucille wouldn't allow it.

Johnny slowed down, he didn't know why he was leading the way. He didn't know who they were meeting or where they were going. Well, he knew ultimately where they were going but it wasn't like he could walk up to a taxi driver and say LaRusso's house. Nonnio and Nonnia's house please in Newark. They'd ask if he needed to call his mom or something. Think he ran away from home.

They caught up and Johnny looked at the faces of all the strangers wondering which strangers were their strangers. A man stood with a big smile and a wave. Lucille hugged the man. That was their stranger.

Johnny started to slow more. It had to be one of Daniel's godfathers.

He should've brought something.

A gift.

His palms were sweating.

The guy was laughing and pulling Daniel into a hug messing up his hair.

Johnny rubbed his palm against his jeans.

"Hello, I'm Johnny," Johnny said holding out his hand.

He'd never cared before he realized.

He could be charming at the country club hungover, high, bruised, and battered, with ease because he didn't care.

But now he cared a lot. Too much.

He'd already known Ali's parents so it'd been easy. Nonnia and Nonnio had been easy because he hadn't tried because he and Daniel weren't dating. But now...now he was so incredibly nervous. More nervous than the first time he'd showed up on Lucille's front step. More than every study date. He wanted to turn around and get back on a plane.

He wasn't ready. He wasn't at his A-game. It was going to crash and burn and-

The guy grabbed his hand, pulling him into a hug. "Yeah, you are! I've heard so much about you. I think I could pick you out of any crowd between what Lucille, Daniel, Nonnia, Nonnio have said," he laughed.

He smelled like mints and the cold.

"I'm Moshe," he said hand on Johnny's back a hearty pat. "Nice to finally meet you. We tried to get Daniel to bring you over last time, but we got a little overwhelmed reading his Dad's letter that we'd held onto for him and well, we wanted to meet you when we weren't all sobbing. Tristen's with the car so you'll meet him soon. Oh shit, is this your warmest jacket Johnny?" Moshe asked stepping back and taking Johnny in, fingers on the hem of the jacket.

"We have to get him some warm winter clothes. He doesn't even have a hat or gloves." Daniel said.

"Well you're just going to have to share," Moshe said.

"Huh?"

"You wear one glove, give him the other, and then hold hands," Moshe said. "It'll get you through until we get you to a store."

Daniel dug around in the pockets of his orange puffer jacket and handed Johnny a glove.

Johnny put it on, taking Daniel's bare hand in his own.

"You all ready? Brace yourself Johnny, East coast winters are something else," Moshe said.

There was a bitter wind as soon as they stepped out. It was like getting sucker-punched. All the warmth leached out of him almost immediately.

He followed Moshe to an old car idling a little ways away.

Moshe opened the trunk and they put all their things next to the spare tire and emergency kit and a bag of kitty litter.

"Do you have a cat?" Johnny asked.

"It's for traction on ice," Moshe said shutting the trunk once all their bags were in.

Daniel pulled him towards the backseat, his mother already in the warm car, leaning forward and talking to the man behind the wheel.

"Nice to meet you Johnny, I'm Tristen. Welcome back to Newark."

"Nice to meet you too," Johnny said putting his seatbelt on and shutting the door.

He was a bit nervous the last car ride he'd been in Newark had been pure chaos and he couldn't believe Daniel had let it happen. Hadn't just gotten out and taken over driving. But he held Daniel's hand, running his thumb absently over the back of Daniel's knuckles. There were little scars but they were fading, had healed up nicely with Mr. Miyagi's medicine and the care Johnny had put into it. Daniel had gotten annoyed with Johnny's fussing. It ended up being a frustratingly slow process because the only way it'd worked out was when Johnny had kissed him. Soft kisses didn't do it either, they had to be dizzyingly and heated and a promise of more if he let Johnny finish bandaging up his hands.

It was all that guilt. He hadn't known it then, but it was a stubborn self-flagellation. Daniel had thought he'd deserved the pain and suffering because he'd gone to Cobra Kai, because he brought all that danger into their lives.

Johnny had worked very patiently and very slowly to make sure Daniel didn't blame himself anymore for that. For Silver. For Kreese. It was hard, Johnny slipped into it sometimes himself, but Daniel always pulled him back so Johnny did the same.

Tristen drove better than Louie Jr. which wasn't a surprise. But it was a relief.

Lucille was talking about the flight, asking how the winter had been in Newark, about the weather, and Tristen and Moshe responded. It sounded cold. A freezing cold winter. It was supposed to snow that night. Lots of it.

"We got to take Johnny shopping," Moshe said when there was a lull in the weather conversation.

"Yeah?" Tristen asked.

"He's going to turn into a popsicle in that jacket."

At a stoplight Tristen's eyes flicked up to look at Johnny, to study his jacket.

"Okay,"

"I'll take him," Daniel said. "You guys don't have to. It's still that shop about 3 blocks away right?"

"That's the one. You sure?" Tristen asked.

"Yeah. It'll be fun."

"Okay. Well, how about we get you all settled in first?"

Daniel nodded gently squeezing Johnny's hand as they pulled into the neighborhood Johnny recognized and parked.

Daniel didn't let go of his hand, stubbornly holding on while Johnny got out of the car, waiting for Daniel to follow. Like he was scared one minute of cold air on Johnny's palm would freeze it. He turned, planning to get their bags only to find that Moshe already had two of them and Tristen took the third. Shutting the trunk with a smile and heading up the stairs into the building followed by Lucille.

"It'd be easier to get out of the car if you let go," Johnny said.

"I'm not going to."

"My hands not going to freeze and fall off because you let go for a minute."

"It might."

"It's not that cold."

"Don't tempt fate or the weather," Daniel said finally stepping out onto the sidewalk with a grin, proud of himself.

"Good job. Absolutely unnecessary, but sweet," Johnny said kissing the top of his head, shutting the door behind them as they headed up the stairs.

"I don't want you to lose your hand or your fingers."

"It can't be that cold."

"It's below 31 so it's totally possible."

"Okay, where are we going?" Johnny asked standing in the entryway.

"Nonnio and Nonnia are there," Daniel said pointing to the door to the right. "And Moshe and Tristen are the other side."

"Convenient."

"Well, Moshe's family moved in first when my parents were young and he and my dad became good friends. When they were all, wow, my age I guess? Moshe's family bought a house in the suburbs and Moshe stayed here because it was convenient and Tristen moved in. I grew up in that one," Daniel said pointing to another door down the hall. "There's like four apartments in here and they're each about two floors?"

"Why didn't your parents move further?" Johnny asked following him through the door to Moshe and Tristen's apartment.

"Everyone they loved was here," Daniel said with a shrug. "It's one reason I didn't want to go."

Johnny squeezed his hand before loosening his grip, waiting for Daniel to let go so they could take off their jackets. Daniel started to take off the orange puffer, but still wasn't letting go. Johnny wiggled his fingers.

"I'm for sure not getting frostbite in here."

Daniel looked a little disappointed, but he let go and Johnny quickly took off his jacket and the glove, handed the glove to Daniel, and hung up his jacket next to Daniel's orange one. Then he held his hand out again.

Daniel nodded, taking his hand.

Lucille was sitting on the couch with Tristen while Moshe was coming down the stairs.

"Your bags are in your rooms."

"Moshe, Daniel's going to study business," Tristen said turning back to look at him.

Johnny felt his heart sink. The argument was going to start up again. Daniel let go of his hand.

"Ma!"

"You forgot the part where he abandons all this hard work right when it starts to pay off," Lucille said.

Moshe frowned.

"Hey," Johnny said softly. "Is there a cafe nearby where I could pick Daniel and I up some coffee? I've uh, heard this argument for over six hours."

Moshe laughed, patting him on the shoulder. "Yeah, uh, down the street."

"I'll be back," Johnny said.

Daniel wasn't paying attention, sitting down in the living room to explain the situation to Tristen and Moshe nodded, joining the group. Johnny put his jacket back on and slipped out the door, memorizing the number and then down the block in search of coffee.

Ali and the guys had gotten Johnny into coffee. Jimmy with his fancy imports and Ali with the fancy lattes she always wanted before school. He used to leave early to get them for her, to bring when she showed up to school. He'd abused it for a bit, drinking cup after cup to stay awake and not sleep in the mansion. He hadn't drunk as much since he moved in with Mr. Miyagi and now just one cup in the mornings with Daniel.

But it was a good excuse. He could go out and get coffee for Daniel and himself. He found the cafe when the bite of the cold started to get strong and ordered Daniel a cup of coffee with a dash of cream and one for himself that was a mocha. Then he walked back. Easy. And maybe at least it was nicer than sitting inside listening to Lucille wrap her head around Daniel's plans and Daniel trying to explain that he was thinking of the future and not abandoning anyone.

Sitting on the front steps was Louie Jr.

He was attempting some sort of facial hair but it looked like he hadn't figured out what he wanted to do with it yet. There was enough space to walk around him but Johnny stopped and held out his mocha to him. Louie Jr. looked up at the coffee then followed the arm up to Johnny's face.

He frowned then looked back down.

Johnny sat down next to him, still offering him the coffee.

Louie hunched away from him.

Johnny waited. After a while, Louie took the proffered coffee.

The other coffee Johnny held carefully in his hands hoping it'd keep him warm, regretting not taking Daniel's gloves.

"Why aren't you wearing gloves or a hat?" Louie asked.

"Don't have them," Johnny said.

Louie frowned at that.

Johnny expected a rhetorical question.

Some rich kid thing? Cool California beach guy unprepared for the cold?

But he got nothing.

Silence.

And then

"Daniel going to take you to get some?"

"Yeah."

Louie sipped at the warm coffee and seemed to nod his approval of Johnny's drink choice.

"It sucks."

Johnny waited.

"That he couldn't make it."

"Yeah."

Louie nodded a stiff nod, teeth grit, jaw tense, a quick blink.

He regathered himself.

"Ma and I wouldn't have come if-"

Johnny nodded running his thumbs over the side of the cup.

"Feel guilty bein' here, not bein' there. But also relieved."

Johnny shifted Daniel's coffee in his hands and listened as Louie started and stopped, slowly letting out all the tension.

He was just a kid.

A kid Johnny had learned when he'd done the paperwork with Louie.

A kid who couldn't legally drive which made their trip to Newark the first time a million times scarier.

Why the hell had Daniel thought that was okay?

Sure Louie had his permit and Johnny thought that was the argument, but no wonder the kid drove like a nightmare.

He listened as Louie talked about how awful it was to hear his dad's coughing echoing through the house.

How it'd interrupt conversations where he, for a moment could pretend everything was fine right until he had that wracking fit of coughs and then any and all conversations were over.

Louie turned away and Johnny didn't look but could see him scrubbing at his face out of the corner of his eye.

Louie drank his coffee and sighed.

"Everyone is asking how he's doing and talking to me like he's not going to- it's all pity. They know he's sick. I know he's sick. Why do we have to talk about it? There's nothing we can do, we're not, well I mean Nonnia was a nurse, but most of us aren't. Or-like I'll be walking through the house and they'll talk about it when I'm not in the room and about how hard it is and how sad it is and I just don't want to hear it. He's not their dad. They're not- they don't know what it's like. But we're also so talkative, like asking them not to talk about it is like to ask a mouse not to like cheese. It just fucking sucks."

Johnny nodded.

It was cold in Newark and the stone steps bit through his pants, there was a cold wind that kept pushing his hair around.

It really was getting long, he'd need to book an appointment to get it cut when he got home or steal someone's hair tie.

He was sure someone would have one. It'd look weird but he felt like one of those sheepdogs that can't see because their hair grew over their eyes. He'd just been too busy to book an appointment.

Louie sighed, a deep sigh, drinking the rest of Johnny's coffee and standing up. "I'm going back in. Thanks."

"Of course," Johnny said.

He got in and followed Louie Jr. through the door. Louie went to Nonnia and Nonnio's door and Johnny went to Moshe and Tristen's. He knocked and after a couple of minutes Daniel opened the door and looked startled.

He turned and looked around the room.

"When did you-"

Johnny held up a coffee. "I got you a coffee. Might be cold now."

"It might be cold? You're probably freezing, get in here," Daniel said

"Whose at the door?" Lucille asked.

"Johnny."

"Johnny left?"

"Clearly Ma. Why else would he be at the door?"

"Why?"

"Apparently to get me coffee."

Daniel's warm hands went to Johnny's cheeks.

"We got to get you warmer stuff," he said pulling Johnny down into a kiss. "We'll go soon. I'm going to start with this coffee you kindly got me and then we're going to get you a warmer jacket, gloves, a scarf, and a hat, and then if you think you'll be up for it we'll go across the hall and see everyone."

"Okay," Johnny said as Daniel took the coffee from him and walked back to the couch, hand in Johnny's.

The argument seemed to have ended long ago and instead, they were on safer topics. The neighborhood, Nonnia, and Nonnio, work. Johnny relaxed into the seat next to Daniel while Daniel drank his coffee.

"Didn't you get yourself one?" Daniel asked after a while.

"Gave it away."

Daniel looked at him surprised but didn't press further. Just worried the edges of the cup until it was empty then set it down on the coffee table with a sense of finality. "I'm going to take Johnny to get a jacket now."

"Okay honey, we're going next door after you get back, for dinner."

"I remember," Daniel said standing and kissing her on the cheek before going to bundle up with his warm clothes.

Johnny waved awkwardly, putting his coat back on and following Daniel back outside.

"You okay?"

"She just won't listen," Daniel said with a sigh once they were further down the street, hand in Johnny's. "I'm- we talked about this right? Like you support it?"

"You going to school and your apprenticeship?"

"Yeah."

"Of course."

"Then why doesn't Ma? Why was she so upset when I didn't go to school and now she's pissed that I am?"

"I don't know. Did you ask?"

"Did I ask?" Daniel asked stopping suddenly like he was offended then frowning. "No. We've just been going around in circles all day."

"Try asking what changed."

Daniel sighed. "You're right. I'll talk to her later, after we get you something warmer."

Johnny followed Daniel into the shop.

He hadn't been into a dimly crowded shop in a long time.

There weren't a lot of people but there was a lot of stuff.

A lot of shoes, boxes, clothes were stacked everywhere someone could look with little space to get around. Everywhere Sid sent him to get clothes was open, spacious, brightly lit, blindingly so. This was the opposite as Daniel tugged him forward through the racks till he stopped at one.

"This is usually where jackets are," he said digging around through the racks. He pulled out a few and set them on top of the screeching rack. One was neon.

"No," Johnny said putting it back. "No neon."

"What? You'd be so easy to find."

"Aren't I already easy to find?"

"No. You disappear without me even realizing it."

"I came back. With coffee."

"Yes, very sweet. But I can't believe every time we come to the east coast you just disappear without me realizing it."

"Sorry," Johnny said. "I just... you and your mom argued for the whole flight. It's a six-hour flight. I think I've heard every iteration of that argument. I didn't want to listen to it again."

Daniel sighed holding up a pink puffer like Jessica's. "You and Jessica could match!"

"No," Johnny said putting it back.

"Oh, this one's yellow."

"That one's too short," Johnny said. "It's for tiny people, short people with short torsos."

"Okay, okay, how about this one?"

It was blue. Cobalt. It didn't assault his eyes to look at.

"I'll try it."

"Yeah?"

Johnny took it and put it on. It did fit.

"Okay so is this going to be warm enough?"

Daniel ran his hands over Johnny's arms, testing the fabric.

"Lift your arms."

Johnny lifted them, stretching and Daniel felt around the jacket, hands running down his chest. No one had ever tested clothing that way in Johnny's life. He somehow doubted it was an actual normal way, not with the way Daniel's fingers dug in, the way his hands squeezed.

"It looks warm enough. Now we just need a scarf, hat, and gloves. Maybe some ear muffs."

Johnny wanted to protest but he was pulled along to the next section, to look at the accessories. Warm waterproof black gloves were put in his hands.

"Make sure your hands can fit."

Daniel was on a mission. He had a checklist and he was going to go through it.

Johnny unzipped and unbuttoned the cobalt blue jacket.

Trying on the gloves that fit while Daniel picked out hats to plop onto his head, chewing on his lip with a frown. Lost in thought and focused. Any second and he'd start talking, mile a minute about whatever he was thinking. Johnny just had to wait.

It wasn't like he hadn't bought winter clothes before. He had for their ski trips to the lodge. He'd gotten nice winter jackets and hats and scarves. Expensive things that he just wasn't interested in keeping. He hadn't thought about keeping it when they sold all of Sid's stuff and bulldozed the house. He was pretty sure it'd all been donated to people who needed it. Johnny had liked that. That some kid somewhere who lived somewhere cold would have not just warm stuff but nice warm stuff. He just hadn't realized he was going to be a guy in need of it in a couple of months. He hadn't even thought of it.

He'd been too overwhelmed in the mansion to think to really grab anything for himself that had been useful. He'd had his bonsai, his book on flowers, his walkman and that was all he needed. He didn't want anything else. The other stuff only survived and made it home with him because of Daniel and the rest of them. He'd not even spared a second thought to his jacket until he'd gotten it from Daniel. He'd cared about it, liked it but in the moment he needed something else to focus on.

He supposed it was fine as Daniel found a ski hat that matched, and a scarf. Blues and black.

"So this works?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah, they don't have any good ear muffs," Daniel said. "But I think if you tug the hat down it should keep you warm enough. Okay, do you want to look and see if you like it?"

Johnny dipped his head down to look at the mirror Daniel was motioning to, there was a pompom on the top of the hat.

He laughed. "Yeah, it's fine."

His mom would appreciate it when he told her. He walked up to the counter with the puffy coat in his arm and the scarf, glove, and hat.

"I'll buy it," Daniel said quickly pulling out his wallet.

"I can buy winter stuff. I have money again."

"I want to," Daniel said.

"Is this because your mom thinks your abandoning Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees?"

Daniel frowned.

"No."

There was a tightness to his voice. He took a deep breath, turning to Johnny.

"No. There are multiple parts to it. One, I invited you here and I should've checked. Two, we're doing good with Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees. Trees are practically flying off the shelves. And that's you. Mr.

Miyagi is great with the trees, I'm great with keeping us organized and the books. But you, you talked us up to the neighbors, got Tommy to come and get the newspaper or that magazine to run the spotlight and you cleaned the place top to bottom. You go get the stuff we need, and people like you. I thought I'd have fun talking to people, but I find I just get pissed over stupid questions, or when they fail to call me back or lose our order. So I burn out and don't want to scare away customers. People like you. Do you know how many of those calls I get are Is the blonde dreamboat in? And I nearly want to close the shop every time. But they like you. And they buy stuff because they like you. I don't like it, and I can't keep standing around listening to people talk about you because it pisses me off. I mean I like working at Little Trees, but I need...I need to excuse myself from the situation. Otherwise, I'm going to start a fight with customers."

"Maybe you should tell your mom that."

"That I'm following my dreams and feel guilty leaving my boyfriend to the wolves at our shop because I'm afraid I'm going to get too jealous?"

"Just being honest. Like you know I didn't even realize people were-"

"I know," Daniel said running his hand through his hair with a sigh. "Which is one of the reasons I have to do this. Like I want to but I also need to let you be without like getting upset because I want to be the one to enjoy watching you work."

"Uh, sirs did you want to wear this? It'll be um $152.97."

Daniel turned to the kid working the register. "Yeah he'll wear it, please cut the tags."

Johnny flushed, "Sorry."

"It's..fine," he said cutting the tags and taking the money Daniel gave him, working out the change and handing it back. "Here you are, sir."

"Thanks," Johnny asked putting on his jacket.

"Are you sure they're not there to also see you?" the kid asked Daniel putting the receipt in his hand.

Daniel laughed while Johnny put on his gloves getting his change.

Johnny didn't know why Daniel had laughed. If he'd been a customer he would've come often to check out Daniel. Especially on hot summer days because Daniel wore the worst clothes on those days. The best clothes.

Daniel took the scarf and wrapped it around Johnny's neck, ever so carefully. "That's sweet."

Johnny pulled Daniel close. Trying to make it as clear as possible that Daniel was taken.

"I mean the kid might be right."

"You think?"

"I mean you are what I like looking at."

"Me and the bonsai huh?"

"Yup. And I'm going to miss watching you work."

"Well," Daniel said taking the hat and pulling it down over Johnny's head, brushing long hair from his eyes. "You've got a couple of weeks before classes start."

Johnny nodded, pulling away, towards the door. "I'll make sure to enjoy it."

"What are you going to do without me?" Daniel teased.

"Savor our evenings together."

"Don't you already?"

Johnny slid his hand into Daniel's back pocket as they walked out into the street. "I mean more so."

Daniel grinned. "I look forward to seeing what the difference is."

"Well first, thank you for my winter clothes."

"Can't have you losing anything because I forgot to tell you how cold it gets up here."

"I wasn't worried, because I knew you'd keep me warm."

Daniel looked up at him surprised.

"You always do. But if you can think of a way for me to express my thanks," Johnny trailed off pointedly.

"I can think of many ways," Daniel said.

Johnny grinned as they walked back to the apartments, his brown jacket over his other arm. Maybe he'd been a little jealous. Because the kid was right. Daniel probably did draw in a crowd and he hadn't noticed. Too focused on him already to realize others were also focused. Because sometimes Daniel didn't dress professionally to work at the shop. Sometimes he wore his stupidily short shorts and jersey shirt that barely covered anything, and was practically see-through depending on the lighting on super hot days while he sat at the desk and answered phones or sold bonsai. He'd said it was one of the nice things about owning a business, you could wear what you wanted. But it was practically indecent to Johnny.

Taunting with how much skin he showed.

Torture.

Sometimes Johnny wondered if he did it on purpose. The probability was high. And it'd probably be good that Daniel was off studying because it meant that Johnny wouldn't be tempted to just scoop Daniel up like some caveman and take him home. Or worse, wait until Mr. Miyagi left for lunch or something. Which never happened because they always ate together.

He liked to try and keep things neat. There were places that were off-limits. But the shop was starting to blur. Probably because of the way Daniel would come back behind him while he was working on a bonsai and press up against him like he was innocently trying to see Johnny's plan for the bonsai. But all Johnny could think of was that warm weight and the feeling of his breath against his skin. The lips that pressed against the tip of his ear.

It was always torture. Johnny did lots of breathing exercises. He'd definitely had to go in a different direction than he'd originally planned with at least four bonsai so far. Especially if they didn't have customers and Mr. Miyagi had gone into the back. Because without failed Daniel would rest his hand on Johnny, starting at his hip somedays, or his shoulder and drag his hand over his shirt or shorts, always heading to the same point, slowly enjoying whatever twisted journey he wanted to go on while Johnny held his tiny scissors trying to remember what the bonsai in his head looked like while he shivered and Daniel made some dumb joke about wood that he always timed with when his questioning hand found its way between his legs.

Without fail the door would open with Mr. Miyagi's wooden wind chimes, or they'd hear his footsteps come back and Daniel would jump back to talk to whoever had shown up, a mile a minute and Johnny would curl closer to the bonsai mouth dry, heart pounding and knowing his face was red and would wait, uncomfortably to calm down again.

So he was kind of relieved when Daniel said he wanted to take classes, wanted to do the apprenticeship. Because he felt like he was fucking up constantly, distracted by the way Daniel licked his lips or his thumbs after he snacked on whatever he was eating. Or the way he just moved around the space.

Johnny thought moving in together, their own space would help. And it did, but it didn't stop Johnny from wanting to put his hands on Daniel, to touch ever exposed piece of skin, flip the sign to closed, lock the door and push Daniel down somewhere.

"Are you jealous because some kid thought I was hot?" Daniel asked, tone playful, grinning and looking close at Johnny's face.

"I can't be certain it was a kid."

"What do you mean?"

"I thought Louie Jr. was older than you. Like I thought he was in his 20's, when we came to visit he was like barely 15 if that. When I first saw you, like actually saw you after we got into a fight I thought you were some punk kid. I thought you were how old Louie Jr. actually was but then you sucker-punched me and I saw red. You all age weird around here. For all, I know that kids 40," Johnny said with a frown

"So Dutch flirting with me at the club does not set off jealousy alarm bells but this does?"

"I trust Dutch. I don't trust that kid."

"Dutch told someone I was his boyfriend."

"Yeah, well has he taken you out in his fancy car?"

"I've been in the van."

"Not the van."

"I thought he only has the van," Daniel said.

"He doesn't. The van is his first car. It's arguably his favorite. But it's not his date car."

"What's his date car? Why's he have a different date car?"

"Girls thought the van was creepy. So he got a Ferrari."

"Of course he did. No, I haven't seen the Ferrari. Wait, you've seen the Ferrari?"

"Yeah. His parents didn't want him driving the van to some fancy event."

"And you went?"

"I'm the only guest they gave an okay to. Which is why I know he has five cars."

"Five?" Daniel squeaked. "What is he a prince?"

"I don't think so. I think they might have a tie to some royalty somewhere but not a clue. He doesn't like talking about that stuff."

"Seriously Johnny?"

"Yeah."

"Well now what Sid said made sense," Daniel said.

"What do you mean?" Johnny said pulling away.

"I couldn't figure out why he picked Dutch of all people to be like, you should've dated that one."

"You are not telling me to date Dutch," Johnny said.

"No, I'm just saying I kind of get it now."

"What does that mean?"

"It means your friends are rich and powerful and I'm not, so I get why a power-hungry monster would pick Dutch."

"I can't tell if I'm offended for myself anymore," Johnny said with a frown, before shaking his head. "How'd we end up on this train of thought? Dutch knows I love you, that's the point okay? I know because we're good friends. Just like I know the other guys wouldn't try and steal you away either. So no jealousy. But that random person? Who knows."

"You've nothing to worry about," Daniel said stopping and kissing Johnny. "But I appreciate it," he said grinning and stepping back.

"You appreciate it?" Johnny asked confused following him back up the steps.

"I get jealous all the time. You never seem to. I was beginning to think either you weren't human or something was wrong with me."

"No comment."

"Hey!"

"I plead the fifth."

"I have ways of making you talk."

"Like to see you try."

Daniel pushed the door to Moshe and Tristen's open and hung up his jacket.

"Oh, that looks very nice!" Lucille said.

"Thank you," Johnny said, taking everything and hanging it up.

"Warmer right?"

"Much."

He sat down on the couch with everyone. They ended up falling into the argument again and Johnny pressed his thigh against Daniel's, a gentle reminder he hoped and Daniel pivoted.

"Ma, you wanted me to go to school, why are you upset now that I am?"

She looked startled the words on her lips stopping. "It's not that you're going to school. It's the timing. I feel like you just opened your shop, just got rid of Silver and Cobra Kai, and now I'm worried okay? I just want you to be safe and I was going to worry about school but I guess

I kind of figured Johnny would've gone with you or the guys or something. But with the shop Johnny and Mr. Miyagi are busy and now you won't be together to have each other's backs, and you're leaving the safety of that right after some strange man specifically picked you to manipulate and abuse. He tried to isolate you and I'm just worried that you'll over course correct at school. Like you'll try and make friends but you'll get into trouble or you'll not make any friends, that you'll be too scared to interact with people. You're not going to the one with the guys, you're doing some community college."

"It's cheaper."

"Yeah and that's fine, but I'm worried okay? I don't get why you're leaving the safety of the shop to open yourself up to attacks again."

"Ma, I'm not a danger magnet."

She laughed. Dry, humorless.

He sighed and Johnny gently rubbed his back and got up to get them tea.

"Ma, I can't stay in the shop I'm going to beat up strangers if I do."

"What? Why?"

"Because half our customers show up to oggle at Johnny. I gotta remove myself from the situation."

Moshe was standing in the kitchen with a mug. "Hey, Johnny what can I get you?"

"I was thinking of making them tea."

Moshe laughed. "Good idea. At least this part of the argument is new huh?"

"Yeah," Johnny said softly.

He could still hear them.

"You know Johnny isn't going to date a customer."

"I know that! But I don't like them looking!"

"Honey you can't stop them from looking," Lucille said laughing.

"I know, which is why I have to do something else!"

Johnny filled the kettle Moshe handed him with water, ears burning, putting it on the stovetop.

"Wasn't Johnny in a magazine?" Lucille asked.

She sounded delighted. Amused.

"He was," Daniel sounded sour, almost like he was pouting.

Johnny could imagine him with his arms crossed and frowning.

"Why aren't you upset about that?"

"It's from before we were dating."

"So?"

"I try not to think about it."

"Didn't Tommy's aunt give you all the magazines?"

"Mom!"

"What, he mentioned it to Laura. She's been trying to collect all these photos of Johnny so he said she should ask you or he could ask his aunt. Don't you have a lot of photos of Johnny?"

"Ma!"

"Right, So Tristen-" Lucille started.

"Oh no," Moshe said softly laughing into his mug. "Should've rescued him earlier. Whoops. Every man for himself I guess."

"Johnny used to model for some teen magazine. And they did when he was in Okinawa. So there are all these photos out there in the world of Johnny yet he's worried and upset about customers coming in, buying stuff from his shop, but taking an opportunity to see Johnny. Does that make any sense to you?"

"I-" Tristen began.

"There's a difference Tristen. I don't have to see people looking at the magazine or the ads or whatever. But I do see them when they're talking about Johnny right in front of me and I have to be friendly."

"Well-" Tristen said.

"They really talk about Johnny in front of you?" Lucille asked.

The water kettle began to whistle.

"Yes, Ma that's what I mean. I get, angry and annoyed and that's no way to run a business. So I gotta take a break before I snap and say something I regret but mean."

"Daniel," Lucille said gently.

"So I gotta do it Ma. It's not me abandoning them. It's me trying to protect Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees from myself. Because I will start a fight with the next person who comments on Johnny's body. Chozen being home has made it worse."

"You okay at work?" Moshe asked and Johnny blinked up at him surprised.

"Yeah, everything is fine."

"I mean all these people coming to see you."

"I hadn't noticed," Johnny said.

"They aren't like harassing you are they?"

Johnny thought back to the people who came to the shop. Everyone was so friendly he just assumed it was the atmosphere the shop excuded. He had been surprised that people came up to him and asked him questions. He thought Daniel or Mr. Miyagi looked more approachable. He'd expected to spend all his time just lugging things around, not talking to customers. But he did. He talked to a lot of customers and it was exhausting. But it wasn't bad. And they weren't upset if he redirected them to Mr. Miyagi or Daniel when he was carrying things. Maybe they hesitated a split second but Johnny hadn't understood why that happened so frequently. He thought maybe they were worried he'd drop what he was carrying. But now...

"No, just more people talk to me than I was expecting."

"Sounds like it's been bothering him for a while."

"Clearly," Tristen said taking Moshe's mug from him and taking a sip. Then wincing. "Ugh the earl grey?"

"Yup."

"Can't believe you left me behind."

"Sorry, I got up to make tea and then this argument started up again and I thought why not just stay in the kitchen?"

"Heartless and cruel."

"Hey, at least they moved into a different argument, though this one is more pointedly awkward."

"Yeah, Johnny do you like bonsai? Like is working with bonsai something you enjoy?"

"Yeah," Johnny said looking at the boxes of tea, picking some out for Lucille and Daniel. "It's peaceful."

"I don't think I've ever seen a bonsai before," Moshe said. "And here Daniel's made a shop for them."

Tristen laughed softly. "Out of all the things I expected him to do after school this was not it."

"What did you think he was going to do?" Johnny asked.

"I thought he'd become a professional soccer player."

He probably couldn't now. Because of Johnny.

Johnny looked down at the mugs with a frown.

He wondered if that had been Daniel's dream and he'd crushed it.

Hurt his knee so he couldn't pursue it professionally.

"Really?" Moshe asked gently smacking Tristen on the shoulder.

"What?"

Moshe sighed. "I thought he'd be a radio show host. He likes to talk."

"Why not on TV?" Johnny asked, swallowing down the flood of guilt.

"I figured if he was on TV he'd get a lot of calls that would essentially be who let the kid on set? He's 12," Moshe said with a grin.

Johnny nodded. "True."

"His dad was the same," Tristen said. "I thought he was an underclassman for a long time. Freaked when I realized he was like a month older than me."

"Got that LaRusso babyface," Moshe said with a laugh. "Be careful Johnny people are going to think he's your son when you get older."

Johnny wrinkled his nose. "That's going to be awful."

"It's why I was surprised when Lucille said he came home drunk. I was like who would look at Daniel and give him alcohol?" Tristen said.

"Oh, that was from beer pong at a party," Johnny said.

"Did you play?"

"No."

"Why not?"

"I was getting the pizza and didn't know he was playing. It was a big party. Plus I was one of the designated drivers."

"How responsible. So how'd he do?"

"According to Daniel, he sucks at beer pong."

"Oh! Maybe we can do that!" Tristen said.

"You want to do beer pong at, four in the afternoon?" Moshe asked amused.

"No, tonight. We can do it with sodas and stuff, so he can get better you know? His dad was amazing at it."

"He had to be, he fell asleep when he drank too much. It took all of us to drag him home."

"Yeah, he's got a legacy to live up to. We should play after dinner. Johnny, how are you at beer pong?"

"Pretty good."

"Oh look at that confidence. How should we do teams? Split them up or put them together?"

"Let's think about that."

"Sounds fun," Johnny said carrying the tea out.

Johnny was surrounded by Daniel's aunts.

"Can you cook?"

"I learned a little in Okinawa and Daniel's sometimes teaches me."

"Do you have a job?"

"I work at Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees."

That didn't seem to go over particularly well. It was Daniel's shop after all and Johnny knew it didn't sound good. Sounded like he was just a guy who didn't know how to do anything and Daniel had given him a job and was teaching him how to cook.

"Are you going to school?"

"No."

Once upon a time, his answers were impressive now he realized they were kind of sad. Or at least came off sad. Once upon a time, his answer was to make Sid and his mother look good. But now-

"Stop pecking away at him," Lucille said walking into the room and standing next to Johnny, arms crossed.

"Lucille, he-" the woman dropped her voice, "kind of seems like a deadbeat."

It was like he wasn't there.

Johnny felt his palms itch.

He was usually so good with families and parents, but of course, a whole brood of LaRusso's would crawl under his skin.

Maybe if he'd helped out like he'd wanted. He could look for something to do.

"He's a good boy."

"Does he come from a good family?"

"His mother is an amazing woman. Now stop pestering," Lucille said putting her hands on Johnny's shoulders and moving him out of the kitchen. "I am so sorry," she said. "I will give them a piece of my mind later. Why don't you go find Daniel?"

Daniel was talking to his Nonnio and Nonnia and Johnny didn't want to interrupt, so when she turned her back he wandered off.

He probably shouldn't have.

It was someone else's house and it looked like he was snooping. But he wanted to get away from all the people. There were too many of them and they didn't like him. So his best move was to be elsewhere.

He wandered through the apartment looking for things he could do, things he could fix like he used to do with Mr. Miyagi.

He found a burnt-out light bulb in one of the closets and took it down and replaced it when he found the tool kit.

He found that there was a leaky tap in one of the bathrooms and went to work.

He walked around the apartment, moving inch by inch to look for things.

There was a window that didn't open and he fixed it.

It ate into time and it felt good to be busy.

When it was time for dinner he put away the tools and went downstairs.

Daniel grabbed his hand and pulled him to a side of a crowded table and Johnny braced himself.

Prepared himself for all of the talking with hands, the accidental smacks, but surprisingly he didn't get hit.

They turned as they spoke, moving their hands but not towards people, adjusting to where there was free space, in front of them or next to them. It was fascinating to watch, they really didn't bump into anyone or anything.

The food was amazing, chicken and pesto penne, a pot roast with artichokes and sun-dried tomatoes, a salad with bread, tomato, cucumber, basil and onion, and focaccia.

It was a lot of food.

Johnny had thought Lucille and Daniel made a lot of food, but this was intense. But with so many people it made sense. And it was a long meal. Everyone sat around the table for hours. Johnny listened to how school was going for the older cousins in college, how the orchard and farms were doing for one of the aunts, a reminder that everyone was supposed to take some preservers home with them.

Moshe and Tristen sat close and Tristen would occasionally turn to Johnny and explain something. Some intricacy he didn't know. Like how one of the cousins had dropped out but hadn't technically told their parents yet and that was probably going to be an explosion over the weekend, or how the farm had done super well that year and there were too many preserves so the aunt was drowning in them and didn't want to waste food so Tristen and Moshe were driving up to help carry crates off to food banks. And the stuff that was getting too mushy was going to turn into something else. They'd done it last year and it'd been kind of fun. Maybe Johnny and Daniel could come some future year.

It was nice to just listen and when Daniel wasn't talking with his hands one would settle and rest on Johnny's arm or leg.

After dinner, Tristen and Moshe set up an all-ages-friendly version of beer pong.

Johnny walked over to Daniel who looked at it with a growing frown.

"It's not beer," Johnny said.

"No?"

"Soda I think? Water?"

"Isn't the point that the loser gets drunk?"

"I think in this case the point is bragging rights."

"So who's playing?" Daniel asked.

"We are."

"What? No."

"I didn't volunteer us. Tristen and Moshe think you need to be better at beer pong. Some family legacy?"

Daniel looked at Johnny surprised then at Tristen and Moshe. "Seriously?"

"Yeah, I guess it was something your dad was good at."

"Oh."

"If you don't want to play with me I'm sure your mom would-"

"That's not-" Daniel gently took Johnny's hand. "I was really bad okay? And I got frustrated and so I got worse at it and I don't even remember who I played against but I got way too into it and way too upset over losing."

"You won't be drunk this time though," Johnny said.

"Yeah."

"Plus if you get better here then we can play against the guys some time and crush them."

"I like the sound of that."

"I thought you would," Johnny said with a grin. "So you in?"

"Are you any good at it?" Daniel said looking up at him like he doubted it.

Doubted Johnny who had to take all sorts of lessons for Sid and the country club from tennis to table tennis to squash and golf so Sid could talk to people wasn't skilled at the intricacies of throwing a ping pong ball into a cup on the other end of a table.

Johnny.

Who attended parties all throughout high school at Jimmy's house, with the guys, and all their classmates and got dragged into playing whenever he wasn't designated, sober person? Who people refused to play with him and Ali because she got too drunk and he just got better at it?

"You'll see," Johnny said.

"You two going to play?" Moshe asked.

"Yes," Daniel said, arm hooking through Johnny's as they head towards the table.

He was deadly serious as he stepped up to the table. There wasn't a prize. It wasn't like he won something if he did well.

Johnny wondered how bad he could be.

Ali had been okay at it. But she got drunk quickly.

Bobby was awful at it so Johnny doubted Daniel was worse than Bobby.

Beer pong usually led to Bobby getting distracted and wandering off, leaving his partner to continue on without him. Johnny usually found him later with a girl, completely having forgotten why he'd left or that he'd been in the midst of a game.

But he'd passed out once, though that might have just been the one time at the lodge where Dutch had found the hard liquor and poured that into the cups instead of the beer. They'd all fallen asleep in the master bedroom that night because the stairs weren't an option but a hazard and the big bed was enough for all of them. Everyone else had sort of fallen and it'd become a game between Jimmy and Johnny. The most intense beer pong of his life and arguably the most drunken. But that was because Jimmy was also good and by the end of the night, they both had to hold onto the table to stay upright.

Daniel was very focused.

He'd hold the little ping pong ball and try to measure the right angle to get it in, he'd sway and close one eye, all intense, and then it'd bounce off and he'd miss. He frowned, leaning over to Johnny to complain about how he'd thought he'd gotten it but he'd miscalculated because he forgot about the movement in the house, an aunt or uncle coming in from outside, or moving around. There was an excuse for each miss.

It was like when Daniel was on the sidelines watching matches with Mr. Miyagi. The way he'd cross his arms and lean over to tell Mr. Miyagi something, upset, and how Mr. Miyagi would just nod, or how he'd gesture towards what was happening, all arm movement before turning to Mr. Miyagi as if Mr. Miyagi wasn't watching the exact same thing. But now Johnny was in that position and it was kind of funny.

A lot of yes, I did see that, you were very close.

He would've tried to wrap his arms around Daniel and help him try and angle the ball right, but his arms were swinging too wildly too frustrated at missing and getting agitated. He was trying not to laugh because it was cute how into it Daniel had gotten. How serious he was taking it. How he was lifting up the ping pong ball and talking to it, very seriously, like they were teammates before he'd throw it.

Moshe and Tristen were good and Johnny was glad that they'd agreed to soda and water. They were trying to teach Daniel from the other end of the table. You gotta do this Daniel and You gotta do it like that Daniel.

Johnny missed two out of three on purpose.

He didn't want Daniel to be the only one failing.

He wanted to exaggerate his movements because he knew Daniel was watching, and hoping he was learning that way, when he did get them in on purpose.

It took a while, but Daniel was getting better. It was because he was doing what he always did. Analyzing the situation. Instinct. What made him good at karate, at breaking ice.

The excitement when he got the first one into a cup was like a flood. He maybe was too proud because he just scooped Daniel up off the ground. Daniel wasn't upset about it. But then Johnny remembered where he was and very carefully set Daniel back down. Once he figured it out it was game over. He improved in leaps and bounds. It became a fiercer competition and drew a crowd of cousins and aunts and uncles. They didn't win per se but they also weren't completely crushed like it had looked like would happen at the start. And Daniel's confidence was growing by the second. He was going to be insufferable. But Johnny was proud of him. Was looking forward to the next party where Daniel could show off his new skill and watch him crush the guys or girls or both, depending on who was around. He wondered if Kumiko and Jessica would like to play. Though maybe that'd disappoint Yukie, make Johnny and Daniel seem like bad influences if they played beer pong with Kumiko and Jessica. But then again Sato and Yukie played drinking games with Mr. Miyagi almost every night. So maybe, maybe they'd teach them the game and they could all play. He'd mention it to Daniel later.

When the game was over Moshe and Tristen taught a couple of kids how to play and then younger cousins took over and Daniel gently took his hand, leading him over to Nonnia and Nonnio.

"We'll see you tomorrow," Daniel said, leaning down to kiss them on the cheeks.

"Tired?" Nonnio asked.

"We got up early for our flight," Daniel said. "I heard tomorrow is going to be busy."

"I wouldn't know," Nonnio said with a deep sigh. "Tesoro has told me nothing."

"Don't listen to him," Nonnia said. "He's acting all wounded but he loves surprises. Good night, it's great to see you both, we'll see you tomorrow."

"Good night," Johnny said before following Daniel out and across the hall to Tristen and Moshe's.

When they got through the door Daniel stretched and let out a satisfied sigh, turning to Johnny. "Do you know how nice it is to not have to sleep on the floor?"

"I don't know, I kind of liked it in Okinawa."

Daniel frowned. "Sleeping on Nonnio and Nonnia's floor will be nothing like Okinawa. We'd be sharing the floor with everyone."

"It sounds kind of nice."

"I'm almost tempted to tell you to shower and give it a try, but I want you by my side and I don't want to go over there. Or let the rumor mill start running because you're over there and I'm here. By morning Mom would come to breakfast and ask if we broke up. And I'd have to tell her you just wanted to experience sleeping on the floor with everyone. And she'd think I'd lost it."

Johnny laughed following Daniel off to their room. "I doubt your mother would think that."

"Just you wait. Some rumor or something will happen. It always does."

"I'm not worried," Johnny said pulling Daniel close, arms around his waist. "I am thinking though that now that you've mastered beer pong maybe we should play with Mr. Miyagi and Sato, see if Yukie wants to play. Could be fun, or our friends back home."

"Mr. Miyagi and beer pong was not a thought I thought I'd ever have," Daniel said thoughtful, wrapping his arms around Johnny's neck, pressing close and letting his fingertips brush against the back of his neck, a ghost of a touch that sent a shiver down Johnny's spine. "But I kind of like it. That could be fun. Though he could be great at it."

"Right?" Johnny asked.

"It's a good idea," Daniel said leaning in and kissing him warm and soft and tasting like soda.

In the morning Johnny got up when Daniel did. They were supposed to be next door early but Moshe gave them coffee before they went next door for breakfast.

"You ready?" Moshe asked Johnny.

"For what?" Johnny asked trying the coffee. Needed more cream.

"They're morning people and there's a lot of them. Add in energetic children and it's chaos."

"I think I can handle it."

"Brave last words," Moshe said with a laugh. "We won't be there today, we're just going to pop in and wish everyone a good day before we head out. But we'll see you guys tonight."

"Thanks for letting us, well I guess, thanks for letting me stay with you," Johnny said.

Moshe smiled giving Johnny's shoulder a warm squeeze. "Glad to have you and finally put a face to a name and a whole bunch of stories."

"Not all of which are good," Johnny said.

Moshe laughed softly. "Hey, the good had outweighed the bad for a long time now. At least the stories we get."

"Today's the shopping day," Daniel said walking in putting on his gloves and taking the coffee Johnny handed out to him, giving him a quick kiss. "It's a lot of work and it's slow because Nonnia talks to everyone. But it can be kind of fun."

Lucille laughed digging around in her purse. "It isn't fun. It's a lot of organizing and a lot of carrying things and it's exhausting watching a nephew or niece debate between twelve different scarves to decide which one is good for Nonnio," She smiled and then clapped her hands. "Okay we ready?"

"Johnny just needs to grab his new jacket," Daniel said.

Johnny finished off his coffee and headed towards the door, hooking his new winter stuff over one arm before heading across the hall with everyone. Daniel taking his coffee mug with him.

Moshe was right. It was loud. People calling from one end of the apartment to the other end. Checking in that they had everything. Kids weren't up though. It looked like they were asleep for the most part. Johnny followed Daniel through to a spot on the couch that was empty, sitting beside him and waiting. Slowly everyone filtered in and then an aunt stood at the front, counting everyone. Satisfied that everyone who was supposed to be there was she spoke.

"I need a volunteer to stay and watch the kids."

Johnny waited for a hand to shoot up, for someone to volunteer.

He spotted one of the kids who was supposed to be in another room peering in through the door.

"If I don't get a volunteer I'm going to have to draw straws."

"I'll do it," Johnny said.

She blinked, looking at him only momentarily surprised before nodding and moving on to who was driving.

Maybe he shouldn't have volunteered, should've stayed quiet and gone shopping with Daniel and Lucille, but he wanted to be useful.

That old itchiness to be doing something, and he couldn't let a kid know the fact that the adults had to draw straws to stay behind. While all the adults and the older kids were out doing fun things they were stuck together without their parents.

He was good with kids.

He could do this.

It'd be fine.

They all packed up and got ready to go and Daniel hovered for a moment.

"You sure? Do you want me to stay?"

"I'm sure," Johnny said smiling at him giving him a quick kiss. "You don't get to see your family often, go have fun I'll see you when you get back."

In a whirlwind, they were gone and Johnny frowned.

They hadn't given him any information in their rush to leave.

No allergies, no emergency phone contacts, no doctor's numbers, no schedules.

The only one over the age of 13 left was Nonnio sleeping in his chair.

He walked through the apartment, there were twelve kids.

The kid that had listened in had run in and they were clearly expecting him and were unimpressed, disappointed they hadn't gotten to go.

"Anything you want to do today?" Johnny asked.

He got silence as a response. Not something he'd ever expect from anyone with LaRusso blood.

"I'm going to assume it's not sit in this room all day. Though maybe it is," Johnny said with a shrug when he saw one of the kids in the corner scribbling away on some paper.

"Louie Jr. says you used to be in a gang."

Ah there, that was a familiar LaRusso. Couldn't stay quiet for long. And of course, Louie Jr. had spread rumors with the kids. Johnny felt like if anyone was in a gang it was just the LaRusso's in their entirety. He still had a feeling they were a mob. He just wasn't in yet.

"I wouldn't call it a gang," Johnny said.

"Said you get into fights all the time. A big snob meanie."

At least they were honest. But the thought that Louie Jr. called him a big snob meanie was kind of hilarious. He'd have to ask. See what he said. So still think I'm a big snob meanie?

"When'd he say that?" One of the other kids asked.

"When we visited last January and were asking about Daniel."

"He didn't say nothin' over the summer."

"Well in January he said Johnny was bad. Scary."

"He doesn't seem scary."

"Louie Jr. isn't scared of no one. I think you're full of lies."

"Scary mean to Daniel."

"But they're dating."

One of the kids turned to Johnny very seriously. "Did you bully Daniel into dating you?"

"No. I wasn't nice to him the year before last but I didn't pressure or bully him into dating me. I told him I liked him and I understood if he didn't want to be around me anymore but it turned out he liked me back."

"Why wouldn't he want to be around you?"

"Because I hadn't been nice to him when he moved to California. I hurt him. And then I didn't tell him I liked him for six months or so after we'd started hanging out on friendly terms. I didn't know how he'd take that. Plus I thought he liked Kumiko."

"Whose Kumiko?"

"A friend of ours from Okinawa."

"Did you say you were sorry?"

"I did."

"And you meant it?"

"Yes."

"And you still like Daniel?"

"Love him." Johnny gently corrected.

"Oh!"

That seemed to have gone over well based on the gasps and the chatter that followed. They started, like most kids, a million questions, a quick avalanche that Johnny answered about California and Daniel and himself. It was easier than the rest of Daniel's family. They showed him the art they were working on and the stuff they'd brought with them and asked him to play games. They started with a couple of board games, where they had to break up into teams because there were too many of them. But it ended up being fun. For lunch, they made sandwiches and sat around with Nonnio.

"The snow out is nice," Nonnio said.

"Do you want to go out?" Johnny asked.

"Could be nice. When I was their age I loved snowball fights and playing in the snow."

Johnny turned to the kids. "Do you want to have a snowball fight? Or go out and play?"

He got a resounding yes. After cleaning up from lunch Johnny got them all up and into their winter jackets and their little tiny boots and Nonnio followed along and Johnny carried his chair as they walked down the street to the park. Nonnio picked out a spot where he wanted to sit and Johnny set up his chair and turned to the kids.

The kids looked a little unsure standing in the snow in their puffy jackets.

Johnny scooped up some snow. He packed it carefully into a ball. The texture wasn't great. It didn't hold its shape well enough but he got it together.

He threw it in a gentle lob where it hit one of the kid's backs, enough to notice.

That was enough.

One could say egging on 12 kids was a nightmare idea, on their home turf, especially LaRusso's. But Johnny had had worse ideas that had worked out.

He ran, scooping up snow as he went, carefully trying to prepare the snowball and then turning to throw it back at the kid who was closest to him. He was surprised, there'd been a couple of kids who seemed more interested in coloring than being out playing in the snow but who'd come along anyway and they were there, amongst the small mob.

He spun on his heels again, changing his course, throwing the balls he'd managed to make back, gentle lobs that hit true and exploded in powdery white. While he was being gentle the kids were not, a hail of snowballs thrown with all their might.

Eventually, they did slow down, they started to tire, and much to his amusement when he turned around they were all lying in the snow. Nonnio was laughing from his chair over the book he'd brought out with him.

"I suppose I need to ask for a raincheck for this fight?" Johnny asked.

One kid held up a hand into the air. "Yes." was all they said before letting the hand fall dramatically with a crunch into the snow.

Johnny checked his watch. They'd taken care of part of the afternoon, with the kids at home it'd now be dinner time.

"Anyone hungry?"

"Yes," another kid said sitting up quickly.

Eventually, with the promise of food the kids got up and Johnny collected Nonnio's chair and they returned to the apartment.

They traipsed in chattering, dumping snowy boots at the door.

"Wait," Johnny said.

They stopped.

"Will your parents trip over those if the door opens?"

They looked surprised and turned around carefully putting the shows back in a neat and orderly way and then took a moment to put their jackets up before following him to the kitchen.

He looked through the cabinets trying to figure out what he could make. After taking stock he turned around, rolling up his sleeves.

"I'm still learning to cook so we're going to take a vote on what I can make. Okay?"

He got a bunch of nods.

"Okinawan meal of fish, rice, and soup."

He waited not a single hand raised. Not even Nonnio.

"or mac and cheese."

Every hand shot up.

"Okay, but we have to make a deal with the mac and cheese."

The chattering was so silent, Johnny turned to his audience with the pack of elbow noodles in hand. "I'm still working on my mac and cheese recipe so I want a full review. And I don't mean be nice. I mean be brutally honest. I know it's not going to be as good as your parents or your Nonnia's, but I want constructive criticism so I can make it better, so I'm expecting notes."

They looked a little shocked, turning and talking to one another as he found a large pot and filled it with water.

"Why?" one of the kids asked as he set it on the stove turned it on.

"It's Daniel's favorite food," Johnny said going to the fridge and gathering cheeses. "One of them anyway. Who better to tell me how I'm doing than his family?"

He'd made mac and cheese often for the kids he babysat back home, but they were perfectly happy with the stuff out of the box. They'd actually been shocked the first time he'd made them macaroni and cheese that wasn't fluorescent orange. He'd spent a little bit of time at his mom's testing out different cheeses and she had her favorite combination, but she liked sharper cheeses. The one Lucille had made for Daniel's birthday was creamier, less sharp and he didn't want to make hers exactly, but he wanted to know how to make it or at least a good one that Daniel would actually like. He was confident that he could cook the things Yukie taught him. He was pretty sure he could be thrown into the wild and feed himself off of fish because thanks to Mr. Miyagi he knew how to catch clean and cook a fish. But macaroni and cheese he wasn't sure about.

The kid's conversation verged into their favorite shows, the stuff they liked and Johnny listened, asking questions as he cooked. And before he knew it he was filling bowls and setting them out and waiting for feedback. They ate as if it was the most serious job they'd ever been given in their lives.

"It's good," one kid said.

"Needs another cheese though."

"Sharper or less sharp?" Johnny asked.

"Saltier."

He'd found a pen and paper on the counter and took notes of the feedback he got. They liked it was the takeaway, but it could improve. Which he figured.

After dinner, Nonnio retired to his chair to watch a bit of TV and the kids played for a bit, coming occasionally up to Johnny to ask him questions.

"Do you like karate?"

"I do."

"Is Daniel good at it?"

"He is."

"Are you good at it?"

"Yes."

"Does it snow in LA?"

"No."

"Is that why you don't have a hat?"

"I have one, I just forgot to wear it."

After a while with no parents returning and no word from anyone else, he herded them into the bathroom to brush their teeth, sending them off to get ready for bed.

"Do you want me to read a bedtime story to you?" he asked as they slowly filtered into the room where they slept. A lot of sleeping bags on the floor. He'd brought a couple of books with him. Daniel always complained that he didn't read anything current so he'd gotten a book from the library the librarian recommended.

"What's it about?"

"Magic," Johnny said before dipping out of the room to get his book.

He sat down carefully in a chair in the corner flicking the library book open. They got comfortable in their sleeping bags and waited.

He wondered if he should get a library card nearby so that he could have options. He hadn't seen a lot of books around the house that were for kids. He was pretty sure if he paid for the library card he could get it and he had money. And then when he visited he could pick a book up from the local library to read. There were a lot of books his mom used to read to him they might like. He carefully opened the book and began to read.

"In the land of Ingary, where such things as seven-league boots and cloaks of invisibility really exist, it is quite a misfortune to be born the eldest of three."

Soon after Sophie began her adventure they were struggling to keep their eyes and many had fallen asleep. Johnny smiled at the ones struggling and very quietly stuck the bookmark in the book and shut it.

"Will you read more tomorrow night?" one kid whispered.

"Sure," Johnny said carefully making his way around the sleeping forms and flicking off the light, and heading out into the living room where Nonnio sat. He was surprised to see that they still weren't back.

"Would you like anything?" Johnny asked.

"No no, come sit," Nonnio said motioning to the couch Johnny had spent the entire time he'd visited last time sitting on.

Johnny sat down.

"Howl's Moving Castle? Did they like it?" Nonnio asked.

"One that was still awake requested I read tomorrow night so I think so. If you don't mind me asking, why didn't you go with everyone else?"

"Oh, I'm not allowed. Mio Tesoro was very adamant that as it was all birthday prep I was to stay home. No finding out the surprises early. She takes it very seriously."

Johnny nodded thoughtfully.

"Do you know what Mio Tesoro means?" Nonnio asked.

"No sir," Johnny said shaking his head.

"Means my treasure. Because that's what she is, my family is my treasure," Nonnio said with a warm smile. "I know it's a bit overwhelming to be around them all. I know questions like What do you want to do? What is your job? Are you going to go to college? Can be overwhelming, and you don't need to worry about your answers. I know it probably felt judgmental, but it's okay to not have answers to those questions. When I was little I didn't have the same dreams as my classmates. I didn't want to be a doctor or a fireman. I didn't want to be a pilot. I didn't have any dreams like that. One of my friends ended up finding his dream later in life, stumbled upon it, but I never did, not that way. My dream ended up being this family I have. Instead, I'll ask this what do you like to do, what do you enjoy?"

Johnny looked at the carpet thoughtfully. "I like reading, spending time with my friends. I like gardening with my mom. I like driving my car."

"I notice Daniel wasn't in that," Nonnio said with an amused look in his eyes.

"You asked like, not love," Johnny said.

Nonnio laughed. "You know Tesoro started that sweater for you long before we ever met you. And it's exactly because of that."

Johnny looked at him confused and waited.

"Daniel, as I'm sure you are aware, like everyone in this family can talk a lot. And he'd call home and he'd talk to us, we've got two phones so that Tesoro can listen on one and I can listen on another and we can also chat. I also use the other phone to keep up on all the family gossip. When Daniel lived here he'd come by after school at least once a week and talk about school and his friends and the stuff he was doing and whatnot. But when he moved to California it was a lot of nothing. A lot of words that meant nothing. Mio Tesoro nearly packed her bags to go, but I told her Lucille had it under control, and if she needed help she knew we'd be there in a heartbeat. But she never did. Then he started talking about Mr. Miyagi and karate and it was something. But last January he started talking about you. He probably never realized it, but we'd call to check in once a week and every time Lucille handed the phone over to him we'd get a little bit about school and classes but the majority of the conversation was about you. More so after he broke up with that girl...he never told us her name. But you, Johnny Lawrence. He'd talk about your car, about the bonsai Mr. Miyagi gave you that you carried around with you, the books you were reading, sometimes the most mundane things. Oh, what was one that made Tesoro laugh? Oh right, we had celery at lunch and he ate them but slower than normal. I don't think he likes celery," Nonnio laughed softly.

"I don't like celery that much," Johnny said. "It's too fiber-y. But it's okay in soup."

"So Tesoro turned to me one day after one of these long calls that was mostly about you and said I think he likes him, don't you? And we figured either he'd made a lifelong friend or he was falling in love and hadn't realized it. Neither Mio Tesoro or I had heard Daniel talk like that and she wanted to make you a sweater. Would pace around with her knitting needles trying to figure out how to get the information she needed. Because she figured even if you were just a friend, well we were so relieved he'd finally made a friend his age. One that according to Lucille was looking out for him and keeping him safe. I know it's impossibly hard, but she talked about how you brought him home drunk and put him to bed in the fondest tone. And then Daniel mentioned that you were in a magazine. And then he caught himself. Like he hadn't meant to say it. Mio Tesoro went on a mission. She talked to everyone about teen magazines that featured a blonde California boy. You would not believe the number of wrong turns she went down. Until eventually, she got it," Nonnio leaned over to dig around in a basket full of magazines and plopped one onto the coffee table.

Johnny recognized it.

"With that, she knew what you looked like and she was able to call the editor and ask how tall you were. It was a little weird listening to that call. It sounded like they got that call a lot. Or answered it a lot. She managed to get your measurements from the editor and was able to get to work. It wasn't done yet when you visited, but it just renewed her energy on it."

"I thought it was only for family," Johnny said softly.

Nonnio smiled. "That is generally how it goes, but family doesn't have to be the people you share blood with or marry. They're the people who are there for you when you need them, good times or bad. Tesoro made them for Moshe and Tristen when Daniel's father wouldn't stop talking about them either. His friends, the oldest friends who were by his side through thick and thin and even after he was gone. They still come by. They have dinner with us more often than some of our kids do. They're family. It has become a thing of welcome to the family for people who marry into the family but Mio Tesoro will drag her knitting needles if she feels like they're not really in for the family, but Johnny some of those people are failing at things you've done without even thinking about it. Tesoro and I are very happy you're here and would've been whether or not you ended up with Daniel. I mean it helps, but you've already done a lot."

"I haven't done anything though sir," Johnny said confused.

"I know that you helped out Louie Jr. and his family."

"It was for selfish reasons though,"

"He was mean to you when you came to visit and yet you still spent hours on the phone with him for practically months helping him and his dad, helping Louie Sr. It may have been with a selfish goal in mind but you helped Lucille return to her son and allowed a family to have more dignity and mobility then they'd had before. You would not believe how helpful it has been for them to have a professional caretaker helping out. That was a lot of work Johnny. And you noticed that no one was going to volunteer to watch the kids. No one wanted to stay behind and be in charge of 12 children who we love because it felt like a chore. You didn't even know the kids, and rather than spend time with Daniel and Lucille you opted to babysit. And those kids had a blast. You wore them out, fed them a good meal, and got them into bed at a decent time. Plus I know it was you who fixed the leaky sink upstairs."

Johnny nodded.

"The reason Mio Tesoro made Daniel a matching sweater was because you two started dating and we approve. But your sweater was because we like you, we're thankful that you've been there with Daniel. You took him to the doctor, Okinawa, and this whole Silver thing. But Johnny I know you're thinking you did some of that because you had to, or because you loved him. You work hard to try and fix things from when Daniel moved to California, but, well I don't know if he told you this but he did tell us in one of his calls and I think you should hear it, he told us I forgive him, but I don't think he's forgiven himself. And I think that's important Johnny, you need to forgive yourself because Daniel has, he did so long long ago."

Chapter End Notes

Lau Lau the Hawaiian food Mr. Miyagi made
The glass items in Lucille's house are Murano, a special Italian glass from Venice
The ceramics are Italian as well
According to NHS You can get frost bite at -0.55C (31F) chicken and pesto penne pot roast with artichokes and sun-dried tomatoes salad with bread, tomato, cucumber, basil and onion focaccia

Sunflower Heliotropism

Chapter Notes

> We're going to follow someone different in this chapter. We're going to go back to Johnny and Daniel in Newark after this chapter.
>
> I hope you are having a wonderful holiday season.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Chozen stared at the bonsai that was Johnny's.

It wasn't particularly old, but you could tell it was well loved. It would live a long time. Be passed down through the Lawrence line.

Chozen liked that.

It was a beautiful line.

Ms. Lawrence was stunning and Johnny was even more so.

It made his chest hurt sometimes looking at him. But he couldn't not.

Kumiko teased him about it. A lot. Of course he looked at Johnny. Everyone did she'd tell him.

She said it like Johnny was a magnet that pulled people in. Well loved.

But what Daniel had said didn't match that.

He wondered if that was the issue with beautiful things. Sometimes they made people irrationally angry and wanted to crush them. Like flowers.

Chozen had been like that once.

He reached out to touch the tree then curled his hand back.

He'd offered to babysit it while Johnny was out of town. Earnest.

Every chance he could he tried to show he'd changed, that he was a better person. He and Kumiko went shopping in the mornings sometimes and Chozen would stop and look at something and Kumiko would realize he wasn't with her and turn around to go back and find him.

Thinking about Johnny?

The answer was yes. But he hated that she knew. That she had no fear of him anymore.

Though she hadn't really had any from the start.

When he'd go to Miyagi sensei's house to visit growing up, while she was also visiting they'd sit politely when Miyagi sensei was around and then would fight as soon as he was out of sight or earshot.

He remembered getting in trouble for pulling her hair, feeling pissed because of course he got caught, but she hadn't been caught pulling his.

He was adamant that she started it.

Miyagi sensei had told him that he shouldn't be mean to girls. Because they were delicate. But he wanted to argue that Kumiko was anything but.

She was sneaky.

She played baseball sometimes when in town, had a strong arm that aimed true which made her a horror with tomatoes. And she always went for tomatoes. She had destroyed so many of his shirts. It was like as soon as he found a shirt he liked she got pissed at him and found a tomato. Added it to her collection.

He hadn't known what Johnny would say when he offered to babysit the bonsai.

He had hoped that Johnny would trust him to care for the bonsai. The bonsai he'd talked about in Okinawa. Spoke about so fondly. The one that Johnny held like it was precious and that he loved so much. The one, for the short time when their life under Mr. Miyagi's roof had overlapped where Chozen watched him with it.

The one time he sat with it, tools nearby, and eyes closed, thinking of something.

The way his shoulders relaxed. Breathing deep, the way Sato did when he meditated. Then he batted his eyes open studying the bonsai like it was something new, like an artist, who was it? Kumiko had talked about it. Michelangelo who could see the figure beneath the marble and would work directly onto the expensive surface without testing it first. No fear. Just knowledge of how it should look.

He was beautiful. Calming. Chozen had never wanted so badly to be a bonsai.

Chozen would sit on the boards in Mr. Miyagi's garden and just watch. The way he moved his hands around the tree. A cut here, there.

He talked to it, ever so quietly and no matter how hard Chozen focused, no matter how hard he listened he never caught what he said.

If anyone got too close he stopped. So like a rare encounter with an animal you wanted to see he kept his distance, watched from afar, trying not to spook him.

And Johnny had smiled when he offered, hand on Chozen's shoulder, a warm weight.

"Thank you Chozen, but Mr. Miyagi's already offered. I appreciate your offer though and remembering."

He'd been disappointed, but he'd become tongue-tied and just had nodded.

Of course, Johnny had already made plans while he was out of town. But that smile had been worth the disappointment. And it wasn't like the bonsai was leaving. Instead, it'd be returning to Mr. Miyagi's. And that was nice. Nice that even though Johnny wasn't around his bonsai was at the house. And Chozen could sit next to it. Like a companion, a friend.

There were two bonsai Johnny had brought before he left.

Chozen thought about picking up Johnny's and moving it, but Johnny had set them together with such purpose, such care that it made him feel bad. He couldn't do it. It'd be like separating best friends. Which was weird. Because they were trees.

Instead, he went to them. He'd bring out his breakfast, a snack, or his morning coffee and he'd sit next to the bonsai and look out Mr. Miyagi's garden.

"Think he's having fun? Think they're being nice to him?" Chozen asked in Japanese.

It was a bonsai. It had to understand him.

It was also a tree.

He really didn't want Kumiko to catch him. He'd never live it down. She already had too much ammo.

"Sounds like a nightmare to me. Who'd want to be around that many LaRusso's?"

They didn't respond.

Sato and Mr. Miyagi were laughing in the distance about something and it was weird.

Chozen grew up with stories about Nariyoshi.

The name became like a curse word, an evil spirit that had to be warded off.

At first it was stories about Uncle's childhood, bedtime stories of adventures on the island. But then when he got a little older, old enough to go to school, the stories became bitter warnings. That the best of friends could stab you in the back, make a fool of you and then leave never to talk to you again. The ghostly specter of the unnamed best friend of his childhood became solid, was given a name.

Nariyoshi became like a kitsune in his uncle's stories. A trickster who wore the guise of a human to befriend everyone including Sato who fell for it, hard, only for when Sato's parents had chosen Yukie because she was a sweet girl and a dear friend, for Nariyoshi to make a fool of him in front of everyone. His best friend. Instead of talking to him directly, instead of anything else he attacked his honor in front of everyone including Sato's parents and Yukie's parents. Humiliating all parties.

It'd been a good match.

A good chance for Yukie to rise up out of poverty, a chance for Sato to give her a better life. He'd envisioned the three of them living in the same big house. The best friends of his life.

It wasn't like he hadn't known Yukie loved Nariyoshi and Nariyoshi loved Yukie, he'd just thought maybe they'd also held some fondness for him. And he'd thought they'd at least talk about it privately, work something out. Sato just wanted them to be happy. But Nariyoshi knew what an outburst like that meant, one in front of everyone, the slight to his uncle's honor. He had to challenge him to a duel, he'd be disowned otherwise, and then what good would he be to Yukie? To anyone? And he was hurt. Hurt badly. He'd thought they'd have time to figure everything out after his parents made the announcement. Yukie's family was happy about the match. About the money the chance and the hope for her. But Nariyoshi didn't see it that way. Didn't understand, didn't try.

He told Chozen:

Friends cannot be trusted. People cannot be trusted. The only one who can be trusted is yourself. So you must become strong. Learn everything Miyagi sensei taught me to become the strongest because the only reliable human is yourself.

For a long time, Chozen thought his uncle had killed Nariyoshi. That it had ended in a bloody duel and Yukie had refused to marry Sato because of it. Heartbroken over the two men fighting over her and one dying. That Sato had been so heartbroken over it himself that he couldn't bring himself to marry. Even though he had several chances over the years. Several women from good families tried.

But that trust was gone. He didn't want to let anyone in unless there was a financial bond. Because You know what the relationship is with money. They want to be paid. I want a service. That's all there is to it. They don't do it. They don't get paid. I find someone else. There is always someone else.

The only person Uncle did like and trusted was Miyagi sensei. The two went fishing sometimes. Not often. But sometimes.

He always was quiet when he got home from seeing Miyagi sensei. Like time spent with the old man both helped him and hurt him. Badly.

It was only one drunk evening that Chozen heard about Nariyoshi the coward.

Rather than face Sato in a death match. Rather than talk to Sato. Rather than making any stand, he made a fool of Sato and then ran away.

Rather than appeal to the village, to their parents, he disappeared in the dead of night leaving pain and suffering behind.

Sato said Yukie had locked herself in her room and cried for weeks. She'd moved into Sato's home at that point and he'd just been tortured by the sounds of her sobbing for weeks. She'd begged him not to fight Nariyoshi and Sato had started to cave, his temper fading. The sting of the pain subsiding but then he was drowning in waves of it.

Yukie wasn't crying because Nariyoshi had left.

She wasn't crying in relief that she wouldn't watch him die.

She wasn't crying because she was supposed to marry Sato.

She was crying because Nariyoshi had left her behind.

And Sato felt that. Without a word, without note Nariyoshi had just disappeared into the middle of the night. A coward. One who refused to talk, refused to fight for their friendship, for the love of his life. All those words had meant nothing. All those years.

He let Yukie go. Told her to stay with Miyagi sensei. Because if anyone would hear from Nariyoshi it'd be his father. And they gave up on getting married. His shattered heart couldn't handle her tears anymore.

Sato thought, a small part of him, that Nariyoshi would reach out sometime. He thought maybe when he landed wherever he was going he'd reach out. He held onto the smallest of hopes he'd reach out to him. That despite the war he'd hear something. That they could try and fix things, because Nariyoshi had been so good at finding solutions, at fixing things.

He waited weeks. Months. He worried that Nariyoshi got caught up in the war. That he was out there somewhere fighting far from home and that he'd die before they'd ever get to speak again.

He waited years. No word.

Yukie still cried, but not as much.

The worst part of it though was the pity. From his parents, from the villagers. It was a small town. They talked about it a lot. About what would've been a fairy tale wedding. And it was always poor poor Sato. Poor poor Yukie.

The pity twisted something in him. Took the hurt and made it harder. Added fuel to that distrust. He talked about how Miyagi sensei always waited, always listened, had a friend at the airport he begged to call first chance if a Miyagi Nariyoshi ever booked a flight or stepped foot on the island so that he could be there when he landed. So that he could be the first person to greet him. To tell him they would make it okay. To welcome his son home.

It was like an additional wound. And that was part of the cowardice. To run away and not face the mess made. To just ignore the pain left in his wake. Uncle vowed to fight him to the death if he ever stepped back on the island. Retribution for years and years of pain. Not just for himself.

He said he wanted to go out into the world and find Nariyoshi, and that he was pretty sure Yukie knew where he was but she refused to tell him.

How little had their friendship meant?

Had it been a long con?

A game?

Sato told him he'd felt like a fool. A heartbroken fool. He closed himself off from everyone, even Chozen who lived with him, always had since his parents had pushed him into a Sato's arms before disappearing and never coming back. At least that's what Sato said, the one-time Chozen asked why he let Chozen stay with him if he didn't trust anyone.

Because you're like me. Abandoned. My good-for-nothing family couldn't even have the courage to raise their own kid. Cowards the lot of them. But you and I? We are not cowards. We are family. And I will not abandon you. And maybe you will learn from my mistakes, and guard your heart, your soul, from the same pain.

Chozen tried.

Tried to become a person that wouldn't fall from the same tricks Sato had. It meant he had friends but didn't trust them. It meant he was always angry because there was no one to talk to that he trusted. He didn't even like Yukie because he didn't understand why she hadn't just married Sato. Why she was so stiff when talking to Sato. As if he was the bad guy.

He did like Miyagi sensei though. Like every other kid in town after Nariyoshi left Miyagi took him fishing. Taught him how. Told great old stories. It was his only joy and he refused to let anyone know it, because uncle said happiness left you vulnerable to attack. And anyone and everything could use it against you. Take it away in the blink of an eye. So he sat sourly on that boat or on that beach with Miyagi sensei. Not complaining, barely talking, but soaking up everything he could get and burying it away. To keep him going.

It was easy to be angry. To be angry at the world because his parents had left. Because his only family left was angry. Because life was unfair. Because fairy tales weren't real. That there wasn't any balance in the universe. Because if there was then Miyagi sensei never would've gotten sick. He'd put so much good and love into their village and he shouldn't have gotten sick. He shouldn't have been hurt by Nariyoshi the coward.

Mr. Miyagi was what he went by when he arrived on the island and Chozen expected him to be alone. But he didn't come alone. He hadn't lived like a monk or a hermit which maybe then if he'd been just as lonely as Sato, as everyone he'd left behind then maybe Chozen would think he had some honor. But instead, he had a chatty student talking a mile a minute and Chozen hated him. Hated that Mr. Miyagi had left, had hurt everyone, and had made a new life out in the world.

He had a student. An outsider. A student he never took to see Miyagi sensei before as he should've.

A student who didn't go through the same trials by fire of trying to catch slippery fish while Miyagi sensei laughing nearby. The frustration of trying to catch them with your bare hands because patience was key to everything. Something his uncle was good at. Even when his uncle scared off all the fish. Even though it disappointed Miyagi sensei. Even though they fought about it and the little piece of Chozen's heart he thought he'd protected but had missed chipped every time they fought. Because Sato thought that he was owed, owed pieces of the island, things he could sell to make money. He didn't care about the village, the villagers, he didn't even really care about Yukie anymore.

He respected Miyagi sensei but they grew distant over the years and Miyagi sensei got weak. Got sick.

It was unfair. Life was unfair.

Chozen tried to take comfort in the fact that Mr. Miyagi the coward's student was spindly, a weak-looking twig. He had no muscle hadn't trained long. But Chozen didn't think Mr. Miyagi deserved the title sensei. He didn't deserve to be a teacher. Let alone one so well loved. Not like his namesake. Not like his father.

At first, if Chozen could have wished for anything it would've been that Daniel hadn't come to Okinawa. But if Daniel hadn't come then Johnny wouldn't have. And that always stuck that wish in his throat from fully forming.

Johnny had clearly not been a cowards student. Couldn't have been Mr. Miyagi's and it was a curiosity. One he kept glancing back at in the car ride. One he kept puzzling over, even though the small bits of revenge he got for his uncle were satisfying yet hollow at the same time.

Johnny didn't back down and he was like the military men Chozen taught but nothing like them. He didn't make crude jokes, didn't ask Chozen where to find babes or get a drink, didn't automatically throw an arm around him and try to use that weight or mass to push him down or around.

Chozen had flipped many military men to the ground was always satisfied to see the shock on their faces, only when they realized he was their sensei did the respect come and it'd taken a long time to get there, to get it to the point where a new arrival would instantly get chewed out by the old ones for trying to mess with Chozen.

It was refreshing. Like Johnny was a sea breeze on a hot summer day. He wasn't angry. He listened and he responded based on it. Except he kept asking questions that unsettled everything and made him uncomfortable. And Chozen saw him around the village, helping out, running errands, speaking little bits of Okinawan, Japanese, trying. He wasn't used to people trying. The military men always wanted things to be like they'd been at home, got frustrated and angry when it wasn't and Johnny accepted that it wasn't like home. That it was somewhere new and he respected it. Learned like he really wanted to know.

Chozen wanted to ask him a million questions but couldn't do so without getting angry. Because of Miyagi, because of Daniel. Because of a history of horrible bedtime stories and warnings like a twisted fable. Chozen do not stray from this path or you'll be hurt. You'll be betrayed. Anger is your best tool, the best way to protect your honor.

But then Johnny would ask him something. Would want to clarify things, to understand what Chozen meant.

How is Mr. Miyagi a coward?

Because he didn't come back. He didn't talk. He left pain in his wake. He forgot about everyone. And people always leave. At least once a year the house got dark and quiet. Sato got drunk. He got pissed. Got angry. He never hurt Chozen. But he yelled at Nariyoshi who wasn't ever there.

Why did you leave? Why didn't you talk to me? What is the point of everything? Are you even out there coward? Where did you go? Why don't you come back? Do you know how many hours Yukie cried? How many your father cried? Coward! What kind of joke was it? 18 years of friendship. Best friends since before we could walk! What kind of man declares his love, challenges the system and then runs away? Come back here and fight me coward! You love this island more than you love Yukie more than you love your own father! Well I'll get rid of it. Sell it piece by piece. Then nothing will remain. That's what you want right? We'll all disappear just like you.

Yukie said you married, that your wife died, that your child died. She refuses to tell me where you are. How she found you. How dare you. Yukie's been waiting for you. Your father has been waiting for you. You should've brought them home. Coward. Come back and face me. Talk to me. How dare you leave without a word.

Sensei and I fight now, all the time and it's because of you. We stopped talking. It's because of you. He won't let me help him. Keeps asking me not to fight you. To let it go. It's all he or Yukie say to me anymore.

If I let it go...then what was the point? The point of you leaving? The point of you hurting Yukie? Your father...sensei...me? Why don't you write? Why couldn't you have just...been like a normal friend? Send a postcard at least once. For Yukie. For sensei. Do you know how often they stand on the beach? Wondering where you are? How often they go to spread rice to wish you a safe journey wherever you are? Whatever you're doing?

The anger was fine. But sometimes Sato cried on those nights. When he'd gotten too drunk. Chozen usually went in then. To check on his uncle. To ask and see if he needed something and he'd show Chozen pictures. Of the coward. Of his old friend. A chance to see that even the most devious of humans could hide in an unassuming shell.

Johnny had thought Mr. Miyagi was kind. None of it matched with what Chozen knew. It didn't match the pain in Miyagi sensei's eyes, or Sato's, or the quiet distant look Yukie got in her eyes while she was tending to Miyagi sensei's garden or cooking. When she didn't think anyone was looking.

And when Chozen saw Mr. Miyagi he didn't get it. Why would those two, Daniel and Johnny follow him across the ocean? Of course Mr. Miyagi only showed up when his father was dying. Of course he hadn't been brave enough to come earlier. Before he'd gotten sick.

He regretted things now, but in the moment it felt like Mr. Miyagi came for his own conscious, a cheap gesture. But he learned later that Mr. Miyagi hadn't known. Hadn't wanted to fight Uncle, hadn't wanted to kill his best friend. Had saved his life. A misunderstanding born from action and not discussing things that spanned decades. It made Chozen's stomach churn now, but at the time it'd just pissed him off more. It'd been like a switch. Sato became someone he'd never met. Like spring, he supposed.

His home was brighter. And a part of Chozen, a part of himself that had grown hard growing up in a hopeless house hated it. Was bitter. That could've been his life. A life of helping the people in the village, of them liking him, of spending his days with Yukie and her smiling at him, of phone calls from Kumiko to check-in.

He'd been the one to send her away. He'd gone to her house with a brand new suitcase and a plane ticket to Tokyo, had used Sato's contacts, his own military contacts to find a good troupe.

She was the closest he had to a real friend. Family. A little sister. Or, if Nariyoshi-san had never left, then maybe she would've been like a cousin.

Maybe they'd have gotten along without the stories. And he felt bad. Kept thinking of the way Johnny always rushed forward to defend his friends when he could, rising to the challenge, the way he swallowed down pain and never mentioned it and that hurt. Knowing he'd hurt Johnny and hadn't meant to. He had reveled in the chance to fight him, like a game, like somewhere along the way he'd forgotten how to interact with others and only knew how to socialize through fighting. It was still a pain he felt. Like he'd done something unforgivable.

Johnny didn't look like someone who would run. Not like Nariyoshi-san. And that'd given him hope. He hadn't known what to do with it.

Kumiko would say it was because he was out of touch. That Chozen couldn't flirt worth all the money in his bank account. But he could. When he didn't care. And he hadn't cared about much in so long.

It didn't help that Johnny liked Daniel. He didn't get that. Who could withstand all of that talking? It was like a flood, gave Chozen a headache. Yet Johnny had moved in with that. Just because he was beautiful didn't mean he had good taste. Chozen thought the choice should've been obvious. Though Kumiko disagreed with him. But she disagreed with him on almost everything.

"Moping?" Kumiko asked sitting down next to him giving him a cup of tea.

"No," Chozen said taking it.

She bumped her shoulder into his. "I'm surprised you haven't moved Johnny's bonsai to the other end of the garden or something."

"I wouldn't dare."

"Really? Who are you?"

Chozen scoffed into his tea. "I'm always me."

"You say that, but I remember a very angry kid who would hold my homework over my head."

"And I remember a bratty kid who'd stomp on my feet whenever I did that. I don't pity you."

She blinked at him then smiled.

"What are you doing today?" he asked.

"Ali wanted to go do stuff. You want to come?"

Chozen frowned he could say no but Kumiko wouldn't let him.

Sure enough her hand was on his sleeve. "You cannot just stay here with Mr. Miyagi, Aunt Yukie and Sato all day. Let them have some fun of their own. Come on."

Every day. She refused to leave him alone. He thought it was because he got her to the Tokyo troupe. Because he helped her with her dream. He just wanted to make Aunt Yukie happy. Wanted to see her smile again. Thought Johnny would approve. And maybe, he'd never tell her, but she really was the closest thing he had to a friend and he wanted her to be happy too. For her to follow her dream.

His excuse had been that there was no point in going to the USA to study dance when there were perfectly good troupes closer and that there might be some good if he had a famous dancer who owed him. He'd insinuated tickets to take a date, specifically a tall blonde one.

He wanted her to be happy. Wanted her to be healthy. Wanted her to follow her dreams and soar. Because he had seen her dancing sometimes. Saw the jumps she tried after watching the TVs in Naha, trying to teach herself. The way she'd spun.

He'd never cared about anything like that, never had a dream. He just followed in his uncles footsteps.

They came to LA because Johnny called. Because Chozen always answered the phone. Because he always called Mr. Miyagi's. Talked to Mr. Miyagi, talked to Johnny, hung up on anyone else. And Johnny's voice had rasped. Sounded like he was in pain. And that'd worried him. What had happened?

There was an ocean between them. But if something bad had happened he could hurry.

"Hey, you mind helping me with something?"

Of course. "What is it? You okay?"

Johnny had asked if Chozen or Sato thought about expanding their dojo to the USA, specifically about buying the Cobra Kai dojo. The dojo Chozen slowly learned was where Johnny had learned from the old teacher who'd hurt him. And Chozen was very down for helping him get revenge on that particular person. And Sato was on the phone before Chozen finished explaining the request, the situation.

He was buying their plane tickets, was calling Yukie telling her to pack that they were going to Nariyoshi this time.

She'd protested, said that she wasn't part of the plan. She wouldn't be of much help.

I will not leave you behind. Sato had told her. Serious. Plus I'm sure Nariyoshi has missed you.

"Ah they're here," Kumiko said at the sound of wheels out front, pulling on Chozen.

"I don't want to spend all day with girls," Chozen complained, letting himself be pulled along.

"Come on," Kumiko said. "You cannot literally spend all of your time with Johnny's bonsai."

"I could try. Better company anyway."

"You're planning to stay here right? You gotta make friends Chozen."

Little sister. Little. Why did she always act like she was older? Like she knew better? Like she was smarter and wiser? Worried about him.

"Is it okay if Chozen joins?" Kumiko asked as the car pulled up. Ali at the the wheel and Jessica sitting in the passenger seat.

"I don't know, Chozen you know we don't do death matches here right? You're not going to like fight someone who gets your order at McDonalds wrong right? Challenge them to the death?" Ali asked.

Johnny had warned him. He might as well be letting Kumiko push him into a trap.

"I know," Chozen said a little bitterly.

"If you can behave then come along."

Behave, what did that mean? Of course he could behave.

Kumiko tugged him along, pushing him impatiently into the car, into the back. He bit down a sigh, a sound of frustration, the desire to rip his arm out of Kumiko's grip. He knew how to get into a car on his own. She acted like he was five sometimes. And because she was hanging out with these girls they also treated him like he was a bad toddler.

"Did you two eat yet?" Ali asked.

"Aunt Yukie made us breakfast," Kumiko said shifting forward. "What did you do?"

"I had a boring thing at the country club with my parents. They do these brunch things and because I'm home we had to go."

"The food had to be good right?" Jessica asked.

"We had egg with lobster and caviar. There were also raspberry pancakes with gold leaf. It's too much really."

"It sounds exciting," Jessica said.

Sounded like a waste.

"The gold leaf doesn't taste like anything it's not worth it."

"That's disappointing," Jessica said.

"Really it's not worth it. Anything with gold leaf on it, just skip it."

"Well Ms. Lawrence made me breakfast. It's still really weird staying with her, but my options are that or the guys since my aunt rented out my room to a musician whose now working part time in the shop. And as much fun as that could be Ms. Lawrence has been adamant that I'm not in the way and that she's more than happy to have me around and I kind of feel bad about the thought of leaving her to stay with one of the guys."

"Okay, which one would you stay with?" Ali asked, nose wrinkled. "Because really I would stay with Ms. Lawrence but it kind of sounds like you would be down for staying with one of those cobras."

"They're not cobras anymore," Jessica said.

They were still awful Chozen thought. But she'd gotten defensive over them. He supposed she'd spent the most time with them. And she probably wasn't on their hit list like he was.

"Yeah yeah, they're growing up or whatever, they can still be dicks."

Thank you.

Jessica sighed. "Dutch's place is way too intense. I think it'd be fun because there'd be so much to explore that I'd feel like Nancy Drew. Plus he's a lot of fun. I think we'd go for runs and cook and listen to music and it'd be fun. Bobby's house is bursting with sugar and he has cute little siblings. It's super cozy and nice. I feel like we'd eat junk food and talk about real shit. I mean I would with Dutch too but Dutch would give me super honest opinions and those aren't always nice. Like every time I complain about my boyfriend back home he just flat out tells me to break up with him. Which, okay I get it, they've never met and he's only heard the bad shit, but still. Bobby would listen and be sympathetic and more understanding. He gets wise sometimes and it's pretty helpful, but I'd get so sick of sugar and I'd feel so sick after like two days. Plus we do fight over our baking styles. Midwest versus west coast. Jimmy's house is set up for guests and it's like party central. If he's not hosting one of his cousins is or his parents are and I think that could be a lot of fun but I'd also get tired of it. Like I don't know how anyone gets a good night sleep there-"

"That's because it's break. When we were in school Jimmy's house was only party central sometimes. But now that he's in school my parents said his house is just constantly hosting events. They think his parents miss him. It's how they're coping," Ali said.

"Ah, that makes sense. Anyway it does mean it's not really a great place to sleep now. And Tommy's place is just too small which I never thought I'd say. Their extra bedrooms are already full with film equipment and there's a dark room and it just seems like I'd be in the way even though I know Tommy would make sure I was treated like a princess," Jessica said.

"I can't believe you get along with all of them. Tommy I get, but the rest of them-" Ali shook her head. "better you then me honestly."

"They don't seem too bad," Kumiko said.

Traitor.

"You all are lucky, you didn't have to deal with them for years and years and years. They're a group of macho idiots. Like Kumiko you should know what that's like more than any of us, to have to deal with a macho idiot."

Her eyes met Chozen's. She meant him. He gritted his teeth. And here he was starting to warm up to her because he agreed with almost everything she said. He'd let himself get comfortable even for a split second.

Kumiko squeezed his shoulder scooting forward, hooking her arm around the back of Jessica's seat. "People can change."

"You really think that huh?" Ali asked glancing at her.

"I do. And people can change your life when you least expect it."

Chozen looked out the window at the passing palm trees with a frown.

Ali frowned then sighed. "Stop looking at me like that, so full of hope.

Okay fine, so they are good friends to people they like and you all are lucky because you met them after they started cleaning up their act. And there was a lot of shit going on that I didn't know about until it was really too late to help."

Chozen turned back, her shoulders were drooped.

"Can't read minds," Chozen said before he could stop the words from leaving his mouth.

He had thought it'd be best if he just kept his mouth shut the whole time. Less likely to have three girls beat him up or stop the car and kick him out. He did not want to have to figure out how to get back to Mr. Miyagi's on his own.

Ali glanced back at him, surprised, waiting.

Chozen looked away. "Uncle spent life thinking Miyagi-san left out of cowardice. Miyagi-san spent whole life not coming back because think unwelcome. Think have to kill uncle. If talked, no forty years of pain. Could not read the others mind. Ali-san not know about Johnny-san's pain because Johnny-san not say right? I hurt his arm. He didn't make a sound. Still feel bad. But... if say nothing I can do nothing. Not even apologize or help."

The car was quiet for a while and then Ali spoke, so softly, "Daniel noticed."

"Daniel-san very nosy," Chozen said.

Ali laughed.

"He sure gets into more trouble then any one else I've ever met," Jessica said with a sigh.

"Well some people also just won't let him be," Kumiko said pointedly.

Chozen frowned. The stories she'd been told were different from the ones he had been told. It was one of the things they fought about growing up. She thought Sato was evil and Nariyoshi was a tragic hero. She thought the only thing standing in the way of Yukie and Nariyoshi's happy fairy tale ending was Sato. Not that Sato had also been hurt. She always stuck her fingers in her ears when they were little and sang so loudly when he tried to explain that Sato wasn't the villain. Eventually, he gave up trying. Eventually, he stopped trying altogether. He realized some people would only believe what they wanted and if he was going to the villain in her story by association with his uncle, the only family he had, the only family that wanted him then so be it.

So maybe he could see how it made things worse when Mr. Miyagi had returned to Okinawa with his students in tow. He hadn't been welcoming. He hadn't been friendly.

He'd been mean.

He'd taken all of that bottled-up anger over everything and dumped it onto Daniel's shoulders.

It hadn't seemed fair.

Nariyoshi, an untrustworthy monster from his childhood bedtime stories, a warning, a fable of danger had returned with a student. Two. Two students who were willing to fight on his behalf. A man who refused to fight his own battles would let his students fight for him?

How more cowardly could one get?

Sato would never allow Chozen to do the same. But there was always something about Johnny's tone, like things had been bad, that things weren't good and that Nariyoshi, now Mr. Miyagi had helped. That there was that root of Miyagi sensei there and that he'd sprouted into a sturdy reliable and well-loved tree that gave shelter to those in need.

Chozen didn't know how to take the two halves of perception of a man he didn't know, how to put them together.

He knew his own pain.

He knew his uncles.

He saw it in the bags under Johnny's eyes, his tussled blonde hair when he arrived. A teen who'd not slept. Who was haunted, yet he was there.

Daniel refused to fight. Mr. Miyagi refused to fight. But Johnny faced Chozen, wasn't scared. Not like the kids who ran away thinking his bad luck would rub off on them as a kid. Like parents just up and leaving was contagious.

"Well we are here," Ali said turning. "The only way this works is if we're quiet. So no talking, no applauding, we don't exist where we're going. We're just going to watch. I've only been allowed to do it because the people I bring with me and I are well behaved and quiet. Can we all accomplish silence?"

The girls nodded and Chozen felt eyes fall on him. Really? Him? Come on now.

He nodded.

Ali led the way to a backdoor in an alley and Chozen wondered what sort of awful thing he'd just agreed to.

She knocked on the door and it opened.

A big burly guy looked at their group with a frown, but after taking in Ali he stepped aside and let them through.

Chozen half expected the guy to not let him past, but he was allowed in as well.

He followed the girls, Kumiko keeping her hand on his arm like she was scared he'd get lost even though it was a hallway, there were only two ways to go and there was no way he was getting lost. Though he could just turn around and escape, call a taxi and just be free. It was tempting. But she'd tease him for chickening out. He wasn't scared. He just had a healthy amount of self-preservation and spending time with Ali and Jessica was only one rung below hanging out with the ex-cobras on purpose on the hazardous for his health scale.

He'd heard there were tar pits somewhere in LA, that might be safer then spending time with the ex-cobras.

He was on the fence whether it was safer than spending time with Ali and Jessica.

Ali opened a door and led them up a staircase, she was being as light on her feet as possible. Sneaking.

Clearly they weren't supposed to be wherever they were going.

Chozen was going to end up in jail and he'd say I was just following a girl who didn't tell me where I was going. And Ali would bat her eyes and twirl her hair and be gone and Chozen would sit in jail until his uncle realized he was missing which would be days. Maybe less if Kumiko also got out, which she would, before him. But she would for sure let him sit there for 48 hours. Let him just stew. And he'd get yelled at even though it wouldn't have been his fault.

Ali crossed a catwalk that hung high over nothing and then settled down in the middle of it, sitting and holding onto the bars.

She motioned for them to join her.

Chozen sat down, copying her and hooking his arms through the rungs, looking down.

There was a thick heavy curtain below and lights. Some people were standing below, waiting. The curtains rose and the music swelled.

He'd never seen a musical.

Never seen one from such a view.

There were fight scenes but they were all done via dance.

He pressed his cheek against the bars, watching the actors swirl below, the way their voices rose up in song. It was too fast to keep up with, but he got the story. He got the main points. He could follow along with the flow.

He hadn't ever thought about how dance could benefit fighting. But he supposed Kumiko had because she'd talked Johnny into coming into the dojo for a lesson. She kept trying to talk him into it but he kept telling her no. He didn't see the point. But he could see it now. Maybe it'd be worth learning dance. Might be worth incorporating in his lessons with new students.

When the dojo was ready.

It wasn't yet.

He was determined not to cut corners.

It had to be completely unrecognizable.

Johnny hadn't requested that, but he had to do that. He had to make it safe for Johnny to step foot in again. Which meant every single thing that had made it Cobra Kai had to be stripped away.

There was a couple in the musical below. They kept trying to find a way to be together. It wasn't as exciting as the fights.

He'd been so relieved that they'd been given enough funds to do everything he wanted, that his uncle was okay with it. They'd gone through everything and got rid of anything and everything with that accursed snake.

They were replacing it with the bonsai. Mr. Miyagi's bonsai. Miyagi-do.

It wouldn't have the same peaceful air as Mr. Miyagi's garden. But it'd be a nice mix between Sato's style and a good memorial to Miyagi sensei. And that made Chozen happy.

Miyagi sensei would exist over the ocean. That part of his memory would get to finally be on the same part of the world as his son. All he'd wanted for the entirety of Chozen's life and probably longer. To be close to his son again, to see him.

Sometimes Chozen got jealous. Angry at the man he hadn't met. To have a parent who loved you so much that their heart broke while you were gone and they waited desperately for you to get back. To have a parent that just wanted you. To throw that away....Chozen couldn't understand that.

There was a fight again. Characters were dropping like flies. Important ones. Chozen frowned, brows furrowed. He had a bad feeling about the plot.

Mr. Miyagi hadn't expressed any interest in teaching. He kept saying no, that he was too busy. No no, don't want. Students who need me find me. Like strays. Like all the cats at home that need help find people. And I've got my hands full with that and the shop. I helped one and well you've seen my garden. That one ended up becoming two and then those two brought more. Let me focus on helping those harmed by Cobra Kai and help them heal. You focus on creating a new dojo to bring life back into the valley. Sato wanted to be a sensei, and you Chozen, I know my father would be very proud of the both of you and honored.

Mr. Miyagi, Nariyoshi, he was like that. Not some monster from Chozen's childhood. Some confusing monster who threw back all the love he was given in the faces of those who loved him and then stomped on their hearts before disappearing into the night. Instead he brought Chozen tea and Chozen had mentioned he wanted to try some snack, an off handed comment, mostly to remind himself but then Mr. Miyagi bought it and gave it to him later.

It was a lot of little things. How he brought them lunch sometimes when they got busy and he remembered things. Remembered what salad dressing Chozen liked, what orders he got from the stores, and always got it for him.

It was somehow worse that Mr. Miyagi was nice. That two nice people were kept apart over nothing. Years and years of pain that could have been avoided.

In the evenings Sato and Yukie and Mr. Miyagi talked. They drank and played games and kept talking. Chozen sat quietly by their side, Kumiko was usually off practicing in another part of the garden, or was talking with Ali and Jessica on the phone about their plans. She'd join them to play games, but she missed the quiet moments where Mr. Miyagi talked.

He talked about Mrs. Miyagi, about the war, about the son he never got to meet. The pain in the air fell over their small group like a thick fog. Regret and pain. Heartache and grief.

It dissipated whenever Kumiko bounded back, to take a break from practice and enjoy some tea or to join them in a card game after the call with her new friends. Chozen was sure she knew, but it was like the addition of another person scared off the deeper topics. He wondered what conversations were startled off or set aside by his presence.

He wondered if they talked about his parents. If Sato ever mentioned them. Sometimes Chozen desperately wanted to know more about them. But uncle had once told him not to bother, to not hurt himself. He didn't even know if they were still alive or dead. Didn't know which answer would make him feel better. He thought his uncle was right a lot of the time, that poking and proding at the wound was bad for him. A terrible idea. He understood that. But sometimes he couldn't help himself. Yet he never asked. Couldn't bring himself to do it. He feared it'd hurt Sato to ask.

The couple met again below and someone stepped out from the darkness. Chozen knew better to call out a warning even though he felt it. There wasn't going to be a happy ending. He didn't know why he'd expected one. He'd kind of hoped there would be one. Real life didn't have happy endings. No one he knew got one. So he had hoped at least in the story playing out below him that there'd be something. But it was a tragedy. He'd had enough of those. So he shut his eyes and just listened to the music fall into a sorrowful sound.

When it was over a hand tapped his shoulder and he looked at Kumiko.

Her eyes were red rimmed.

She'd cried.

She was sniffing and pulling up at him, laughing softly. "You fell asleep?"

"No," Chozen said.

He wasn't going to ask if she'd cried. She clearly had.

Instead, he shoved his hands in his pockets and followed them down the walk and out past actors and actresses that now flooded the hall, talking. They weaved around them and their costumes back out through that door that led to the alley.

Ali stretched and spun around in the alley.

"Wasn't that great?"

Kumiko nodded. "It was beautiful."

"I never thought of watching a show from that angle before, it was interesting. The story was great."

"Chozen? Did you just sleep through the whole thing?"

"No, but it should've ended earlier."

Ali frowned, "Not a fan of musicals?"

"Not a fan of tragedies. Enough in real life," Chozen said with a shrug.

Ali studied him a little too closely.

He wanted to look away but he wouldn't back down. He wasn't scared of her. He wasn't going to step back or look away.

She stepped in closer look up at him.

"We'll go to one with a happy ending next time," she said.

He hadn't expected that. Her whole body language had been rearing for a fight. Instead she just patted his shoulder and turned. "How about In-N-Out?"

"Yes!" Jessica and Kumiko said looking at each other and laughing falling into chatter about the show and other shows they'd seen.

Chozen followed them to Ali's car getting into the back watching the palm trees pass.

If he focused on the palm trees he could pretend he was still at home.

There weren't enough flowers to be Okinawa if he lowered his gaze. Not enough stray cats. Not enough US military. But that last one was kind of a relief.

It was nice not to hear the helicopters, to listen to drunken men, to have to teach them. Because he wouldn't be, well he might be. Sato was for sure. But Cobra Kai had taught people like Johnny and Johnny wasn't military.

Chozen hadn't ever taught non-military.

Who would he be teaching? Kids?

What was he supposed to do with kids?

He wasn't like Johnny.

Kids didn't like him.

Yuna had kicked him in the shin the last time he'd seen her. Her little mob of kids that she was in charge of was also a pain. She reminded him of Kumiko when she was younger. Popular, charismatic, and prepared to make Chozen's life hell if he got on her bad side.

Trying wasn't good enough.

Maybe he'd get flowers for the dojo. Maybe he could get some shiisa sent over. Bring a little bit more of Okinawa over.

There was a knock on his window and Chozen blinked, they were in the parking lot of the In-N-Out and Jessica was looking in at him concerned. She motioned for him to follow.

Chozen rubbed his face.

He'd been staying up late listening to stories and getting up early and maybe wasn't getting the best sleep. Was distracted. He didn't want to miss anything. He wanted to be a part of everything. He didn't want to be left behind.

"Thanks for waiting," Chozen said. "Sorry."

"It's fine," Jessica said with a shrug. "They went in to make sure there's a table for us. It's kind of busy."

Chozen nodded following her into the diner.

"I remember what it was like feeling all alone here. And I'm sure it's weird because of your history, but the guys make living here less lonely," Jessica said smiling up at him.

A guy gets lost in his thoughts for a few minutes and some girl starts pitying him. Stab him in the chest and it'd be kinder.

"There's a lot to do."

Jessica nodded, seriously. "Oh I'm sure. I've never started my own business on the ashes of another. Not one made of nightmares. I'm sure there's a lot of...well my aunt would say bad energy, that needs to be removed at the very least. Oh, do you need any pots or pottery or anything? I can put you in contact with my aunt to make some stuff. Her place is across from Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees."

"Thanks, I'll ask Uncle."

"I think what you're doing is important. For all the guys, even if things between you all aren't comfortable, I think it's still going to be good that the Cobra Kai dojo is gone so entirely. They won't say it, but I think their old teacher really hurt all of them pretty badly. Not just Johnny and not just Daniel," Jessica said as they headed to the red and white counter. "It might take awhile for them to come around but I think they're grateful."

Chozen looked at Jessica wondering why she was being civil to him, waiting for the other shoe to drop, for the trick. He patted his pockets. He had his wallet, so he could cover the bill if they all left them with the bill and ran, which he wouldn't be surprised if it happened.

"Have you been here yet?" Jessica asked turning to him.

"No."

"You should try the Animal Style burger."

Chozen nodded and she turned to the cashier. "Two animal style burgers, fries and drinks please."

She pulled out her wallet and Chozen realized belatedly when she passed him a paper cup that she'd paid for him and horror flooded his veins like ice. A girl he didn't know was paying for him.

"How much do I owe you?" He asked quickly reaching for his wallet again.

Jessica shook her head, "My treat. From one non-native-Californian to another."

She tapped her cup against his and headed off to the machine to fill up her cup with root beer. He followed copying her choice, confused, still waiting, holding onto the cup so it couldn't be knocked from his hand. He followed her to the table where Ali and Kumiko were talking about school and dance. Ali was talking about dancing at the country club and the different styles she knew the basics of, asking Kumiko questions.

"The dojo would be the best place to practice, I could for sure give you a lesson," Kumiko said.

The mirrors were still on the dojo walls because Kumiko wouldn't let him take them down. She wanted to practice with them. She kept saying what a waste it was to take them down, even though there was paint all over them, even though she'd scrubbed at them to try and prove they were salvageable and it'd just made it worse.

He'd tried to tell her that everything had to go. Everything had to be rid of, they were only keeping the bones. He tried to stress how imperitive it was to get rid of everything that held an ounce of the old place.

"If I offer to open up the dojo and let you host a class will you let me finally take down the mirrors?" Chozen asked quickly in Japanese.

Kumiko blinked at him and pursed her lips, speaking in English. "No, you can't."

Chozen sighed pinching the bridge of his nose.

"What did he say?" Ali asked.

"He wants to get rid of the mirrors."

"Aren't they covered in paint?" Jessica asked.

"Yes," Chozen said.

"He also offered to open the dojo so I could give a lesson."

"Let's do that, and then we can tell you whether it's worth keeping or not," Jessica said.

"But-" Kumiko protested.

"I also would like to see what the dojo looks like now."

Chozen couldn't believe his ears. It almost sounded reasonable. Like they might side with him.

He doubted it.

They were Kumiko's friends.

Which mean they were Daniel's friends.

Which meant they couldn't be his friends. And that was okay.

He didn't need friends. But not having enemies was better. Though he didn't trust it. He refused to trust it. He heard their number called and got up quickly to get their food, taking his drink with him and setting it on the tray to carry it all back.

It was the least he could do since Jessica was treating him. It was also the only guarantee that nothing happened to the food or drink. He sat down setting the tray down between them and ate, listening to Kumiko try and explain why the mirrors should be kept and not winning her argument.

It was...satisfying.

Conversation turned to hobbies, things they were all picking up in school.

Kumiko had joined a hiking club and had plans to try and hike Mt. Fuji the next time the mountain opened which excited Jessica who went rock climbing for fun and Chozen looked at her again. These girls were all dangerous weren't they? The amount of upper body strength needed for rock climbing...he was going to just disappear if he made them upset. Never seen again.

He ate while they talked, looking out the window at the palms. He wondered if Johnny was having fun where he was. What Newark was like? Cold? He bet it was cold. Why would anyone want to live somewhere cold? They probably didn't have palms.

Kumiko pinched him.

"Hey!"

"Stop that."

"Stop what?"

"You keep thinking about him, stop it," she whispered in Japanese.

"I can't help it, also how the hell can you always tell?"

"Because you look...you look like Aunt Yukie used to," she said.

He stared at her.

He was not Aunt Yukie. Not even close.

He wasn't some woman who was going to spend a good chunk of her life crying. He wasn't going to cry. He never cried. He hadn't ever since he showed up on Sato's doorstep. He only almost had when he'd lost against Daniel and Sato had come angrily up at him, but had hugged him instead of yelled at him. Uncle had apologized for all the years of darkness. All the years of distrusting the world. All the years of honor that wasn't honor. For not fully being there for him.

To him Yukie always looked heartbroken. He wasn't heart broken. He was just waiting. He wasn't going to go down to the water all the time and pour rice in. He wasn't going to cry when no one was around. He wasn't going to stop living. He wasn't going to stop growing and changing and becoming more...he'd read it in some book Kumiko was reading that he borrowed for the flight...self actualized. He was offended. Highly offended. He wasn't that tragic. Was he?

"What the hell did you say to him?" Jessica asked. "He looks upset."

"I told him he reminded me of my aunt."

Jessica laughed softly. "Yeah, I could see why he's offended then."

"I'm just worried," Kumiko said playing with the paper that had covered their straws.

Worried? About him? Why? It wasn't like he was doing anything dangerous. He wasn't training to hike mount Fuji in the summer. It wasn't like he was starting fights for the fun of it anymore or because he was bored. He just liked someone who liked someone else. That was the most mundane problem to have and none of her business.

Or when he was busy painting the dojo and working did Uncle Sato and Aunt Yukie and Mr. Miyagi talk with Kumiko? Did she know about his parents? Was she worried because of-no Sato wouldn't talk about him. Not like that. He didn't want anyone to pity him or his family and he wouldn't do that to Chozen.

"Lets go to dojo," Chozen said. "They can see, you can teach."

"Alright let's see how you've changed it," Ali said leading them back out to the car. "I used to go by and watch practice at Cobra Kai."

"You did?" Jessica asked. "What was it like?"

Ali drove as she spoke. "Their teacher, Kreese...Their sensei taught like it was a military class. At first it was kind of cool to see them in their gi's moving so concisely, every move was ordered and perfect. They moved together. But that's because I didn't know. I didn't know that they broke bones that they were hurt so badly in their path towards that perfection. I just didn't like the way he barked at them, the way he spoke to them. It seemed like he was supporting them, trying to help them and I thought it was kind of cool, the way he like puffed up like a rooster full of pride of his students, but then there was a moment it switched, where the things he said just didn't sound quite right, where the words he used were similar to the ones he had been but it was like he was slowly trying to shift them into a more dangerous point of view. That it was them versus the world as if there were enemies around every corner and that's just now a good way to live you know?"

It kept you safe though. But Chozen really didn't want to agree with Kreese on anything ever.

"Honestly, very glad it's gone. That guy was bad news."

"It sounds like there's a lot of that around here. It's so boring in Ohio. It's almost like a Scooby-doo mystery here all the time, that or just Johnny and Daniel bring it with them."

"Oh! I thought that too!" Kumiko said leaning forward. "Okinawa is very peaceful but it wasn't while they were visiting."

Peaceful for her maybe. When all you did was teach kids traditional dances and go dancing in Naha you had a peaceful life.

"Alright, Chozen, show us around," Ali said parking her car in front of the dojo.

Chozen looked around getting out and heading up to the steps, digging the keys out of his pockets. He'd already taken down the snake on the outside and all the signage. That had been his satisfying. He got to paint over the snake. To go around finding all the cobras in the shop and destroy them.

Now he was waiting for Mr. Miyagi and Sato to agree on a design for the bonsai. He'd studied Daniel's gi and the design Mrs. Miyagi had made and had also stared at Johnny's red jacket and the bonsai patch.

He'd worn it one afternoon and Chozen had put his hands on the jacket focused fully on the patch.

"Oh right, you're redesigning right?" Johnny had asked. "I like this one."

He'd bent his head to look down at the patch as well and Chozen hadn't noticed how close they were until Daniel had told him he couldn't steal that jacket off of Johnny. Ranting about how that jacket was Johnny's and how much work went into that patch.

"He's looking at the patch," Johnny said. "He's got to work on the logo."

It was fascinating to watch how Daniel instantly backed down. Like only a gentle couple of words and all that fight, all the concern evaporated. He still was a pain, but he'd come over, leaning over to look closely at the patch, sharing his opinions on the design. Comparing it to the late Mrs. Miyagi's. And Chozen hated that Daniel had good ideas, had a good eye for it. Hated that he was incorporating Daniel's notes.

Chozen unlocked the doors and stepped through. It smelled strongly like paint. Overwhelmingly like paint. The dojo at home was dark while Kreese had painted the walls white Chozen had painted them blue. He'd started the sketch of the bonsai on one of the walls and he'd forgotten about that, shit. He hadn't even let Sato look at that. He had asked him to give him time to try and figure it out for a couple of weeks while he bickered with Kumiko over the mirrors. Maybe they wouldn't notice-nope they were beelining towards it.

"What is it?" Jessica asked.

"It's a little unclear," Ali said.

"It's not important," Chozen said. "Go, study dance."

He tried shooing them away from the sketch on the wall but they were focused, stepping close looking up at it curiously. "Oh! Is that supposed to be Johnny's bonsai?" Kumiko asked.

How? How did she do that?

"It is!" Jessica said.

"I haven't seen his bonsai that often," Ali said. "But it is definitely a tree. Who drew it?"

"It's just a sketch," Chozen said. "It's not done. Just testing."

"You drew this?" Jessica asked as she and Ali spun to look at him.

He turned his back to them picking up his tools. It was a blend. It was partially Mr. Miyagi's bonsai, that's what it'd started as, but it'd turned into Johnny's bonsai. He'd thought maybe no one would notice. But of course Kumiko had.

He still had a lot of work to do and maybe he'd do it while they danced.

He still had to figure out the typography for the sign. Something that would draw in the locals and would show off that they were powerful but not Cobra Kai. Something that felt like Miyagi-do. Something that would make Miyagi sesnei proud. He kind of wanted to hide some fish somewhere. Paint a few of Miyagi sensei's favorites. He wanted it to be something to honor him. To remember the roots. Maybe he'd hide fish in the roots. Maybe he'd hide a man in a fishing boat and some pieces of Okinawa in the tree or somewhere else.

He wasn't sure. He had too many ideas and he didn't want to mess it up. It'd be part of their first impression with students.

There was a lot of stuff to get done.

He'd painted Sato's dojo when he was little. Lugging around paint cans bigger than him. Sato's students offered to help him but he told them no, he could do it himself. He didn't need any help. He didn't want any help. Never had. But now, well he cared a lot more. And before his uncle would've told him if it was bad, but his uncle was gentler now, and that was why he wanted to wait until he was done and he was proud of it.

He'd already sketched out the bonsai at least 15 times. It helped that it was at Mr. Miyagi's because he could study it in person now. He could watch the way it moved in the breeze, the way the sunlight hit the leaves. He'd seen plenty of bonsai, Miyagi sensei's place was always full of them but now now this one was the most precious to him because it was going to mean so much.

"It's good Chozen," Ali said. "When are you going to start painting it?"

"I'm not sure I like it yet."

"You gotta just start, if you don't like it can't you just repaint the whole wall?"

She made it sound easy. But that was hours of work, it wasn't like erasing a failed math problem. It wasn't a quick do over. He wanted this to last. He wanted this to be his own chance at starting something new, turning over a new leaf.

He turned, arms full of the brushes and paint cans he'd set out that were now tripping hazards for girls planning to dance and looked back at the silvery ghost of a sketch on the wall. He was proud of it, but he also didn't like it. It'd taken days and the thought of painting it now, he was scared to ruin it.

"Didn't you want dance lesson?" he asked moving things aside and motioning towards the paint covered mirrors.

"Yeah yeah, that can wait," Ali said waving her hand dismisivlly. "What colors are you going to do?"

"I don't know. Like I said. Not done."

"Well green of course, and brown, but like isn't part of Miyagi's design the setting sun? Are you going to do a sunset?"

"I don't mean to be rude but how is a tree going to really sell Miyagi-do? Like I get it's important to Mr. Miyagi but aren't you trying to get students and take over the void left by Cobra Kai?" Jessica asked.

"It's stable. Lives long life," Chozen said.

"But like isn't it like a school mascot? Whose the fighting bonsai trees?"

Chozen set his stuff down to the side biting back a sigh.

"It represents the long connection to the roots of the craft," Kumiko said. "Plus it's defense only for Mr. Miyagi. But you're not teaching defense only right Chozen?"

"It's both, but without Cobra Kai's strike first. Defense heavy."

He'd found so many pamphlets in the office about the Cobra Kai creed. Enough pamphlets that he was sick of it. He'd taken them home to Mr. Miyagi's and burned them in the fireplace. He brought marshmallows to test out the thing the miliatary men always talked about fondly. S'mores. He made some for Kumiko, Yukie, Sato and Mr. Miyagi. It'd been nice. And it'd also felt good to cook something sweet on the ashes of something that had hurt people he cared about.

"Do you want help?" Ali asked. "I was in cheerleading. I've made and painted plenty of signs."

"Oh and I've done thousands of these little bonsai motiffs for the shop," Jessica said turning.

They looked so excited.

How did he politely tell them no?

It wasn't some community after school project to beautiful a community wall. This was suppose to- oh god they were all looking at him in that puppy dog eye way.

He turned away, dragging drop cloth away from the mirrors he'd tried to clean for the fiftieth time hoping maybe they'd be less paint covered so Kumiko would stop bothering him about it but it was like Silver had cursed them to remain dirty and unclear as his revenge.

He hated it all.

"You can paint over it all later but come on this is perfect," Ali said hand on his arm.

"Thought you wanted to dance," Chozen said.

"How about we let Chozen work more on the outline and dance and then help him if he needs it after?" Kumiko asked walking past him and grabbing the radio that she'd found while digging around in all the stuff left behind.

That had taken days. Just to clear out all the junk. Chozen had sold a lot of it but Kumiko had held onto the radio. He didn't understand why she kept trying to hold onto things left behind from Cobra Kai. She'd seen the fight, she'd heard the stories, why didn't she view it all as cursed like he did?

She plugged it in and took off her shoes stepping onto the mat in front of the mirrors.

That meant he had to work on it huh?

He did not want to do that, not with people there.

He sighed grabbing a ladder and dragging it over to the wall.

He heard the click of her turning on the radio and classical music began to play.

He climbed up to the top and sat and staring at the wall.

He didn't know what to do.

He took a deep breath. He could do what Johnny did. What Sato did.

He closed his eyes. He thought of the bonsai in Mr. Miyagi's garden. The one Johnny held so carefully in his hands. The way it looked in his hands, the way it looked on that patch he wore. Different bonsai's of course.

Johnny was teaching his to grow in a different way. He was working on it with some different goal in mind and Chozen needed to meld it all together.

Mr. Miyagi's bonsai and Johnny's.

He opened his eyes and studied the sketch on the wall.

That hadn't helped. He didn't get it. But he did know what he could work on. There were a lot more leaves that needed to be added.

He dragged his pencil across the blue wall, sketching the leaves onto the tree, working his way down adjustting the shape of the limbs, the arms of the tree and the curve of the trunk.

He could hide things in the bark.

It might be good with the kids. Tell them something deep the way Miyagi sensei liked to. As if everything in the universe was connected and there for a reason. As if everything happened for a reason.

He hated that, but kids liked it. And maybe they could make that cool for the miliatry guys that he knew would start showing up over the summer.

California had a lot of boot camps. The miliatary already explaineed that they'd ship their new recruits to Sato and Chozen to teach, to meld early on in their career and in their lessons. Something about the usefulness of the meditative techniques on calming them in the midst of battle. But Chozen didn't trust it. Wanted to branch out, hah, and become a part of the community.

The truth was he didn't want to go home. He liked Okinawa but without Miyagi sensei there, without Sato, knowing that Johnny was an ocean away everything felt empty. It was cold despite the summer heat. He wanted to go home and visit but he wanted space and an excuse to travel back and forth.

He wanted to live in California and this was his best shot and he had to make sure everything was perfect and that included the damn bonsai on the wall. It included figuring out the font and every choice he made possibly gave him a future or took it away.

And what happened then? If he failed? If he didn't take everything forward and settle in as Miyagi-do? Would Cobra Kai come back?

He couldn't allow that. He couldn't let them have a foothold. A chance. Everything had to be destroyed.

He needed this. He needed a chance to be near people and have his own life. He needed....a chance to step out of his uncle's shadow. He needed space to breathe. To figure out who he was. Because he didn't know who he was on his family tree. He didn't know if his temper came from his mother or father. He didn't know if he had one of their eyes, their nose, any of that bullshit people cooed over babies. He didn't know any of that. All he had was the future and he wanted it so desperately that those damn leaves had to be perfect.

The music stopped and he glanced over. They were doing ballet.

Kumiko was showing them how to stand and the girls were wobbling and laughing. They were having fun even though they kept falling over. Carefree. Because they weren't worried about their futures. They could do what they wanted or at least they knew what they wanted to do, their dreams.

"Let me switch songs," Kumiko said walking over and flipping the cassette over in the machine.

"Okay okay, we suck at this, Kumiko just show us what you've got," Ali said after she fell over again, sitting up on the mats with a sigh.

"Are you sure?" Kumiko asked. "You can get it, it just takes time."

"Put us out of our misery, just show us a routine," Ali said slumping back down onto the mats in defeat.

Chozen wondered how many times he'd heard that tape. She'd brought it with her to practice when she wanted, or to just have fun dancing to. He was honestly surprised it wasn't some pop music, something more recent. But she seemed to like songs without words. And he watched as she danced for a couple seconds, the start to a routine he thought he had memorized himself because he'd seen it so many times before turning back to the bonsai. Pencil back to the wall, sketching it out feeling a little more at ease.

He chewed on the edge of the pencil looking it over again.

He could maybe paint.

He could start.

He'd brought a small can of paint up with him up the ladder and he carefully pried the lid open with the edge of his pencil and dug around for the brush from his stuff. He stared at it, brush dipped in green. He didn't want to mess it up but he was no chicken. He wavered. He leaned forward and made a stroke. Not that hard. He just has to keep doing that. Again and again. He could do that.

After about an hour he stopped and set his paint brush on the paint can and felt eyes on him. He turned to look down at the girls who'd snuck over to watch.

"I didn't know you were so artistic," Kumiko said.

"Those are some impressive leaves," Jessica said.

"Looks like he doesn't need our help," Ali said, "Except maybe on this. Kumiko those mirrors are awful. You gotta let them go. You looked distorted in them. There's no way you can teach a class with distorted mirrors."

Kumiko sighed, shoulders slumping. "Yeah, you're right. They look pretty bad."

"I'll get a few new ones," Chozen said.

"What! Really?" Kumiko said looking up at him in surprise.

"Few, not nearly as many. Not whole wall. Military men like throw one another around. Break too many if have whole wall. But if you want to teach when in town, then we can have some. But, Kumiko-chan these mirrors are expensive."

"How expensive are they?" Ali asked.

"Very expensive, I think that's why Imouto wanted to keep them. So-what, what is that look?" Chozen asked frowning.

Kumiko was staring up at him wide eyes.

"You said Imouto."

*"*I did not."

"You did too."

"Did not."

"Did too."

"What does imouto mean?" Ali asked.

"He called me his little sister," Kumiko said.

"I didn't."

"You definetly did," Jessica said a smile breaking across his face. "Oh, how about we get iced tea from the cafe down the street, and then we'll come back?"

"I like that, you want anything nii-san?"

Chozen felt his face burn and quickly turned away. "Tea is fine."

Kumiko laughed and headed out the door with the girls.

Chozen took a deep breath gathering up a different color of paint and going back to work. He went to work trying not to think about, how even if she was teasing him, that it was kind of nice that that bickering had created a bond. Little sister felt right said out loud.

There was a knock on the dojo windows and Chozen looked from branches he was painting. There was a woman the door and she looked familiar. He didn't know who she was though.

He carefully climbed down and walked over opening the door.

"Chozen? I'm Mrs. Douglas. I work for the Under 18 All-Valley tournament, since your dojo is new I wanted to personally bring you all the paperwork so that once you get students you can get straight at it, mind if I come in?"

"Uh, okay," Chozen said stepping out of the way.

"You know I never came in here while it was Cobra Kai. Now that I know everything that I know I think Mr. Silver submitted all the paperwork before they even opened quite awhile ago. That or he had his lawyers do it for him. It looks nice, oh are you painting the bonsai! I always thought that was the neatest dojo design."

Chozen stood awkwardly wondering if she should be speaking to Sato instead.

"Do you think you'll put up Daniel and Johnny's trophies?"

"I didn't teach them," Chozen said.

"True, but they are students of Miyagi-do right?"

Chozen nodded.

"You know I heard what happened to Johnny's second place trophy, we had it fixed, the problem is I don't know if he wants it, or if it'd be something to put up in here. You know let sleeping dogs lie and all that."

Chozen did not know. What had happened to Johnny's trophy?

"His trophy?"

"Oh, his teacher snapped it in half because he hadn't won first place.

From my understanding Johnny protested that second place was still okay and then Kreese...well he tried to kill him right in our parking lot. Oh if I'd been anywhere nearby I would've bashed that man with my bag and called the cops. I'm glad Mr. Miyagi was there to save him."

"I'll ask about the trophy," Chozen said.

He couldn't see why Johnny would want it if it was so marred with a near death experience. Chozen wouldn't want it, but it wasn't his choice to make.

"You know some dojo's put up photos and stuff of their students. I brought some and newspaper clippings if you want them."

How many times could he say I didn't teach Daniel or Johnny until she understood?

But he was curious.

They walked into the office and she set her bag down digging around. He'd gotten a new desk for Sato, unsure if Sato would be staying or leaving but he figured there needed to be a desk there anyway. She pulled out a stack of papers.

"This is the paperwork needed to be a part of the All-Valley, if you're on good terms with Jimmy I recommend asking him to help you go over it. Turn it in before the summer and you'll be all go to go," she said patting the top of it. She pulled out a little baggy of grapes. "Want some?" she asked.

Chozen shook his head. "No thank you."

"Aha, found them, so these are the press clippings from Daniel's win the first time," she said putting the newspaper down. "And look, there's Johnny with his second place trophy before Kreese broke it. He looked pretty happy for a moment don't you think?"

Chozen looked at the photo of Johnny after the tournament in his black gi, you could tell he'd fought hard, was sweaty. He looked relieved, not happy. It was in the eyes. He was smiling but it didn't reach his eyes.

If Chozen didn't know Johnny, if he hadn't seen what his real true smile looked like then he'd agree. He'd think Johnny was pretty pleased with his second place trophy.

He did want to see more. "What else do you have?"

"Well we did take photos of Daniel's win against Mike Barnes. So we also have those. But I figure...that one, maybe no one wants it."

Chozen had to agree there. That had been a brutual fight to watch, prolongued torture was what it was. Barnes had played with Daniel using the rules to his advantage to not gain a point and toy with Daniel.

It'd pissed Chozen off. Daniel was a good fighter, though he'd probably never tell him to his face. But to watch someone do something so dishonorable for the fun of it? The whole orchestration of the event had been terrible.

He flipped through the photos of Daniel looking exhausted and beaten down to holding up his trophy relieved and proud of himself. Even that one might dredge up bad memories. Chozen wouldn't tell Daniel, barely would admit it to himself, but he also wanted the dojo to not bring up any of those bad memories for him. He wasn't just clearing out Kreese, but also Silver.

"How about something lighter?" Mrs. Douglas asked. She dug around and pulled out photos of a bunch of kids in white gi's. Chozen's eyes snapped to a young blonde with blue eyes smiling warmly at the camera.

"Johnny?" Chozen asked pointing at him. He knew instinctively that was him.

"Yeah, and that one is Jimmy, this one's Bobby, Dutch, and Tommy. This is from their first year. Each of the dojo's send their student classes and we put them up on the walls in the hall. Cobra Kai had quite a few and we...well unanimously when we banned Cobra Kai decided to take them down. Also I liked those boys so I've got a bunch of photos from their tournaments," she said pulling out an envelope and dumping the photos on the desk.

He went through them watching the ex-cobras grow up over the years in their gi's. That warm smile only fully on Johnny's face near his sensei or his friends. It wasn't as bright as it was now, but it was there, the start of it. He looked so proud holding his first first place trophy. Chozen wanted to hang them up. Even if they were for a different dojo. Maybe he could buy some markers and put them in a glass frame and then sketch a bonsai over the emblem. Maybe he could just black it out with ink.

"You want to keep them?" Mrs. Douglas asked.

"Yes. Will figure something out," Chozen said.

She smiled at him, warmly, opening the bag of grapes and taking one then holding it out to him. He took one popping it into his mouth. It was frozen. It was kind of nice on the hot day in the hot dojo. She patted his back. "Welcome to the Valley Chozen, I can't wait to see what you accomplish. I'm going to leave my card. I'm happy to help if you need anything."

"Thank you," Chozen said following her out. "I appreciate it."

He went back to the office. He had other things to give Jimmy. A stack going where he was waiting to gather his nerves. He'd found so many papers, so many papers. Scribblings of Kreese's lesson plans that involved dangerous ideas. Silver's ideas and plans for Daniel. All of it made his stomach churn, but Chozen didn't know how to contact Jimmy to hand them over. He'd need it for the trial. Evidence. He'd have to ask Kumiko or maybe Jessica would hand them over for him. She seemed closest with the guys. She seemed, nice.

Chozen organized the stack for Jimmy in the office then climbed back up to continue painting while he waited for the girls to come back. He wouldn't finish that day but it'd be okay. Ali had said something about watching a movie at her house that evening and Chozen was looking forward to it.

"Chozen, you coming?" Tommy called.

Chozen stood on the steps of Mr. Miyagi's house looking at the van. Wasn't there some warning they gave children in the USA about getting into strangers vans?

"No, I'm going to dojo. Lots of work to do."

"Dude! You can't spend forever in that place. We promised Johnny we would look after you."

"And that we'd be nice."

"Daniel really chewed us out after last time. We promise we won't, like we won't tease you about Johnny okay?"

"Daniel was fucking pissed. He lectured us for like an hour straight. I don't think he took a breath."

"We did insinuate Johnny was easy. Daniel said that any slight on Johnny's honor could end up in a fight. A bad one."

"Listen man, we fucked that one up. Johnny's not like that."

"Not saying you should trust us. I mean you're not forgiven and you're still a shit for hurting Johnny, Daniel and Mr. Miyagi-"

Chozen took a step forward looking at Dutch who was sitting in the drivers seat. "And you haven't ever hurt anyone? Haven't ever accidentally hurt someone? Didn't mean to hurt Johnny. Accident."

"Yeah you accidentally knocked him out."

"Better than him trying to interrupt the fight. Or watching the fight. I did that to protect. Doesn't hurt. Want to see?" Chozen asked moving his hand up. He didn't trust that van full of young men. He was not going to go anywhere with tricksters.

"Hey you-!"

"Dutch," Bobby said, tone full of warning.

"Oh, now you're going to try and be a pacifist now? Huh Mr. I got into a fight last weekend?"

"You know that bakery is fucking shit and they should be closed, but they keep trying to steal my parents recipes and the owner had the nerve to disrespect my little siblings," Bobby said darkly before turning to Chozen. "Johnny was worried you'd spend all your time alone or in the dojo and he said and I quote 'No one should spend all their time in there. It messes with your head. Please make sure he doesn't lock himself in the dojo and be nice.' So we're here."

"Already went out. With girls. No need," Chozen said.

Kumiko was out with them again, he told her he was going to meditate in the garden with Mr. Miyagi and Sato because she had the same worry Johnny did.

He'd waited until she left and of course, as soon as he thought the coast was clear, no girls dragging him out for another movie marathon, which had been fun, but he had work to do, then the guys showed up.

He had the worse luck. Even if he had things he wanted to ask. Even if he was carrying around the documents Mrs. Douglas gave him in the hopes of running into Jimmy so that he could ask him to look it over. Even if he had a pile of stuff for Jimmy in his bag. He was working up his nerve and it wasn't there yet. That was for if he ever ran into Jimmy alone. He figured that was more equal. But a van full of guys gunning for him was not good odds.

Was this how Daniel always felt?

Maybe he owed Daniel a more sincere apology.

"That doesn't count," Jimmy said. "You gotta have some fun, not just do whatever it is Ali wants to do."

"Besides I heard that you all just went back to the dojo yesterday," Tommy said.

"Heard the same thing," Dutch said nodding. "So that doesn't really count."

"Just get in," Bobby said. "We can go to a game, do you like hockey? We can go to a museum. We can go to the beach, have you been to our beaches yet?"

"I grew up on an island," Chozen said with a frown.

He doubted the coast of California, that their beach, were better or even held up to the beaches in Okinawa.

California had Johnny and the people he cared about at the moment, but not much else he thought that would win out against the beauty of Okinawa.

"Okay, even so, I can never get tired of the beach, and neither can Tommy and he has a beach house," Dutch said.

"Oh, I got an idea," Jimmy said leaning out the door. "We promised Ms. Lawrence we'd swing by and visit and help her with stuff. She wanted to put in a pond and we told her we dug the pond at Mr. Miyagi's and put that together and she said if we really wanted to we could come and knock ourselves out."

"Oh, I forgot about that, good memory Jimmy."

"Honestly surprised my brains not mush after finals," Jimmy said.

Go to Ms. Lawrence's house. See her, see maybe more photos of Johnny, maybe hear more about Johnny, maybe see what a Mom is like. Even if it was a trap, even if it was a lie he couldn't pass up that opportunity. Not to see and observe the woman who raised Johnny, not to maybe understand a little bit more of what he didn't have.

Chozen nodded. "Okay. I will help Ms. Lawrence."

Jimmy nodded moving out of the way into a seat further back and patting the seat he vacated. "All aboard."

Every fibre of Chozen's being told him it was a terrible idea but he wanted to go. And that made him step forward and carefully climb into the van. He turned to shut the door, feeling a sense of finality, of foreboding as he shut the heavy door blocking out the brightness of Mr. Miyagi's garden and house.

The inside of the van was actually clean.

He expected to step his feet in wrappers of take out. He expected it to reek of dirty laundry, weed and beer. But instead it smelled clean. It was better cared for then he expected from looking at it on the outside. There was plenty of space and there was pop music playing on the radio. Chozen buckled himself in and sat tensly as Dutch drove off.

The drive to Ms. Lawrences home was uneventful. Nothing happened. No one opened the door and pushed him out. No one pranked him on the ride over. It was mundane and boring. It was a relief. But he still worried as he followed them up the steps.

"Hey Ms. Lawrence, you wanted some help digging the pond?" Jimmy called pushing open the door.

They just walked in. Like it was their home. Not like Ms. Lawrence had her own life, she could've had a gentleman over, some suitor. She seemed like the kind of woman to have suitors and not dates. She could've been having an important business meeting over the phone that they were interrupting or a luncheon with some fancy person. Despite that he still followed them in. He was too curious not to.

Her home was nice and bright. She was sitting on the couch hair up in a messy bun with with a bunch of pamphlets around her. "Hello boys," she called looking at the pamphlets then looking over the back of the couch taking in the fifth person, him. "You can't bury him in my backyard."

He hadn't thought of that.

"Wouldn't even dream of it."

"We're not that evil."

"Are you sure you want to dig the pond? It's not even a big pond I want made. I can afford to pay professionals. Really," Ms. Lawrence said.

"We had fun digging up Mr. Miyagi's pond," Dutch said walking past and towards some sliding glass doors that he flipped the lock on.

"Happy to help Ms. Lawrence," Jimmy said.

"Plus we brought Chozen. Figured if he's spending all his time inside working he might as well do some outside work too," Tommy said clapping Chozen's back on his way out.

"Ms. Lawrence," Chozen said bowing, following but wanting to stay, wanting to sit next to her.

Her garden was beautiful. It wasn't the same as Mr. Miyagi's. Mr. Miaygi's was a Japanese style garden. Minamilist and beautiful, calm and peaceful. Lots of greenery.

Ms. Lawrence's garden was where all the flowers he'd missed upon stepping off the plane at LAX had gone. Everything was blooming and the air was thick with the scent of flowers. The trees were in bloom, the shrubs, and flowers.

He stopped, suddenly taking it all in, breathing in the floral scented air. There was a shed in the back of the garden and the guys were getting out tools that reminded Chozen for a moment, a slow terrible moment of destroying Miyagi sensei's vegetable garden.

Johnny had asked him "Isn't this your heritage you're destroying?" when he'd come to destroy Miyagi sensei's home.

He'd been so mad. So furious that Miyagi sensei had died. That Miyagi sensei not only had died that Mr. Miyagi had come in and taken up the space and that all focus had shifted to him. That suddenly Yukie saw Sato and Chozen as the bad guys even though they'd been there.

Even though they'd been the ones to check in on Miyagi sensei for years. Even though Miyagi sensei had been so important to them.

Chozen had viewed him as family. As a step in for a grandfather, something he hadn't had. And he'd died.

The kindest nicest person who never flinched when he got mad, when he snapped, when he didn't know what to do with all that anger.

Miyagi sensei had been the one to find him sitting on the old docks absolutely furious because the other kids were doing things for children's day with their parents, that other kids had koinobori flags and he didn't. No one was happy or celebrating that he existed. But Miyagi sensei had found him and had taken him fishing. He'd been the only one to give him kashiwa mochi and shiikuwasa juice.

No one else had bothered. They'd eaten it on the boat and Miyagi sensei never asked why he was upset, just let him be mad, let him be bitter and angry and never told him to behave or to let it go. Eventually the fire fizzled out and he enjoyed the moment and the ricecakes with red bean jam.

Sato was usually too busy. But Miyagi sensei had been there. A gentle hand on the top of his head, then his shoulder, and eventually on his arm when Chozen grew taller than him. He only was chided when he and Kumiko fought. But there was never any bite to it. And when he died it was like a vast hole in his chest.

It wasn't fair. And while Sato grew even more bitter Chozen grew angrier and it fed off one another. Like an out of control wildfire and in the moment Chozen hadn't cared. Why shouldn't anything still stand while the man who inhabited it, who'd given it so much life no longer walked the halls or breathed in those spaces? Why should the vegetables grow when he wasn't there to care for them? What was the point?

Why honor the ancestors of Miyagi sensei, the previous sensei's when their brightest star was snuffed out?

He'd regretted it later. When he'd nearly lost his uncle. When for a very awful hour he thought he had. That he was finally alone in the world because Yukie would go with Mr. Miyagi and Kumiko hated him and he liked Johnny but Johnny wouldn't stay and Chozen wouldn't blame him. And he didn't know what he was going to do. He didn't know CPR or how to check on someone and had just thought in horror that that was it. That just like his parents, just like Miyagi sensei a terrible horrible storm had come and taken his uncle with it. And he'd just been so tired and scared. Tired of everyone leaving and dying.

He'd been overjoyed when Sato had returned, stumbling in with the help of Mr. Miyagi. But then very very suddenly the table had turned. Sato had changed sides. And Chozen hadn't proved himself. He hadn't been brave or courageous. He'd let himself be scared and feel pity for himself and his uncle had turned his back to him for the first time in his life. Breaking what he thought had been the strongest promise, the only strong sturdy promise in his life. That they were family and unlike his parents Sato would never turn his back to him. And he had.

Desperate was how he'd felt. Part of him thought about leaving. That if Mr. Miyagi had wormed his way back into Sato's heart then despite all the terrible stories maybe it'd be better for Chozen to disappear along with the storm. But he couldn't do that to his uncle. He couldn't be another person who left. It'd been a bad idea but it was the only thing he knew to do to get welcomed back. To be the one with the death match. And if he'd lost, if Johnny had been wrong, if Daniel had won and killed him, then so be it. It'd been worth the risk.

Was it his best idea? No. Not even top five, ten or twenty. But grief compounded by the pain of abandonment made it feel lucky that he hadn't made even a worse plan. More drastic.

When had been the last time Sato had given him a hug? Before that fight, before the storm? He'd remembered being so stunned, so shocked that he'd puzzled it over, trying to remember unable to place the last time.

"Here you go," Tommy said handing him a shovel.

Chozen took it.

He'd expected them to give him a comically small shovel, a spade, but it was the same as theirs.

Bobby was unrolling a piece of paper, a landscaping design of the garden. They were pouring over it, discussing how big it was, how deep it was supposed to be. It looked fairly simple.

Shoveling and gardening was something he was confident in. It was what he'd spent most of his time doing ever since the death match. Helping the villagers rebuild after the storms and helping their gardens thrive. All he did was work in the dojo or in the village.

Unless he felt the need to send something to Johnny. Then he started collecting notes from the villagers, translating their words for him and Daniel, collecting things for care packages from his uncle and aunt Yukie.

Sometimes it was because he'd seen something. Usually ads for the aquarium. A pang of jealousy of the fun it looked like Daniel, Kumiko and Johnny were having. A pang of regret because Johnny's arm was still in a sling and knowing that was his fault. That that was immortalized on all the ads they kept releasing.

At least in the fashion magazine he'd seen at the konbini with Johnny on the cover he wasn't wearing the sling. He'd never purchased a magazine so fast, wondering when and where and how. Aunt Yukie had explained when he'd brought it with the tea she liked, happily taking it and flipping through telling him about the business cards Johnny had gotten and how Kumiko had taken him and Daniel around to do all these fun things.

They sat together, drinking tea and reading it. She talked about the last time she'd talked to Johnny-san on the phone. Worried over how the new shop was going and all the strange things happening in the Valley. She recommended he collect the photos and send them to Johnny. So like an obssessed stalker Chozen went back to the konbini and bought another copy to send to Johnny and Daniel, avoiding the gaze of the person behind the counter. It wasn't that bad. He could've bought more. Could've explained, I know him, I have to send him a copy. But he refused to explain himself. Just glared. But it didn't feel as potent as it used to.

It didn't help that there wasn't anything behind it. He wasn't really angry, or as angry anymore. Sato and he had talked, like actually talked, a real conversation rather than stories and lessons, for the first time in his life. They talked about the changes Sato wanted to make in the company, how he wanted to be better and what did Chozen think was missing? What could be improved for the both of them?

Sato had said that he'd played games with Mr. Miyagi and Aunt Yukie and that'd been a lot of fun. Chozen recommended they keep doing it. That if they continued to isolate themselves to protect themselves that they'd fall into the same bad habits. He told his uncle that he thought the games would be a good first step. And that they should visit the people they cared about, now that they knew where they were. They should visit Kumiko in Tokyo and watch her performances with Aunt Yukie and they should visit Mr. Miyagi.

Sato had agreed smiling at Chozen warmly. "When did you get so smart? I guess you always have been. I'm so sorry Chozen. We both have a lot of work to do."

And they did, helping out with the village that no longer was Sato's. They went to work buying back things that were from Okinawa but had been sold. The fishing boats stopped and Sato focused on his dojo, focused on spending time with Aunt Yukie and Chozen. Working along side him in the fields or bringing him green tea. Things were getting better, healing. And Chozen felt better. Tentatively. Because good things never lasted. He was toeing his way forward, testing the ground with each step forward.

"Wow, you boys have gotten a lot done. I've made some lemonade," Ms. Lawrence said.

Chozen glanced up from the spot where he was digging and watched the guys clamber out grabbing the icy glasses. There was one for him to and she held it out on a tray. He reached but his hand was caked in dirt and he pulled his hand back. He rubbed it on a clean spot on his shirt.

"It's fine Chozen," Ms. Lawrence said taking the glass from her tray and holding it out to him. "Do you guys want to come in and take a break? Abuela just brought me, oh I forgot what it was, it sounds like a shell. Kind of looks like one now that I think about it. Right! Conchas. I've got a whole lot of conchas. I asked her if she robbed a bakery and she told me she made them all. Something about how her kids were visiting and how she liked to have freshly made conchas for when they visited and then thought maybe I would like some. She really is the absolute sweetest. I need to ask Johnny if he's had them. I feel like he probably has because he spent a lot of time in her shop growing up even though I was completely unaware. Anyway, you can come in if you want, don't worry about the dirt. It'll give me something to do. Being divorced and rich is surprisingly boring. I have to find my own entertainment and with Johnny out of town and Jessica out for the day I'm pretty bored. I haven't cleaned in ages, I kind of want the challenge."

"Ms. Lawrence, you could just hire someone," Jimmy said.

"I could, just like I could've hired someone to dig that whole pond you all dug for me, but sometimes just like you liked doing it yourself I like doing things myself too. I mean I did a lot on my own before I met Sid. I took care of myself and Johnny and it wasn't easy but he says I'm a great mom, even got me a mug," She said pointing to a coffee mug on the kitchen counter that said world's best mom. "And I think he truly means that. And that is the best thing."

"You are a good Mom," Dutch said walking past her and into the kitchen and looking at the colorful bread, the top of which was cracked. It did look kind of like shells.

"Thanks," she said taking a seat on one of the bar stools.

Chozen took a sip of the lemonade, looking around the kitchen. It was very sweet, and cold, and a little sour. He set it down and went to wash his hands at the kitchen sink.

"So what do you usually drink on hot days in Okinawa?" Ms. Lawrence asked him.

"Tea."

"Ah, Mr. Miyagi makes a lot of green tea. Like that?"

"Also corn tea, uncle likes corn tea. Aunt Yukie likes sanpin."

"Sanpin?" Ms. Lawrence asked, "What's that?"

"Jasmine tea," Jimmy said.

Chozen turned to look at him. He shrugged. "I had to learn for the family business."

"Oh, I'm going to make a note of that," Ms. Lawrence said looking around the counter, leaning over and grabbing a pen out of a jar and a scrap of paper. "Yukie likes jasmine tea and Sato likes corn tea. What kind of tea do you like?" she asked turning to look at him.

Chozen shrugged. He'd liked the tea Miyagi sensei used to make. But he always tapped his nose and said it'd been a secret. His secret tea. Chozen was pretty sure he'd never know what that tea was, it'd died with him. He'd tried to go through Miyagi's kitchen once to try and find it but he never had.

"You've got to have a favorite," Ms. Lawrence said.

"I do, I just don't know kind," Chozen said softly.

"Where'd you have it?"

"Miyagi sensei's."

"Well we can just call Mr. Miyagi then and ask."

"No, not Mr. Miyagi. Miyagi sensei. Late Miyagi sensei," Chozen said taking another drink of the lemonade.

"Oh. I didn't realize. I suppose I should've."

He could feel her eyes on him and then she leaned forward and he got whiff of a sweet perfume, her hand gently on his shoulder. "Chozen, I'm sorry for your loss."

Chozen looked at her startled. She was sincere.

He looked away, brow knit, kicking around at the ashes of his anger to hope for a spark of something to burn up the lump in his throat. All he managed was a bitter. "Thanks."

No one had talked to him about Miyagi sensei. But he assumed no one had known how important he'd been to Chozen. And with everything going on. With the death match between uncle and Mr. Miyagi, between the storm and Daniel and trying to make things better no one had...he'd put a candle in the water for Miyagi sensei but he hadn't talked about him.

"Want to talk about it?"

She was dangerous. A witch. But her hand was gentle and so were her eyes on him. He couldn't look at her. She motioned for him to sit and he did, sitting next to her at the bar. Tommy set a colorful concha in front of him and he picked it up, carefully ripping a piece off and tasting it. It was sweet.

"Miyagi sensei..." Chozen felt that lump return. How did he say anything? What did he say about him? He tried prodding around at the ashes, hoping for some ember he'd overlooked but everything was just dust. "was the very best."

"A fisherman?" Ms. Lawrence asked.

"Yes," Chozen said.

"Did he teach you how to fish?"

"He taught everyone. Whole village."

"Did he teach you karate?"

"Uncle taught, Miyagi sensei honed."

"Do you like karate?"

Chozen hadn't ever thought about it.

"I ask because Jessica talked for an hour yesterday night about your artistic skills. She says they're very good."

Chozen couldn't believe she'd-oh who was he kidding he should've known they wouldn't have kept that to themselves.

"It's not great."

"Nonsense. Jessica works with artists, she's got a good eye. She's not going to compliment you without reason."

Chozen shoved more bread in his mouth. He drank some lemonade.

She was waiting.

"Working at the dojo is expected. Now it's helpful. Art is just like...meditation."

He'd only gifted art to someone once.

He'd drawn the sunset once, sitting on the docks while Miyagi sensei was out, because he'd gotten bored and hadn't wanted to go back home just yet and he liked sitting on the docks. He'd drawn what he'd seen. Miyagi sensei peacefully fishing at sunset. He'd given it to Miyagi sensei and he'd never talked about it again. He thanked him for it and Chozen forgot about it. Until he'd been helping Aunt Yukie go through Miyagi sensei's things and had found it, framed in a room he never seen in a spot he'd never looked. It'd been like a gut punch to see it again.

"Ah, Miyagi sensei loved that," Aunt Yukie told him. "Said it was his favorite piece he'd ever gotten. Never said who the artist was. I wanted to get him another, but no one signed it."

They'd found a lot of art from the kids in town. Little notes from the kids he'd taught, but only Chozen's was framed.

"Then you should make time for it," Ms. Lawrence said. "You shouldn't just work all the time, you should also do things you want to do.

We're all very grateful that you bought the dojo and took over. I don't know what your plans are but you should also take time to enjoy yourself Chozen. Or else you'll find yourself looking back and wondering if you'd ever had fun."

He drank some lemonade and nodded. She patted his hand.

He didn't think he could handle that much more focus on himself. He needed her to pay attention to someone else. He needed to take all the jumbled wires of his frayed emotions and feelings and sweep them back into a box and lock it again.

"Have any of you boys heard from Johnny?" she asked.

"No," Bobby said shaking his head. "I didn't ask him to call this time since he was going with Mrs. LaRusso."

"I kind of thought he'd call, at least once," Ms. Lawrence said with a frown. "I think I freaked him out before he left."

"Over what?" Jimmy asked sitting down next to them with his lemonade and grabbing a concha.

"I told him not to let them bully him. But I don't, maybe he wasn't even worried about that before he left."

"We could call," Tommy said.

Ms. Lawrence looked at the clock. "They're probably busy."

"I doubt it's a problem, do you know the number?"

"I do," Bobby said grabbing the phone and dragging it over, pulling the cord along with it setting it down on the counter. He dialed and then adjusted to speaker phone, setting the receiver down. They listened to the dial tone and then the click as someone answered.

"LaRusso residence, you've reached Lucille, who can I put you in touch with?"

"Oh Lucille! Johnny never called to let me know you all arrived okay, I wanted to check in and see how it's going?"

"Laura! Oh he's fine. He's got a small army of children totally enamored with him now. My in-laws adore him and there was a bit of a spat earlier but both Nonnia and Nonnio put their foot down immediately. I swear I thought Nonnia was going to start disowning people left and right." Mrs. LaRusso laughed softly into the phone. "Daniel took Johnny out to get him a jacket and gloves and a hat, poor boy didn't have any."

"I should've taken him shopping before you guys left," Ms. Lawrence gasped. "I'm so sorry."

"Oh no, it's fine. Daniel was more upset with himself. Honestly he and I have been fighting more than anyone else. Johnny's been very sweet about the whole thing. Did you know Daniel got into a mechanic's apprenticeship and business school? To open a business and just ditch it, I swear I didn't raise him like that. He essentially is dropping the whole shop onto Johnny's shoulders. They both say they're fine with it but it just isn't fair to Johnny or Mr. Miyagi." Mrs. LaRusso sighed. "We talked about it some more and I get why he's doing it, I just feel bad. Your son's done enough, he doesn't have to take over Mr. Miyagi's shop too."

"Aunt Yukie can help," Chozen said.

"Chozen?" Mrs. LaRusso said sounding confused.

"Ah, sorry Lucille, the guys came to work in the yard and I mentioned I hadn't heard from Johnny so they called and put you on speaker."

"Oh, hello boys."

"Hi Mrs. LaRusso!"

"I suppose if Ms. Yukie also helps I'll feel a little bit better," Mrs. LaRusso said thoughtfully. "But really she shouldn't have to. Daniel should clean up his own messes."

"She likes working in bonsai shop," Chozen said.

He liked the idea. Plus if she did, then maybe she'd stay. And if she stayed then maybe Sato would also stay. Maybe they could all stay. And just go home sometimes. Rather than back and forth. Then he wouldn't be alone in LA.

"Do you want to talk to Johnny? He's probably around here somewhere. He's the only blonde so he's fairly easy to find, sticks out. Plus he's a giant. Let me see, hmm not in the kitchen, no I'm not talking to you, let's see living room, hi Nonnia no it's Laura and the guys, oh oh okay, Nonnia wants to say hi. She's going to pick up the phone in the living room with Nonnio. I'm going to be back I'm going to see if he's next door."

"Laura!" a woman said excitedly. "How are you? How is LA? Did you get the jams we sent?"

"I did, it was really sweet thank you. You have something coming up soon. I hope Johnny's been good."

"He's a delight, you've raised a very sweet boy. And you'll have to come with next year."

"I would love to."

"Actually," a mans voice said coming through. "We were thinkin' of visiting California some time. It's clearly now Daniel and Lucille's home. It's been awhile since we've traveled so far, but it'd be nice to visit and see all the places they talk about."

"And the food."

"Of course Tesoro, there's a lot we want to see and eat and lots of people we want to meet."

"How is your garden coming along Laura?"

"Well Johnny's friends came by today and did all the hard work of digging up my pond."

"Oh how exciting! What are you going to put in it?"

"I'm thinking koi and some frogs. Maybe some lotus and lilies, not fully certain yet. Johnny usually helps me pick things out. He's got a good eye for flowers."

"It sounds lovely. I can't wait to see it."

"Thank you. I look forward to meeting you in person,"

"Laura?" Mrs. LaRusso's voice came back. "I've got Johnny. He's covered in glitter." she said with a laugh. "He was helping the kids make some surprises, I won't say what since I know Nonnio is listening. Here you go Johnny I'm going to put the phone just like that, you got it?"

"Yes, thank you Lucille," Johnny said.

Chozen leaned forward a little.

"Bye Laura, nice talking to you."

"Bye dear," came Nonnia voice.

"Bye." Laura said.

There was a click and silence.

"Honey?"

"Hi Mom."

"You having a good time? Are they being nice to you?"

"I'm-they've been nice. I just wish I'd brought a gift."

"Can you even hear yourself think over there?" Dutch asked.

"Yes."

"How many LaRusso's are in that house?" Bobby asked.

"I don't know. Over twenty. But I gave up on counting."

"Where are you staying?" Jimmy asked.

"Across the hall with Daniel's godfathers and Lucille."

"How's that?"

"They're nice."

"Are you exhausted?"

"Kind of. Hey, you guys checked in on Chozen right?"

"I mean ask him yourself. Did we check in on you Chozen?" Bobby asked nudging the receiver over.

"They've behaved?" Johnny asked.

"So far," Chozen said carefully. "Your bonsai is okay. Mr. Miyagi's taking good care of it."

"Thank you Chozen," Johnny said.

Chozen pressed his tongue to the top of his mouth hard to stop from saying something stupid. It was bad enough Kumiko knew. It was bad enough to have her teasing him. He didn't need these guys to tease him even more. And they knew. Or kind of knew and he didn't want to deal with that. He wracked his brain for something smart to say back. Something cool. But he couldn't think straight, he was nervous. He never got nervous. Not like this.

The guys were talking to Johnny, Ms. Lawrence was talking to him and then they were saying goodbye.

"Bye," Chozen managed to say with the others.

He felt like finding water and pouring a bag of rice into it. Was this how Aunt Yukie had felt? It was awful. Mushy. He could carry at least a ten pound bag of rice at least, make it seem less pathetic. Though he might upset some water police or something. With his luck he would. He could just imagine tossing a bag of rice over his shoulder, finding some dock or pier and dumping it into the ocean to wish Johnny a safe journey and then having to run from some angry water police officer. Just sprinting with rice going everywhere. And then with his luck he'd get attacked by gulls. Sorry Johnny. The feeling would remain in his heart but the urge would get stomped out.

They finished their lemonade and the conchas and went back outside to finish digging the pond.

Chozen wondered what it was like at a household of LaRusso's. He wondered if Johnny was having fun, covered in glitter from hanging out with the kids. He could imagine that easily. He was good with kids. Chozen wondered if he could ask Johnny to teach him. Chozen didn't have a clue on how to interact with children. He'd need all the help he could get. Because unlike at home he needed to not scare them off. And at home scaring them off usually benefitted him. They left him alone. But here he wanted to teach them, needed the dojo to be a success.

It was the only way he could say thanks. The only way he knew how. To Daniel (though he'd never say it to his face, at least not any time soon), to Johnny, to Sato, and Mr. Miyagi and Miyagi sensei. He didn't know how to say it otherwise. But proving himself at the dojo, proving that he could teach and could be trusted to be a good role model to kids. That would do it. He'd live up to the legacy of his Miyagi sensei. And he hoped would make him proud.

The pond was finished before Chozen knew it and they walked back into the house to clean up. After getting most of the dirt off of himself he wandered around curious. It felt a little rude but the other guys just wandered around like it was their own house. He supposed it'd be different for him no matter what, but he looked around while he had the opportunity.

He found a guest bedroom that looked cozy and had Jessica's things in it. He saw climbing gear and a big poofy pink jacket hung up in the corner, a book she was reading with a mountain on it and a pair of dirty hiking shoes in the corner.

He tried another door and found Ms. Lawrence's room.

It was cozy and understated. There were fresh flowers on the counter. He didn't know what kind they were but the collection of them were beautiful. She had a stack of books on her bedside table and a vanity with light bulbs around the mirror like he'd seen walking around backstage with the girls after the musical. It was similar with a ton of make up and brushes sitting out. Hanging up was a beautiful gown.

He closed the door and tried another.

Linen closet. Boring.

He went to the next one. He found a boys bedroom. Johnny's. He took a step in, carefully. There were a lot of books. A ridiculous amount of books.

He studied the shelf looking for Tales of Genji. He looked for his gifts. But they weren't there. Not the sake set, not the books he'd sent as a holiday gift, not the photos, not the letters, not anything. He felt a momentary pang of disapointment. But then remembered he'd seen all of that. In Johnny and Daniel's room. The sake set had been in there, so had the pictures, the magazine he'd sent, the charm, the Tales of Genji. All of it had been with his stuff and he'd seen them at Johnny and Daniel's new apartment. The sake set on the shelf, the books on the bookscase. Of course they wouldn't be there. Johnny didn't live with his mother any more.

He did see a lot of photos though. Chozen looked at the photos on the wall. Johnny with his friends, his mother, people Chozen had met recently and people he hadn't. There weren't a lot of photos of him when he was little.

It was like he hadn't existed before.

Chozen had a lot of photos but they weren't happy.

Chozen rarely smiled for photos. It seemed silly to smile, why smile when a serious look matched his uncle better? But now he kind of wished he'd smiled more. Or had photos of him and Miyagi sensei. Or a photo of his parents. He didn't know what they looked like. He didn't know if he matched them at all or if he'd grown up looking strange and different so you could never tell because he'd never seen them? Maybe he couldn't have grown up to look like them without seeing the blueprint.

Ms. Lawrence leaned against the door and watched him and he refused to touch anything.

"You seem like you're trying very hard," she said softly. "And I appreciate that. I appreciate you trying to be careful with Johnny. I know you didn't mean to hurt him. But you did."

"I know. I have no excuse."

She nodded. "But I also don't want you to torture yourself. He really does love Daniel."

Chozen frowned. He knew that. Johnny smiled very brightly when he looked at Daniel. Like a magnet he was drawn into Daniel.

"I can wait, until Daniel dies."

"You're kind of stubborn aren't you?"

She said it with a smile. Like it wasn't a bad thing.

"I will help him recover when Daniel dies. Don't worry, I won't steal him."

He would however just prove that he was a better choice every chance he had. He'd let Johnny make that decision himself.

"I appreciate that," she said with a laugh. "I can see why Daniel's been worried. But if you have an opportunity to love you should, you shouldn't wait 70 years or more for Daniel to die."

She seemed worried, how did he explain that he was okay?

"Ms. Lawrence, I am a sunflower."

"A sunflower huh?"

"Sunflowers spend whole life turning to face the sun. They never meet the sun, they never touch it, they just bask in the light of the sun and grow and bloom. To me, Johnny is the sun."

She walked in and gently wrapped an arm around his shoulder. "You can grow and bloom on your own. Don't spend your whole life just working and waiting for Johnny to turn around. Because he's going to check in on you and he's going to be nice to you but he's not going to notice. The amount of girls that fell over themselves at the country club who hadn't given him the time of day when he first joined but did after he bulked up and shot up like a weed was intense. But he didn't notice. He just went through the motions over and over again. I know now that he was just tredding water, just trying to keep afloat. He couldn't see beyond himself and he couldn't think of a future because he didn't have the brain space for it. He was surviving and that was all he could do."

Chozen nodded. He understood that feeling. He'd felt that way. That it was all he could do. Keep moving forward and survive.

"I'm sure it was hard, living alone with your uncle. He probably wasn't ready or prepared to be a parent and I'm sure he did his best and it wasn't perfect. But even if he did his best and had the best intentions it doesn't erase how you feel and that's okay. Parents, even the best prepared ones don't know what they're doing. It's a guessing game and a gamble. We do our best and hope everything turns out right and sometimes we fuck up," Ms. Lawrence said gently. "And I hope you thrive in LA."

"Thank you Ms. Lawrence."

"And I look forward to seeing the dojo when it's done. And the bonsai you painted. Jessica really did say it was beautiful."

"Thank you," Chozen said again.

He took another look at Johnny's room and then followed her out of the room and back out to where the guys were. He supposed he was stuck with them for the rest of the day.

"What will you boys do now?" Ms. Lawrence asked.

"We've got tickets to a game," Bobby said.

"What kind of game?"

"Hockey," Dutch said.

"Do you have something warm to wear? It gets pretty cold watching those games because of the ice."

"We brought our jackets."

"Do you have one for Chozen?" Ms. Lawrence asked.

"Oh, shit I forgot."

"One moment, don't go anywhere yet," Ms. Lawrence said walking over to the phone and making a call.

"Hello, yes may I speak to Jessica?"

She waited smiling at them then turning. "Hi Jessica, the guys are going to watch a hockey game. Chozen doesn't have a jacket, do you mind if he borrows yours dear? Oh, not a problem? Perfect thank you. Will you be home for dinner? Oh? That sounds delightful. Of course, the more the merrier. I'd love to have them over. We can get take out or delivery. Think about what you girls want and we'll get it when you get here. Perfect. Bye Jessica." She hung up and clapped her hands turning to Chozen. "Alright, you can borrow Jessica's winter jacket."

Chozen had a bad feeling about it but waited while Ms. Lawrence left and came back with a pink puffy jacket.

"I know it's not...well it might not fit your style, but it gets really cold at hockey games. You need something warmer then what you've got on and honestly I don't think Johnny's got anything in his closet. Otherwise I'd lend you that, he wouldn't mind, but as you just heard he went to Newark in January without a real jacket."

"Thanks," Chozen said taking the bright pink coat.

He'd have to have it cleaned. He was pretty sure he was still covered in dirt despite cleaning up and his best efforts.

"You boys have fun, thank you for digging up the pond for me."

"Any time Ms. Lawrence."

"Call us if you need anything. We're at the Brown's tonight," Dutch said.

"I will. And you call me if you need me. The girls will be over for dinner."

"Bye Ms. Lawrence!"

"Thank you," Chozen said softly bowing his head and following them out.

She smiled at him, gently squeezing his shoulder and stood on the steps waving.

Chozen got into the van. The sun was setting. It was a little darker even though it wasn't that late and he watched those palm trees pass. Dutch made Tommy who was sitting up front next to him go through a collection of cassettes. He reached over and grabbed one at the red light and popped it in, pop rock. He held Jessica's pink jacket carefully.

"We're going to watch the Los Angeles Kings play," Dutch said.

"You ever watch hockey?" Bobby asked.

"No," Chozen said.

"Do you know what it is?"

"No."

"They skate on ice. Which is why you needed a jacket," Jimmy said.

"We would not have let you go in without one. We would've bought one at the souvenir shop before going in."

"Still can if you'd rather that over a pink jacket," Dutch said glancing at him in the rearview.

"It's fine," Chozen said. Jessica's jacket seemed warm.

"Hey watch it."

"Sorry," Chozen said.

The man seemed itching for a fight. Chozen wasn't short, and he wasn't all twig thin. He was muscular but sometimes, especially under a puffy pink jacket, it could be hidden. The man had friends. four of them. And they seemed equally interested in a fight.

He'd won in worse odds, with his arms held back.

Miyagi sensei was of the belief that karate should be used to defend not to fight. But Sato was of the opinion that fights happen and sometimes you got to defend yourself ahead of time. So he readied himself, bracing for fists, ready to lift his own, ready to end the fight before it began when an arm slung around his shoulder.

"Making new friends already?" Dutch asked.

Chozen glanced at him. He was smiling. He looked like he was ready to fight, like the thought of fighting these men was exciting. Like this was the best gift anyone could've ever given him.

"Can't fight your own battles huh? Need your boyfriend to fight them for you?"

They reeked of beer and were laughing.

Dutch leaned forward, it looked like he was just more into the conversation or wanted to pass a secret across to them, but he was tensing up, coiling, preparing for a fight in the subtlest of ways.

"One he can very well fight you all, probably on his own, but then what would the fun of that be? And two, yeah, so what?"

They looked surprised.

"I think the rules for the arena are that we have to take all fights outside. Personally I'd like to continue watching the game after this tussle ends up with your asses in a dumpster, but I'm ready to roll here or there, you decide. Wanna get banned for at least two weeks or you want to pick banana peels off your shoulders and slump back in here later?"

"Let's take this outside then," the man said.

"Father Bob, you still a pacifist or you wanna fight?" Dutch asked turning his head and calling to Bobby somewhere behind him.

"Never ever call me that again, which I know will just make you do it more and more often, and why not?"

Chozen walked towards the exit steeling himself for a fight, away from guys.

He didn't need help.

He was used to this.

He was used to fighting uneven numbers and winning.

They stepped into the alley, Jimmy testing the door to make sure they could get back in before following.

Chozen turned towards them, waiting.

"I thought you want to fight?" he asked when no one made a move.

The man cursed, seemingly realizing that the odds were no longer stacked in his favor and still zeroed in on Chozen.

Chozen waited, the man swung, a big swing like a man who expected his target to stand still and just accept being punched in the face. It was clumsy and easy.

Chozen sidestepped and watched the man wobble as he lost balance. Chozen swept his legs out from under him and he fell to the ground with a solid thunk and rush of air, of all the air in his lungs being knocked out. That seemed to piss off his friends who circled in.

Chozen braced himself, watching their movements planning what he was going to do, but Bobby, Dutch, Jimmy and Tommy sprang into action, making it an even fight and Chozen watched them fight, the rudimentary pieces of karate, the things they were good at. Bobby was very good, almost on par with Johnny. Dutch wasn't doing karate, it was something else with too many high kicks, it took him a moment to recognize it, taekwondo. And Jimmy and Tommy were doing fine with drunken fools.

Chozen pulled his gaze away and back down to the man on the ground who let out a groan. Chozen knelt down, digging through his pockets for his business cards and set it down on the mans forehead. "I teach karate. Miyagi-do dojo, opening next month. Come if you want rematch, or how to learn how to fight," he said before standing and dusting off his hands.

"They are are playing with you. Like cat play with mouse. Finish your fights. Lets go back to game. Too hot out here for jackets," Chozen said. He was sweating, not from exertion but from the heat of the LA sun under Jessica's pink coat.

It was like dominos, a one two three four as the men were knocked to the ground. Dutch leaned down to haul his up.

"What are you doing?" Bobby asked.

"I told them I was going to stuff them in the dumpster."

"I don't think that's necessary," Bobby said with a frown. "Isn't that a bit much?"

"Fine you party pooper," Dutch said dropping the limb he was holding with a sigh.

Chozen flicked a business card onto the guy's chest just like the others.

"Are you, advertising?" Jimmy asked with a laugh.

Chozen turned to him, putting the rest of his business cards away. Sato had requested them to be thick good quality paper. They had a nice weight to them. In Okinawa they used traditional paper. They hadn't done that here. Not yet. Though Chozen had looked. He hadn't found any artists yet. He might have to do it himself, but they weren't there yet. Maybe after they won a few of those trophies that seemed to mean so much in the Valley, then he'd make traditional paper to print the business cards on. But until then they were fancy.

"How advertise at home. Best kind of advertising. Either they come to fight again, or they come to learn to fight again later. Either way, good for business," Chozen said pushing the door to the auditorium back open. "Coming?" he asked pausing to hold it open for them.

Chozen was used to fighting on his own. He was used to being on his own. His friends weren't that good at fighting, left it up to him or if the fight skewed heavily in their favor. Not really friends. But he kind of liked having people with him. What would've been a couple of minutes of a fight fell down to only a few seconds with no injuries on his own. They were too drunk to get up quickly so they could be back in their seats enjoying the rest of the game. Which was entertaining, because sometimes fights broke out on the ice and people just let it happen. That was fun to watch. And it was easy to follow.

"Of course man," Dutch said patting him on the chest before slipping past him through the open door, followed by the others. It seemed to be a thing, to pat him on the shoulder or chest before walking past. It was a little weird, but it seemed to be in good spirits.

Was it possible they actually didn't hate him? That they weren't going to torture him at every possible opportunity? Maybe, but he also feared that as soon as he let his guard down he would jump. He wasn't going to let his guard down...but he was going to be nicer. Less prickly as Kumiko told him.

He followed them back to their seats to watch the game. Listening to the conversation around him.

After the game they made their way out to dinner. A local pizza joint and then to a bar. Jimmy said his cousin worked there and they found a table. Chozen sipped at his beer keeping a close eye on it and keeping it close to his body while the guys played pool. It was an uneven group and even though they offered to let him play with them he didn't really see the point. Plus he'd rather keep an eye on his beer. It was decent beer. Not as great as Orion, but he doubted they had that. After a while Jimmy wandered back to the bar setting his finished drink down on the bar and taking the next one given to him by the man behind the bar.

He wondered if that was his cousin. He wondered what it was like to have cousins.

"I get it you know man," Jimmy said sipping his beer and slumping into the seat next to him.

"Huh?" Chozen asked.

"My parents wanted me to take over. The whole shebang. The whole enterprise. I didn't want to. I spent every day of my childhood studying drinks. Who produced what? How did I say it in the local language? How did I write it? I was in tons of lessons. I had to learn different languages. I didn't get a chance to do anything else. Just study study study. And it was all drink related. I couldn't even learn anything I wanted. I wanted to learn history and I wanted to learn how to talk to people. How are you? Genki desu ka? But I was learning business language. Not casual conversations. My parents heaped it all onto my shoulders and it crushed me."

"Uncle not crush me."

"Maybe not. But man that expectation to take over sucks. And after Johnny and I became friends I'd go over to his house whenever I'd had it. I'd sneak in through the back way because that was the only way in and I'd cry. I'd be so frustrated that that was all I could do. I could barely breathe sometimes. I didn't want to take over the family business. I didn't give a shit about beer and hops and percentages and what was selling best and flavors and corn syrup versus cane sugar and how things were made and how to import. And Johnny was the only safe island for me to go to.

"It's because there was one day we were talking about family stuff after a Cobra Kai class and we were sitting on the boardwalk eating ice cream and I said I was supposed to take over the family business and he turned to me and he asked. "What do you want to do?" No one had asked me that yet. They just accepted the I'm supposed to take over the family business on what my plans were for the future. But no one asked if I wanted to do that, or what I wanted. And I'd been so stunned. Because I hated spending my weekends and holidays and after school memorizing things and with private tutors and it'd been fighting tooth and nail to get to study at the dojo. My parents hadn't wanted me to but I begged. I offered to study harder and well I wasn't very good at karate and I didn't get to a black belt before we quit because I had so many other obligations and fell behind but Johnny and the guys didn't care, they still hung out with me and it was just a nice break. For the length of a class a couple times a week I could focus on something else. I could forget who I was. I could become who I wanted, or at least puzzle over who that was. And it was like a breath of fresh air.

"And when Johnny asked that, well I started talking to him about what I wanted to do, I kept throwing out ideas because for a minute I thought he could tell me what I wanted to be. Like he was some all-seeing person who could tell me based on our friendship who I would become. So I'd ask "Firefighters are cool, what do you think?" and he'd nod. "They're cool." "Could I be a firefighter?" "Do you want to be?" And that would always stump me.

"I didn't know. And it was like trying on hats slowly over time. What did I want to do? What did I want to be? Who did I want to be? And I just kept throwing things at him to see if he'd be like YES that is you! And he never did and eventually, I figured it out.

"I want to be a lawyer and the path to figuring that out was frustrating and painful. But I like it. It's got a bit of history which I enjoy in it and it's helpful. Especially if you know the system then you can figure out your way around it. It's kind of like being given a puzzle you have to decode and I liked those. I like figuring out how to get a person in a difficult situation out of it. And I can use it for good. And that'd make me feel better than just importing beer, even if it's good beer.

"But I'd go by Johnny's place a lot and I'd cry. Oh, I cried so much. I'd bring beer and we'd drink and I always cried. Because my parents wanted me to be this person I didn't want to be and no one saw me, saw who I was but Johnny did. And I bet you feel that way too huh? That Johnny saw you, through all the," Jimmy motioned drunkenly at all of Chozen. "The gruff grumpy angry guy you are to see who you are." He poked Chozen in the chest. "And there's something precious about that right? Something about that that you just really like the guy for right? I mean I do. We do. We all do. And it makes my blood boil when people are mean to him. I want to yell at them, grab them by the shirt and shake them and like do you know how this guy works? No? You don't! Because you could've had something great, you could've let him see you for you and he would've supported that but instead, you turned your back to him and you hurt him and, man I get that blood-thirsty feeling to go after his stepfather and Kreese. He's our friend and he's our brother. He's important to us.

"He never told anyone that I cried nearly every time I came over to visit. He never told anyone that I was overwhelmed or that he checked out book after book after book from the library to go over with me. I wanted to be a firefighter? Well even if it was a fleeting fancy we walked past the firehouse together and talked to the firefighters and he got a book on it for me to read from the library and we poured over it together. I thought about being an engineer? He went through the phone book for me one day at my house and called and asked some engineer if we could come and see what they did. And we did. We got a tour and got to follow along with this guy and see how he worked and what he did. Marine biologist? We went and followed some people at the local marine research facility and I got to study things through a microscope and that was so much fun. He knew where everything was and he knew his way around the city and I never questioned it. I never questioned how he knew all these places and how to talk to people to get in. He charmed his way through every door and some of those doors opened so easily for him because of Sid, but a lot of them opened because he knew how to work with people, how to tell them what they wanted to hear. Not that I was some pathetic lost kid given the thought of choice for the first time in my life but I was a student wanting to figure out how something worked, he wanted to write a paper on it. And funny enough I'm pretty sure he did. He got straight A's and I think he wrote probably a million career based papers for our school."

Jimmy was motioning around the bar with his beer. "I was supposed to be here. I was supposed to go to business school and work here in the summers after I turned 21. Before I turned 21 I was supposed to be in the back and washing dishes and loading things in and out of trucks. But I'm free now. And Johnny will say I did it myself. But I have him to thank for it. He opened a door I never noticed because I was too overwhelmed to see it. And you, look at you, you're in LA. Did you think you'd ever leave Okinawa?"

"No," Chozen said shaking his head.

Jimmy spoke too fast. He caught the gist of it, but some of it passed by him like a freight train.

Tommy came back from the game of pool he'd been playing and tapped Jimmy on the shoulder. "You sure you don't want to play Chozen?"

"I'm sure."

"Tommy, you decide what you wanna do? After school? Did it change?"

"Government," Tommy said pulling up a chair between them.

"Politics. Seriously? Wait no. That makes sense actually."

Tommy laughed. "Yeah, I want to make laws that you then have to figure out how to understand."

"Oh I hate you, you're going to make my life hell aren't you?"

"Only with love."

"I'm going to go play. But Chozen," Jimmy said standing, wobbling on his feet a little and patting Chozen on the shoulder. "You can take your own path. Got it? Understand?"

"I do."

"Good," Jimmy said with a smile before waving at Bobby and Dutch and heading over.

"Politics?" Chozen asked.

"Yes," Tommy said. "I was in student council, I liked it. Hey, I know I didn't make the best first impression, but, like you, we really fucked up, and sometimes we overcorrect in the wrong way. We overcorrected and maybe chose the worse way to go about it. But like today was fun you know? I hope you had fun. And we know you're trying. It's kind of hard you know? Trying to make things better and also feel better about it. I mean I don't feel better but it helps to have support. Like Bobby's got great support so he mostly bounced back and I.... Listen, I don't know what your life is like, but mine. My parents...I live with my aunt and uncle and they're great and they're wonderful but they don't replace my parents and that hurts. And I wonder, would they have caught on faster than my aunt and uncle did? Would I have listened if they had? I like to think I would've. But it's kind of hard, you take things for granted when you have them and when you don't, well you just, there's a lot of wishes."

"Your parents are gone?" Chozen asked.

He hadn't meant to ask. He hadn't meant to stick his finger directly in a gaping wound but it was so close to his own that he couldn't help it.

Tommy blinked looking at him a little surprised then glancing away. "Yeah, they died."

The only honorable move after sticking a finger in a wound was to share his own. Even if he'd never said it out loud, even if he didn't want to, and struggled to get the words out despite the beer and buzz in his system. "Mine abandoned me."

Tommy's head snapped back up looking at him eyes filled with concern but understanding, it wasn't the same. It was different. Tommy's parents hadn't left him because they wanted to. They probably desperately wanted to stay with him.

"Uncle raised me. Don't know if alive or dead. Just gone."

Tommy nodded looking down into his own beer.

"I'm sorry."

Chozen scoffed a dry humorless laugh. "Americans and their I'm sorrys. You didn't cause."

"It's sympathy. You know."

"I know," Chozen said taking a sip of his new beer. "Miyagi sensei, late Miyagi sensei was nicest to me. Now also gone."

He also hadn't said that before and hated that he'd said it. Hated that he was opening up. It had to be the beer. Sneaky beer.

"That really sucks man. If you ever, well it's not the same I know it isn't, but if you need to talk, no joke, no trick, I'm here. Mr. Miyagi's got my number, you give me a call okay?" Tommy asked reaching out, hand on Chozen's arm.

Chozen nodded. He believed him even though it wasn't the safest idea. Even if it could hurt him in the future, he wanted to believe him. And he felt, maybe for the first time in a while, not as alone as he had been.

"Oh! Tomorrow Johnny and Daniel get back, we were thinking of taking the bonsais over before they arrive, surprise them. Do you want to come with?"

He didn't want to part with the bonsai, but he'd get to see Johnny again and he would like that. He dragged his fingers through the edge of the glass, through the condensation. "I'd like that," Chozen said softly.

He hadn't realized it, but in less than 24 hours Johnny would be home. He'd be back to seeing him at lunch, at the shop, and soon the dojo would be done and it'd be better and Chozen would prove that he could be trusted, he wouldn't fail.

"You know, there's a way to play with everyone. Or you could at least come and join the conversation," Tommy said.

"Okay," Chozen said. He stood, holding his beer close, and followed Tommy over to the pool table.

"Chozen!" the guys drunkenly cheered when they saw him come over.

It was nice. They weren't there because of money. They weren't there because they needed something from him. They didn't have to do anything.

Chozen wouldn't have said anything if Johnny had asked. They could've done the bare minimum. But they hadn't and he was there, with them and it was nice. He could flourish in LA he thought, maybe.

Chozen held Johnny's bonsai carefully in his arms on the ride to Daniel and Johnny's apartment.

Bobby had the other one and was talking about possible surprises. Leaving cakes in the fridge or moving everything just a couple of inches over to mess with them. He didn't think any of it was a good idea. And he doubted they'd do it. But he followed them through the familiar parking garage and to the elevator, saying hello to the security guard that knew them and heading up to the room.

Bobby had a key and opened the doors.

Chozen stepped through.

It was weird to be there when they weren't. Little pieces of Johnny around. He wanted to know what book he was reading, where was it sitting and how far had he gotten before he'd left for Newark? Was it a library book or one he owned?

This time of day Johnny set the bonsai in a spot where they got good sunlight and that was the table in the dining room near the bedrooms.

"Ah!"

Chozen set the bonsai down and startled, stiffening.

That was Johnny. He was home. He was hurt. He never made sounds when he was hurt. So it had to be bad. He had to be really badly hurt.

Where was he?

"Just like that, you've got it, beautiful. Just a little more, almost there."

Daniel?

He didn't sound panicked.

What was wrong with him.

If Johnny was hurt that badly then it was an emergency.

They were home.

There.

Chozen walked towards the closed door, gearing for a fight, to get the first aid kit, to assess the situation and call an ambulance, whatever was needed to be done to help when arms wrapped around his waist and the ground went out from under him.

"No, you don't."

One quick move and he was over Dutch's shoulder and being carried out of the room. Dutch was moving fast. The guys were retreating fast. The two bonsai sitting close to one another on the dining room table.

Chozen heard another moan.

Tommy's hands clasped over Chozen's mouth, eyes wide, face red.

Dutch didn't stop, practically running out the open door and into the hall, slamming his hand against the button for the elevator. "Shit, that little bastard and his love for coming home early and surprising people."

Chozen squirmed. Dutch had too good of a grip on him and there was no way to unpin his arms. He'd grabbed him in a specific way so he couldn't hit his pressure points.

He had to go back.

Johnny was hurt.

Why were they running?

They weren't cowards. Or at least Chozen wasn't.

Bobby was locking the door, fumbling with the lock, getting it, and sprinting towards them as the elevator door opened and they all darted in.

Bobby and Jimmy slumped down to the bottom of the elevator.

"Oh come on, like we haven't-"

"Shut up Dutch," Bobby said. "That could've been bad."

"But it's fine," Dutch said. "We got this one before anything happened. It's fine."

"We must go back. Johnny's hurt. How could you leave him like that?" Chozen asked trying to get loose.

Dutch was stronger than he looked.

"He is assuredly not hurt."

"How do you know? We didn't check."

"Yeah, not going to open that door. Both of them would for sure murder us."

"Chozen, let's get some ice cream and go to the beach huh?" Bobby asked looking up at him from where he was crouched, brushing hair from his eyes that were pleading, begging him to just go with them, to say yes to the ice cream, to not demand they go back.

Chozen frowned. He was in no position to argue. At least not now. But when they were in the garage, he could break free, steal the keys from Bobby and run back.

"Stop it," Dutch said smacking Chozen's back. "Stop scheming your grand rescue. Let Johnny have this."

"He's being hurt."

"He's super safe Chozen. Daniel's there," Jimmy said.

Chozen frowned.

"Daniel would not dream of hurting Johnny," Tommy said gently. "You know that."

Chozen looked away from him.

Daniel had always gotten pissed when he thought Chozen had messed with Johnny. It was one of the few things to really get him to snap.

Fine.

He'd just pay super close attention to Johnny later, make sure he wasn't hurt then. And if he was he was going to get Johnny somewhere safe and never talk to any of these guys again or Daniel. Maybe his first opinion of them was right. Tricksters. Evil tricksters the lot of them. But for now.

"He better be okay," Chozen said darkly putting as much venom into his voice as he could.

"Ice cream?" Bobby asked pushing himself up as the elevator dinged.

"Fine. Just put me down," Chozen said.

"Not a chance bud," Dutch said.

If Chozen trusted Dutch he'd think there was concern in his tone. Like he was worried that Chozen was going to do something to hurt himself. Which was silly. Chozen wouldn't hurt himself. He was being gentler than he had to be.

They waved at the security guard again, like it was normal to walk off with a guy over your shoulder.

Chozen stewed angrily.

He could've walked out on his own.

He was going to take them on their word. Because they were acting like...like they were worried about him. Not Johnny.

He didn't like that. He didn't need them to worry about him. He'd lived a long time without people worrying about him and now, now everyone was worried about him, strangers. Because that's what they were. Strangers. They weren't his friends.

They didn't care, they weren't-

Jimmy opened the back of the van and Dutch set him down gently in the seat, buckling him in like he was a child. "We'll get a lot of ice cream man. Just chill. Don't hurt yourself."

He'd thought right. They thought whatever was on the other side of that door wasn't painful for Johnny but for Chozen. Chozen frowned as the rest of the guys piled in and the door shut. Dutch doing a rotation with his keys around his index finger before starting the car up. "Beach?"

"We're going to create a pavlovian response to the beach if we keep this up," Jimmy said.

"It's hard to be bummed on the beach," Bobby said softly, almost too softly for Chozen to hear but he did hear it.

"How'd we miss the fucking Avanti in the lot?" Dutch asked pointing at it sitting next to the yellow Ford on their way out of the parking garage.

"We forgot Daniel lies about when he gets home," Tommy said.

Dutch sighed. "Yeah, it's one thing if it's just us. I don't mind teasing the shit out of them, but that's not really what-"

"Yeah."

Dutch sighed turning up the music, some musical soundtrack. Chozen turned to watch the palms pass, brows furrowed. They were worried about him. Him. Not Johnny. Johnny was fine. Dutch had said Let Johnny have this. And Daniel had been talking. A lot. Had sounded out of breath. All of the guys had been red. Like they were blushing. Embarrassed. Oh. Chozen crossed his arms over his chest. He knew Johnny and Daniel were together. He knew what that entailed.

He was glad he hadn't opened the door though.

Some doors weren't meant to be opened. And that was one of them. Though now he knew that Johnny did make sounds...during. That was going in a box. And it was going to be politely pushed to the very back of his mind. Compartmentalized.

They arrived at the beach and Dutch hovered like he was ready to chase Chozen down if he ran. But Chozen didn't run. He was fine. They'd introduced themselves with a joke in the same vein, he'd already gotten over his shock on that, this was nothing.

Aunt Yukie had waited decades for Mr. Miyagi. So had uncle. So had Miyagi sensei. Mr. Miyagi had married, had a child, had lived a full life before returning to them. Chozen had seen all the pain the distance caused, he'd watched them wait, longing to see him again. Chozen had learned millions of small lessons from seeing them, watching them. They had wilted without their sun nearby, but Chozen was on the same side of the ocean, he would grow, he would thrive and he could wait. Miyagi sensei had taught him patience. And he'd just flirt, badly, every opportunity, because at least it'd piss Daniel off.

Chozen walked up to the ice cream stand. "Mint chocolate chip please," he said digging out his wallet.

A hand gently pressed on his arm. "Our treat, right Bobby?"

Bobby gave Jimmy a dark look but nodded, putting in their orders and paying for the group. He held his wallet a little longer, thoughtful and then pulled out a small thing of stickers. He pried one off and stuck it on Chozen's shirt. It was a gold star that said good job. Chozen stared at it, then at Bobby.

"Thanks for not bolting."

"I don't run away," Chozen said, taking his mint chocolate chip cone from the worker when they brought it out.

"Well thanks for making a tactical retreat with us," Tommy said grabbing his own cone and heading off to walk along the beach.

Chozen followed along looking down at the star, it had a cartoon face on it. He felt like he was in kindergarten, but his teachers never gave him stickers. He'd never behaved well enough to get any. He stopped after awhile, turning to face the direction of the sun, shutting his eyes and just enjoying the warmth. He could hear the guys talking, they'd stopped walking, were waiting, not rushing him, not asking what he was doing, just letting him be and it was more than he could've asked for, more than he'd expected.

Chapter End Notes

Heliotropism is the word for how sunflowers follow the sun
Concha recipe
Orion beer is from Okinawa and here is a youtube video of a Orion drinking song

Challenge Accepted

Chapter Notes

> Hello!
> I kind of feel like I have to apologize to Jane Austen and for the utter misuse of karate. Additionally uh... in at least one scene please do not try this at home. Right? I feel like I got to include that.
>
> I gave myself two chapters to wrap this story up and what happened was I ended up with a whole bunch of mini-chapters in one big chapter. Who knows how long the final chapter will end up being.
>
> So grab a drink, a snack, get cozy, and prepare for a long chapter.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

The first stop they made was for Nonnia to talk to all the local vendors and shop keepers she knew, and to talk to her friends and to catch them up on everyone who showed up and her plans for Nonnio's birthday.

It was a lot of talking and normally Daniel didn't mind but it was long.

He wanted to get the shopping done and get back home to see Johnny. To make sure he was okay and that the kids hadn't been too mean.

The last time he'd been home they'd been bratty as a group. Individually they were fine, but for some reason as a group they became a mini mob.

"He's going to get eaten alive," his aunt said shaking her head as they collected flowers.

"Trouble already?" one of his older cousins asked.

"No," Daniel said.

"He picked the worst task."

"We're going to get home to chaos."

"Or a kid in the ER."

"Johnny won't let that happen," Lucille said stiffly.

"I'm surprised you like him, after everything Louie Jr. said."

Daniel turned his gaze to Louie who was outside waiting, hands in his pockets and rocking on his heels, bored.

"What did he say?" Daniel asked as they left with their flowers.

"He said he was a spoiled rich bully from LA, right Louie?" one of their cousins said as they passed him.

"That was last year," Louie said looking startled. He shrugged. "I changed my mind he's cool."

"One meeting changed your opinion?" Daniel asked feeling a bit of hope.

Louie looked at him surprised, brows furrowed, "He didn't say-? Yeah, yeah he was cool."

Louie was dragged off to another car and Daniel frowned into the chrysanthemums he held.

He sat in the back of a car squished in with his mom and a couple cousins. Their next stop was the mall where they could finally split up. Daniel wondered if he should've told Johnny that it was flowers and shopping and talking to people. All these things he knew Johnny would shine in that maybe his aunts and uncles would stop needling Johnny about dumb things that meant nothing.

"Shit," his aunt said looking in her purse.

"What?" his mom asked.

"I forgot to leave Johnny money for dinner to feed the kids."

"I thought you were doing a trial by fire," another aunt said.

"What does that mean?" she asked crumpling the envelope and shoving it back with a sigh.

"You didn't leave him numbers or anything. Didn't even tell him where to find the kid's jackets or what time they should go to bed or really anything."

"Why didn't you speak up?"

"I figured you were doing it on purpose. You know, see how he reacts to the chaos. It can be really telling. Uncle Elijah cried when we left him alone with them all."

"He did?" Lucille asked with a frown.

"Nonnio is home," another cousin said, patting Daniel's shoulder as they climbed out and wandered into the brightly lit mall. "I'm sure your boyfriend won't be too badly scarred by the time we get back."

"Can you please be nicer to him?" Daniel asked. "I know you're all upset about the sweater, but it's a sweater. And he's been very careful with it. Just like...Moving to California wasn't easy. I didn't make any friends for a long time. I just had a girlfriend and a teacher. And that teacher became my best friend. My sensei. And after the tournament, Johnny apologized. He owed me the apology, not all of you. And I've forgiven him. I forgave him long ago. He's more than made it up to me. I know you're all pecking at him, you don't know all the shit we've been through and how much he's helped me. Because of him, California feels like home and I like it there. I never asked him to work in the shop, he offered to help. He cleaned the shop and worked for free. His work ethic is better than half of you. Hell, I bet you didn't even realize he fixed the sink that's been leaking for years. He's also really good with kids. They like him. Give him a chance, will you? Because I love him and you're going to be seeing more of him if you want to see me."

Daniel sighed turning in the mall, he didn't want to hear whatever they had to say and stormed off to go buy a gift for his grandfather. His mother found him later when he'd given up and was sitting in the food court fiddling with his sweater. It'd been almost a year since Johnny had given it to him. Had let him borrow it and then said he could keep it. It was one of his favorites. She sat down next to him with a bunch of food on sticks. He took his share grumpily and the soda she offered him.

"You okay?" she asked.

"I thought my family would be nicer to him from the start. He's dealt with enough he doesn't need." He gestured around him. "All this."

"They're protective of you."

"I can defend myself and I have multiple times. I don't need anyone to baby me. I can take care of myself."

"I know, they're just concerned. It takes them time, but they don't hate him. Remember that guy who cheated on your cousin Charlotte?"

The family had found out and no one would admit to it but his car ended up in the Hudson and the guy couldn't get into any good Italian restaurant in Newark. They also pretended he didn't exist.

"They haven't done that to Johnny," Lucille said gently.

"But that guy, he cheated."

"And they hate him for it."

"Johnny didn't cheat on me."

"No, they're just adjusting. Plus now that you've chewed them all out, and your Nonnia also chewed them out-"

"She did?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah beat me to it. She's apparently very fond of Johnny. Said I gave him that sweater because he's been there when he wasn't asked to be for Daniel and Lucille and other members of this family. I started it before I met him, before they started dating, because he was going to get a sweater whether they ended up together or not. He's family like Tristen and Moshe. And if you're all jealous over a kid without a big family like ours being welcomed and loved then I've failed to raise you as good human beings. And then she took stormed off and I swear I've never heard a single LaRusso's stay quiet for so long. Let alone a group."

"Nonnia started it before we started dating?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah you really wouldn't stop talking about him," Lucille said smiling warmly and squeezing his shoulder gently. "She figured you'd at least be good friends."

"How'd she know his size?"

"No clue. She has her ways."

Daniel frowned looking at his drink.

"I had an awkward conversation with the guy who ran the shop I went to."

"Yeah?"

"I didn't end up buying anything for Nonnio. I just...talked about Johnny."

She laughed softly reaching over and patting his hand. "We'll head home soon and you'll see him again. Besides your Nonnio didn't want anything from you or Johnny remember?"

"Yeah," Daniel said softly. "I'm ready to go now, was ready like 8 hours ago."

"We hadn't left 8 hours ago," Lucille said sipping her drink.

"I know. I missed him before we left."

She smiled reaching over and gently pinching his cheek. "What ever are you going to do?"

"I don't know."

"Well let's go round up our family so you can get back to Johnny as soon as possible and stop moping."

They pushed the door open to the apartment as quietly as possible. He heard one cousin note how neat the boots were as Daniel added his to the pile and hung up his jacket. He turned to look for Johnny, poking his head through doorways and finding him curled up on the couch reading.

"Everyone else went to bed," Johnny whispered, looking up when they entered.

"All of them?"

"Yeah."

"Have fun?" Johnny asked pushing himself up.

"Not as much as I'd hoped. But we might be able to rescue the evening," Daniel whispered as the crowd continued past them putting things away.

"How?"

Daniel kissed him gently on the nose and then held out his hand.

Johnny looked around and snagged his bookmark off the table and stuck it in the book before getting up and taking Daniel's hand.

"What are you reading now?"

"Howl's Moving Castle, the librarian recommended it. It's new."

"You mean it came out this millennia?" Daniel asked looking at the book and then at Johnny in shock, leading him towards the door.

"It comes out in April."

"What? How'd you manage that?"

"The librarian lent me an advanced reader copy."

"So your two reading modes are ancient or not even out yet? Are you sick?" Daniel asked pressing the back of his hand to Johnny's forehead, faux concern in his voice.

"I'm not sick," Johnny said with a soft laugh. Then he remembered something and stopped, turning to Daniel suddenly like he had something urgent to say.

Daniel paused in getting Johnny's jacket and scarf off the hook by the door.

"Is there a library nearby?"

"Did you run out of books already?" Daniel asked.

"Not yet, but I was thinking of checking some out when we visit to read to the kids."

"Oh, the kids didn't scare you off huh? You want to come back?" Daniel teased.

"They're good kids."

"You, Johnny Lawrence, are probably the only person ever to say that about a hoard of LaRusso kids. Careful or else you'll get stuck babysitting forever."

"I don't mind babysitting," Johnny said with a shrug.

"Saint."

"Definitely not," Johnny said with a laugh.

Daniel shook his head amused as they crossed to the door.

"Do we need to say goodnight to Nonnia?" Johnny asked.

"Oh, best not to, she's a little pissed. We'll chat with her in the morning."

"Anything we can do?"

"No, we are perfect angels in her eyes, which means we get to go while everyone tries to get back on her good side," Daniel said pushing the door open leading Johnny across the hall.

"I'm sorry to hear it was such a bad shopping trip. I know you were looking forward to it," Johnny said.

Daniel gently squeezed his hand, then lifted it to kiss the back of his hand. "That's sweet. It'll be fine tomorrow. That or I'm going to start a fight."

"Daniel," Johnny's voice was filled with worry.

"This kind of fight is easy. All words."

"Hey guys! Welcome back!" Tristen called from where he and Moshe were sitting on the couch watching a movie. "We've got some homemade gelato in the freezer if you want some."

"How was shopping?" Moshe asked.

"Not the best round of shopping. I'll let Ma fill you in on that. Johnny babysat."

"And you're still standing! That is a feat!" Tristen said.

"They're not that bad. We hung out for a bit, played games, played out side, had dinner and then I read them a bed time story."

"Daniel, you gotta keep that one. If he can handle a bunch of your little cousins and tame them then he can do anything," Moshe said.

"That is the plan," Daniel said watching Johnny blush, shocked at the praise. He smiled heading off to their room. "Good night."

"Night!"

"Sleep well."

Daniel waited until the door behind them shut to step into Johnny's space, close.

"I missed you," Daniel said, backing Johnny towards the bed.

If he wanted, Daniel knew Johnny would stop and be rooted. He'd be immovable, but he was backing up, like he trusted Daniel not to let him fall into anything. Though Daniel was going to let him fall, let him collapse onto the bed and corner him. Because he was protesting but barely. Like all those ingrained niceties meant he had to be say them aloud . That it had to be acknowledged. Daniel got it. He did. But after such a long day all he wanted to do was spend time with Johnny. Naked.

"Your whole family is just across the hall."

"Not my whole family. Ma's side isn't here."

Johnny's eyes widened at that. Stunned. Perfect timing to just take one more step and, yes, down he went, brow furrowing.

"I knew that but also didn't realize that," Johnny whispered.

"Ma's side's much smaller. So see, nothing to worry about," Daniel said following him down grinning.

Johnny frowned an unspoken You know that's not true. But he went for something different.

"Your godfathers are out there."

"The walls aren't that thin. Really Johnny, they're not. No one else would move into the building if they were."

Johnny seemed to mull this over, thinking about the day filled with loud LaRusso's and seemed to relax with the thought.

Daniel kissed him.

He'd told the truth.

He'd missed Johnny all day.

He kept turning to look for him, wanting to show him the things he'd seen at the mall, wanting to get his opinion on flowers, ask what one or the other was. He wanted to hold his hand walking down the street. Hell he almost wanted to stay home and babysit the kids with him. Which was shocking even for him.

He wanted to tell him so much but he also didn't want to take his lips off of Johnny's. Didn't want to stop touching him, especially because he was responding the way Daniel loved, moving to give Daniel space, hands on Daniel, like he too needed to feel skin beneath his fingertips. Like he'd missed Daniel just as terribly.

"We can try to be quiet," Johnny relented when they broke apart for a breath.

Daniel grinned leaning down to kiss him again.

He wanted to try.

It'd be like a challenge.

How quiet would Johnny remain with Daniel's mouth on him?

Would he fall into breathing exercises to try and remain calm and focused? Would he cover his mouth, or just throw his arm over his face? Would he be quiet with Daniel in him? He hadn't managed yet. But there was always a chance. Would the silence bother Daniel or would the valiant effort to remain quiet spur him on? Would it last longer? Or...or was this exactly why Johnny usually said no at other people's places? Not out of a lack of adventurous spirit but because he'd request they try and pick something quiet and Daniel would take that as a challenge to get Johnny to make a sound. Because he did. He wanted to hear Johnny make quiet little gasps, to see how he tried to stifle all sounds of pleasure, desperate to stay quiet.

No wonder Johnny always said no at Mr. Miyagi's. But this was different.

Daniel would...no, he wouldn't. He couldn't even lie to himself about trying to be good. He knew what he wanted and he went for it.

He pressed his lips to the side of Johnny's neck, the spot that usually got a good reaction, the ghost of a touch.

Johnny's hand was under his shirt, fingers somewhat cold and sending a shiver down Daniel's spine. Daniel brushed his tongue against his neck, a plan forming in his head. At the very least he was going to leave a nice mark, see how Johnny could handle that. The feel of Johnny's hands on him became a pleasant background feeling, comforting while Daniel tried to perfect the bruise, listening acutely aware to Johnny's heavy breath.

"Fuck," Johnny gasped. There was something underlying in his tone that pulled Daniel away from his hard work to look at him. He looked like he was struggling to focus, like had a goal in mind but kept losing it, and then his hand was between Daniel's legs, cool fingers that had been reaching and unnoticed until now, finding their goal.

Maybe Daniel wasn't the only one who'd determined this a challenge. Which one of them could remain the quietest? Which one would win? The determined look on Johnny's face made it better.

Daniel kissed him on the lips again, partially because he needed too and partially to not make a sound, not a loud one anyway, because he was damn good with his hands and Daniel refused to lose.

Daniel pulled away from the kiss just barely pressing his forehead against Johnny's trying to calm his breath.

"Did you miss me too?"

Johnny blinked, adjusting his focus to the conversation lost in a haze of lust that sent a thrill through Daniel.

His hand stilled which was less thrilling.

"I did, but it's good practice."

Daniel frowned, confused. "Huh?"

"You're going to go to school, we won't be together constantly anymore."

Daniel had known that, but he hadn't thought about that. He'd just see Johnny in the morning and evening. Maybe at lunch if he was lucky. Maybe he would have to be at school or his apprenticeship late. There'd be studying and stuff that Johnny wouldn't be doing with him. Even before they'd been on good terms they'd still been at school together. He'd probably never get as much free time with Johnny again.

"Oh," Johnny said pulling his hand away, pushing himself up. "You

okay?"

"I didn't realize...I'm going to be busy."

"Yeah," Johnny said.

"I'm not going to see you much. I'll be studying and then I'll be working for other people and it won't be like the shop. And it'll be like that until I retire or until I own my own place."

"It'll be an adjustment, but you'll be so busy you won't even notice."

Daniel looked at him like that was the least possible thing in the world. He laughed dryly. "Not notice you aren't there? I spent at least a fourth of the day looking for you at the mall. I'm so used to having you there, it's kind of...I think I get why Ma was so worried."

"If you're worried, we can talk to Lucille and your godfathers. They might have some advice."

Daniel rubbed at his face. "Damn. How do people do it?"

"I don't know, it's a new everything," Johnny said gently taking his hand.

"Nothing in your books?"

Johnny glances at his book and laughs. "Sophie kind of avoids her responsibilities and gets on a moving castle and lives with a wizard."

"A true role model there," Daniel said amused.

Johnny's hands came up to either side of Daniel's face and he kissed him gently. "We still have a couple of weeks before you start school. We still have summer breaks, winter breaks, fall and spring. It's not immediate."

Daniel sighed. "Yeah, it's just, it's going to suck."

"You're going to learn stuff you wanted to learn."

"I know."

"You're going to meet new people and you'll have so much to talk about."

Daniel laughed. "Okay, you're right. We'll just have to make up for it in advance and in the evenings and in the mornings."

"Why do I get the feeling you don't mean talking?"

"Different kind of talking," Daniel said gently pushing Johnny back down. Johnny reached up to him, pulling him into a heated kiss. Daniel shifted his leg between Johnny's and grinned. "So the thought of being separated didn't kill the mood for you?"

Johnny flushed looking away. "I missed you too."

"Sorry for making you wait," Daniel said kissing him gently before slipping down between Johnny's legs working on the buttons of his jeans.

There was a knock at the door.

Daniel cursed as Johnny pulled back, away, face red, trying to be presentable for whoever. Those deep breaths. Damn it. Johnny had even held onto the thread while Daniel had lost it and now someone was at the door. Daniel was going to chew them out because he knew when he turned back to Johnny the lust in his eyes would be gone.

What was the point of staying with his godfathers if he couldn't have sex with his boyfriend?

Daniel sighed, running a hand through his hair, going to the door and opening it. He'd expected his Ma or his godfathers, expected to whine at them about privacy and how late it was, though he didn't think that would work. It was only nine. Which was exactly why he wanted to spend more time with Johnny. They could've had sex and then still gotten a lot of sleep, or just had a lot of sex. But the thought track died immediately upon opening the door and having to look down. It was one of his little cousins, standing in his pajamas. The last time he'd seen Christopher the kid had been a toddler.

He was pale and looked scared, eyes darting around. "Can I stay here?"

No. Of course not. Daniel still had plans for the evening. And that specifically did not include guests or family or anyone but Johnny.

"Nightmare?" Johnny asked from behind Daniel.

Daniel glanced at him, damn, all trace was gone. How'd he manage that? Daniel hadn't even really managed to leave much of a mark. Sex was off the table wasn't it?

The kid shook his head while Johnny knelt down.

"What happened?"

The kid frowned. There was no way he was going to say. The kids didn't talk to anyone older than thirteen. They were like a pack of feral monsters. This one in particular had ignored Daniel when he'd said hi when they arrived. Worst cold shoulder he'd ever seen.

"My big brother said if you wake up to go to the bathroom in the middle of the night you have to run back to bed and fall asleep in less than a minute or a monster will come and eat you."

"Why didn't you go to your mom?"

"If I told Ma she'd have yelled at him and then tomorrow he'd lock me in the pantry as revenge and I'd miss Nonnio's birthday and Nonnio would be sad. I can't make Nonnio sad."

What the hell?

"What do you want to do?" Johnny asked softly. "Want us to check for monsters?"

The kid scuffed the floor with a slippered foot with a move Daniel recognized from himself. He'd done the same thing awkwardly outside of Ali's house once upon a time, several times since. He'd never noticed that before, habits he thought were his own only to realize a whole bunch of other people did the same thing?

Where had he picked it up?

What was his alone? Were any habits his? Or were they things he'd picked up from his family?

"Sleep here?" the kid asked.

Johnny looked back at Daniel. Damn it. At home it was the guys. Here near his family, even though he'd specifically picked staying with his godparents to avoid situations like this, he still wouldn't be alone with Johnny. Was there a solution? Did he have to move out into the desert? Just pack up the Ford and move into the desert so no one would find them? For a month? A year? The rest of their lives?

He didn't want to share. He wanted to keep Johnny for himself. But he sighed. That claws of jealousy were why he couldn't stay at the shop all the time. It was one of the driving factors sending him to school and to his apprenticeship. And it was pretty messed up if he was jealous because of a kid who'd just met Johnny after a day of being pissed that part of his family was being awful to Johnny. He should've been happy someone liked Johnny other than Nonnia and his ma.

"Yeah, okay," Daniel said with a sigh stepping out of the way so the kid could come in, leaving the door open because there was no point in closing it now. Was this what it was like to be a parent? He shuddered. Constantly cock blocked. Ugh, he'd probably been that kid.

Johnny was pulling back the covers.

"Do you want a light on?" Johnny asked.

The kid shook his head. "No."

"Why'd you pick us?" Daniel asked trying not to whine, trying to keep the complaint out of his tone.

At this rate there'd be no sex the entire trip. They'd fallen asleep the night before tired from the flight, and now this. Maybe there was something to Johnny's hesitancy, maybe there was some force that refused to let them get that far. Next time they were staying at a hotel. No one would bother them at a hotel and Johnny was more than up for hotel sex or at least had been last time.

The brat settled in in the middle of the bed. Daniel wouldn't even be able to cuddle or hold Johnny in his sleep. At least the guys picked a side.

"You're karate champions."

Ah. They'd kick the monsters ass. Got it. Well that was sweet. Glad someone knew he was a strong bad ass.

"You going to take a shower?" Daniel asked Johnny. They weren't dressed for bed.

"Yeah," Johnny said before turning to Christopher. "You going to be okay? I'll make it a quick shower."

The kid looked at Daniel studying him like he was trying to decide how good his chances were with only one of them.

"Hey, I'll have you know I beat him in a tournament. I won," Daniel protested, offended.

"It's fine," Christopher said.

That tone. How freaking rude. And Johnny spent the whole day with these kids.

Johnny nodded gathering up his stuff and kissing the top of Daniel's head before slipping out of the room. He wasn't even going to kiss him on the lips huh? Going to roll back all the way up to polite general audience with no pda. Daniel sighed quickly changing into his pajamas before returning and looking at the kid. He did look scared.

"There won't be any monsters here," Daniel said sitting down on his side of the bed.

"No?"

"Nope. Tristen and Moshe wouldn't allow it. Very safe. Same with Nonnia and Nonnio's place."

Christopher looked down at his hands, picking at his nail beds before chewing on his nails nervously.

"What?" Daniel asked.

"Does no one like me?"

"Hey, why would you think that?"

"No one wanted to stay behind today with us. I thought maybe Johnny did because, well he doesn't know me or the rest of us. But you didn't want me here."

Daniel sighed. Was he that readable?

"It's not a you problem."

The kid had big watery shiny eyes.

Fuck.

"Listen, do you like Johnny?"

Christopher nodded.

"Good. Me too. You got to spend the whole day with him. I wanted to too. But instead I went shopping."

"But shopping is fun."

"Yeah, most of the time, but I wanted to spend the day with Johnny. Would have preferred it. People weren't the nicest about him and it was upsetting. I'd have preferred to just been here with him."

"We had fun. They weren't nice about him? I guess...Ma says he was mean to you but he doesn't seem mean. Maybe everyone's confused."

"I guess," Daniel said with a sigh. "But he's my favorite, so I want them to be nice to him. But I'm sorry, I just wasn't expecting a guest. I was going to bite off anyone's head on the other side of the door. And the family, it's not you, they didn't volunteer because they wanted to go shopping."

"Johnny volunteered though."

"Yeah, because he's kind."

"But he was mean to you?"

"Yeah we had the worst meeting and misunderstanding," Daniel said turning to glance at the kid again.

The watery look was gone and he was staring at Daniel wide eyed. "What happened?"

"Oh boy, where would I start?"

"The beginning?"

"Okay, Ma got a job in California so we drove from Newark to LA with the car packed with our stuff. I complained the whole way and..."

Daniel hadn't had a chance to retell the story in a while and it was kind of fun to have an audience holding onto every word because they didn't know the story. When he got to the beach he felt eyes on him and saw Johnny, hair damp, and with a familiar smirk, one he'd seen so many times, but it'd grown so much since before. There was fondness in his eyes, amused and so full of love.

"Don't let him make it seem like I was the only one getting hits in. He also sucker punched me," Johnny said pushing off the door frame and settling in on the other side to listen. "Daniel's tough."

They'd come so damn far. Daniel wanted to tell him that.

Johnny can you believe the first time we met we fought and now here we are? You're in my godfather's home, we're in Newark and you're spending the weekend for my Nonnio's birthday with the whole family and when we go home it's together, it's our home? Our bed? Our everything? But we started on that beach. Can you believe it? Would you ever have thought, in that moment if someone told you, that kid you're fighting is going to be your boyfriend, your lover, someone you love so much whose going to love you back so fiercely, would you have believed it? I don't know if I would've. I might've. If I'd stopped to take more of you in. I'd like to think maybe. I think maybe it's why I liked to egg you on when I could. Gravity. Pulled in towards you no matter what. Because I had fun doing it. I liked riling you up. I still do. Always will.

Sometimes I wonder if you love me as much as I love you. But that damn look. You love me so fucking much and it makes my knees weak. Like I'm some girl in one of those books Ma reads. I could totally be a girl on the cover of a harlequin novel pressed to your chest. Okay, now I do want that. Think we could do a weird photoshoot? Model for a harlequin book? Do they make harlequin books with just guys? What if we switched it?

"I can't believe you fought over a girl," the kid said nose scrunched up.

"A very cool girl," Johnny said.

"Would you fight someone over Daniel now?"

Johnny tilted his head thoughtfully and Daniel frowned.

That should've been easy.

He'd fight for Johnny in a heartbeat. Had. He was still fighting Chozen off. With his luck, he'd be doing that his whole life. He seemed stuck with the bastard.

Johnny, what the hell?

The answer was simple.

Yes.

Yes.

So easy.

Oh god, why wasn't he just saying yes?

"No."

"What?" Daniel squawked.

"Not like I did on the beach over Ali," Johnny said, not looking at Daniel, but at Christopher. "Ali didn't want me fighting over her. She wasn't interested anymore. I took that hard. And I hurt someone over it because I was upset and angry. I regret that. I regret a lot of things. Almost everything from the first six months I knew Daniel. I kept trying to pull Ali back to me and I hurt myself and I hurt her and Daniel. So no. Not like that. I'm done fighting for the love and attention of people who don't like me. It's all I ever did. I fought hard for Ali's attention, my stepfather's, and my sensei's. And none of it was worth it. You shouldn't ever have to fight to be loved. It took me a long time to realize it. Love shouldn't be given to you in scraps or crumbs."

Daniel looked away rubbing at his eyes, if he could go back and rescue that boy earlier, he'd bury him in an avalanche of love. He'd have done it in a heartbeat. He sniffed, blinking up at the ceiling.

"But," Johnny said and Daniel glanced at him, he was smiling. "I will fight for the people I love. For my friends, my family, for Daniel. If he's in danger. I'd fight. Always will."

"Would you fight people over Johnny?" the kid said turning to Daniel like the lesson full of his inner truth just went over his head.

Daniel laughed, it was a little watery.

Johnny reached over and brushed an errant tear from his cheek.

"Hell yeah," Daniel said. "And I'd win."

Johnny burst out laughing.

"You can never tell Mr. Miyagi," Daniel said deadly serous. "He'd be so disappointed."

"Who'd ever think I'd be the better Miyagi student?"

"You are not the better Miyagi-do student."

"Oh, but I clearly am. I learned and internalized his lessons. I'm so balanced."

"Balanced? You ate fried baloney at like 2 am Wednesday night."

"My 2am eating habits were not part of the equation."

"No, but I think it's something important to note. You are a great house guest. Very clean. Very quiet. Very helpful. But you were dying weren't you? Just to eat junk food late at night?"

"Listen there's nothing wrong with fried baloney."

"I know, it's cheap, but we can buy real food."

"It is food. What do you recommend I eat at 2 am?"

"A bigger dinner earlier? Why were you even up?"

"I couldn't sleep."

"Seriously?"

"Yeah."

I thought I wore you out. How the hell-

"Why couldn't you sleep?" Christopher asked.

Johnny looked away fiddling with the blankets.

Daniel waited.

"Got nervous about our trip. My mother said some stuff and it became maybe bigger than it is. Or maybe not. Maybe it is big. But you are all important to Daniel and there's a lot of you. I wanted...I wanted everyone to like me."

"I like you."

"Thank you."

"I'm sorry they've been awful and rude. I'd say they're normally not like this but I remembered that they are," Daniel sighed, reaching over and taking Johnny's hand. "Believe me I've chewed them out and I'm going to talk to Louie Jr. about-"

"It's okay."

"It's not okay."

"I mean Louie Jr., don't chew him out. He's going through a lot right now."

Daniel looked at Johnny in surprise.

I changed my mind, he's cool.

Daniel sighed. "He told them that-"

"After you guys left Louie Jr. snapped at everyone," Christopher said.

"What?" Daniel asked.

Christopher nodded. "It woke me up. He got loud. Told them to stop. Said they made it really hard to be around 'em sometimes. Said no wonder Johnny didn't go with them. Said he wished he hadn't. Said Johnny helps out and is nice and just because he...well he said a bad word...I don't know what it means. But I think he meant messed up? That he really wished they wouldn't judge people so fast."

Daniel laughed. "Did he now?"

"Yeah, said he liked Johnny and he agreed with Nonnia that he's family and then he said a bunch of bad words."

"What did you do?" Daniel asked with a laugh squeezing Johnny's hand. He couldn't believe Louie Jr. liked Johnny. He thought that'd be the last domino to fall not one of the first.

Johnny shrugged. "Not much, but it's getting late, we should try to sleep."

Johnny looked at Daniel blue eyes focused like what he was going to say was important.

"You going to be okay sleeping like this?"

"Why wouldn't I be?"

"You're like a heat seeking octopus, I don't want you crushing Christopher. I can handle your like wrestlers grip, I'm use to it."

"Hey!" Daniel said. "It'll be fine."

Johnny looked at him like he didn't believe him.

He would not have a problem. He'd done this a thousand times. He laid down arms crossed with a frown.

"Okay, you okay if I turn out the light?" Johnny asked.

"Yes," Christopher said.

Johnny nodded flicking off the light and settling in.

Daniel grabbed one of the extra pillows and hugged it to his chest. He'd be fine, but he'd miss being next to Johnny. He tried not to poke and prod at the feeling because he was trying to be good.

"Good night," Johnny said.

"Night," Daniel said.

He wondered what had gotten Louie Jr. to change his mind. Had it been when Johnny had helped a lost kid? Maybe. At some point though Louie Jr. had deflated. Had stopped getting all riled up about Johnny. Had it been Nonnia and Nonnio? Because if Ma was right they'd been fond of Johnny from the get go. And it wasn't because of Daniel loving him. Which was kind of disappointing. He'd stressed about it but he'd kind of liked the Nonnia and Nonnio like my boyfriend more than he likes your fiancé. Which it still was, it just wasn't because of romantic reasons, but because Johnny was good.

Johnny had said Louie Jr. was going through a lot right now. Sure Louie Sr. had been sick, but Ma came home, which meant he was better right? He'd never asked. What if he hadn't gotten better? Louie Sr. wasn't there. Was that what Johnny had meant? Shit. He should've asked. Should've checked in.

Louie Jr. was his closest cousin, one of his oldest friends...but he hadn't...he'd hang out with Louie in the morning. They'd go get bagels or something. Talk about it. He'd check in. Fuck. He'd overlooked it. Assumed everything was fine.

Daniel woke up still hugging the pillow to his chest and a tiny fist in his face. He pushed himself up with a feeling of triumph, wanting to tell Johnny that ha he totally was fine sleeping without him next to him and see, he didn't hurt anyone with his intense sleep holds. But Johnny was asleep still, curled up on his side taking up as little space as the six foot teen could. Curled up almost like he was cold.

Daniel carefully slid out of the bed and padded over to Johnny's side gently crouching down and cupping the side of his face.

Was it how he slept when Daniel wasn't there?

Or was it because he knew the kid was in the bed and didn't want to crush him?

Or was it something else leftover?

Blue eyes opened after a moment.

"That does not look comfortable," Daniel said softly.

"Morning," Johnny said reaching out and pulling him close.

Daniel huffed a breath of a laugh leaning in and kissing him gently.

If it was his families fault he was going to start cutting people off.

If Johnny was curling himself into a ball because of some stupid thing someone who knew nothing but had enough time to gossip and speculate had said he was going to start a fight.

Sorry Mr. Miyagi. He'd try to not let it become physical. But he was pretty sure after everything Johnny had been through, his whole life, Mr. Miyagi would look the other way or at least forgive Daniel.

"I see you didn't crush Christopher," Johnny said amused pushing himself up and glancing over.

"Of course not. I'm not that horrible to share a bed with."

"No no your not," Johnny said pushing blonde hair back and out of his eyes.

Daniel gave him one more kiss before going about his morning routine, returning to find Christopher bouncing up and down in the corner talking fast about some kids cartoon Daniel had never seen while Johnny pulled on the sweater Nonnia had knitted him asking questions and nodding, following along with Christophers errant thoughts with ease.

If Daniel wasn't careful not only would his home be full of their friends, librarians and old teachers, Abulea and her grandchildren, but also children that just followed Johnny home. Once that seemed like a nice dream, but with dwindling alone time it now felt like an impending nightmare.

Johnny would be like some boy scout troop leader. Teaching them how to survive in the wild and tie knots and maybe Daniel could learn too and use it- nope, store that thought away for later.

Focus.

Family gathering. Baby cousins. Getting riled up would be horrible and there'd be no relief. Absolutely none. Not unless he could grab Johnny and run away, hide away somewhere, but there were too many people and it was Nonnio's birthday and Johnny would never forgive him if he dragged him into a closet or something and someone opened the door on them.

Johnny smiled looking at him, at his sweater, their matching sweaters.

Christopher held Johnny's hand, adamant about it like there was danger crossing the hallway. It wasn't like it was a highway at rush hour. But Daniel opened the door across the hall and remembered. He remembered why Christopher would've wanted to hold Johnny's hand. Because a morning at Nonnio and Nonnia's for a family event was chaos. People rushing this way and that, someone carrying out a hot pan of something from the kitchen to find someone else to look at and ask Does this look right? I feel like it's missing something, what do you think?

It was dangerous. The kid should've been wearing a pitcher's outfit with a helmet just to cross into the place.

Daniel couldn't decide whether matching sweaters was kind of dorky or not. But when Nonnia saw them and her entire demeanor changed like sunlight breaking through, her face brightened and her hands rose to Daniel's face.

"Look how handsome you both look. I knew those colors would compliment you both well."

She was so happy. That was the point. To make his Nonnia happy. She hugged them both. Big warm tight hugs.

"Oh hello Christopher. Your mother's been looking for you."

Christopher nodded letting go of Johnny's hand and darting off in search of his mom.

"You two must be hungry. We'll eat soon, come," she said before pulling them along to the living room. Out of the way of the chaos. Nonnio was in his chair watching a game on the TV and glancing up when they came in.

"Oh ho Tesero, you've outdone yourself this time, absolutely perfect as always."

"You flatterer," Nonnia said with a grin, leaning down and kissing the top of Nonnio's head. "Keep it up."

He laughed gently squeezing her hand. "You know, I could help with-"

"Nope, don't even think about it."

Nonnio looked at them. "I try, every year."

"And then you make a big deal out of my birthday," she said with a grin.

"I do," he said tapping his nose conspiratorial and giving them a wink. "And I keep it an even bigger secret than she does."

"Like I said, pay him no heed in his wounded routine. He's full of tricks. Now be good."

Nonnia smiled walking off and Johnny sat down on the couch, he had a couple books under his arms that he sat on the table.

"I'm going to go find Louie," Daniel said. He didn't want to leave Johnny's side, but he thought if he was with Nonnio then it'd be okay. Johnny nodded. Daniel turned slowly to look around for Louie.

He found Louie near the door.

"Hey Louie I'm going out for a bagel and some coffee, want to come?" Daniel asked grabbing his jacket.

"Is Johnny coming?" Louie asked.

"He can if you want, or doesn't have to if you don't want him to. I think he's reading."

"You okay with that? Aunt Lucille said you went through like withdrawals of not getting to hold his hand or something yesterday."

"I think I can survive breakfast," Daniel said.

Could he?

Yesterday was rough.

He'd gone to breakfast without Johnny before, spent time without him. But there was something that made his skin itch knowing that their time together was limited, that soon he'd be rushing home to see Johnny after all day without him. It made every second precious and something he coveted. He wanted to hoard it all. All he could do, once they got home, was lock the doors and try and persuade Johnny into taking a few more days off from the shop so they could just be a tangle of sweaty limbs.

But he owed Louie this.

He was the older cousin.

He'd watched his own dad die.

He had the experience navigating these waters and he hadn't checked in, he hadn't said anything to Louie.

He'd only thought of Johnny, only looked at the way his lips looked in the cold of Newark in January with his breath visible and his cheeks pink, bundled up in things Daniel had bought him.

Daniel sighed he wanted to kiss Johnny.

"All I need to do is get a kiss from him and then I'll be good to go," Daniel said, "So get your jacket and your gloves."

Louie looked at him with a frown, suspicious but getting ready and Daniel went back to find Johnny.

He was pretty sure he was with Nonnio still, reading curled up on the couch.

Yup, there he was.

Nonnio usually looked kind of sad on his birthday, his family all around but not with him. Even though Johnny was reading, Nonnio seemed more relaxed, like it was nice to watch basketball on TV and just have Johnny there reading a book.

Daniel got that. He liked that too. Just knowing Johnny was there helped him sleep at night. There'd been no way he would've gotten a good nights sleep for months if he hadn't physically felt Johnny next to him.

He kissed Nonnio on top of the head.

"You want me to sneak you back a bagel and some coffee?" Daniel asked.

"Oh yes please," Nonnio said, patting his arm. "It'll do Louie Jr. some good to get out."

Daniel smiled, Nonnio always seemed to know.

He nodded and walked over to Johnny, gently putting his hand on top of his book and tugging it down, watching Johnny's eyes follow the page as it went down, following whatever sentence he was on to its end before his eyes shot back up to him.

"I'm taking Louie out for breakfast, I'll be back after. You going to be okay?"

"Yes."

"Anyone gives you trouble, you'll tell me right? Rat them out to me."

"I'm going to stick with Nonnio," Johnny said. "And I think Christopher and the other kids were supposed to come back with all this art they made to show us. They also wanted me to help."

"Okay," Daniel said, leaning forward kissing him.

He wanted to stay.

He wanted to just keep kissing Johnny, thinking about the way he'd made his lips into a little o to breathe out cold air when they went shopping, like it was novel and new, even though he'd been somewhere cold before, even though he went to the mountains with the guys. How cute it was, and how pink and warm and wet his mouth was- and shit, he had to go or else things would get bad and his Nonnio was right there.

Daniel pulled away kissing the top of his head and hurrying out the door past Louie Jr. who was struggling, hopping around trying to get his foot into his boot.

"The usual place?" Daniel asked shoving his hands into his pockets.

"Yeah. They're still good," Louie Jr. said walking beside him.

Daniel worried at his lower lip.

What did he say?

Where did he start?

What comfort did he have to give?

That having a sick parent was rough but it gave you a chance, on good days to try and talk, to talk about things you didn't think would happen for a long time, until you had a better handle on your life. To face the tough things. It gave you time to come to terms that they might not be there for those big things. It still sucked. It was still awful. But-

"Why didn't you ever tell me that karate got you babes?"

What? What babes?

Louie had his hands in his pockets, shoulders tense and up near his ears, trying to keep his collar up against the wind because he hadn't brought his scarf.

"Huh?"

"I told the girls that I have a cousin in LA who does karate and won a tournament and then I thought, well Daniel's doing it, so I started taking classes too you know? I'm not any good but like girls like it. Think I'm cool."

"Wait, are you saying you're using me to get girls?"

"Well it's not like you'd want them right?"

"That's not the point."

"I mean you're like regularly getting laid, right? So what do you care?"

"Girls, how many girls are you dating?"

"Five."

"Do they know that you're dating other girls?"

"No, but like your friend- Bobby right? He-"

"Louie you can't do that. They have to know and be okay with it.

Bobby always tells everyone. Heck he apparently only ended up with his situation because the girls all agreed day one. No one thought it was exclusive."

"Really?" Louie asked looking at him wide-eyed.

"Yes, really. You can't just-" Daniel heaved a sigh, feeling cold fill his lungs.

He missed LA and it's warmth.

"Damn it," Louie said kicking his feet. "They're going to be pissed."

"Listen I know things are-"

"No," Louie said.

"What?"

"I know what this is, and I get it, and thanks, but I don't- I don't want to talk about it right now. I'll work my way there, but right now I want to just sit and talk. Give me time to get there, but like not yet okay?"

Daniel looked at him surprised and nodded.

Louie kicked at some of the snow piled up on the side of the sidewalk. "How'd you know you liked Johnny?"

"You like one of the girls you're seeing?" Daniel asked pushing the door to the bagel shop open, hit by a wall of warmth that was so welcoming and the smell of bagels, coffee, and pastries.

"I think, it's fun, it's just, it's not- it's not deep," Louie said. "The sex is good though."

"What?" Daniel squawked turning to Louie, but Louie was walking past him towards the counter picking out his bagel, getting lox on it and cream cheese and egg and ordering a coffee, black.

He was trying to seem older than he was. Standing tall and puffing out his chest, as if he needed any more height. But it was a ruse.

He did that sometimes, tried to order his coffee black, plain and then would suffer through it. Until he saw Daniel dump in a bunch of cream. Then that seemed to mean he didn't have to suffer. Could add sugar and cream, relax.

Daniel pinched the bridge of his nose.

He should've checked in with Louie sooner.

He had a habit of making dumb choices and not realizing how bad they were.

He didn't use all of his brain.

"Everything bagel, with cream cheese, lox, capers, tomato and red onion please. And I'll take a cappuccino. Thanks and I've got his," Daniel said digging out his wallet.

"Thanks cuz," Louie said looking at the pastries.

"Can I get some little creamer cups and sugar packets?" Daniel asked.

The worker nodded and Daniel got his change and headed over to a table by the window, slowly taking off all of his winter gear.

"You know you're going to get in trouble, like what you're doing is what Charlotte's ex did."

Louie looked at him startled, hand going to protect himself between his legs. "What?" he hissed.

"Wait what do you think happened to Charlotte's ex?" Daniel asked.

"Uh, didn't they chop off his– you know, and then throw it into the river for the fish?"

"No! Oh god no. Who told you that?"

"I just overheard…" Louie said relaxing a little.

"No, damn. I mean they might've talked about it, but they didn't, no he just got iced out and due to karma his car went swimming with some fish."

"Oh," Louie said hearing their number called and hopping up to get the tray and bringing it over.

"Okay, but…I mean I didn't think it was cheating."

"Yeah Louie, that's exactly what cheating is."

"Oh," Louie said. "What if I just break up with all of them?"

“I mean you probably should, tell them you messed up and…did you use protection?”

Daniel now was worried that on top of everything else there’d soon be some poor girl forced to make a decision, or multiple girls.

“Of course I did. I got the same talk you did.”

Daniel blinked at his coffee and then looked at Louie. “What?”

Louie shrugged. “Moshe and Tristen gave all the guys the same talk after they gave you the talk. Hey, is the sex good? Is that why you- I mean is Johnny good?”

Daniel felt his skin burn.

“We are not going to talk about this.”

“Who are you going to talk to it about?” Louie asked raising an eyebrow, snatching up the sugar off the tray and dumping it into his coffee. “Because last time I checked I’m your oldest best friend.”

“We’re family. I’m not talking to you about my sex life.”

“You were going to,” Louie said. “You promised you would when we were younger, that we’d talk to each other about everything.”

“Yeah, but that was for like flings.”

“It’s not my fault you went from kissing one girl at summer camp to getting boned by a blonde in California that you liked enough to bring home. Just because you thought you’d be a casanova and ended up not being one shouldn’t change things,” Louie said frowning, looking at the pile of packets and his coffee then at Daniel’s coffee, then grabbing more packets of sugar. “The sex I’m having is good, but also I feel dirty after. I always shower a lot. My skin’s drying out.”

“Why is this the conversation--Louie-”

“I mean Johnny is hot but I don’t know...is it the karate thing? Or the muscles? I mean you had a type, you always wanted to watch the fights on TV. The ones with all the shirtless guys. I kind of figured. And you never had a crush on any of the girls at school. So like is it good? Or like-”

Daniel had a headache.

He'd started his day off so good, and had thought this was something long over due.

He didn't realize it'd be his cousin trying to get this information.

"Louie-"

"I mean okay, so you've got no one to talk to right? Like you've got friends but they're both your friends or they're also Johnny's ex, or other girls who are also his friend, or his friends, or whatever, your only other options are Aunt Lucille or the old man?"

He was right. He didn't like that he was right.

"Ali is my ex too."

"I mean I'm not asking for details."

"Aren't you though?"

"I just want to know if it's good? Because I keep thinking about what Tristen and Moshe said and like they made it sound like it was good. So like, is it?"

"I could talk to Tristen and Moshe," Daniel realized.

"No. You promised me."

"Yeah, again, for flings and like regular stuff. Not about the guy I'm invested in."

"Invested in. Who says that? Is this business school talking? Who are you?"

"No, I just mean-"

"Is it bad? Like is that why you're avoiding the question? Is Johnny bad at sex?"

Daniel rubbed his face and groaned.

"He's got a policy to not talk about stuff with other people and it feels weird knowing he's not going to but you're going to make me-"

"I'm not going to like go around and tell everyone," Louie said with a defensive huff.

“Fine, fine, it’s very good okay?”

“Seriously?”

“Yes, seriously. Oh my god. This is the worst conversation I’ve ever had with you and we've had awful conversations, like your what would be worse game."

“Hey.”

“No seriously, this is not a conversation for breakfast. This is…this is like a drunken late night conversation.”

“We’re both under 21 Daniel.”

“You drank wine with me. Don’t act all high and mighty now.”

“Yeah because you thought Great Aunt Elda was right.”

“Well I thought she was. I didn’t realize that you just vomit red wine back up exactly the same. I thought we were dying because it was red.”

“Don’t remind me. I don’t think I’ll drink wine again for a long time. Except like sometimes maybe. But wait, why are you getting all evasive? Are you on top?” Louie asked in a suspicious tone.

“Can we move past this please?”

“Oh, I got it right? Holy shit, that opens up a different idea. He is pretty, and I mean-” Louie said leaning back thoughtfully.

“Stop it. No. Don’t you dare, do you know how many people I’m constantly fighting off?”

“He’s popular huh? Is it the karate? It’s definitely the karate. Or is it the like cliché blue eyed blonde California boy look he has? Is it the muscle? Oh, shit, is it because he let’s you be on top? I mean you know, maybe if- I mean he’s nice, he’s kind and helpful and huh.”

“Don’t huh. Stop thinking about it. Why did I talk about it? No. I didn't talk about it, you've just got your mind in th gutter. Erase that from your brain. Do not think about Johnny like that. He’s my boyfriend and I know you’re my cousin but I will hurt you,” Daniel said picking up his butter knife and pointing it at Louie.

Louie laughed. “I’m not going to do anything. I’m just thinking.

There's no crime in thinking, what are you the thought police from "1984"?"

"You read that?" Daniel asked trading his butter knife for his bagel in the hopes of moving onto a safer topic and being able to eat in peace.

"Had to for school. And reading…well reading that book was like a good excuse to not be home…no, not talking about that yet. So wait, you and Johnny, I would've thought he'd be on top, has he ever...You are so easy to read. Why not? Are you scared?" Louie asked leaning forward and whispering.

"I'm not scared."

"You're getting some twisted revenge aren't you?"

"What?"

"Like the guy beats you up for what, six months? Less right because of the truce? So you get your revenge by boning him every chance you get. Showing that you win in some like old school manliness contest. Moshe and Tristen would be disappointed in you. I bet you're trying to bone him every place that he hurt you."

"I am not!"

"Is that why you won't let him bone you? Or is it like a type thing? Like… Moshe and Tristen said that sometimes there's specific preferences…is that it?"

"No," Daniel said feeling his face burning. This was not how he expected his morning to go. He mixed a packet of sugar into his cappuccino and took another bite of his bagel and lox.

"No to what part?"

"Listen," Daniel said around a mouthful of his bagel. "It's not that. We've just, both been through a lot and things have changed and now…now I don't know."

"You don't know?" Louie asked eyebrow raised.

"When you have all these people treating you like shit, it's hard to relax. And I, I want to, I really do, but I don't know if I can right now."

"Well you better not right now, you know it's Nonnio's birthday."

“What do you think it all entails? It can be quick.”

“It’s just rude. Who knew you were such a horny monster?"

“You asked!”

“Yeah, You know that they have like AA for that stuff right?”

“What horny anonymous? I hate you.”

“You’re the one who made the promise. To talk about anything and everything.”

“Louie, come on-”

“Is it like with a girl?”

“I don’t know.”

“What?”

“You’d have to ask Johnny.”

“Wait,” Louie said leaning forward, eyes wide. “You and that chick never?”

“No!”

“Was she-wait is it because- oh, that makes sense.”

Daniel rubbed his face. ”Listen-”

“No. You really like Johnny that much. What about him does it for you?”

“Louie! You said we wouldn’t go into details.”

“So I just want to know what about that is so good that you’re satisfied. Because like five girls, I didn't really want to bring any of them home."

"Louie, you can't string these girls along."

"Yeah I got that, but you got a home run. How?"

"Johnny was really sweet, I just, we just got off on the wrong foot and I don't fully blame him for all of it-"

"You mean those guys, Kreese and Sid?"

"Yeah. I mean it was like all a wall right? To protect himself and I think, I think I kept trying to get under that wall and he kept trying to stop me and I didn't realize I was like wanting in there because I thought he was hot. I just thought I was doing what I always do. That I kept dreaming of a blonde, not realizing it wasn't my girlfriend. Not realizing I was having vague dreams about Johnny but I was also, like he hurt me so I didn't really feel comfortable exploring that until after he apologized and after I saw just how sincere he was and nice and kind and..."

"This is mushy gushy romantic stuff it's not actually sex related. I don't care about the relationship bit. Is it his ass? I haven't looked."

"Louie, if you do I will stab you," Daniel said waving the butter knife at him.

Louie laughed, a warm deep laugh. "I missed this."

"What?"

"You."

"Me? But I've been-"

"You are quick to like piss off and you fight and are feisty and you've been quiet and just like sticking to Johnny's side when you can and I was worried. You know, after everything with Silver."

"You know about Silver?"

"The whole family knows about Silver. I kept calling to check in and you wouldn't answer or call me back. I got worried about you."

Daniel set his knife down. He hadn't talked to family in awhile. Hadn't check-in, hadn't had the time or the energy. He'd taken Louie out for breakfast planning to check in on him, not the other way around. But it was clear, now, with the way Louie's head was bent sipping at his mostly sugar coffee that he'd been checking-in on Daniel, worried. Additional worry that Louie didn't need on his plate.

"I think that's why everyone was super critical of Johnny. Because like he'd also hurt you, but they don't know that Johnny's a good guy. Not just a pretty face," Louie said softly.

"He isn't just a pretty face," Daniel agreed.

"He apparently also likes your dick," Louie said with a teasing grin.

"Louie, I will get up and leave I swear."

Louie laughed, shoving the rest of his bagel and lox in his mouth.

"You gonna marry him?" he asked, mouth full.

Daniel blinked looking at Louie. "You know I can't. You know if we could marry that Moshe and Tristen already would be-"

"Oh. Right. But if you could?"

"In a heartbeat."

"Even though you've only been dating like a year?"

"Mom and Dad dated like three months."

"My mom says that was lucky."

Daniel nodded looking down at his cappuccino thoughtfully.

"You should still do something at some point."

"Like what?"

"A nice private ceremony. A party. Just like a promise or something."

"I think we have to wait."

"Why?"

"I want to prove I can take care of him."

"To who?"

"His mom."

"Does she care? Wait is that a whole thing? You're like trapped in like a guy/girl relationship even though neither of you are a girl?"

Daniel blinked. "No, I just- his mom can be scary. I like her, she's cool but I want her to like, be okay giving me Johnny."

"Giving you Johnny, what is he some girl you're trading like five cows for in the old days?"

"No, that's not what I meant."

"It sounds like you're sticking yourself into a box."

"I-it's complicated."

"It sounds like you're a mess."

"I- well...yeah."

Louie nodded sagely.

"I am too."

Daniel bit back what he was going to say. That admission meant maybe, maybe Louie would talk. Maybe he was ready. He'd checked in on Daniel and now it was his turn. Daniel took a sip of his cappuccino and waited.

"He can't talk much. I just don't want to talk about it. I don't want to be comforted because it makes me feel guilty. And I don't want anyone's pity because I'm fine. I'm not fine though, but I am? I'm upset but I'm also not because he's still here. And I'm adjusting. I want to be home but I also never want to be home. I want to be anywhere but. And I want to spend time with him but it's hard. Because he's not him. He is. But he's different. He's crabbier. He's meaner. He yelled at Aunt Lucille a lot, or at least kind of did. He's impatient. I don't like it or feel comfortable. I feel like I'm supposed to be by his side all the time. Like it's my duty to be by his side all the time and it's hard and I can't. I can't handle it. I don't want to face it. I don't like it. I don't like how slow it is. I don't like just watching him become a different person. A shell of who he was, angry. I miss him. But he's still here and people don't get that. I mean I still love him but it kind of feels like he's already gone. Like the man he was, Dad, he's kind of already gone, and now there's just this sick guy at home that sometimes is like a shadow of who he was, but he's not him. He's like that bug, the one that comes up and screams all summer and then you go out and all you find is the shell stuck to the tree. I miss my dad. But like no one gets that. Because he's still here. I feel guilty for everything. For any joy or happeniness, or laughing. When I'm home I'm miserable when I'm not home I feel guilty.

"I... I don't want advice, I don't want pity, I just want to-I want you to listen. To just be here and I want to live in a world for even for a moment where things are different. Where people aren't whispering their pity and their concern. And I...I also don't want to be here. I want to be doing something else. I want to be anywhere else. I don't want to be in Newark. I don't want to be in Jersey. I think I think it's why I fucked up with the girls. I just, I want to feel something else. I feel like I'm stuck in the mud. Like I'm sinking and I could get out I just don't know how. I feel like I'm not living my life but I'm scared to live my life. That if I turn around, if I move then something bad will happen and everyone will say why weren't you home? Why weren't you there? Daniel was there. Daniel was home when his dad died. Daniel held his hand and it was super sweet. And I...I don't want to be there. I don't want to watch him die. I mean he might not. But he also might. I'm not as good of a son as you were. And they talk about it, all the time. Daniel was such a good boy when his dad died. He was always home. He was always by his side. He cried. Why haven't you cried? You don't look miserable enough. But I am. This is...this is just my face."

Daniel reached out. "Louie. I felt like an awful son. For not spending time with him before. And you're not me, you're allowed to be you."

Louie nodded, sniffing drinking his coffee.

"You want one of those fancy pastries?" Daniel asked.

Louie nodded.

Daniel got up and ordered a few, returning back and sitting down next to Louie.

"I was a kid. You're a teen. We also are different people. It's unfair to compare us."

Louie nodded, swallowing hard playing with the ripped up tiny mountain of sugar packets.

"How did Johnny handle it?"

"Handle what?"

"Someone trying to kill him?"

Daniel blinked and sat back.

"I think if I'd know he'd been in so much pain. That people were- I would've been nicer to him when he arrived. That first time. He's really nice," Louie whispered.

Daniel nodded patting Louie's shoulder. "Yeah I think I would've been too."

"You weren't nice to him?"

Daniel laughed. "I liked egging him on. It was fun to wind him up and watch him go. Because no one else ever had behaved like that around me. It was...brutually honest. How he felt. When he was mad, it was like lava, rushing towards me and I knew I needed to get out of the way, that I needed to stop, but there was something about it. How intensely he felt everything. I liked it. It was thrilling. Like I assume how people feel when they jump out of planes."

"You're fucked up."

Daniel smiled ruffling Louie's hair.

"Hey! I worked hard on that."

"I'm making it up to him. Slowly."

"How?"

"I-"

"You can't just say by making him orgasm. Orgasms don't fix everything. That's what I've been trying. It doesn't work."

"Of course not. You got to work on the stuff in here," Daniel said tapping his own chest and then his head. "I mean I'm not perfect but I like that he's comfortable around me."

"Comfortable like he doesn't wear clothes?"

"That's not what I meant but-"

"Is your apartment just a nudists' home?" Louie asked wrinkling his nose and drinking his coffee.

"No, can't be. Our friends have keys, they're over all the time."

"You want it to be," Louie said with exaggerated shock.

"Fine, yes. I'm dating a fucking greek marble statue and I like looking okay? He's hot. I admit it. He's very hot. He's also very smart and he can fix things, and he sees things differently so when I'm struggling with something he finds a different solution. And now when we wind each other up it's fun. And it's a million times better then it was. Because it's all playful and loving and now when I wind him up he just plays right back and it's kind of sexy. And he listens to everything I say and he remembers and I don't know how he does, how he follows along, but he does and I'm happy and yes, the sex is good. It's so good. And if I could lock our friends out all I would do is have sex with him and talk to him and make him food and listen to him. I want to spend time with him because he's my favorite person."

"Gross, it's all intertwined huh?" Louie asked before laughing. "Like you want to be."

"What are you even talking about?"

"You're like so in love with him that it hikes up your desire to bone him which hikes up your love and it just like keeps going. How do you survive that?"

Daniel frowned looking away.

"Cuz are you miserable?"

"No! I'm very happy. I just, am like always..."

"You do do it a lot right?"

"We do, but I want to do it more."

"Gross."

"You're the one asking, why do you keep saying gross?"

"Because I don't know what else to say!" Louie said laughing and rubbing his eyes. "Like if I say cool hot, or something like that you'll think I'm hitting on Johnny and get pissed and threaten me with the butter knife again."

"I-"

He was right. There was no way to keep talking about it.

"Why do you call him Johnny and not John?"

Daniel blinked surprised. "Oh, uh..." He held his mug in both hands. "His teacher, Kreese, his first name is John."

"The guy who tried to kill him?"

"Yeah. I don't want to remind him of that. I don't want to do anything to send him back to that time. So I call him by the name he goes by. I mean everyone calls him Johnny."

"What about like a pet name?"

"You mean like honey or dear?"

"Yeah."

Daniel shrugged. "We spent, or I guess he spent so much time calling me by my last name that I just am enjoying being on a first name basis. I haven't, I don't know if he'd like that."

"You should try it."

Daniel nodded looking at the pastries and picking one with blueberries to eat. "Will you finally let me change topics?"

"Yes."

"Then what do you want to do?"

"What do you mean?"

"Outside of school. You started doing karate. What are you interested in?"

"I don't know. I kind of like karate, but everyone just says I'm copying you."

"Well I mean you kind of are, and you're using my win to get laid."

"You make it sound bad," Louie said picking up one of the pastries and eating it getting little bits of flaky pastry everywhere.

"It kind of is Louie. But it doesn't have to stay that way. You can study karate and find your own style."

"There's different styles?"

"Yeah I mean Cobra Kai," Daniel shuddered the word tasting like sand on his tongue. "Is different from Mr. Miyagi's karate."

"And karate is big in LA?"

"Yeah, like baseball in here."

"That's big."

"Yeah or like football."

"Damn."

Louie talked a little about school, about home, asked him more questions about LA and thankfully stopped prying into Daniel's sex life. A relief, even though Daniel felt bad, gross, for everything he had said. Even though he felt like hadn't said much he still felt like he owed Johnny an apology.

Before they left he got a coffee for Johnny and one for Nonnio and then a bagel for Nonnio. He was sure Nonnia had fed Johnny. He knew that even if she was busy cooking or party prepping that she wouldn't let a guest be in the house longer than five minutes without food.

When they got home Louie looked better, pulling away and saying hi to Nonnio and giving him his bagel before plopping down next to Johnny, not saying anything but just sitting next to him. Johnny was reading. It looked like he was close to done with that book. But he was ready with several more waiting nearby. Ready to just sit and read all day if no one interfered or interrupted.

"Mind if I trade you Nonnio?"

"Huh?" Nonnio asked looking up from the coffee he took from Daniel.

"I promised Johnny I'd take him to the library."

"Boring," Louie said.

Daniel laughed. "Yeah that's the trade. You hang out with Nonnio I take Johnny to the library. Can you do that?"

"Easy, whose winning Nonnio?"

Daniel smiled, waiting for Johnny to finish the sentence or paragraph he was on, watching as he put the bookmark in his book, speaking softly to Nonnio and Louie who were too engrossed in the game to say more beyond a yeah, and thanks and then he was up and Daniel's heart thudded hard in his chest. The light was perfect, his hair was getting long, he was so pretty. It made him light headed.

Talking about him had made Daniel miss him, like he'd been homesick.

Homesick for a person.

He'd felt that before. Missing his dad, the days where his dad was still alive but not home, in the hospital and how quiet it was at dinner, how neither his mother or him talked about it, the way she tried to smile but it didn't really fully reach her eyes, how it wasn't as big as he remembered. She talked a lot but it was just noise. The way he'd missed his mom while she was in Jersey, while he'd been in Okinawa when he came home and she was gone. But this was different. Like a craving mixed with an ache.

He held out his hand and Johnny smiled at him taking it. He passed him the coffee. He'd ordered it the way Johnny liked.

He wondered if they could stop by Tristen and Moshe's first, lock the bedroom door for a while. He wanted to kiss Johnny till the both were breathless, wanted to touch his hair and marvel at how it looked in the afternoon light.

He had to let go of Johnny's hand while he put on his jacket, his scarf, slowly going through the motions, gloves, hat. Sweetly bundled, wrapped in things Daniel got him and Daniel wondered why he liked that so much. Because while he wasn't with Johnny it felt like part of him was? That didn't seem to be all of it. There was something else he was sure, but he didn't want to dwell. He wanted to just enjoy.

"Ready?"

"Yeah."

He'd forgotten, like always, how cold it was when they pushed the door open and headed down the steps. It was like walking into a solid wall of cold.

Johnny shivered next to him. His nose was already turning pink.

"Did you have a good breakfast with Louie?"

"Yeah," Daniel said. "Though I'm sorry."

"Sorry? For what?"

"We talked about you."

"Oh."

"Nothing bad. Just maybe...awkward."

"Awkward?"

"He wanted to know if..."

He couldn't do it. But he felt like he had to.

He blushed darkly unable to meet Johnny's gaze.

"We um, we talked about, you see, he had this compelling point right? How when I was little I promised I'd always tell him everything. And then like all our friends in California are our friends so I can't talk to them about- I mean not everyone talks about it- I mean you don't. But I...I'm a monster. I can't believe I let him talk me into- no it's not a good excuse. I wanted to talk to someone. But oh my god I'm so sorry."

"What are you talking about?" Johnny said.

Daniel stopped and turned to Johnny, taking a deep breath.

"We talked about sex," he could look at him and squeezed his eyes shut.

Johnny was quiet. Too quiet.

"I guess if his Dad is sick...but I'd have thought school would mention something before now, he's in high school."

Daniel peeked one eye open.

Johnny hadn't connected the dots. Thought Daniel had gone to breakfast to give Louie the talk.

"He-uh- wanted to know-"

"No one had the talk with him?"

"I mean, yeah he got that, the same one I did, but like-"

"So what did you tell him?"

"He wanted to know if it was good."

Johnny nodded like that made sense and Daniel couldn't do it. Couldn't tell him that Louie knew him too well, had guessed parts of his sex life that he didn't, or hadn't talked about to anyone.

"How much detail did you give him?"

"Not too much," Daniel whispered. "He guessed a lot."

He needed to change the topic. He couldn't go through with it. He doubted people told their partners that they talked about their sex life with other people. He couldn't tell Johnny. He cleared his throat. "Apparently, he's using my name to get laid."

Johnny burst out laughing.

"What? How's that funny? I'm a champion and the people at the All Valley remember me. I'm thinking I might join their little judge council. My crane kick is famous."

"Don't tell Mr. Miyagi that you'll get the disappointed sad face," Johnny said after his fit of laughter subsided "Okay okay, fine how does someone use your name to get laid?"

"Apparently girls think it's cool that he's studying karate like his cousin who won first place in it in California."

"So why'd he ask you about sex then? If he's having it?"

"I think he was curious, but what? You don't think that'd get him laid? Using my name?"

"I think that's the weirdest way to-"

"Be careful," Daniel warned, less bite in it, but still standing tall and stiff.

"I think I just have an unfair way of- here I'll show you," Johnny hooked his arm around Daniel's waist, pulling him close, almost off his feet and Daniel yelped in surprise, hands on Johnny's arms, his coat. Johnny had pushed his scarf down.

"Daniel," he whispered, voice breathy and warm in his ear.

Daniel shivered, he'd felt the word, his own name roll over him, straight to his toes.

Johnny set him back down carefully and stepped back and Daniel blinked, surprised he'd shut his eyes and looked at Johnny who looked smug.

"What the hell was that?"

"The best way to use your name to get laid," Johnny said with a grin.

"What?" Daniel said, his knees felt weak. He wanted to find somewhere to grab Johnny and hear him say his name like that again. Wanted to hear it with a little hitch in his breath, in his voice. He felt light headed.

Johnny was smiling, walking backwards, away from him. Like he'd just won something.

Louie was right. Whatever Daniel had, he had it bad. He was in over his head. Johnny just didn't know how wrapped around his finger he had him. Just saying his name like that.

"Come back here, you can't just do that and then walk away," Daniel said making his legs move, forcing them to run across after Johnny who ducked out of his reach, that frustrating way he always did when he wanted. Where Daniel thought for sure he'd get his hands on him and then with ease and grace Johnny wasn't there, his finger tips would brush his jacket but that was as much as he'd get.

Then Johnny stopped at the corner, he couldn't go anywhere, didn't know where they were going and Daniel grabbed his scarf pulling him into a kiss, a warm heated kiss, the kind he'd been itching to have all morning, all afternoon.

Two could play that game.

Johnny's eyes were shut when Daniel pulled away, satisfied, hooking his arm through Johnny's pulling him along to the library, he stopped in front of the library and held out an arm. "Here it is, closest library."

"Your childhood library?" Johnny asked blush fading, dazed look disappearing.

It sounded like maybe that nerd of his was suddenly much more interested in the building then his usual level of interest.

Daniel nodded. "Yup. Got books for school here sometimes when I had projects but really did not go to the library as much as you did."

Johnny nodded studying the outside of it. Then he took Daniel's hand again before heading up the steps.

Was he judging his local library?

Not everyone hoarded libraries like a treasure. But then they pushed through the doors and Johnny looked around taking in the tall ceilings and the dark wood.

The smell threw Daniel back to when he'd been younger. Back to coming in after school because he had to check out a book for a last-minute project he needed to research for, or the time he'd come with both his parents to get a library card.

Johnny squeezed his hand and then picked a direction and headed off in it.

Daniel followed along, taking in things that had changed and things that hadn't. They made their way to through the non-fiction section and Johnny stopped and Daniel looked at the shelves.

Karate.

He was comparing the karate sections.

Daniel let go of his hand and with an idea slipped his hand Johnny's back pocket and squeezed. He jumped, ever so slightly and then turned to look at Daniel.

"Library on the table?"

To be fair, Daniel did not think they could keep as quiet as they should in a library. But he'd heard from the Bobby that there was a section at their school library were people had sex or made out, speaking with the surety of someone who knew the space well.

Johnny liked libraries, maybe they could think of something sneaky. Or maybe it'd be a pleasant torture.

Daniel wasn't sure.

"Not in the stacks," Johnny said ears red as he grabbed a book from the shelf.

He was distracting himself, trying to not focus on Daniel.

Unfair.

But that wasn't a no. But where in a library could you try to have sex other than the stacks?

He looked around.

He guessed that the stacks weren't really good cover.

Sure no one was there right then, but that didn't mean that they wouldn't later. And really Bobby would only know about that spot if he'd seen other people, unless there was just an underground orgy hosted in a specific spot of the library...it was Bobby, who knew.

Johnny was focusing on the book in his hands and Daniel moved in close, it was soft but he was doing meditation breaths.

Library was on the table. Library was very much on the table. He'd just have to plan.

"Do you just want to look at karate books all day? Or see the rest of the library?" Daniel asked.

He himself was on karate hiatus. He needed a break. No more tournaments. No more fights. He wanted to focus on other things, only spar with Johnny and the guys, practice kata with Mr. Miyagi sometimes. He wanted to let karate fall to a sometimes hobby.

He was more excited to be playing soccer when he got back. Their first practice was coming up.

Johnny nodded putting the book back. "Where's the kids section?" he asked.

Daniel frowned, but pulled his hand out of Johnny's back pocket and sighed leading the way. It was sweet. But he couldn't flirt in the kids section.

They made their way down to a basement to a large room with a lower ceiling and tiny bookcases. There was a small stage and colorful art on the walls. In the back, there were taller shelves and Johnny beelined over there.

"Hello, can I help you?"

The woman looked at the two of them with a barely disguised frown.

"I'm trying to decide whether or not I want to get a library card here," Johnny said perusing the shelf, not looking at her.

"Oh!" she said then walking away, heading to her desk, going through the drawers, and returning with a flyer for adult learning classes.

"Oh, no," Daniel said shaking his head. "He reads awfully big books all the time. Boring books. He's a nerd, I know he doesn't look like it, so I see how you got there. He's thinking of babysitting my baby cousins and is judging your bedtime story options."

"I'm not judging-" Johnny said looking away for the first time from the books to look at Daniel. "Did you call me a nerd?"

Daniel laughed softly.

She frowned. "We have a great collection of books."

"I didn't say you didn't..." Johnny said looking between the two of them. "I'm sorry I didn't mean to insuiate, I just was going to make a donation and I was trying to decide which section to make the donation towards. The nonfiction section is good, so I thought I'd check the kid's section next."

"A donation?" she asked.

"You nerd," Daniel said with a fond smile.

"Why do you keep calling me a nerd? I am not a nerd."

"You are a nerd."

"Again, I apologize. We live in LA, his family is here, we're probably going to visit once? Maybe more a year, and I already brought ten books from LA to here for this weekend and I thought if I paid for a library card for here then next time I wouldn't have to bring too many books with me. Instead I could just swing by, check out books for myself and then books to read to the kids and then return them and head home. They're enjoying the book I'm reading them now, but that's lucky. I'm not always carrying a good book for any age, let alone one that's story time worthy. There's like over ten kids and it worked well last night so I thought I'd prepare for next time."

Next time.

Daniel's insides turned to warm goo.

If they weren't in the kids section, if they wasn't a lady standing right there judging them Daniel would do his absolute hardest to pin Johnny against a stack and kiss him until he was breathless.

Instead he just squeezed his hand.

It was a poor consolation prize for what he wanted but it was better than nothing.

"We don't usually give out library cards to people who don't live in the area,"

"Right, that's why I'd buy one," Johnny said. "Is there someone I could talk to about that?"

She looked thoughtful then nodded. "Follow me."

They followed her to the kid's circulation desk and she picked up the phone.

"You were judging," Daniel whispered.

"Was it like this when you were little? Which book was your favorite?" Johnny asked, ignoring his point.

He was right.

Johnny was judging his childhood library. Snobby nerd. Of all the things to judge it was the library? Not the local cafes or restaurants?

Daniel judged the food of LA hard, and the public transit. Johnny was focusing on libraries. Though if he remembered correctly last time it was also the YMCA karate classes they watched. Johnny had said Mr. Miyagi was better. But that at was a given.

"My parents read the frog and the toad books to me. I liked those. It hasn't really changed," Daniel said looking around, rubbing his thumb over Johnny's knuckles.

It was kind of weird being back. He hadn't been down there since he'd been a kid. He remembered going with Louie Jr. to story time and sitting on that rug and how scratchy it was.

He remembered puppet shows and snacks.

He remembered his dad kneeling down with him holding out books and asking him, "How about this one?" His dad always had such a better eye for books Daniel would like.

Johnny gently bumped into his shoulder and Daniel looked at him.

He wondered if Johnny had done the same thing. At his libraries in LA had his mother dropped him off, knowing it was a safe location while she was busy? Like his parents had done? Had Laura wandered around with him picking out books?

"How about you? Did you go to the library a lot as a kid?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah. I got the calendar for events and would go a lot, especially if there were snacks. Mom also would check out books to read at night. She read the Hobbit to me and the Lord of the Rings books."

Daniel knew those were nerdy. Louie Jr. had read them and talked about them for hours. Elves and shit. No wonder Johnny was such a nerd. Those also weren't short books either.

"And The Princess Bride."

Daniel did not know that one.

"That one is one of her favorites. She read it so much that I think I memorized it. At least for awhile. It's been awhile since I reread it."

Pretty nerd mom with a pretty nerd son.

"Okay, so do either of you know where the main circulation desk is? Near the media section?" the woman said hanging up the phone.

"I do," Daniel said.

"Okay, the head of the library will meet you there."

"Thank you," Johnny said.

Daniel turned on his heels letting go of Johnny's hand, heading back up the stairs.

He paused looking back at Johnny and grinned when Johnny realized he'd stopped and dragged his gaze back up to see that Daniel had caught him. He turned bright red and looked away. Daniel laughed, too loud for the library, but managed to get it to quiet pleased giggles.

"Don't," Johnny whispered when they reached the main floor. "please don't."

"Don't what? I don't mind," Daniel said hooking his arm through Johnny's. "I mean actually I encourage it."

His ears were so red. They made their way to the counter and Daniel barely listened as the head librarian and Johnny talked.

He was being good. He'd be good. But his mind was spinning.

He usually was so focused on looking at Johnny that he'd never thought that maybe Johnny got distracted looking at him.

Oh he could use that. But how?

He'd have to run some experiments. Maybe he'd need to go shopping. Buy lots of shorts. He'd have to keep an eye on Johnny, see how he reacted. He never thought he had before, but he reacted...quietly. When Daniel wasn't looking. Or was lost in thought. He wondered how many looks he'd missed?

Maybe it was a bit silly. But he was pleased and really really want to grab Johnny and find a quiet secluded place. So far this trip was torture. Maybe they'd go straight to Moshe and Tristen's when they got home before going to Nonnia and Nonnio's.

He needed something. He'd take pretty much anything at this point.

It was a little quieter when they got back, less chaotic, but there was no chance to sneak off now. One of his great aunts had arrived and looked like she was already gone over the deep end. She was talking loud and fast about something and Daniel found a spot on the floor gently tugging Johnny down next to him.

Almost immediately, gifts began.

Johnny shifted uncomfortably next to Daniel.

"I don't have-" Johnny whispered.

Daniel's great aunt handed Nonnio a box.

Daniel squeezed Johnny's hand. "Your present is your presence."

He didn't look convinced. He didn't look comfortable. He looked...it didn't look good.

His hand in Daniel's was sweaty but cold. Clammy. Was...was he freaking out? Over a gift? Over not having a gift? Why would he-He remembered how Johnny struggled to come into the apartment. The way he jumped up to help whenever he could. All the times that when he invited Johnny ahead of time he came with something for his mom. Wine, nice cheese, local specialties. He always had something.

Sid. It had to be fucking Sid. Every action Johnny had with people, with large groups of people was a transaction. A service or a gift. He wasn't welcome anywhere without it. Not with strangers.

Fuck. He hadn't even-

Oh no.

This was like throwing Johnny straight into the deep end without any prep wasn't it?

Sure Johnny had watched the kids, but that wasn't for Nonnio.

Daniel had worried it'd be awkward, he didn't think it'd be stressful.

He didn't think it'd freak Johnny out.

Daniel didn't have anything for Nonnio either to give Johnny to give Nonnio. He hadn't gotten anything at the mall. He'd been too upset and Nonnio had been adamant that their gift was just themselves. But Daniel hadn't explained that earlier. That the flight ticket out had been the gift. That he truly just liked their company. The gifts weren't necessary.

Daniel watched as his great aunts wine glass wobbled and her eyes swept across the room and landed on Johnny with a sudden sharpness.

Oh no.

Oh hell no.

"Hey Johnny," Daniel whispered.

He was listening but he wasn't speaking. He remembered Johnny on the beach in tears because Daniel had said he was worth more than a trophy. Something that should've been obvious. Of course he didn't think his presence was worth more than a gift. He hadn't believed his life was worth more than a stupid plastic trophy. And that was fucking Kreese. And they were working on it. But this...Johnny had fallen on old habits. Jumping when spoken to, offering to help, it was probably why he disappeared so much and then Daniel would find something fixed around Nonnio and Nonnia's apartment.

Sid had that awful neither seen or heard policy.

Was the whole weekend just fucking torture for Johnny?

What had he done?

He could see it. Great Aunt Elda was going to ask Johnny where his gift was and it wasn't going to be good.

She didn't know.

They didn't know that was a house of cards that was constantly in the process of healing and that this was a sore wound still trying to scab over.

She was going to jab right at it and ask what it was.

"What about blondie?"

Daniel shifted forward, he was going to start a fight. He was gonna-

"Let him alone."

"He's done plenty."

"Be nice to Johnny."

"He's cool, aunt Elda."

"Elda hon, he's already done plenty you just weren't here."

"Don't make the poor boy feel bad about it. We asked him not to bring anything."

"His name's Johnny aunt Elda. Not blondie."

"How many glasses have you had so far?"

The clamoring was loud and Daniel blinked in surprise, then looked at Johnny.

His head was bowed and he hadn't noticed.

He probably wouldn't notice anything.

Shutting down.

No one was paying attention.

He leaned in close and bit Johnny's ear, gently tugging, slipping his arms around his waist.

"You know, aunt Elda is meant to be ignored, especially four glasses in. I'm sorry I didn't realize how hard this would be for you. But I'm 100% serious. So just listen to me okay? You put too much on yourself. Nonnia and Nonnio have a policy. New people only bring themselves. Family that doesn't live close only bring themselves. Nonnia and Nonnio would prefer to see our pretty faces rather than us sending a gift. They like hugs and seeing people in person. They like feeding people. So you being here is more important, it's more precious than any gift you could've brought with you. I know that's difficult, I know this is very hard, but I'm not lying. You might not have noticed but Nonnio gets lonely and you hanging out with him, even just reading nearby made him so happy. Like he's that easy to please. He'll probably talk about it for a long time. More than any scarf he gets today. The only reason Moshe and Tristen give Nonnia and Nonnio gifts is because they've lived across the hall for decades and they went nearly a decade before getting a gift. They're still Nonnia and Nonnio's favorite because they come over a lot. Now I'm in a lucky position of being pretty high up on the favorite list, but I mean come on, why wouldn't I be? Very lovable right?"

He saw the smallest twitch of a smile.

"But oh man, they also really like you. Ma said Nonnia made your sweater before we were dating. I can't believe that. Like how'd she know? I think Nonnia has- oh what's that mental thing where you can see the future? She can do that. No clue how or why but she started that sweater before you met. No idea how she found out your size. But like I was wrong okay? You didn't get the sweater because they like you with me, but because they like you. Sure they like us together, but you're cool. They like you on your own. And man that's a bigger compliment. Which means the whole not gift thing, the whole guest thing, which I get you struggle with being a guest- I did catch you doing Moshe and Tristen's dishes this morning you weirdo, it's all real. It's not a lie or a trick. And I know that's hard for you right? You don't have to win them over. They're trying to win you over. They want you to visit often. Heck even by yourself they'd be happy, but please let's come together huh? I'd get too jealous if you got to eat all of the good food without me," Daniel said pressing in close. "Plus after the realization I had yesterday I really don't want to give up any time I've got with you. I'm thinking when we get home, we'll spend time with our friends but maybe a lot of time at home, let's spend with just us huh?"

Johnny was probably thinking about dinners and watching TV and reading. But Daniel specifically meant their bedroom. But whatever worked to pull him back.

"Jeez, sorry. I didn't know. Sorry blondie."

"Johnny," Nonnio said. "His name is Johnny."

"Right, sorry."

"We're already deep in debt to that boy, so please be nicer to him."

"Seriously?"

"Yes, he's been very kind, and we like him. Right Tesero?"

"Correct."

"What's he do?"

"Oh! I know the answer to that!" one of the girls said jumping up and darting out of the room.

"Karate and works in the tree shop with Daniel."

"Oh, another karate kid. How many of those do we have now?" Aunt Elda asked.

"Just the two I think. Johnny and Daniel."

"Wait, when did we get Johnny?"

"Almost a year ago."

"Was he here?"

"No he lives in California."

"Ah, doesn't Daniel also live in California?"

"Yes."

"So who does Johnny belong to?"

"That is a loaded question," Nonnio said with a deep frown.

"Daniel," Nonnia said.

"Tesero!"

"What? Elda, they're a match set."

Elda squinted at them. "Lucille adopted one? I thought she was struggling with money? Didn't she lose her job?"

"Oh, we really dropped the ball on keeping you in the loop huh?"

"Lucille is doing okay. She got a new job."

"Thanks to Johnny and his friends," Lucille said. "I didn't adopt Johnny, well he's family. But Aunt Elda he's-"

"My boyfriend," Daniel said.

"Oh, why didn't anyone say so? Why's it always got to be 50 questions?"

"Aunt Elda, that's because you don't pick up the phone. You're behind on like a years worth of news because-"

"I'm a busy woman. It hasn't been a problem until now. Up until now the family news was stuff I could digest in yearly increments."

"Well a lot has happened this year."

"Okay, so Daniel got a boyfriend, who you already dolt on and made him a sweater-"

"From before they started dating."

"What? Why?"

Nonnia sighed pinching the bridge of her nose. "I really need you all to just call more often, so I don't have to do this over and over again."

Daniel heard footsteps approaching and the girl stopped in front of them turning and holding a familiar magazine in her hands.

Daniel's heart sank. He'd been 100% sure he'd left that at home, but now looking at it in her hands it was sinking down to 70%.

What was wrong with him?

"This is you right Johnny?" she asked.

Johnny looked up, then at the pictures of himself and he looked startled for half a second before turning to look at Daniel.

He knew that look.

Did you bring those magazines with you? Seriously?

"I didn't!" Daniel said a little squeakier than he meant.

"Uh yeah, a friend's family works with the magazine. I've been doing it for a couple of years."

"I know," she said with a grin. "This isn't my copy either, this is Nonnia's."

Daniel didn't like that. Didn't like that at all. Why did Nonnia-?

At least it wasn't his.

He tilted his head, to look past his cousin at his grandmother who was whispering to Elda, trying to quickly and quietly fit a years worth of drama into quick whispers, but Elda wasn't responding quietly.

"I know that."

"Oh. I didn't know that. No one did anything? Oh good."

"Seriously?"

"What the hell!"

"No!"

"Really?"

"Good for her."

"Oh, is she here too? No? Why not? If you're going to adopt one you might as well adopt the whole family right?"

"Oh, they're what? What the hell is a Cobra Kai? No no I get the cobra part. That's a snake. But kai? Oh, yeah I don't get that. Oh there's four more of them huh? Why aren't they here? You haven't met them yet? Why not? You're legs aren't broken. You can still drive. You just said he's come here twice. Why don't you go there then? Oh yeah see even four glasses in I'm smarter then you two."

"Hmm. What's that?"

"Tree huh?"

"Daniel's got shit luck huh? Sorry kiddo."

"Good on him."

"I see."

"Oh really? I'd like to see that, oh is that it, let me see that magazine. So you called up the publisher and they gave you his measurements? Sneaky," Elda said laughing and flipping through the pages after Daniel's cousin passed it over. "Whose Ken?"

Daniel stared at Nonnia and Great Aunt Elda in shock then turned to Johnny who relaxed beside him a little.

"I have no clue where she got that," Daniel whispered.

"Oh, Nonnio told me," Johnny said.

He knew?!

"You knew?!"

"Nonnio explained the sweater yesterday," Johnny said looking down at it with a warm smile. "I like it, it's very cozy."

At least he was settling, the panic or stress, the spiral seemed to be fading.

He was still stiff though. Too bad they hadn't brought the bonsai with them. He had a feeling that would've helped. Anchored him.

Daniel pushed down the questions he had. All hundreds and thousands of them and pressed in close again.

He hoped it helped. It helped when he was sleeping.

He couldn't help himself he had to ask.

"Did Nonnio explain why Nonnia has that magazine?"

Johnny shifted to press his cheek against the top of Daniel's head, arm hooking around him. "You mentioned it to them. So they got curious."

"I did?"

"Apparently you talked about me a lot in your calls to them."

Daniel shifted uncomfortably.

Had he?

He tried to remember his calls home.

He hadn't liked calling home.

He hadn't liked explaining how everything was going. Not at first. But then he supposed with the guys and Johnny taking him out every weekend to do fun things...he probably did talk about that.

"Apparently you told them mundane stuff like you didn't think I liked celery."

Daniel's face burned.

Had he-had he really just talked non-stop about Johnny? Celery?

He did remember that though.

Johnny always ate all the food on his plate unless one of his friends wanted it. He didn't waste food. But that'd been the first day he'd watched Johnny struggle to eat something. Slowly eating them with a frown on his face. He'd thought Johnny was one of those kids who was picky. But then he realized it went with everything else. Wordlessly suffering. He'd taken a few off his plate and Johnny had looked so grateful.

Daniel remembered how badly he'd wanted to kiss him then. He'd thought he was so easy to please. He'd nearly leaned over in the cafeteria to kiss him. Now he kind of wished he had. Because Johnny had liked him then.

Nonnio opened up a few more presents and Daniel listened to Johnny's breath, felt his steady heart beat and tried not to think about how easy it was to tell that Daniel liked Johnny from the start. How obvious it'd been to everyone but Johnny and for a time, Daniel himself.

They had dinner, all sitting at the big table his Nonnio and Nonnia loved.

Johnny sat next to him, all polite poise, a little glittery and sparkly from a project he'd done with the kids while Daniel had helped set up.

Maybe one day he'd relax. Or maybe it was too engrained. But he could try to throw him off balance by putting his hand on Johnny's thigh.

It was what he'd wanted, what he'd been craving for so long. Ever since his mother had packed them up their rickety Chevrolet Chevelle Malibu to move across the country.

He had missed it. Missed listening to his cousins talk about school, about family things, about how comfortable it was, how easy. But he was itching to go home.

It was a weird realization.

He'd been wanting this, exactly this and now that he had it it turned out it wasn't it.

He wanted those breakfast mornings with all of his friends crowding into their apartment to talk.

He wanted to sit at Mr. Miyagi's table with Sato and Yukie and listen to them playfully bicker. Watching as they worked to heal decades of pain, of lonliness and missing one another and the glimpses he caught of them, what he thought they must've been like once upon a time before Mr. Miyagi left. Three best friends finally reunited.

He missed the girls, Ali playfully teasing him about Johnny. Kumiko's warm smile, Jessica's laughter when she was joking with the guys. He missed the shop, he missed his car, he missed the Avanti and tacos at Abuella's and hell, he kind of missed Chozen.

He'd realized California was home last time he'd come to Newark. But he hadn't realized how much it'd replaced his home. Now that his mom was in California too.

It wasn't a constant craving anymore.

It was like something had settled into place. A realization that he'd grown up, become someone different since the last time he'd been home. That nothing had changed but he had. He'd changed a lot.

He looked at Johnny eating arancini di riso, tuscan chicken, and filetto di pomodoro, the way he kept tucking his hair behind his ears. The way he listened, the kids, aunt Elda talking to him when they could, fighting to talk to him.

Daniel wanted to kiss that ear, wanted to whisper in his ear, take all that attention he was giving everyone else for himself. But he could tell, they were finally being charmed, finally realizing how nice it was to have his attention on them.

It wasn't as good as Daniel got it, and he felt a little superior, that he knew what it was like to have Johnny's undivided attention, all his focus, a relaxed Johnny who was comfortable with him.

Daniel wrapped an arm around Johnny's back, letting his fingers trail up his spine, running his fingers, a ghost of a touch, wanting to feel the softness of his longer hair. Johnny had mentioned wanting to cut it and Daniel feared it was the one thing he agreed with Chozen on. He liked it. He didn't want it cut. Let it grow out. Just a little more. More for Daniel to touch, to feel how soft it was, to play with while Johnny was falling asleep.

He was ready to go home the next day.

Ready to fly home, ready to curl up in his bed with Johnny.

Ready to walk through their own space, to soak up the quiet of it all. To taste Johnny's skin on his tongue.

The cake his grandmother made was delicious and Moshe and Tristen had brought over the gelato they had and shared it. It was perfect.

Johnny was talking, smiling and charming.

Daniel got an idea, his gelato was going to melt while he was politely listening.

"Johnny," he whispered.

Johnny turned.

"Ah."

"Ah?" Johnny repeated confused.

Daniel grinned slipping the spoonful of gelato into his mouth. It reminded him of cooking, of Johnny walking by but stopping to taste test something. He also just liked putting things in Johnny's mouth.

Johnny must've caught something Daniel didn't say because he turned away a little pink.

"It's good right? Gelato?"

"Yes," Johnny said, hand over his mouth.

Maybe he'd buy some, see if they sold any in LA. They had to right?

Daniel shut the door behind him, finally free of cousins and family and dinner. Finally, in the room they were staying in at Moshe and Tristen's.

"Let's try this again," he said slipping his hands up under Johnny's sweater.

He already knew the deal. Try to be quiet, but it was more of a challenge to see if he could make Johnny make sound while staying quiet himself.

He bit his lower lip, he wasn't sure if he could but he'd for sure try, he refused to give up.

This was the most exciting challenge he'd been given and he hated that it'd been interrupted the night before. Even if it'd been precious and adorable.

Johnny's skin was warm under the soft sweater and Daniel squeezed his pecs. Usually he didn't like to be too telling that that was his goal, that he liked touching Johnny's pecs but he didn't want to waste time tonight. He was going to go straight for what he wanted and that was squeezing at Johnny's chest and pushing him up against a wall, kissing him.

Johnny's arms snaked around his waist and down into the back pockets of his jeans.

Daniel grinned. Maybe Johnny had been wanting to do that all day too. At least since the library. He'd tease him about it later. After they were sated and curled up in bed together.

He ground his hips against Johnny's pulling away from the kiss to listen to him gasp. He wondered how much weight he could hold himself. Could he hold Johnny up between him and the wall? He wanted to try.

He let a hand drop down, pulling one of Johnny's legs up and over his own hip, testing.

He had been able to lift Johnny up off the ground awhile back, just a little, and with the wall taking a lot of his weight it should be-

There was a knock.

"No," Daniel said.

"Cuz!"

"No," Daniel groaned letting his head fall against Johnny's neck. "I hate my family."

"You don't," Johnny said, he was smiling.

How was he amused? How was he fine?

"Daniel!"

Johnny rested his head against the wall and laughed, carefully pulling his leg out of Daniel's grip and lifting his hands to Daniel's hand on his chest, hands gently around his wrist, guiding one out of his sweater.

"Let's go see what they want."

"We're doing this, exactly this way again later."

Johnny gave him a quick kiss.

Daniel sighed looking at where Johnny's sweater was all rucked up and gave another squeeze then reluctantly pulled away.

Johnny fixed his sweater.

Daniel supposed this was better then yesterday. They hadn't gotten as far...kind of.

He glanced in the mirror. He looked a little disheveled but not in a way he cared about. He checked that Johnny was okay and then pulled the door open.

Christopher had brought friends. They stood as a group outside their door and as soon as Daniel opened it they beelined straight for Johnny.

"We didn't get our story."

"Oh, uh, right, sorry," Johnny said turning and digging around for his book. "Want me to come back to Nonnio and Nonnia's to read to you?"

The kids were climbing onto the bed and Daniel had a bad feeling.

"You can't sleep here," Daniel said.

"We're not going to, we're just going to enjoy the story from here."

Daniel frowned.

Johnny looked at Daniel and Daniel shrugged.

It was fine. As long as they left.

He sat down on the edge of the bed and sighed.

Johnny opened his book and began to read.

Daniel made himself comfortable looking up at him, watching him read.

It made him nostalgic for...had it been over six months since they'd been to school together? Since those nice sunny days where Johnny had read to him their English assignments?

He'd missed that.

Oh, idea...inappropriate idea while his little cousins were around but he'd add it to the list.

Daniel nearly fell asleep himself and sat up quickly when he heard Johnny shut the book.

Johnny smiled at him warmly then turned to look past him and he frowned, not a deep frown but like a quiet sigh.

Daniel pushed himself up and followed his gaze.

They'd all fallen asleep.

Every last one of them. In their bed.

Damn it.

If he tried to wake them up.

If he tried to kick them out his aunts and uncles would yell at him.

That was their bed now.

"What do we do now?" Johnny asked.

"Sleep in the living room?"

"You going to be okay on the floor?" Johnny asked gathering up the things he'd need after his shower.

"I'd rather that then sleeping on the floor here. We will for sure get stepped on."

Johnny nodded, gathering up his things and walking past him towards the door, then he stopped, turned back and kissed his cheek before heading off to shower and get ready for bed.

Daniel turned back to his bed. All his cousins sleeping peacefully.

He gathered up his things, changed into his pajamas and headed out to find the linen closet. He dug out bedding and found a spot in the living room. He moved aside the coffee table and that seemed to be enough space. He set down bedding and pillows.

Next time they came home Johnny had to do story time. All kids had to have story time in their room or else they'd ruin Daniel's evening plans.

They had to stay at a hotel. Somewhere where they could have privacy. If anyone asked this would be the #1 reason, being kicked out of their bed by a bunch of kids.

They had to bring Johnny's warm winter things and sweater.

Unless it was summer.

He had to let Johnny bring a small gift. He'd talk to Nonnio and Nonnia about that one.

Daniel sunk his head back against the pillow with a sigh.

Why'd he even bother to bring condoms and lube?

It wasn't going to happen before they left.

But he would challenge Johnny later to read to him, see if he could keep reading to him while he sucked him off.

He wanted to see if Johnny would be able to keep focused on the story.

He wanted to lock the door when they got home and never leave. What was he supposed to do at school without Johnny?

Learn. He was supposed to learn things he wanted to learn and hopefully make new friends...but he'd miss looking at Johnny, at teasing him throughout the day, riling him up and watching him go, because he loved to watch him go.

He heard soft footsteps and looked up at Johnny who looked around and spotted the makeshift bed and Daniel in the dim light.

"There you are," he whispered leaning down and kissing Daniel before lifting up the blankets to join him.

"I'm sorry," Daniel said.

"Huh?"

"I really thought it'd be better. This trip. That my family would be...cooler. I guess I should've sent out a newsletter or something entitled, Daniel and Johnny no longer enemies, now boyfriends."

Johnny laughed pulling Daniel close.

"I'm sorry you got...kind of hazed. There's all this stuff I didn't notice or think of until I saw it happening and it pissed me off. But you won over a lot of my family all on your own, so I hope...I hope you're okay and if you're not, you'll tell me right?" Daniel asked gently brushing hair from Johnny's eyes.

"I think... your set up is hard for me. Showing up without something. I've always had something to give or try to give. I don't know what to do with myself otherwise. I don't feel comfortable."

"Because of Sid?" Daniel whispered.

Johnny pressed his head against Daniel's shoulder. "Yeah, probably. I think if I don't have anything to give, then what's the point of letting me in?"

His voice was shaky.

"My family is not like that. Hell most people aren't like that. It's not some transaction. You don't have to give a gift to be allowed through the door. You don't have to supply a service. You don't have to play Santa Claus every time you visit or see anyone. You, Johnny Lawrence, are good enough. Like okay, the guys, you didn't bring something over to their house every time you went to visit them?"

"I tried to, as a way of saying thank you for inviting me over, for being my friend," Johnny said. "I bought their parents flowers."

"Johnny, they just wanted to spend time with you you didn't...have to...you," Daniel sighed he didn't know how to express the frustration he felt. Not at Johnny but at the situation, that engrained feeling. "You're worth more than you think. So much more. But next time, if it'll help we can bring flowers. Not a bunch, like one bouquet. Okay? And you can tell my grandparents what it means, but you don't need to get some for everyone, because everyone can enjoy it with my grandparents. You don't owe anyone anything. Hell I still owe you. I'm still very deep in kissing debt."

Johnny laughed softly a little watery but he pulled back and kissed Daniel. "We'll have to work on that."

"Hell yes we do, and so much more. I'm falling behind on my payments."

"And interest."

"There's interest on this debt? That was not in the fine print."

"It was."

"Where?"

"It was implied."

"I'm never going to get out. This is going to kill my credit score....actually it might boost it. Credit scores are weird."

"They factor in kissing debt?"

"Might as well," Daniel said gently kissing him.

Behave. He had to behave. This wasn't a room with a locked door. There was a small mob worth of little cousins in their bedroom, there were godfathers around somewhere, his mother.

He gently brushed his thumbs across Johnny's cheeks.

He'd had a feeling he'd been crying and he had. His cheeks were wet.

He kissed him deeply.

He wished he could heal everything quickly. That he could protect Johnny from any harm. He wished he could say everything he felt as eloquently and as passionately as he felt it. He wished he could show Johnny the Johnny he saw and how loved he was and how he didn't need to hide behind gifts or flowers or actions to be welcome. But if it helped then that's what they'd do. And it'd be nice. Nice to go to a flower shop with Johnny to pick out flowers for his grandparents. Because he wasn't saying no to next time. Johnny was bravely facing his fears like he always did.

Johnny shifted beside him, pulling away and Daniel wanted to complain, to ask where he was going but then he was leaning over him, kissing him, a warm quick kiss before shuffling lower and Daniel nearly bolted up, nearly grabbed Johnny and demanded to know what the hell? All this time, all this talk about being quiet and being careful and appropriate times and places and- He quickly covered his mouth with his hand.

This wasn't fair.

He was the one who had to be quiet.

How was he supposed to be quiet? When Johnny was between his legs using his mouth like that? And he'd been crying? Seriously?

The one time Daniel decided he probably shouldn't, that he was going to just suck it up and wait until he got home and that was when Johnny decided to take his sad pretty face, he didn't like that, but Johnny was adamant with his tongue and Daniel swallowed down a moan. He dug his heel into the bedding, the floor, trying to ground himself, trying to be quiet, trying to focus on breathing and not Johnny's warm mouth, trying to stay still, feeling Johnny's hands gently on his hip, his thigh, giving himself more space.

They were going to talk about this later. Talk about how this apparently wasn't obscene, but Johnny thought doing it in the shop was. Daniel was going to dig around, find out why. Because if the line was just the difference in the act, then Daniel would get revenge. He wanted to touch Johnny's hair, wanted to particpate somehow, but it was dark and he feared he might accidentally poke Johnny in the eye or something. That'd be his luck for the day.

He lifted the blanket, looking in the dim light at Johnny, focused, then Johnny's eyes met his and that damn smirk.

He knew.

He knew what he was doing. He knew that Daniel couldn't stay quiet if he did that. He knew and he looked so satisfied about it. Like he'd won. It had been a competition. And Daniel had lost. Daniel had let family run him out of his goal and Johnny had seen an opportunity and had taken it and fine, fine. Johnny won. This time. He wouldn't win next time. When they got home Daniel was going to get his revenge and make Johnny so loud that their neighbors complained despite the soundproofing.

He didn't want to let the blanket go, gripping it tightly in a fist while he watched, trying to breathe, trying to remember, trying to be quiet, not used to trying to be quiet and struggling, soft sounds escaping unbidden and he hoped that no one was around, that no one was awake, that he was quiet enough to not be heard by anyone but Johnny.

Daniel wanted to be home so badly. He needed to be home. He dreamed of their apartment door, of Johnny looking up at him from their bed, the way his hair would fan out, the way he'd moan when Daniel was in him.

Daniel let go of his mouth. A terrible idea, but he had to. he reached out, down, gently touching Johnny, brushing damp hair from his face and tucking it behind his ear. It smelled like Johnny's shampoo under the blanket, the kind that made his hair silky and soft and smelled nice and damn he was too far away to bury his face in it, but he wanted to, he wanted to press his face in close, but Johnny wasn't going to stop until Daniel had nothing left to give.

Maybe he'd been as disappointed as Daniel had been the day before, today too. Maybe he had been looking forward to spending time together, a stress relief, maybe it was what he needed too. Daniel couldn't hold the blanket up any more, falling back and grabbing a pillow to cover his face, to try and muffle the sound of his moan. To hide while he caught his breath again.

Johnny slid back up along him, carefully tugging the pillow out of his hands, out of his tight grip.

"What was that?" Daniel whispered.

"I thought it was fairly clear."

"I know that bit, but what about all the being quiet and respectful and-"

Johnny shifted down to lay on his side next to him, "You didn't like it?"

Didn't like it? Who was he? Of course he liked it. He rolled onto his side. JDaniel wrapped his arms around him, curling in close.

"Yes," Daniel said.

Maybe he'd get his revenge now. Just a little. See how Johnny could handle it. Slipping his leg between Johnny's, smiling when he felt how hard he was. He'd take care of that, see how Johnny could stay quiet.

"Hey now," Johnny whispered. "That look is-"

"Says you," Daniel said with a soft breathy laugh.

"Your hand is cold."

"It'll warm up."

"Daniel."

"Hmm?"

"Hotel next time?"

"Fuck yes."

"I'll remember to read to the-uh-kids."

"Shh,"

"Daniel."

Mmm. He liked that, leaning closer and biting Johnny's ear ever so gently.

"You're the ones who made the rules," Daniel said softly in his ear. "I'm just reminding you. The agreement was to be quiet."

Johnny's hands were on him, holding on tightly, pressing his face into Daniel's shoulder. It'd be quick, even though there was so much else Daniel wanted to do. He didn't want to chance it. He didn't want to push his luck. Plus most of his stuff was in a toiletry bag in the bedroom.

"You can be as loud as you want when we get home. I promise," Daniel whispered.

He could feel Johnny's uneven breath against his skin.

He kissed whatever was nearest him, Johnny's damp hair, his ear, gently guiding him, surprised he wouldn't have noticed if he hadn't been so close, surprised at how quiet Johnny had been. He didn't like that. He preferred Johnny louder, relaxed. Not the quiet shudder and hitched breath.

Johnny won though. Which was one was quieter was definitely Johnny, but Daniel never wanted to try that again. He already was too quiet, too withdrawn. He hoped that he hadn't accidentally asked Johnny to do something, to be quiet that would be like the other things, reverting him to bad old habits. But he couldn't check until they got home. He'd make sure if it was a thing, it wouldn't stick around. Less than 24 hours, and then they'd be home. One nights good sleep, breakfast, and then that was it, they'd be home and he could start fixing any damaged he'd accidentally made.

In the morning they had breakfast early at Nonnio and Nonnia's. Pancakes and eggs, and bacon that his Nonnia made. It was quiet. The kids had gone as a hoard to get donuts down the street with a tired uncle. Tristen and Moshe joined them and Lucille across the hall for breakfast, talking softly about comforting things. It felt unreal. To be going home. But Daniel was ready. Though he'd miss his Nonnia. He'd miss the snow. He'd miss his family and his godfathers and Newark.

Moshe and Tristen volunteered to drive them to the airport and they said goodbye. Johnny got hugged by all his little cousins who refused to hug him. Daniel threatened to come by himself next time and they complained, whined, one gave him a look like an adult would say Don't screw this up. Which made Daniel laugh. He got his hugs though.

Johnny didn't hold on tightly or stiffly to the door on the drive to the airport, just watched the scenery pass as everyone talked, holding Daniel's gloved hand in his own.

At the airport his godfathers gave him tight hugs telling him to come back soon. Hugging his mother so tight that she lifted up off the ground and surprising Johnny with a hug as well much to Daniel's delight.

The flight was good. Better than the flight there. He didn't spend it arguing with his mother, just talking about all the things they'd learned, about family and things they noticed and missed. Like LA, how good it'd be to be home again.

He was so happy when they walked out of the airport at LAX, on the drive home, feeling the warm sun on his skin. They dropped his mom off and then headed home. Daniel's hand on Johnny's leg, tracing random designs along his thigh. He remembered his goal to find shorts as soon as possible. Nice shorts, and to see Johnny's response. But he had other things planned for when they got home.

There was something about being home that was such a relief but also lonely. Quiet. But it was nice to be in their own place, carrying their stuff into the apartment. It was nice to wrap his arms around Johnny and pull him close, bury his face against his chest.

"Welcome home," Johnny said.

Daniel smiled. He always said that. Every time they walked through that door, every time Daniel walked through it at least.

He'd told everyone the wrong time. That they'd be home that night, rather than that morning. But the time difference made it easier. And now, finally, they were alone. No kids. No cousins. No aunts. No uncles.

It was a relief, like a breath of fresh air to just be. As much as he loved them. He was even happier to be home. But he could be even happier. He took Johnny's hand gently pulling him towards the bedroom.

"I told everyone that we wouldn't be home till tonight," Daniel said. "We've got all afternoon. Just you. Just me."

Johnny stopped walking about halfway through their apartment and Daniel frowned.

Why was he stopping?

The universe hated him, didn't it?

He turned back to look at Johnny wondering what was wrong.

Maybe he'd gotten sick?

No way. His Nonnia had made breakfast. No one in the history of time had gotten sick off of LaRusso cooking.

Johnny's hands came to the sides of his face and he kissed him.

Oh.

Johnny's arm hooked around his waist pulling him in close.

Oh.

Daniel kissed him back. Bed. So close.

Johnny pulled away.

Now.

He stepped back, pulling Johnny with him to the bedroom and this time Johnny followed. Daniel dropped his bag at the door, taking Johnny's and setting it aside as well. Daniel locked the door then worked his way out of his clothes, watching Johnny follow suit.

Next time they visited his grandparents, next time they went to Newark they were staying at a hotel. They were going to be somewhere outside of walking range of little cousins and family. And he'd pick the place, he'd make sure Johnny didn't book something expensive. Something nice but sensible with thick walls and a nice bed. Maybe a bath.

Ma could stay with his godfathers but Daniel was booking a hotel so that when they left his family for the night they left. They were going to be out of reach unless it was an emergency. So that when he tried to have sex with Johnny no one would interrupt. Their time was limited before school caught up, before he moved on from the bonsai shop, before life whisked them away and kept them busy.

How many other Monday mornings could he play hooky and just have sex with Johnny?

Not enough.

He wished he'd known earlier. That they'd moved faster. They could've played hooky from school and done this instead.

The bruise he'd started a couple nights ago was fading.

He'd start there. Bring that back to life. Because here Johnny could be loud. He wouldn't stifle himself and neither would Daniel. Or at least he hoped.

He pulled Johnny close. Johnny had a stubborn look in his eyes. Mischievous.

Johnny kissed him then pulled back. Away.

He pushed Daniel down on the bed, following him down, kissing him and straddling his hips.

Daniel's brain short circuited.

Was he going to? Yes. Yes he was.

Daniel ran his hands over the tops of Johnny's thighs, entranced, looking up at him. He tucked golden blonde hair behind his ear as he started to push himself up. Daniel wasn't ready for that and pulled Johnny back down to him, kissing him, tangling his fingers in the blonde hair. Johnny had mentioned Sid had a specific place he used to send Johnny and Johnny hated it, but he hadn't gone anywhere on his own to get his hair cut...his entire life.

Daniel wanted to do it.

He also didn't want to do it. He liked how long it was.

He shouldn't be trusted.

He wanted to keep that door locked and not leave.

He took Johnny's wrist gently in his hand and kissed it looking at how Johnny responded.

He was going to make it worse.

He was going to clarify while his brain was still functioning which he doubted would be much longer.

"Are you going to ride me, Johnny?"

Johnny flushed red, leaning over to the nightstand to get the lube and condoms.

He wasn't looking at Daniel, somewhere off away.

"Yes," he said softly.

Daniel took them from Johnny.

"I said yes," Johnny said looking at him.

"I know, Let me...start it."

"I know how to do it."

Daniel pushed himself up smiling. "I know, but I missed touching you."

That firery red returned to Johnny's skin and Daniel ran his fingers gently along Johnny's spine, smiling up at him, coating his fingers and sliding one in.

He wasn't sure how he was focusing because his brain kept shorting out. Like it was failing. Too distracted by how beautiful Johnny was, how nice the view was of him like that. He'd wanted to savor it but if he did, if he took too long Johnny would take over and maybe he'd lose any chance. For the moment.

He might be able to catch Johnny off guard and do something again later, but he also wanted to lay back and enjoy.

Two. It'd be easier with two to find-yup, Johnny arched back with a warm moan, hands on Daniel's torso.

He grinned, the worry in his chest disipating. The quiet night at his godfathers hadn't stuck around.

He probably could-no, he'd let Johnny continue with his plan. For now.

Three and Johnny was looking at him with such a heated look that Daniel thought his heart might stop. He needed to find that box, asap. There? Now to get it without losing his momentum, not the sounds Johnny was making. He needed to never leave this moment. Needed to just savor the moment, savor Johnny, he didn't need to worry about the future, he didn't want to think about it or worry about it. He just wanted to enjoy the present, enjoy the way when he nodded at Johnny, the way he moaned when he started to sink down, the way he felt it in his toes.

How could he tell Johnny how he felt?

"Just like that," Daniel said hand on Johnny's thigh. He usually was doing so much more that he didn't know what to do. "You've got it."

Johnny gave him a look that said Clearly that nearly made him laugh.

How was he so lucky? All that muscle was on display as Johnny moved carefully.

"Beautiful."

His ears were red, he heard him, but he was ignoring him, focused. At least he was being careful, gentle with himself.

Daniel had been worried. He always tried to be so gentle or as gentle as he could with Johnny and feared with how stressful meeting his family had been that Johnny wouldn't be.

"Just a little more," Daniel said.

It was weird. He never would've thought this would be where he'd be. Not the view he would've ever expected he'd get to see on that beach. But it was a great view. He slid his hand up from Johnny's thigh, up along his hip and abs, to his pec. "Almost there."

Johnny stopped, turning his head towards the door.

Daniel heard footsteps the sound of the front door shutting.

Nope.

Nope.

Whoever it was was leaving.

Their door was locked.

Daniel was going to hold onto this thread.

He'd been stopped too many times the last couple of days. He let his hand trail back down and wrapped his hand around Johnny's length. Johnny looked back at him startled.

"Doors locked, no one has a key for this room. It's just you and me and at this point I don't care who hears now."

Johnny flushed red at that.

Maybe Daniel didn't fully mean that. He didn't want anyone they knew to hear. But whoever had been there was gone now. He leaned up to kiss Johnny and Johnny made a soft sound of surprise when Daniel moved, putting his hands on Daniel's shoulders to steady himself. He moved his hand. Johnny kissed him back and Daniel waited, waited for those gorgeous muscles to move. He was so steady on his knees.

He wanted Johnny to focus on him. Johnny looked at him, shifting and moving and Daniel moved his hand in time. Johnny gasped putting his hand on Daniel's wrist.

"Daniel, stop, I won't-ah"

"Please."

Johnny looked startled.

"You first," Daniel said.

Daniel wanted to find a way to tell Johnny that everything was okay. That their trip had been a success and that Johnny shouldn't ever accept anything other than love from his family. Any rudeness, well Daniel was going to send out a long newsletter or something, explain who Johnny was and for them to piss off with anything mean or negative because Johnny was his boyfriend and he was going to hold onto his hand for as long as he could and he hoped that'd be forever. He was going to be around for a long time and they needed to get used to the idea. But he also had a feeling that that'd sunk in.

He didn't want to share this. He didn't want Johnny to find someone else. He didn't want to find someone else. He wanted this to continue. He wanted Johnny in his bed, in his home, making him forget how to speak because he always knew the thing that would throw Daniel off balance, but always in the best possible way.

He wanted that smile to shine on him, he wanted that heated look that he saw more often now to only be directed at him.

He wanted this to just be theirs. There were things he let go without a fight, fights he tried to avoid, but he didn't want to let go of Johnny. He'd fight for this, to keep him.

Johnny shifted, hands on Daniel's chest, the look he was giving Daniel made his breath stutter in his own chest. If Johnny didn't hurry up then it wouldn't work the way they wanted.

Daniel ran his free hand along Johnny's abdomen, his chest watching Johnny shiver, listening to him, entranced, trying to breathe, center himself, calm himself so that Johnny would-there. Daniel let go, right behind him.

He pulled Johnny close as they both settled.

He kissed the top of Johnny's head and Johnny looked at him, tired, sweet, relaxed.

"I missed you too."

Daniel blinked, feeling his face burn.

Johnny smiled, moving himself up and kissing him while Daniel stared at him stunned. Did he mean? If he meant- then maybe just give him a minute and Daniel was pretty sure he could go again. One minute. Maybe less. And Johnny could enjoy as much as he wanted.

Johnny laughed softly.

"What's that look?"

"Let me just recover for like a minute and then I think we can-"

Johnny laughed, "You recover, I'm going to take a shower."

"No."

"Yes. I feel gross after the flight, I'm surprised you don't."

"I mean I do, but... if you want to-"

Johnny pushed himself up. "We can't hide in here all day. We will be disgusting."

"I don't mind."

"Really?"

"Okay I mind a little. Fine, you shower then I'll shower and we'll see where we are then."

Johnny smiled kissing him gently.

Daniel slumped back down onto the bed with a frown, watching as Johnny put on a robe and very carefully poked his head out of the door unlocking it and looking around, determining the coast was clear he slipped out the door, shut it and Daniel heard the shower turn on and sighed throwing an arm over his head.

He'd wanted to cuddle. Wanted to curl up next to him and just feel his breath, his heart beat, wanted to take just a beat.

He laughed softly. Was this revenge for all the times he made Johnny get up and go after? Like the beach?

At least he didn't ever leave Johnny behind. He felt left behind, lonely. But also tired. Tired from getting up early because his little cousins had run out as a hoard, surprised and entranced at having spent the night at Moshe and Tristen's, from Moshe and Tristen standing over the makeshift bed with their coffee and setting cups out for them, his mother asking him why they were sleeping on the floor in the living room, trying to be quiet to let Johnny sleep more but all the commotion woke him up and Daniel had tried so hard to let him sleep in.

It was just so comforting to watch him sleep. It was like the softest sweetest reminder of how far they'd come, because he was actually asleep, not just pretending to be asleep like he once had done. It made his heart feel so full. Gave him hope and comfort and made it hard to get out of bed, or to want to wake him up.

After awhile, having fallen asleep, Daniel woke up to a dip in the bed and a gentle drip of water. He felt disgusting, just like Johnny had mentioned as he sat up. Johnny kissed his cheek.

"Do we have any plans today?" he asked.

"Dinner. Always dinner," Daniel said groggily, getting up and heading off to shower.

He kind of hoped Johnny wouldn't get dressed. But he himself was yawning.

Everything in the bathroom was covered in condensation and the air was still steamy. But the water was nice and the pressure was good. It hadn't been great when they moved in but Johnny had fixed that first thing. He'd set up the shower shelving so that there was enough space for all of Daniel's stuff and Johnny's. He'd installed the shower curtain, fixed all the creaky doors, patched the screens in the windows and all this stuff Daniel would've just suffered through or asked the maintenance person to fix. Johnny had just done them.

Daniel thought he learned a lot from Mr. Miyagi, but really Johnny was a sponge, collecting all the lessons Daniel didn't have the time or patience for.

A part of him was a little jealous how well they got along, how easily, how unspoken everything was.

He'd watched them once, repairing something in one of the old cars on the lot and Mr. Miyagi didn't even have to ask for the tool he needed, Johnny put it in his hand automatically. But Daniel didn't know how good that was.

Was it a deep bond of two quiet peaceful men or was it a leftover need to please?

Was it part of that survival mode to anticipate the needs of others left over from Sid, or was it from Kreese?

Or both?

Daniel wanted to be that, self-sufficient. He was learning how to fix cars, he knew how to cook, he could do finance, but he couldn't fix a leaky sink, he didn't trust himself not to flood the apartment.

Johnny didn't need anyone or anything now.

Daniel worried he wasn't contributing enough, chewing on his lip.

He didn't want Johnny doing everything, didn't want him doing everything because he felt he had to.

Daniel scrubbed at his skin with a frown.

He was going to be starting school soon. Starting a new chapter. That was new people. People who didn't know about karate or Johnny or who probably hadn't been to Okinawa. Might not even have heard of it. He didn't know if it was a relief or frustration.

Everyone around him knew. Knew about Johnny. Knew about all the pain and all the struggles, all the good times and the bad.

He was getting a chance to become anyone.

He could do anything.

He could just be some guy who moved from Jersey who moved to California.

He could be just be a guy who did soccer on the weekends.

He got to choose what people would know about him.

He could keep them at bay. He could make himself successful, normal.

Normal?

What did that even mean?

Daniel hadn't known normal since he'd left Newark the first time. Doubted he'd known it before then, even longer.

His normal wasn't anyone elses. His normal was getting into fights with rich millionaires who had too much time on their hands like he was in some bad Saturday morning cartoon and he was supposed to be some superhero kid solving mysteries and stopping the bad guy, but in reality, he was just a guy trying to live his life.

A guy who badly, desperately wanted to just live his life.

He wanted to romanticize the mundane, for that to be his life.

He didn't want any more adventure.

He didn't want to seek it out.

He wanted just his morning cup of coffee in his favorite cup.

He wanted to go dancing.

He wanted to make new friends who knew nothing. And then later, maybe he'd open up. But he just wanted to be one of the guys.

He'd be the guy who went to baseball games with his classmates, or to the bar, he'd listen to people talk about their drunken hookups, and he'd laugh at their bad jokes, and he'd just exist, and then he'd go home and he'd curl up next to Johnny on the couch and watch TV and he'd make dinner and eat with him and make love.

Maybe sometimes Johnny would stop by for lunch, wait for him outside his school or his business, that red jacket and long blonde hair, leaning against the Avanti, the epitome of cool.

And maybe people would wonder. But no one would ask. And Daniel would know that the coolest guy he knew spent his time at the library reading books and cried when the cow at the sanctuary got sick, or that he liked to spend his evenings playing koi koi in a garden that would become a secret garden in Daniel's heart.

Something for him, something for the people in his life up to this point but not past it.

A place he went to spend time, peaceful time with Mr. Miyagi, to get advice on how to deal with awful bosses from him, on how to deal with mundane life issues, and no longer a desperate plea to teach him how to defend himself. How to survive.

He craved it. Just like he craved that muted smell that was filtering in but would never admit it.

Daniel laughed, rushing to finish up his shower.

He rinsed soap off his skin and hurried out, with a towel wrapped around his waist.

"Are you seriously frying baloney? Nonnio and Nonnia sent us home with so much food and that's what you're making?" Daniel asked, hands on his hips.

Johnny laughed. "I wanted to save that."

"Save it? Why?"

"I thought we could pack it for lunch for your last week at the shop. I thought it'd be comforting."

Daniel blinked back tears, that was the sweetest, thoughtful-he watched as Johnny turned, blue eyes taking him in, the towel, the wet skin and Daniel's mouth went dry. Johnny reached out and hooked an arm around him, pulling him in close and Daniel's hands flew up to catch himself, practically lifted off his feet when Johnny kissed him. Pressed close to the soft cotton of his shirt, the rough denim of his jeans and Daniel nearly told Johnny to forget about their lunch. To forget about sandwiches, that they could just go straight back to their bedroom, but then Johnny moved, lips pulling away from his and kissed his forehead. Soft and loving Daniel melted into the embrace, wrapping his arms around Johnny and staring at the baloney frying in the pan with an acceptance that that was his lunch.

They left before the sunset in the Avanti. They were having dinner with Ms. Lawrence and Daniel looked at the houses in Encino hills wondering, not for the first time what it'd be like to live there. His mom lived close, on the border, but Daniel wanted to live there on his own. He thought he'd feel like he finally made it if he put down roots there.

It was nice to be in LA again. To take comfort in the palm trees and the warm air. So different from Newark. It didn't feel like January. It didn't feel like winter. To think that morning he'd nearly slipped on a patch of ice carrying his luggage to the car. But now he was somewhere sunny and warm with clear skies was so weird.

Johnny reached over and Daniel's heart pounded expecting Johnny's hand to go to his thigh, and it did, but it was flipped up, not groping.

Daniel put his hand in Johnny's, looking over at him as he drove, wearing sunglasses and blonde hair being whipped around in the wind.

His heart ached. He loved everything so much.

Except the smog. He never even liked the smog.

But driving with Johnny? He loved that. He loved how comfortable Johnny looked, how at ease, as he drove through those streets he knew so well. Daniel knew with Johnny he'd never get lost in LA.

Laura was waiting for them when they arrived pushing open the door as they were getting out of the car.

She held out her arms and Johnny hurried, not to keep her waiting and Daniel smiled, it was cute.

The big hug he gave her, the tight hug she returned.

"Oh, I missed you so much!" she said. "How was Newark? How was the flight? Did Nonnio have a good birthday? Did you eat well? Who am I kidding it's LaRusso's it'd be a criminal offense if you didn't."

Daniel laughed softly coming up the steps a little slower. His Nonnia had made cookies expressly for Laura. She'd pulled him aside "Your great aunt is right, if we're adopting one, we're adopting them all, start with is mom. We're working on that. She's sweet, please give her these. No one can resist being pulled into our ranks when confronted with our cookies. And these are the big guns," she said tapping the top of the container.

His grandmother's cookies were amazing and Daniel had worked very hard, struggled, to not eat them on the flight over, to not sneak one that morning or afternoon.

"I missed you too," Johnny said carefully pulling away, or trying.

"Nope, one more minute," Laura said tightening her grip.

Johnny laughed, returning the tight hug.

Daniel smiled shaking his head and kissed Laura on the cheek slipping past into the house to put the cookies away and to let them have a moment.

Jessica's shoes were by the door and he wondered if she was around.

"Yo!" the red head called from the couch.

"Hey! I thought you might be here."

"I am! I wanted to see you guys. I have to head out soon, we're going to another play."

"Another play?" Daniel asked leaning over the back of the couch looking down at her.

"Yeah, Ali said she found a happy ending play so we're doing a re-do."

"I'm missing something," Daniel said.

"Oh, we took Chozen and Kumiko to a kind of sad musical. West Side Story I think? I'm not one hundred percent sure. I didn't get the brochure or see the title. We went in through the back. But Ali I guess felt bad so we're going to do a take 2 of our day out. So I think this time we're going to an opera? She got actual tickets. We're going to dress up and everything. I gotta get changed in," she looked at her watch. "Ten minutes. But I'm watching this murder story and I got to know how it ends."

Daniel laughed looking at the TV.

"Clearly it ends with someone dying."

"We're past that part. I wanna know if the guy or gal got caught," Jessica said. "Oh, I think you guys are doing take-out for dinner. Maybe get something other than pizza? We've eaten a lot of pizza. I think she's secretly sick of it. She's all smiles and says we can have whatever I want and I keep wanting pizza."

"Not sick of it yet?"

"We're trying different ones. We've almost tried every type this one place has and we're ranking them before I leave. So no pizza."

"Good to know. Are you all...getting along?" Daniel asked.

"Yes, of course! Wait, why?" Jessica asked looking up at him.

"Chozen's pretty....prickly."

Jessica laughed. "He seems like it doesn't he? But he's actually quite sweet. He's putting a lot of work into the dojo, and it's pretty much all him. I also think, I mean the guys were talking and I think maybe he's been through a lot."

Daniel sighed "He's a dick."

"Reformed."

"Yeah and how's he proven he's reformed?"

"He borrowed my jacket and took it dry cleaning before returning it."

"So? Wait the pink one?"

"Yup. That's pretty polite and unnecessary."

"He also made us all lunch yesterday."

"All? Whose all?"

"The guys, Ali, Kumiko and I."

"Where at?"

"The dojo. He's been cleaning up and there's like an apartment near it that apparently something the uh...previous owners owned. And it came with it. I think he might be planning to move in there and out of Mr. Miyagi's. It's not fully fixed yet. There need to be some repairs done. But it should be nice."

Daniel frowned.

Chozen moving out of Mr. Miyagi's would be nice.

He wouldn't feel weird every time he went over.

Or he'd feel less weird. But it kind of was weird.

"Wait so you went to this apartment?"

"Yeah the guys said they'd never been. So I assume no one knew it was part of the property. Like there's the main dojo space right, and then there's an office and a locker room, but then there's also an apartment. Kind of like a secret space. I don't know if that's creepy or not. I mean with the past owners, creepy."

"Huh. So he's staying?"

"Well yeah."

Daniel wondered if that meant Sato and Yukie were also staying. Mr. Miyagi would like that. Would Sato and Chozen live together at the dojo?

He had a whole bunch of questions that felt too nosey.

"Was it good?"

"What?" Jessica asked engrossed in her show again, about brutual murders.

"Uh the food?"

"Oh, yeah, Chozen's a great cook. Kumiko explained what everything was and everyone loved it. Dutch even asked if Chozen would teach him a few of the recipes. Which was kind of funny because Chozen got this look on his face like he couldn't understand why or how or what was happening but he agreed. So they're going to have a cooking class soon. I think Tommy was going to go too. I would, but Kumiko wants to go to this dance performance and Ali said she can get the three of us cheap tickets so we're going to do that instead."

"I'm glad everyone's getting along," Daniel said though he felt a little jealous.

A little bitter that everyone got along well and was having fun without him. While he and Johnny were out he was kind of bummed that they'd went from teasing and bickering with Chozen to hanging out with him on purpose.

Betrayed.

Jessica glanced at him and flicked his forehead.

"Hey!"

"Stop that."

"Stop what."

"I know that look."

"What look?"

"You get this stubborn self distructive streak where suddenly the world is falling but you're making a bigger deal out of everything. Chozen is a person. He's not...he's not Barnes or his friends or Silver," she said quickly rushing through the names. "He's a guy who's working hard to redeem himself and whose been nice. He knows he fucked up. Those guys, they didn't give a shit. There's a difference. And the guys...well at least Tommy's a pretty decent judge of character."

"What does that even mean?" Daniel asked rubbing his forehead.

"He says he thinks Chozen needs just a little kindness and care. Even Ms. Lawrence likes him."

"What?" Daniel squeaked.

"He came over and helped the guys with a project in the garden. Ms. Lawrence said he really just needs a little love," Jessica said picking up a can of soda and taking a sip.

"A little love," Daniel huffed. "He wants Johnny's love."

Jessica coughed on her soda looking up at Daniel.

"Seriously? That's where this is coming from?"

"What, of course seriously! He loves Johnny."

"Jealousy," Jessica said with a sigh. "You get haunted by that emotion a lot huh."

"What?"

"You have Johnny right. He loves you. So why are you worried?"

"Out of everyone telling me to chill-," Daniel said. "Should I remind you of one Elizabeth Anne Rooney?"

Jessica's frowned. "Chozen is no Elizabeth Anne Rooney."

"But you know that's what happened to you right? Someone else swooped in and-"

"My boyfriend fucked up and isn't anything like Johnny."

"Are you two still dating?" Daniel asked.

Jessica sighed. "No. We broke up again. But Daniel I didn't have what you have with Johnny. My boyfriend's eyes wandered a lot. He flirted all the time saying it was harmless fun, but it wasn't, because he couldn't stop himself. Johnny doesn't flirt with other people. Heck, I'm not sure I've seen him flirt with you."

Daniel laughed. "He does sometimes."

"He also just softly kisses you in the most loving way. I don't think you've got to worry about Chozen. There's no opening there. Unless you fuck up and make one."

She said waggling her finger at him and then heard something from the TV and turned gasping. "No way!"

"What?"

She pointed at the TV screen. "That's exactly what I feared!"

Unsolved.

"That murderer could still be out there or anyone. That's terrifying!"

"It's from one hundred years ago," Daniel said. "Whose your murderer? A vampire?"

"Oh, right. Still, those poor victims," Jessica said looking at her watch. "Oh shoot. I gotta hurry."

She jumped up, hugging Daniel. "Welcome home, nice to see you again," she said before darting off to the guest room to change.

"Daniel, what do you feel like eating for dinner?" Laura asked walking in and patting his shoulder.

He turned, she was smiling softly at him and held her arms out for a hug.

He hugged her, smelling her light sweet perfume.

"I was thinking we could order out, what sounds good?"

"Chinese?" Daniel asked.

"Sounds good to me, Johnny you okay with that?" Laura asked walking over to the kitchen. She opened a drawer and pulled out a menu.

"Sure," Johnny sat down at the island looking over the menu she passed to him.

Daniel leaned against him, arm around his shoulder looking at the menu as well.

Johnny took the pen and paper his mother got out and wrote down what he wanted then passed it to Daniel who quickly wrote down his soup and sweet and sour chicken with rice and passed it back to Laura who smiled and dialed the number with manicured nails.

Johnny turned to Daniel, shifting in the stool and wrapping his arms around Daniel's waist pulling him close.

"Mom was thinking we could watch a movie. She rented a whole bunch. So we'll catch up, see some of the updates to the garden and then a movie. Sound good?"

"Yes," Daniel said.

He wanted to kiss Johnny on the lips, a french kiss, because he looked so sweet sitting at his mothers house, at ease, comfortable and because Jessica was right, he was unnecessarily jealous over nothing. Possessive. He tried to stamp it down. He'd already spent most of his morning and afternoon enjoying his time with Johnny.

"Want to see the pond?" Laura asked. "It's not done but your friends came over saying they're pros at it and I'm pretty impressed."

Daniel stepped back from Johnny reluctantly and followed her to the sliding glass yard and outside. The pond was smaller than Mr. Miyagi's. No balance wheel would fit there but it was still nice. A bench had been put near it, one of the weeping trees was curled over it and it was full of water already and flashes of gold, white and red.

"Koi?" Johnny asked walking out and kneeling to peer into the water.

Daniel resisted the urge to push him in, shoving his hands in his pockets.

"And I got some lilies, they won't bloom yet I'm going to also get snails and tadpoles maybe a few more plants, we'll see. I think it's a good start."

"It's great Mom."

She smiled and it was so warm and fond.

"You should see the hydrangeas. They're blooming already," she said pointing to a spot in the corner where purple and pink flowers were blooming. They were big and poofy.

"They're pretty," Daniel said. "Oh, before I forget Nonnia made you cookies."

"So that's what's on the counter top," Laura said with a smile.

Jessica's head popped out the sliding glass door, she was wearing a black dress with a layered frilly skirt, hair done and wearing make up. "I'm going out Ms. Lawrence, Ali should be here soon."

"Have fun Jessica, say hello to everyone for me."

"Of course!" Jessica said putting on her shoes and coming out to hug Johnny.

He lifted her up off the ground with a big hug.

"It's good to see you, even for a moment," Jessica said.

"Ships that pass in the night, and speak each other in passing," Johnny said setting her down gently when they heard the honk of a car.

"Bye have fun!" she said waving and hurrying out the garden gate.

Daniel hooked his arm through Johnny's.

"How about some lemonade?" Laura asked. "You can tell me about your trip."

Daniel nodded following her back inside, arm in arm with Johnny. They sat on the couch together. He told her about Nonnio's birthday, about the food they ate, about the flight, talked about the snow, buying Johnny a winter jacket.

He felt nervous. There was something about the way she was sitting, like she was waiting for something.

"Were they nice to him?" she asked Daniel and that was it.

His heart sank.

"No," Daniel said slumping his shoulders and rubbing his face. "No, and I didn't let Johnny bring a gift and it was a mess."

"It wasn't a mess." Johnny said protested.

"You nearly had a panic attack."

"That wasn't-"

"It was Johnny," Daniel said.

"How did it end?" Laura asked picking up her glass of lemonade and taking a sip.

"I got apologized to, but a lot of people," Johnny said.

"You did?" Daniel asked turning to look at him surprised.

"Yeah, before we left while you were talking to your Nonnia. A lot of your aunts and uncles apologized. And I got lots of tearful hugs from your little cousins. Heck, even Louie gave me a hug."

"Louie Jr.?" Laura asked with an amused hug.

"Oh, all the kids loved him," Daniel said warmly.

"So it wasn't awful?" Laura asked.

The question wasn't directed at him, she was studying Johnny, motherly concern. Searching. After so long of not being able to check in on him, to make sure he was okay, learning how much he hid, she was preparing, to make sure, to look for cracks and to peer in and make sure, for sure that he really was okay. She wasn't going to let him lie about being hurt anymore. She was going to hold them accountable, to make sure everything was good and okay and that he was happy and healthy. And Daniel was going to be held accountable. Just like Johnny was and had been.

Johnny picked up his glass of lemonade and took a sip then drummed his fingers on the side of the glass.

"We talked about it. I'm going to bring them flowers next time and I'll feel better. And Daniel's going to fight any of his cousins who look at me wrong."

Laura laughed and Daniel flushed red.

"What?" Daniel said.

He had said that, or something like that.

"I'm joking," Johnny said. "But Daniel did say he'd get into a fight with them. So I don't feel too bad and when I was...panicking, he stayed with me and I'm okay. They're being protective of him. And I get it. They haven't caught up with the memo. But his godfathers, his little cousins, his grandparents, they've all been very nice to me."

"I'm glad."

"Oh and Lucille checked on me a lot."

Laura nodded sitting back, her posture relaxing and Daniel's nerves calmed.

Johnny's hand found his.

"What did you do while we were out of town?" Johnny asked, thumb running over the back of Daniel's hand in a way Daniel loved.

"Worked on the garden, started a pizza ranking system with Jessica, had lunch with Yukie and checked in on all your friends."

"How are they?" Johnny asked.

"They were worried about how you were handling a mob of LaRusso's."

"Is that what we're going with?" Johnny asked with a laugh.

"Until I'm told something better," she said with a smile. "I'm going to the dojo tomorrow."

"You don't have to," Johnny whispered stiffening beside her.

"I want to see it. Plus Jessica won't stop talking about it. She loves it."

"She does?" Daniel asked surprised.

"Apparently Chozen's quite the artist. I'm going to take photos and see if I can do something."

"Mom, be careful," Johnny said.

Daniel agreed.

Chozen was best kept at arms length, out of range of his feet and fists.

She smiled softly. "I'll be gentle."

Huh?

"He's been through a lot."

Daniel had been through a lot. What had Chozen been through?

"We talked about that a little," Laura said turning her gaze to Daniel. "I'm adding him to my brood Daniel, so I need you two to get along. You don't need to be friends. But no fighting."

"What?"

"You know in a game of chess where you steal the other players pieces?"

"Yeah?"

"I'm hoarding them all. I'm not giving them back," Laura said. "And I must say I'm doing a decent job. Your mom and I are going out for brunch tomorrow. And I've got a lot planned. I couldn't spend time with who I wanted or do what I wanted and while at the time I was disappointed that Sid didn't want more kids I'm grateful we didn't have any, but now I get to just adopt my own. So Chozen, I'm adding him to my hoard of stolen chess pieces. And step one is visiting the dojo."

Johnny shook his head amused and Daniel stared at her in confused horror.

"Chozen's dangerous."

"Chozen is mourning."

"Mourning? Mourning who?" Daniel said.

"Miyagi Senior," Laura said. "Everyone mourns differently, I'm sure you're aware of that Daniel."

Why did he feel like he was in trouble? He wasn't the one who made Mr. Miyagi's life hell. He wasn't the one who destroyed Miyagi Seniors stuff....Mr. Miyagi's father. Mr. Miyagi hadn't seen him decades. But he'd said that his father taught Sato karate...it was possible that he also taught Chozen. Chozen hadn't been there when Mr. Miyagi's father had passed. But he'd been at the funeral. That angry scowl on his face. Daniel had thought that was directed at them. But maybe...had it all been... Daniel had been angry when his father passed. Mostly at himself. At the universe. At the doctors. He'd snapped at people. He hadn't known karate. But if he had...would he have reacted the way Chozen had? Would he have acted that way if someone he didn't know showed up to his father's funeral who hadn't been in his life for decades and if they drew all the pity to them even if it was deserved?

Daniel wouldn've hated them. It was his dad.

Was that how Chozen had felt? Daniel didn't know what Chozen's relationship was with Mr. Miyagi's father.

He didn't know...anything about Chozen. Except that he liked Johnny.

"Oh," Daniel said.

"It still doesn't excuse what he did to you," Laura said gently leaning forward, patting Daniel's knee. "You didn't deserve any of that, you shouldn't have been treated like that. It doesn't erase anything, not how you feel. I don't mean to say you should let things go. I just want you to be aware that Chozen is staying and he's probably going to try and make a life here in LA, and I think he's more than welcome to do that. And if he needs help, I will help. And you'll see him around because you have an overlapping social circle," Laura said.

"Do you approve of him?" Daniel whispered a sudden panicked thought threatening to take root.

"You mean how he feels?" Laura asked eyebrow raised.

So she did know. She caught on to things fairly fast so Daniel wasn't suprised. But he didn't trust himself to speak.

He nodded.

"He says he's going to wait till your dead."

Daniel scoffed. "I'm going to outlive him, I'll live till I'm over 100. Not a chance."

She laughed softly. "I hope you all find happiness. But as a mother, I'm pleased that so many people like my boy," Laura said getting up when there was a knock at the door and kissing the top of Johnny's head.

"But I'm your favorite right?" Daniel asked turning as she grabbed her purse, looking at her over the back of the couch, that panic not fading.

"Johnny's my favorite," she said pulling out her wallet and opening the door, paying, thanking the person, and taking the bag of food.

"I love you too Mom," Johnny said.

"You're both infuriating," Daniel murmured. "You do that too."

"You usually benefit from it," Johnny said warmly kissing him before hopping up to help her organize the food on the kitchen island.

Johnny was right.

Usually, he picked Daniel, saying it was because he loved him. And it drove everyone else nuts. He wouldn't take a side, would just pick Daniel. That was what mattered.

Laura liked him, and that was good, but Johnny picked him and that was the important part. The part that mattered. That Johnny loved him.

He got up and hurried over to join them, to join them, settling his nerves knowing he'd been picked, chosen, and he got to be the one to curl up on the couch with Chinese food and watching movies with the Lawrences.

Johnny was taking a shower and Daniel was sitting on the couch watching TV. There wasn't anything on that could hold his interest. He'd tried watching a few games. He'd tried thinking about his impending classes and the things he needed to prepare. But all he could think about was that somewhere very close Johnny was naked and soaking wet and he was missing out.

He tried one more channel, tried watching some grandmother explain how to cook something before turning the TV off and heading to the bathroom. He chewed on his bottom lip. He reached for the door knob then stopped, paced.

Johnny should be allowed to have his own space, should be allowed to shower without being interrupted. Time to think and process the day and the future days.

On the other hand, there was lube and condoms in a little waterproof caddy in the shower already just begging to be used.

Should he knock?

He should knock.

He wasn't a monster who would just sneak up on Johnny while he was naked. He didn't have a death wish. Johnny could still kick his ass. And it'd be warranted if he snuck up on him like that. And that was a concussion waiting to happen.

He knocked.

He waited.

He knocked again, louder.

"Yeah?"

Daniel pushed the door open a little.

"Can I join you?"

The air was full of steam and Daniel waited.

He was so close.

Johnny was thinking. Or startled.

He wanted to look but he wouldn't. He'd wait.

"For a shower or do you want something else?"

"Honestly?"

"Honestly."

"Both?"

"Priority, top pick."

Daniel ran his hand through his hair, pushing it back and sighed. "Sex."

"We've tried shower sex and you didn't like it."

"Yes, but I want to give it another shot."

"Okay. I just...wanted to remind you that you didn't like it."

Daniel pushed the door the rest of the way open taking off his clothes and dumping them on the tile before pushing back the curtain.

"True, but, I want to try something different."

Daniel had expected for a second for Johnny to hide when he pulled open the curtain, but he didn't. He just turned to him, curious and amused.

"What is this different thing? Be exact because one of the reasons you said never again was because you thought we'd slip, fall and die."

Daniel stepped in next to Johnny moving close, pressing up against him.

"I want to see if I can lift you."

Johnny laughed. "If any thing was going to lead to us falling, hurting ourselves and dying an embarrassing death trying to lift the other in a wet area would be it."

Daniel bit his lip, pouting a bit.

Johnny was right but he wasn't going to be deterred.

He'd been thinking about it and the corner of the shower might let Johnny brace himself against it and that might give him more to work with.

"It's not going to be a lift just in the middle of the shower."

"So then what is it?"

"That corner."

"Then what even is the point of the shower being on?" Johnny said.

"Easy clean up?"

"It's going to be a waste of water."

"I'll skip my shower in the morning."

"Seriously?"

"What? I'm showering with you tonight. It makes up for it."

Johnny sighed and brushed wet hair out of his face.

"And if this doesn't work?"

"Then I'm hitting the gym until it does," Daniel said.

He knew Johnny could do it. If he wanted Johnny could scoop him up and wouldn't even need a wall to pin him against. But Daniel needed to try. The thought just kept popping back up ever since they'd been in Newark.

Johnny's eyes had headed south and he nodded. "Okay, but don't hurt yourself."

Daniel grinned, opening the shower caddy.

"I was wondering what was in there. I should've known."

"You just don't snoop do you? Like you can just look in there, I don't mind."

Daniel turned back to Johnny and hooked his arms around his neck, kissing him under the stream of warm water. A couple steps back and Johnny was against the wall and he hoped that it'd work.

"This is going to be the most embarrassing ER trip," Johnny said.

"Hey," Daniel said. "It might work. Don't jinx us."

Johnny frowned. "It's really better to lift where it's not wet, where it's...safer. Like a thousand things could already go wrong just with that bit, but the water, what if you lose your footing? Do you seriously want to die with your dick in my ass?"

"Sounds pretty good to me."

"If we get hurt we deserve it."

"Johnny."

"Okay okay, just I don't want you to die."

"How come in this scenario I die and you live?"

"I'll mourn you forever, he was full of great ideas, and then had one absolutely terribly stupid one that killed him."

"That's what you're going to say at my funeral huh?"

"Well it'll be the only thing I could say publicly."

"Privately?"

"His insatiable libedo killed him."

Daniel laughed pressing a kiss to Johnny's neck.

"I can try something to help," Johnny said.

"How?"

Johnny looked thoughtful, "Step back a little, I think I can..." he shifted his stance, pulling away when Daniel stepped back, kicking up his leg, sending water everywhere. He had a focused look. Daniel had seen Johnny do high kicks. He'd been on the wrong end of those kicks. He'd never seen one like this though.

"Seriously?" Daniel whispered. "Why didn't you do this earlier?"

"What?" Johnny asked.

"If you can get your leg that high-" Daniel had a million ideas going through his head.

He would have to see how long Johnny could hold that position. What other positions he could try?

He'd forgotten.

How could he have forgotten? Forgotten how good Johnny was at karate, which meant...he'd have to check out that book from the library again. The one with all the poses and ask Johnny which ones he could do. It'd be a total misuse of karate. To use it like a menu, or karma sultra. He was almost mad at himself for not realizing sooner. He'd known on his birthday that things might be possible but he hadn't explored it, hadn't thought about it again, he hadn't...

"Are you ready?"

Daniel blinked. Right. Focus. Future sex had to wait until after current sex. Johnny pushed himself up onto the tips of his feet, his ankle resting on Daniel's shoulder and Daniel moved in closer until Johnny was against the wall, arms around him, bracing for whatever Johnny was going to do.

"Still think I'm going to die?" Daniel asked.

"We're about to find out," Johnny said lifting his foot completely off the ground, eyes not leaving Daniel's. Focused on him, like he was a focal point, like Daniel had used growing up learning skating, like he used for spins.

Every time he thought Johnny did the hottest thing he'd ever thought was possible he always found something new to make Daniel feel weak in his knees. But he couldn't be weak this time. He grabbed Johnny's thigh, hiking it up over his hip, pressing close.

"Please tell me you already-" Daniel whispered, pressing his forehead to Johnny's chest trying to not rush with the need coiling hot in his stomach.

"I was not expecting you to join me," Johnny laughed. "How you doing there?"

Lube. Hurry before his legs gave out. He could do this.

"Can you keep that position?" Daniel asked. Then remembered the water, felt how slippery everything was, and worried his lip. "As much as I like this, maybe your leg should be here too, I think that's too much of a....I love it, but..."

Johnny nodded and Daniel braced himself, carefully helping Johnny move the leg from his shoulder to his hip.

"Better, safer. Though we'll try something with that later."

"We're going to die before you finish your list."

"Of old age."

"The only old people in the nursing home still getting it on," Johnny laughed.

"Think they'll let us share a room? Or will we have to sneak out to visit each other?"

"I hope things are better by then," Johnny said softly. "I want to share a room."

"We'll be what? 80? 90?"

"I'm not planning to move into any sort of home until well after 100."

Daniel laughed. "We're going to have to change our habits if we want to live that long."

"Hey man, I plan to subsist of off beer and baloney well into my 60's."

"Okay stop making me laugh, I will drop you."

It was harder than he thought to prep with his arms full of Johnny. But he was determined, he just had to-

"M-ah-ybe I'll drink coors banquets and prepackaged ham. I'll buy the good stuff and share it with you. Peak decadence."

"I hate you," Daniel laughed. "You know that won't happen. You're going to be eating nice Italian meals and fucking salads."

"I do not want to fuck a salad," Johnny said seriously nose wrinkled.

"Stop it," Daniel said. "This is hard."

"You're hard."

"Oh my god."

"I think I'm good."

"Thank god."

"Thank you. Though Daniel, if your knee-"

"Do not worry about my knee right now."

"I have to, you're the one wanting to chase me around a nursing home when we're old. Gotta make sure you'll still be able to keep up."

"Not worried about your self there?"

"What? Hell no. Ahh! wa-rn a guy will you?"

"What did you think was going to happen?"

"I was distracted," Johnny said softly. "And I can't...well normally I can...you usually take your time"

Daniel kissed him, gently pulling him closer, as close as he could.

"There."

"There he says," Johnny huffed into his neck. His legs were tense around Daniel's hips fingers digging into his back. Too tense. It'd been easy enough...but maybe...

"I'm not going to drop you."

He was kind of holding on like a startled cat, nails digging into Daniel's back for purchase. Maybe all the talk, all the jokes were for his nerves, maybe he was up for the adventure but terrified that they'd fall and wouldn't make it embarrassingly horny octogenarians. Daniel hadn't just...well maybe he'd used gravity to go a little faster than normal, fast and deep. He had no clue how he was going to move. But with Johnny like that he wasn't going to. Couldn't.

"If we fall I'm landing on you," Johnny managed through gritted teeth.

Next time Johnny said he was ready Daniel was ignoring it and continuing to prep for a little longer. He'd gotten impatient.

"I mean where else are you going to land? You're kinda attached," Daniel said with a grin. He could play the same game and yup bright red. Though maybe that'd been a bad idea because nothing about Johnny relaxed. "Hey, don't you faint on me."

"Why would I-"

"You're all locked up, you've never seen someone lock their knees and then just face plant?"

"I'm not going to f-face plant I can't. I can't go anywhere. Wasn't that the point?"

"Added bonus," Daniel said kissing him, trying to get that furrowed brow to relax. "Sorry," he whispered into his skin.

"You are not."

"I am! But you did say you were ready."

"That is not an apology."

"I'm sorry that it...hurt? Are you hurt?"

"No."

"Are you sure?"

"Pretty sure."

"Pretty is right."

"I think your brain stopped working."

He was relaxing a little, which maybe meant he could shift his stance? A little? The nails that had been digging into his back had stopped.

Johnny's vice grip had relaxed.

He was breathing, deep, meditative breaths, eyes shut, leaning back against the wall. His fingers only dug into his shoulders a little when he shifted.

Had he hurt Johnny? Not enough apparently to have dispelled his interest. Thank god. He looked up again and flushed red, Johnny had caught him, blue eyes dark and an eyebrow raised.

"What are you doing?"

"Just checking."

"Did you go numb?"

"No."

"Because if you did we gotta stop this."

"I am not numb. I just wanted to check you were still interested. It's no fun if you're not."

Johnny laughed, a soft sound, pushing wet hair from his face again, damn, Daniel grit his teeth trying to stay still, to breathe, to stay steady. They should've done this sooner. It was a constant wish a pang of regret that they'd been stupid and slow and just hadn't tried. That he hadn't looked closer. Because maybe if he'd seen it, the cracks

Johnny had hidden he could've saved him and doing that could've gotten them out of a lot of trouble and into one another's arms.

But he was happy. Now. He liked their apartment. All the plants on the balcony. The comfortable couch where they watched games and TV dramas, where Daniel suspected if Johnny ever got sick would turn into telenovela central. Where they watched movies and ate microwave popcorn.

It was so nice to be home. To spend time with Johnny, to have a place to go, their own little world. A bathroom with great acoustics, which he'd noticed last time but had hated the sometimes wet, sometimes cold and not in the shower part of the process. The water in his face. But this corner, it was good.

Johnny let go of him a little and pressed his hand against the other wall like he needed something to hold onto and that helped but also was distracting in the best/worst way.

"Still okay?" Johnny asked, voice all breathy.

"Amazing."

He might regret it in the morning though, but at the moment, he was going to enjoy it.

But.

"Are you okay?" Daniel asked, a beat later, concern flooding him like a splash of cold water.

"Yeah."

"Yeah?"

Johnny nodded kissing him.

It took a couple of tries to figure out how to move, how to balance, and Daniel was right, the acoustics were perfect.

♥♡♥♡♥♡♥♡♥♡♥♡♥

"I'm just...going to sit on the bottom of the shower for a bit. Want to join me?" Daniel said sinking down, knees weak.

"Not yet."

"No?"

Johnny shook his head moving to get into the shower water, leaning against the wall. His entire back was a bright pink, slowly turning red.

"Oh shit," Daniel said.

Johnny passed him a bottle of shampoo and soap.

"I know I said I was going to, but really?"

"Yup, otherwise all of California is going to be super pissed at us for wasting water."

"Fine, I'm saving our shower-escapades for hotels."

"We are not doing that again."

"What? Why not?"

"Because," Johnny said taking the soap and washing Daniel's back, "we fucked up each other's backs."

Daniel hissed, it stung.

"I'm sorry for scratching you up," Johnny said kissing the top of his head.

"You haven't seen your back," Daniel said with a sigh. "You're right, that was one of my less than good ideas."

"Less than good?" Johnny asked with a laugh.

"Hey, I only say that due to the danger and the fact both our backs are all scratched up, speaking of which let me see yours?"

Johnny turned and Daniel sighed getting up carefully.

It was surprisingly difficult. His knees were bothering him. He would never admit that because Johnny would worry and send him out of the shower and straight to bed. He'd start fussing. But he mostly felt euphoric and he was going to keep pushing through leaning on endorphins.

He rinsed off which was unpleasant before focusing on Johnny's back. It could've been worse he realized, but it still wasn't great.

"Okay, fine anything that requires first aid and could kill us is a bad idea," Daniel sighed. "Even if it was good...it was good right?"

"Yeah."

Johnny turned, gently pulling on Daniel's shoulders pulling him under the water.

"Hey!"

"I'm going to wash your hair."

Daniel sighed. "Fine, next time we'll do it in a bath."

Johnny laughed.

Daniel leaned his face against Johnny's chest, into his skin while Johnny washed his hair.

"That will at least be a set amount of water," Johnny said.

"That's one thing I miss about the east coast, no one cared."

"I'm sure someone cared. Also how much water were you wasting?"

"Listen, in a tiny apartment it's one of the few places for privacy."

"I can't believe I thought you weren't interested in sex," Johnny said shaking his head.

"Right? All your radars are completely broken."

"What does that mean?"

"You can't tell when people are flirting with you or hitting on you or trying to get in your pants."

"Sometimes people are just being nice."

"I was not being nice, I was literally trying to cop a feel as much as possible."

"Not always."

"Fine, not always. I did start touching your knee because you were sensitive about your shoulders and neck."

"See? Sometimes people aren't flirting."

"But I was totally subconsciously flirting with you. I was totally begging to get laid."

"Close your eyes," Johnny said.

Daniel did and felt lips on his before his head was pushed back into the water and fingers rinsed out his hair.

"I still can't believe you couldn't tell," Daniel complained. "Like we could've been doing stuff like this in like February of last year."

"You still didn't really like me then."

"I did too. I liked you at like the end of January. I wanted you to like me in February. I made you candies. Did you even eat those?"

"I did."

"You got a ridiculous amount of chocolate," Daniel complained. "I thought you gave me cookies some girl made."

"I made those. Didn't you read my note?"

"I didn't notice it at first."

"I was up almost all night making those for everyone."

"See! You made yours for everyone. I made mine just for you."

"I made one heart," Johnny said. "You're the only one I gave that to."

"I tried to keep that for like a month," Daniel said. "But then I ate it because I didn't want it to go bad."

"I'll make you more if you want."

"Yes."

Johnny smiled kissing him again. "The guys also dressed me up and you didn't notice that either."

"The guys dressed you?" Daniel asked with a laugh.

"Yeah, they wanted to make sure I looked nice. They thought it'd get your attention. I was wearing Bobby's clothes."

"You already had all my attention. If we hadn't done study groups I would've failed like half the classes we shared."

"You wouldn't have."

"I really would've. I spent all of Valentine's day trying to figure out how to give you my chocolate and got intimidated by all the girls who'd swarmed you and the fact you already were buried in chocolate and candies. But I did notice you looked nice. But you always looked nice to me. Hot is a better term. What did you end up doing with all of those sweets?"

"Shared them with the guys and Mr. Miyagi."

"Why didn't you share them with me?"

"Because you ran off pretty quickly and because I wanted to make sure I got you your cookies. I was nervous."

Daniel laughed hooking his arms around Johnny's neck. "You nervous? No."

"Make fun all you want. You ran away."

"Did you share the truffles I made with the guys?"

"No."

"Did you like them?"

"Yes. Everything you make is amazing."

"True, of course, even love right?" Daniel said nodding and grinning watching Johnny's ears turn pink.

"You're like a rabbit."

"Cute and cuddly?" Daniel asked.

"Deceptively innocent looking but just constantly wanting sex."

"You're avoiding the question," Daniel said.

"Seriously?"

"Yes seriously. Now I'm starting to worry."

"Isn't it obvious?" Johnny asked face pink.

"You've put up with a lot in the past, maybe you're just putting up with bad sex. I need feedback, a review. Give me stars. What do I need to improve. A grade. Something."

"But I always-"

"You could fake it."

"How? I honestly don't know how. Do you know how?"

"I mean you could think about-"

"No."

"You didn't let me finish."

"Because I know whatever it is I don't."

"Well, now I could've said anything."

"I'm sticking to my answer."

"We lost track of the point."

"You lost track of the point. I gave you my answer."

"That's not feedback."

"It is if you're paying attention. And you usually are."

"True," Daniel said grinning up at him. "So you want to go again?"

"That was not where I was going with that. Not in here."

"Oh, that's not a no. You know, I must be improving, you don't say no as much anymore."

"That's not why I was saying no."

"Really?"

"This is our own space...and I...feel more comfortable with it," Johnny said turning to the shower finishing up and then turning to the curtain, pushing it open.

"Wait you weren't comfortable?" Daniel asked while Johnny dried off with one of their fluffy towels that his Ma had helped them pick out.

"You gotta relax to enjoy it. Let your guard down. I wasn't very relaxed for a long time," Johnny said drying off his face and moving onto his hair, motioning for Daniel to finish his own shower and Daniel grabbed the soap. He was bursting with questions he needed to answer.

"Does that mean I- I didn't force you to-" Daniel tried to think of the right way to ask quickly scrambling out of the shower once he finished his speed cleaning, turning off the water and not realizing Johnny had come back with a towel for him, barreling straight into him.

"Gotcha," Johnny said wrapping him in the towel and kissing him. "Nope. You didn't force me to do anything. I just couldn't let my guard down in a lot of spaces and it took a long time to feel comfortable doing that. Like the woods was fine, no one knew we were there or where exactly we were, same with the hotel."

"So it wasn't me?"

"No, of course not. I had my guard up constantly, almost all the time. I rarely slept while at Sid's, and in Okinawa I started to relax but I was also on guard because you and Chozen kept fighting and Sato kept causing trouble and then there was the storm. And then I saw Silver break into the house and I just didn't feel safe at Mr. Miyagi's either or at the shop. But now that they and Sid are behind bars I feel...better, safer. Plus the security here is the best."

"So you can finally relax," Daniel said thoughtfully. "You didn't have to be on guard all the time, like you know I wasn't expecting you to-"

"It's a habit," Johnny said. "It's why I appreciated everyone being in my room at Sid's that last night."

Daniel frowned. "I wanted to have you to myself there."

"You mean for sex?"

"Yes."

"That wouldn't have gone probably how you wanted it to. I couldn't relax that well at Sid's."

Daniel sighed. He'd liked the idea, but Johnny was right. The dazed kissing he'd gotten was probably the best he would've gotten. Even if he'd gotten further Johnny might've gotten nervous or made some weird connection or something.

"Can't beat a first time during a meteor shower," Johnny said kissing him gently before pulling away and grabbing the first aid kit.

Daniel wiped off the mirror and turned to look at his back over his shoulder, there were angry red marks.

"You didn't go that deep."

"Still."

"We'll have to do your back too then," Daniel said arms crossed.

"You will have to do my back then."

"Give me," Daniel said holding his hand out.

"Not yet, I gotta patch you up first," Johnny said pushing open the door and walking off to their bedroom, first aid kit in hand and towel wrapped dangerously loose around his waist.

Daniel blinked looking at the stuff left behind in the bathroom. Clothes to sleep in. Did that mean nothing to sleep in? He liked that idea.

He hurried off after Johnny.

Johnny tapped the space on the bed between his legs getting out cotton swabs. At least it wasn't the green stuff. Daniel put his hands on Johnny's thighs taking a seat and leaning forward so Johnny could work.

"I'm surprised we haven't injured ourselves before now," Daniel said.

"We have," Johnny said softly.

"I mean during sex."

"Oh. Wait why?"

"Well, we used to spar and then- or like accidentally kick-"

Johnny laughed, "We get cockblocked by the universe a lot, this was really our first like attempt at something different."

"Are we boring already? I figured that wouldn't hit for at least another decade."

"We strive to be boring and aren't. Not many people want to be boring as badly as us," Johnny said kissing the back of his neck. "Done."

Daniel turned. "With you, I'm never going to be bored."

"You are most definitely going to get bored."

"Nope, because sometimes I just like looking at you. Like this," Daniel said gently cupping the side of Johnny's face. "You missed a spot shaving, you never do, but we've been busy and it's golden," Daniel said running his thumb across Johnny's cheek, over the spot. "It's the smallest spot the I doubt anyone noticed, I hadn't until right now."

"That's embarrassing not something that gets rid of boredom you weirdo."

"Have you throught about growing your beard out?"

"No. I mean, if I didn't see anyone, if I was alone, I might stop shaving, but-" he shrugged. "People usually also don't like kissing you with scruff."

Daniel kissed him gently. "I'll kiss you no matter what."

"Do you want me to let it grow out?"

"I'm not saying that, I just think you should know, you can do what you want," Daniel said.

He carefully climbed out of Johnny's lap and around behind him taking the first aid kit from him.

"Whatever you think looks good, whatever you want to look like, it's your choice for you. Like I know you want to get your hair cut, but I also like this, short, long, I like it both," Daniel said running his fingers through Johnny's hair, pushing it forward and away from his red back.

Little spots were bleeding. He opened up the first aid kit.

He felt bad. It'd been his idea. He kind of liked the scratch marks on his own back but this, this was different, this was from rubbing up against a wall. A friction burn.

He rubbed ointment over his back

"I'm sorry. I didn't think that this would happen. Are you going to be able to sleep tonight?"

"Yeah, I'll just have to sleep on my side."

"You sure?"

"Yeah of course. It honestly doesn't hurt too bad."

"Your bar for what actually hurts is too high. I can't even reach it on a ladder," Daniel said with a frown.

"I'm lowering it. Just you wait, by the time we're sixty I'll complain about everything."

"Somehow I doubt that, and seriously, sixty? Start complaining now."

Johnny bowed his head, he spoke so softly that Daniel barely heard him. "I'll try."

Daniel nodded. "Alright, all done. What do you want to do now? Are you going to read?"

Johnny turned to Daniel, an eyebrow raised. "There's something hidden in your tone."

"What? Me? Never," Daniel said fake innocence dripping from his voice, unable to get the smile off his face.

"We hurt ourselves and what, you're still-listen with both of our backs hurt, problem-solve that one will you?" Johnny said. "I'm going to read. Tell me when you come up with something where we don't have to re-do this. Or like if you want to play Uno or something."

Daniel watched Johnny lean over and grab his book off his nightstand and flick it open and Daniel sat staring at him. How easily he settled into reading his book, legs crossed, fingers gently slipping between pages. Ah, he had an idea similar to this. Everything else he was worried about hitting Johnny's back or bumping into it. Not everything but a lot of it.

Daniel laid on his side, draping himself over and into Johnny's lap. Johnny had said to tell him, but could he just move the towel a little? Get rid of it?

"What are you doing?"

"Go back to reading your book."

"Daniel."

"Just relax. Enjoy your book."

"Are-"

"Maybe read to me?"

"What?"

"Read me a story while I have fun."

"Have fun...seriously? This is not a sexy book."

"What are you reading?"

"A horror novel."

"Oh, then grab something else. Grab our book."

Johnny stared down at him and Daniel did his best to give him his most stubborn look. He was going to give this a try. And it would not work if Johnny was reading some horror novel.

"You want me to read you Pride and Prejudice again?"

"Yes."

He liked that idea. He'd been thinking any book would do. But that was their book. He liked that one. And he wouldn't mind hearing it again. And Johnny liked it.

One bad idea had to be evened out with a great one. And this was a great one.

Johnny got up, putting his book back on the bedside table and wandering over to the bookshelf on his side of the room, looking over the books.

If his back wasn't red, a reminder, then it'd be the perfect view. It was still a good view.

He kind of understood why so many old paintings were just naked people existing. It was intimate and comfortable and a chance to exist in that space. He could understand wanting to capture that feeling on canvas.

Johnny got the book and returned to the bed, looking at Daniel with an expression of confused amusement.

"Think of it as a challenge," Daniel said.

"Another one?"

"Yes."

"Why me?"

"I'm not going to do this with someone else."

"I mean why is your idea, what a blow job while I read?"

"Yes. Exactly. I want to see if you can keep reading."

Johnny flushed red.

"I'll get started when you get started," Daniel said gently curling up on his side into Johnny's lap, trying to find a comfortable position, deciding to hook his other arm around Johnny's waist.

"Where do you want me to start?"

Daniel frowned and looked up at him. "What do you mean?"

"Well we've already read this, I could start in another spot."

Daniel thought about it, thought about skipping past all the spots that confused him the first time, but now he knew, he knew the characters and the story and it might be nice to meet them again, not confused by school work or trying to get Johnny to relax and let him touch his shoulders and neck, but instead to meet them as old friends from before. Friends whose well worn path he knew but this time he'd take comfort in the journey, enjoy the scenery.

Johnny was blushing a little, not as much as he had when Daniel had proposed the idea.

An experiment was really what it was, a fun way to while away an evening when it was too early to go to bed and too late to go out. A nice challenge, worth drawing out.

"If this is a stamina challenge I feel like you're cheating," Johnny said.

"What? How? How could I possibly be cheating?"

"With your breath," Johnny said flicking the book open, blocking Daniel's view of his face.

It was so pointed, so practically prim and proper that Daniel had to pull away and laugh.

"What?" Johnny asked. "This was your idea."

"Nothing, I've just never seen you...I don't know, gesticulate with a book."

"Helping the guys study for an English exam?"

"We played vocabulary Jeopardy while you were busy. I got five gold stars," Daniel said leaning up, hand on the back of Johnny's neck, brushing his nape with his fingertips and kissing him, cupping the side of his face, brushing his thumb against that missed spot of stubble. "You should teach something. I know I'd pay attention."

Johnny laughed softly. "You wanted it to be a challenge, I'm trying to take this seriously."

"I bet you won't even be able to finish the first chapter."

"We'll see about that," Johnny said. "Though I think you should give me a head start."

"Now how is that fair? Wait how long is the first chapter?"

"That's a question you should've asked before betting on the first chapter," Johnny said showing him the book.

"That's it?" Daniel asked, "That's what two pages?"

"Yup."

Daniel frowned then rested his hand on Johnny's thigh, sliding his fingers up watching as he shivered in response. "Well we'll see."

He ducked his head down, curling up back to where he'd been before, waiting for those words.

"It is a truth universally acknowledged-"

"We'll take care of cleaning up and closing up Mr. Miyagi," Daniel said.

"You sure? Last night," Mr. Miyagi said.

"Of course, we'll come to your place after for dinner okay?" Daniel asked.

Mr. Miyagi nodded gathering his things and heading out to the truck.

Daniel watched him go, switching the sign over to closed and pulling down all the blinds.

Johnny was working on a tree, focused and Daniel cleaned, finished the bookkeeping for the night, tallying their sales and waited for Johnny to finish. Or tried. When he finished his tasks and Johnny hadn't moved he walked over slipping his arms around Johnny's waist looking at the tree he was working on.

"This a particularly difficult one?" Daniel asked.

"No, but it was comissioned so I want to make sure it's perfect."

"Comissioned huh? That's new."

"Yeah a man came in and asked Mr. Miyagi if we did that and he thought we could give it a try. If it works well then we're going to add this to the services. We've done eleven. They have to be identical."

"One guy ordered what tweleve? Oh, I saw that order. I didn't realize it was going to be so much work."

Johnny nodded, turning and twisting to look at Daniel. "But I'm done for the night, done as much as I can for the moment."

"You stuck? Creatively blocked?"

"Just a little, I think from staring at tiny little leaves all day. They're all the same style tree, so there's no real difference," Johnny said leaning against him with a sigh that was almost dramatic.

Daniel laughed. "You know, we're not in a rush to get to Mr. Miyagi's."

"Yeah," Johnny said.

"We don't have to be anywhere at all."

"Right."

"And it's my last night here. I'm just going to be the absent boss."

Johnny laughed at that, amused.

"What are you getting at boss?"

"Well you see I've noticed you work really hard, but if you're creatively blocked maybe we should do some sort of stress relief to get you..unblocked," Daniel said dragging a hand down Johnny's chest towards his groin.

"I believe this is an HR violation," Johnny said breathily arching towards his touch.

"That's not a no."

"It's not a no."

"That's a double negative, now I'm confused."

"We're not being strict with our grammar here," Johnny said turning his head and kissing him.

"Good because I start classes next week and don't want to even think about it till then."

Johnny laughed softly. "Then let's think about something else."

"Already ahead of you."

Daniel was trying very hard not to feel guilty because it'd been good and nice and it had been the break Johnny had needed because he'd picked up the bonsai after and finished it, laying naked on the floor next to Daniel on the soft blankets he'd gotten for the shop in case it got too cold, or he saw an opportunity.

It hadn't started on the floor but Daniel liked watching him work, laying on his stomach propped up on an elbow studying the bonsai and finishing it, with renewed focus.

Daniel had run his fingers down his back watching the bonsai take a new shape, a shape he'd recognized all day but hadn't put two and two together. He hadn't realized that's what it'd been. The big order. He'd been distracted by phone calls.

"I'm going to miss this."

"Me?" Johnny had asked. "Having sex in the shop? Because this is a first."

"The shop. Working with you and Mr. Miyagi. All these little trees. The smell of dirt."

"You can just smell me when you come home."

Daniel rolled onto his back, shifting to rest his head on Johnny's back. "I haven't even been here a year."

"You found what you want to try to do though," Johnny said.

"You don't think my ma is right? That this is a bad idea?"

"No. I think it's good. You got to do what's right for you."

"Even if I'm leaving you?"

Johnny set his tools down and turned to look at Daniel, shifting onto his side. Daniel rolled onto his own side to look at him.

"You're not leaving me though."

"But during the day."

"That's normal though."

"I don't want normal."

"I thought you wanted it desperately."

"I want mundane."

"There's a difference huh?"

"Huge."

Johnny cupped the side of Daniel's face. "I want you to go after what you want. It'd be selfish of me to keep you here in this shop getting miserable. I want you to try what you want, to do what you want, and I'll see you at home when you get home from classes, from your apprentice ship, your soccer games. I'll come to your games, I'll come to your graduation and I'll cheer you on-"

"In a tiny cheerleaders skirt?" Daniel asked.

Johnny flushed red. "Not in public."

"I'm adding that to the list then because that was not a no."

"I'm trying to-"

"Sorry I've still got sex on the brain."

"You always have sex on the brain."

"Not always. But those skirts come up to like here right," Daniel said hand just below Johnny's ass on the back of his thigh. "That's kind of hot."

"I don't know why I bother. You're completely fine. And not all skirts are that short."

"Too bad karate doesn't have cheerleaders," Daniel said thoughtfully.

"No way in hell," Johnny said.

"What?"

"We're not going back to the All-valley. We're skipping next year. Neither of us are competing again."

"You don't think I could sneak in with my youthful looks?" Daniel asked batting his eyes.

"I think they've got a photo of you saying Daniel LaRusso, too old to compete, don't let him in."

"I'm not banned."

"You aren't, but you can't compete."

"I was just thinking having you in a short something would've really distracted from getting beaten up. And it would've been fun after."

"We had fun after."

"But skirts are nice because they're easy access."

"Says the guy who didn't chase skirts."

"Well they are," Daniel said. "Though your shorts sometimes are also evilly short."

"They aren't. Not any worse then yours."

"Oh, you like my shorts huh?"

"I like you in them. Not the actual shorts."

"What's wrong with my shorts?"

"There's no winning this huh? Would you wear a cheerleaders uniform or skirt for me?"

"Huh."

"Huh what?"

"Well, I suppose it'd only be fair. But you're not fighting or competing. You don't have any games. So I don't think I can do a cheerleader's uniform."

"Are you getting out of it via a technicality?"

"No no, I'm just thinking," Daniel said. "I feel like it'd be fair. And I mean it might be fun to dress up. Nurse maybe? But I don't want you getting sick or hurt though I think I am good at nursing you back to health...Halloween?"

"You want to wear a dress for Halloween?" Johnny asked.

Daniel shrugged. "Why not? Anyone bothers me I can kick their ass. Or you can."

Johnny shook his head amused. "Well I was thinking this Halloween we'd join the guys at school. Visit them on campus or something. But you also might have stuff at your school."

"Oh heck yeah. Let's go bother them."

"We usually all match."

"Think they'd be up for dresses or skirts?"

"I've never asked. And it feels weird to recommend it when you are explicitly thinking of sex."

"Well, it's like your robe."

"What about my robe?"

"It's short."

"It's a summer robe. It's LA, it's always hot."

"And you're very hot in it. But again, easy acess. I love it."

"So maybe I'll just wear my robe around and that'll take care of this craving you have. Though it also sounds like you just want me to be naked."

Daniel hummed a thoughtful tone, running his eyes over Johnny's body appreciatvely. "I mean I also greatly enjoy that."

Johnny sighed. "I think you're going to be okay," he said pushing himself up and grabbing his shirt.

"No," Daniel whined.

"What?"

"I'm not done looking."

"Daniel, we can't keep Mr. Miyagi and everyone waiting all evening. We have dinner plans."

Daniel pouted. "One minute."

"You just want to stare at me for a full minute?"

"Yes. That's not long at all."

"It's going to feel like it though."

"Scared it'll turn you on? I'll take responsibility."

"That's what I'm scared of. That we'll keep finding excuses and Mr. Miyagi will worry we got into trouble or something," Johnny said setting his shirt back down and staring at him.

It was haughty almost, like daring him to look.

Daniel wasn't going to back down.

"Us? Trouble? Never," Daniel said eyes leaving Johnny's blue ones and studying him, the way he did his favorite pieces of art. But unlike a museum, he could touch.

"Hey, thought you were just going to look."

"What? Does it cost extra to touch?" Daniel teased.

"I'll put it on your kissing tab."

"Not the kissing tab. I'm already so in debt. Why is it always the kissing tab? Why can't we open another tab? Sex tab? Blow job tab? Can I actually just give you money? Or massages? Can you please subtract by how many times I make you come?"

"No. I'm keeping things all in the kissing debt tab. It'll get confusing otherwise."

Daniel nearly met his gaze but he refused, following well-toned muscles because Johnny was flexing, showing off while being watched and Daniel loved it, every beautiful second.

Daniel sighed. "You know what add it to my tab. It's worth it," he said running his thumb over one of Johnny's nipples and ghosting his fingers down along his sides, over his abs. "You sure you don't want to go again?"

"You got thirty more seconds."

"Damn you're actually timing this? Trying not to get too turned on huh? I bet your sensitive and it wouldn't require much work."

"Daniel, I love you very much but you're going to have to wait till we get home. In case you forgot this is Kumiko's last night. It's not just your last night working here party, it's also Kumiko's going away party."

"Fuck I forgot," Daniel sighed pulling his hand back.

"Otherwise," Johnny said gently. "If we had nothing. Then yes."

"When when we get home then," Daniel said with a sigh. "Okay, yes. We have to see Kumiko before...wait whose taking her to the airport?"

"Chozen is adament he drives. I think Yukie-san is going with."

"So this is it huh? We're not driving her?"

"No. There's not enough room."

"That's kind of a bummer," Daniel said grabbing his own shirt and putting it on.

He carefully picked up the bonsai Johnny had been working on and set it on the shelf, putting on the rest of his clothes and watching Johnny straighten up as well. They finished cleaning up, Daniel grabbing the blanket, folding it up and shoving it in the trunk of the Ford.

It was a familar drive and Daniel wondered if this was the end of a chapter of his life. It would be nice to move on to something new. As much as he loved Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees. As much as he loved working with all the trees and with Johnny and Mr. Miyagi he couldn't help but feel nervous whenever he walked through the door. He felt nervous every time he unlocked the shop in the mornings or was there by himself. He was pretty sure Johnny had noticed. Noticed that he didn't like being there alone. It was why they always carpooled, why if Johnny had plans he'd wait, hover until Mr. Miyagi came in and would leave then. Or why sometimes one of the girls was there when he arrived. Like Johnny had called them to meet Daniel in the morning.

He knew Mike Barnes and his friends weren't going to come around any more. They were in jail. So was Silver. But they'd broken into the shop so many times. They'd beaten him in the shop so many times, jumped him that he didn't feel safe there even though he'd tried desperately to make it feel safer. He didn't unless Johnny or Mr. Miyagi was there. And then that made him feel weak. To be scared. He still felt Silver's gaze, still felt the burn of his hands, his voice in his head if he was alone too long. If he was left to himself he could hear it. Terry Silver's laughter in his head. Could hear the things he told him. A whisper in the wind Danny-boy.

He feared what would happen when he'd go to school. Would he freak out like Johnny had that one time in the mountains when a snowball hit his neck? Would he just shut down? He hoped he wouldn't. He worried that Johnny would leave for work and Daniel would just curl up in their bed and be too scared to leave. And he felt awful about that. He felt worthless. He felt unlucky. He felt like he was less than.

But having Johnny beside him, he could breathe. Because he felt safer with Johnny there and then he felt guilty. Because Johnny had gone through so much staying by his side, and then he felt selfish and weak and it was an awful merry go-round.

He parked the Ford and Johnny was there, suddenly leaning over and kissing him, arm behind him on the back of the seat.

How did he do it? How did he take every awful thing thrown at him and keep going?

Daniel felt like he was held together by fraying twine and about to come apart any second.

Johnny pulled away. "I love you."

Daniel blinked back tears and squeezed his eyes shut kissing Johnny. "Trying to help me out of my kissing debt huh?"

"It will take an eterinity, every little bit helps."

"Every little bit helps is usually what people say when they ask for help paying for something. This is my debt, I'm not going to ask for help paying it. Wait...are you saying you'd let someone else kiss you. Johnny!"

Johnny laughed quickly getting out of the car. "Oh no, your debt isn't transferable. It's your responsibility and that's it. Even if someone else kissed me it wouldn't count towards your debt."

"Did someone else kiss you? Give me names."

"My mom did. On the cheek and the forehead," Johnny said.

"I was seriously worried," Daniel said hurrying after him.

Johnny smiled. "You shouldn't get jealous or worried over my mom."

Daniel sighed walking up the steps and taking off his shoes, putting them amongst all the others. There were so many and he paused to look at them all.

"Mr. Miyagi is probably pretty happy."

"Huh?"

"After being alone for so long."

"Yeah," Johnny said adding his shoes neatly to the side and knocking before gently pushing the door open.

"Ah Daniel-san Johnny-san! Start to worry. Think need to send search party. But told to wait. Shop closed? Locked?" Mr. Miyagi asked.

"Yes. And Johnny finished the last comissioned bonsai."

"Oh good!" Mr. Miyagi said smiling at them warmly.

Daniel smiled walking through the familiar halls out into the backyard where everyone was sitting. Kumiko was sitting across from Chozen, talking animatedly to the guys, Jessica and Ali listening.

"I don't want to say goodbye," Daniel whispered.

"It's not goodbye," Johnny said. "Chozen said she's going to come over the winters and host a winter break dance class at the dojo."

"He's going to share the space?"

"Yeah. It sounds like a good idea. Want to take dance lessons with me?"

"I will dance with you any time anywhere."

"Kumiko will be happy to hear that. I'll make sure she knows."

They sat down, welcomed warmly by their friends and Daniel chatted with Kumiko, hearing about her plans in Tokyo, about her long flight, how much of a pain it was to pack and get all the stuff she wanted to take back with her in her suitcase.

"I already said I'll send you snack package," Chozen said shaking his head.

"But that'll take weeks," Kumiko said. "I want to take chips and snacks and treats on the plane."

"Oh that's easy," Bobby said. "Here open my going away gift."

He passed over a box. She opened it revealing a bunch of mini cupcakes and cookies.

"That will get you through the flight," he said with a smile.

"Am I going to get one of those too?" Jessica asked.

"I want one too," Ali said.

"We go to the same school Ali, you're not leaving LA," Bobby said with a laugh. "And of course Jessica."

Jessica grinned then turned to Kumiko. "I wish we could come see you perform in Tokyo."

"Me too. But you've got school."

"Boo. I want to transfer. I want to go to LA or be somewhere else."

"Come to Seoul with me," Dutch said. "See if you can study abroad at oh shoot what's the university? Ehwa? See if you can get into Ehwa Women's University in Seoul."

"Shit, I forgot you leave for Seoul in a couple of months."

"Yeah, I might actually get to see Kumiko perform. It's a short flight."

"That's actually a good idea," Jessica said. "Studying abroad in Korea or Japan. Ali, you should do that with me."

"Well I mean, yeah but-"

"Oh it'd be fun!" Jessica said. "We can see Dutch and Kumiko. And then we'll already be there when everyone comes to visit. It'll be an adventure. We could try and climb Mount Fuji!"

Ali laughed, smiling warmly. "Okay, I'll see what my options are and I'll call you once I talk to the guidance counselor. We'll see what they say but it'd be next semester or maybe over the summer. I think it's too late for this semester."

"Good," Dutch said nodding. "You all owe me a visit."

"Don't worry Dutch we'll come see you and you can be tour guide," Jimmy said.

"Sounds like a plan," Johnny said.

Daniel looked at him. He was smiling. Relaxed, happy to be back in the garden, surrounded by their friends.

Daniel put his hand on Johnny's thigh.

Kumiko was smiling, but there was melancholy in her eyes.

"What's wrong?" Daniel asked.

The conversation halted and Kumiko turned to look at him, her smile freezing and faltering.

"Being in LA," she said picking up her glass of soda and looking down into it, there were cherries in it. She picked one out by the stem. "It's felt like a dream. A good dream."

"Kumiko-chan," Chozen said softly.

She nodded, then brushed her hair back. "They're all staying, except me. Chozen is going to move into an apartment with the dojo and Sato-san and Aunt Yukie are staying here with Mr. Miyagi." She sniffed brushing at her eyes. "It feels weird that they won't be in Okinawa. Okinawa is our home. Tomi Village is home. But this is better. I'm happy. I'm sad. It's confusing. Like maybe I'll never go back to Tomi village again. Aunt Yukie is thinking of selling the house you know? The one Mr. Miyagi bought her with the winnings? So it's just Miyagi sensei's place and Sato's place, but who will take care of those? But this is so much better. To be here together. But I'm also leaving, and I don't want to."

"Your parents are still in Okinawa," Chozen said. "It's still your home."

Kumiko looked at him with such sadness in her eyes that Daniel didn't understand, wondering if her parents were okay. He'd never gotten a chance to meet them. She reached out and patted Chozen's hand and he looked away, gaze averted. To Daniel's surprise Tommy bumped amicably into Chozen reaching into the middle of the table to grab a pot of tea and pour Chozen some. Chozen bowed his head, lifting the cup with two hands.

Daniel wondered if he lived in the twilight zone.

"We can find you a dance studio in LA," Bobby said. "If you want to stay."

"He's right, there are hundreds," Ali said.

Kumiko shook her head. "I want to but I feel like that's the easy path. I want...no I need to do my own thing. The troupe in Tokyo, that's...important to me. I just wish I could...shrink you all down and take you with me."

"About that," Johnny said opening his bag. He pulled out a familiar Fotorama.

Daniel remembered in the morning Johnny asking if he could bring it with them. It'd been a good idea.

"It might help if you have some captured memories to take back home with you."

Kumiko smiled, eyes glassy and wet.

"I love that," she said sniffing.

"We'll take lots of photos," Ali said warmly.

"You can tell all your friends in Tokyo who all your handsome American friends are," Dutch said with a grin.

Kumiko laughed and nodded, brushing her eyes.

They took a few photos, trying to figure out the best way to get the lighting right.

Mr. Miyagi, Yukie, and Sato came out with dinner and more drinks, joining them at the table.

They took lots of pictures through the night as they played games, with the guys grinning, arms around one another, Chozen sitting stiffly, face neutral next to Sato and Yukie.

Of Yukie and Mr. Miyagi and Sato.

Of Johnny and Daniel, the girls, and group photos, photos of them learning Koi koi, of Kumiko winning, arms in the air delight on her face. Her third win in a row.

There was a thick stack of photos at the end of the night and she went through them picking out the ones she was taking home, they'd taken multiples so that Yukie could keep a nice photo of the two of them together so that everyone got photos to keep.

Daniel did notice that Chozen got a small stack handed to him by Kumiko and he had a sneaking suspicion that somewhere in that pile was a picture of Johnny by himself. But he was trying to be nice. And maybe he handled it by putting his hand a little too high on Johnny's thigh, shocking Johnny, Daniel felt his muscles tense, the slightest twitch as his fingers grazed his groin. Johnny didn't stop talking to Bobby on his other side, but his response was to take Daniel's hand in his and hold it very firmly away from his groin. His ears were pink.

Daniel had no good excuse but he grinned, soaking up the night, the atmosphere. The celebration of his last day working at Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees and their goodbye for Kumiko. He was happy.

Johnny was being gentle. Too gentle. Daniel wanted to tell him to hurry up. He wasn't fragile. They could get this show going.

Did Johnny seriously still think he was fragile? After all this time?

Sure...Daniel was gentle with Johnny but that was different. Johnny had a history of people being unkind to him. Of no one taking the time to be gentle with him, kind. So Daniel wanted to make sure he was. That Johnny felt safe and loved and that he was precious.

But Daniel didn't need that. He already was made fun of for being weak, picked on ever since he moved to LA...and oh god did he have a complex? Whatever.

He wanted to flip them over and show Johnny that Daniel wasn't going to hurt himself, that he could take it. Show Johnny that he didn't have to be careful, that there wasn't that fear that...was that it? Was Johnny worried that Daniel would freeze up? Worried that once Daniel saw him that, that he might panic?

Hadn't they gotten past that? Hadn't he told Johnny that they were past that? That he'd forgiven him long long ago? Long before they got together? Hadn't he said it a million times?

He hadn't had he?

Damn it.

Why did he always think he told Johnny the things he'd only thought? Because he was always talking. He thought he'd slipped it in there somewhere. He thought with how strongly he'd felt it that Johnny would just pick it up. Like all the times he struggled to sleep while Silver and Barnes were tormenting him. Like the way he just always listened, he'd ended up relying on that rather than saying everything.

But now was a bit awkward right?

He didn't know what to do with himself.

"Is something wrong?" Johnny asked.

Stopping. Of course he was stopping. Why was he stopping?

"No."

"That's the no of a liar."

"Nothing is wrong."

"Lies. If you don't want to, it's fine."

Why was he like this?

"I can't read your mind," Johnny said. "But you're quiet. Too quiet. You're almost never this quiet unless you're deep in thought but you're also not relaxing. At all."

"I'm not fragile."

"You're not," Johnny agreed, shifting and laying down beside him, laying on his side and towards Daniel.

"Then why are you going so slow?"

"Because someone's made sure I'm very aware that it could hurt."

"That's for you!"

Johnny laughed. "I think that's supposed to be for everyone."

"We've gotten nowhere."

"I don't know about that."

"Oh come on, you haven't even..."

Johnny smiled shaking his head. "You say the crudest things, the dirtiest thoughts you have when you are-"

"Got it," Daniel said sitting up quickly.

"Got it?"

"Maybe I just got to do it?"

"Daniel, it's okay we don't have to."

"What? But I want to have sex."

Johnny pushed himself up. "I want you to listen to me okay?"

"But-"

"Daniel."

"Fine."

"You aren't fragile. You're a bad ass. You're the one who defeated me at the All Valley. You got up every time. You defeated Barnes. You're the one Chozen chose to fight-"

"Because I wouldn't kill him and he didn't want to hurt you."

"Still, he knew you'd give it your all. I'm sorry that I started that snowball of people fighting you."

"Is this because of that?" Daniel asked.

"Huh?"

"Are you going so slow because you still feel guilty?"

"I may always feel guilty but Daniel that's not-"

"I forgave you a long time ago you know. Before we started dating. Somewhere around New York, earlier actually now that I think about it. I thought I'd told you but I realized I just felt it so strongly and I didn't actually tell you. Just like I thought I'd told you I liked you back but hadn't in Okinawa. You just can read me so well most of the time that I forget you can't actually read my mind."

Johnny kissed him, a deep passionate kiss that left Daniel breathless. That was better. That was what he wanted. More of that. Then Johnny pulled away. No. Noooo. Come back. More.

"It's not that Daniel. I mean I'm still working on that. You've forgiven me, but I haven't forgiven me. But I'm working on it."

"Johnny."

How could he not forgive himself? After everything he'd done to make up for it. After all he'd been through. It didn't seem fair.

"You aren't fragile to me. I know you can handle yourself. But, to me you're precious. I love you. You can ask me to hurry up all you want, but if you aren't relaxed we're not doing anything. Because you're not comfortable, you're not ready and that's fine. I don't mind. I enjoy...what we do," Johnny said looking away face red. "You..." he turned back to look at Daniel, taking his hand and bring it to his chest. Not where Daniel wanted to put his hand. "Being with you, whatever we're doing, makes me happy. I like how you meet my gaze from across the room, I like that you can't keep your hands to yourself. I like listening to you talk. It's all grounding. I like watching you do kata in the living room. I like dancing with you. I like that you pull me in to dance. I...I like my life and that's not something I ever expected to say and it's because of you. I wouldn't change anything because you're here. You were the catalyst, falling in love with you is the best thing that ever happened to me. Which is why I am not going to rush you, why I'm not going to keep going if you're not relaxed or into it, not because you're- what did you say? Weak? Definitely not. You are not that, it's not even on my list of synonyms with Daniel LaRusso. But because you're precious and you've also told me like a thousand times that rushing and pushing through when you're not relaxed is bad. So you can blame yourself for being a good teacher." He got a mischievous glint in his eye. "Sensei."

Daniel laughed, a watery laugh. Somewhere along the way he'd built himself a wall and hadn't realized it. He refused to relax because of all the people who just one after another came after him. He couldn't let down his guard because every time he tried he got hurt. But Johnny wasn't going to hurt him. And he knew that. He just...didn't know how to tell his body that. To get his mind to relax, to calm down.

He liked coming home from his night classes and seeing Johnny curled up on the couch with a book. He liked how Johnny always slowly dragged his eyes from the page to tell him welcome home. How Johnny felt like home. It was the thing he'd always wanted. He'd spent time building a foundation telling himself it was for Johnny, but it was for himself. He'd needed something sturdy under his feet that wouldn't shift or crack. He needed something steady to hold on to and Johnny was that. He had a strong hand to hold onto, something stronger than every other hand he'd held.

Somewhere along the way everything had gotten twisted up. Because he had wanted this, had expected this from the start, thought it'd be the opposite, thought he'd have to butter Johnny up to get between his legs. He'd thought that would be a rare treat, not his favorite constant indulgence. He'd never thought he'd be the one getting stuck and hung up. He'd tried to do it himself once or twice and Johnny had...the one time when he'd found out about the magazines but now...

It was like he'd put his guard up and couldn't figure out how to put it down. Which felt silly because there wasn't any danger. Not anymore. Terry Silver, John Kreese and Mike Barnes were in jail. Jimmy had given him the ruling in a fancy box over a nice dinner at some family restaurant with some champagne they snuck. He'd also given him the check. A ridiculous check. Daniel hadn't known what to do with it. He didn't want it. Even though it felt wrong to throw it out.

Jimmy had explained that he could do whatever he wanted with it. But it was understandable that he didn't want it. That happened. But money was money and it was his. He still didn't know what to do with it. It felt cursed. Like the ghost of the man was around the corner, waiting.

He'd told Daniel that he'd already gotten Daniel to do what he wanted, that it'd been so easy to do and Daniel didn't trust himself, didn't trust people.

He didn't trust that Silver wouldn't get out and come looking for Daniel first thing. When he was alone he feared the footsteps behind him, he walked fast past alleyways, he feared hearing that laugh, that voice. He didn't know how Johnny handled that fear.

He didn't want the money, didn't want to use it or touch it. In case he came back. In case he said something he'd throw it back at him. But it was also his. As the one who suffered the abuse, the stalking, the torment. Things he didn't think of for himself that made him feel weak, he wasn't weak. He wanted people to just believe him. He wished he could be as cool about it as Laura. That he could just burn something big and vast and then move past it.

They probably weren't going to have sex tonight. And that was a disappointment. Made him feel worse.

"It's not like I don't know how it's supposed to go," Johnny said pulling Daniel into a hug, running his fingers down Daniel's back. "I mean I've gotten past this point before."

Daniel sighed pressing his cheek against Johnny's pec. He wanted to bite it. But Johnny would let go of him then. Would yelp and fly away. Maybe if he was gentle. He bet it was like the mochi Mr. Miyagi gave him, he'd have to ask for more to keep from biting Johnny. Daniel was gentle, just letting his teeth graze Johnny's chest.

"You've just completely moved on. You sometimes have the oddest coping mechanisms. Like Daniel you- seriously? Fine if you're going to be like that- for someone who manhandles it a lot, are you just scared of my dick?"

Manhandles? Daniel bit down a little harder than he meant to, but not too hard and shot Johnny a glare. It wilted immediately.

Johnny wasn't being mean, he was trying something new, a gentle ribbing to get Daniel to relax.

"It's not you," Daniel said softly. "Just somewhere along the way I think...I backed myself into a corner and put walls up. I thought this was how things would always go you know? That I'd have to work harder to get you under me. I wasn't expecting to one day to..."

"You've been through a lot," Johnny said.

"So have you!"

"You've had a rough couple of years, and this last one was pretty brutual. You're allowed to feel upset or uncomfortable or just not up for certain things."

"But you're fine with it," Daniel mumbled into Johnny's chest.

Johnny shrugged. "I had support, even if I didn't see it. A nosy beautiful Italian who wouldn't leave me alone and who kept checking in on me. I think if we'd met earlier you probably would've joined the guys in their guard routine. I'd probably never get a night to myself."

"If we met earlier I like to think I would've gone for you instead of Ali."

Johnny laughed. "No fear huh?"

"Of the big buff beautiful blonde? I wasn't scared of you pretty much ever. It was more of the group that constantly beat me up. I mean you on your own were...Johnny you did a spinning kick to close a locker door and looked like you were going to cry when I ruined your sweater."

"I wasn't going to cry."

Daniel smiled kissing the tip of his nose. "Now that time I was pissed, but I also got to touch your pec, so you know, that was nice. If you'd shown up to the beach and gone for a swim earlier and not shown up to try and talk to Ali? I think I'd have just stared and then started flirting before I even knew what I was doing."

"What are you going to do when I'm no longer buff?"

"Squeeze everything I can get my hands on," Daniel said.

"Seriously?" Johnny said it in a way like he hadn't expected Daniel to have such a quick answer. His face was red.

"Yup," Daniel said pressing his finger into Johnny's pec. "You still work out even though you don't have to anymore. You lift stuff all the time for the shop, you do who knows what at the animal sanctuary and with the kids, and you do kata with me. It's going to be a while before that happens, but I know I'm still going to be obssessed and manhandling you as much as I can."

He smiled at Johnny's stunned red face and kissed him. He liked thinking about their future. He wanted a nice house in Encino hills. With a pool and their own dojo and a nice garden. He wanted to cook in the kitchen, make love in the kitchen, every room of the house, in the privacy of their garden, by the pool. They might not get there though if he didn't relax.

Johnny's hand was in his hair, a soothing motion of fingers along his scalp, down the back of his neck and spine then back up.

"I think...everything fucked me up more than I thought," Daniel whispered. "Which is weird, you...you were constantly...and I...I can't handle being manipulated by...I can't bounce back from that? You nearly died, and I..."

"Apples and oranges."

"Huh?"

"You can't compare them. We're different. You know when you dropped me off at that place while you sat in the café and looked over the paperwork for the shop?"

Daniel nodded.

"They wanted to know everything. But they were nice about it. I was given books and had a lot of...difficult conversations. It was helpful. But I thought this is nothing, everything I went through, it's nothing compared to Daniel. Like Daniel survived a fight to the death and the death of his father and Mr. Miyagi's...what I'm dealing with isn't that bad. And they told me, trauma is trauma, your hurt is still hurt, it hurts you. Sure, people are going through awful terrible things out in the world, even people you know, but it doesn't take away from what you feel and it doesn't make that lesser. A child who lives an idyllic life is still going to cry when they get stung by a bee. Because it hurts. And we're not going to go up to them and yell at them and say why are you crying? There's a kid whose parents are gone. Everyone's hurting and it's different because people are different and how they handle it is different.

"Silver was an asshole and he hurt you, and so did Chozen, and so did Barnes and his friends, and so did the guys, and so did I. And you are still healing from all of that and all the changes and difficulties in your life. Your mother leaving while we were in Okinawa? That was rough. You lost your home. Losing your home fucking sucks. Your dad died. That's going to be with you forever. You watched Mr. Miyagi go through the same damn thing and I'm sure that reopened that wound. Your uncle is sick. You're starting a new chapter of your life without any of us there by your side. You're allowed to feel hurt, betrayed, angry, or sad, or a confusing combination of everything and you're allowed to take your time. You'll have good days and bad days. It's one of the few things that isn't a competition and never will be. It's a process. There's no quick fix and it takes time, heck, I didn't even really start to like myself again until Okinawa."

Daniel looked at him, vision blurred.

"If it hadn't fucked you up in some way then you'd be inhuman," Johnny said.

Daniel laughed, rubbing at his eyes. "I want you to fuck me up though."

"You say that but-"

"I know, I know," Daniel sighed. "Mood is completely gone."

"Always a shocker," Johnny said smiling at him. "Very few things kill your mood."

Daniel buried his face back in Johnny's chest, listening to him breathe, to his heart beat. It was kind of new to be nude and not having sex or cuddling after. To not be sated but just comfortable.

"I want to do something cool," Daniel thought about not saying the rest of it but decide the mood was already super dead so why not. "I want you to think I'm cool."

Johnny laughed a short snort of a laugh. "I already think your cool."

Daniel frowned.

Johnny had said that. Several times. It wasn't that. He wasn't sure exactly what it was, so he was going to try and figure it out the best way he could, by talking.

"I want to be the kind of cool I think you would think would be cool."

"Okay...you lost me."

Daniel sat up trying to figure out how to say it. "Ali said she didn't want to be the girl on the back of a cool guys motorcycle and said maybe that was something I wanted, but really I wanted to drive your motorcycle."

"I mean you can if you want," Johnny said brow furrowed trying to follow along.

Daniel sighed. "You...I am always getting into fights."

"Not always."

"Right, not always, but ever since I moved to LA I get into more fights than I used to. And like in Newark I didn't get into fights pretty much ever. But if someone picked a fight with me I'd be down to fight. Just with all my family around it never reached that point so I was more of a class clown. But I wanted to be the cool guy who won fights and rescued the person they liked. Like the hero on a movie or comic book cover you know? And you, that's all easy. You fit that very easy. I want to save you. Every time I try I...fail."

"You want me to get into danger so you can rescue me?" Johnny asked.

"No, I don't want you to be in danger I just..."

"You fought a death match for me."

"That Chozen had no intention of winning and didn't even hurt you.

He never would on purpose. But like Kreese attacked you twice and I didn't...I didn't save you either time."

"Well Mr. Miyagi saved me the first time and I saved myself the second time."

"I've regretted walking away the first time ever since," Daniel whispered twisting the blanket in his lap feeling the lump in his throat, the burn in his eyes. "I saw Kreese attack you, I saw the whole fight. I walked out, everyone was congratulating me and I signed autographs, me, I felt great and then Kreese tried to kill you and I froze. I want to think I would've stepped in, I want to think I would've helped you, I wish I had, I desperately wish I'd gone with Mr. Miyagi, that I'd at the very very least gone to help you up afterwards, but instead I went out for lobster with Ma, Ali and Mr. Miyagi and I tried not to think about it. And I didn't think about it that much. And I regret that. I felt guilty all night, awful. It was callous. I didn't worry about you I-"

"Daniel," Johnny said softly rubbing his back.

"And then it was really the guys who saved you from Sid. I didn't even-I didn't even chew him out or yell at him. I wanted to punch him in the face and I should've."

"He would've sued you into the ground for battery."

"But he deserves it!" Daniel had tears in his eyes but he was pissed. Pissed at the universe, at himself. "And then I brought Kreese back into our lives, I opened that door. I met with Silver, I fell for his lies, I let him talk me into hurting myself. I only fight now when I'm cornered and there's no other choice and I never move fast enough to save you or help you or anything. Everyone targets me because they know right? That I freeze up? That I'm weak? Why do I always freeze up. Hell I froze up now and that was with you. What's wrong with me? Why is it always me? Why can't I be the hero?"

Daniel rubbed at his eyes, it was the same thing that'd been bothering him for a long time. All compounded. Regret, guilt, failure, pain.

"You saved Yuna."

Daniel blinked looking at him. "Anyone would've-"

"I couldn't," Johnny said. "And you didn't even think about it, you just climbed up a pole, stopped the entire thing from catching on fire or electrocuting the two of you and you got her back down safely. She wouldn't be alive to send us art now if not for you."

"But you-I walked away from you. I hate myself for walking away from you. You were having such a rough-such a bad time. And then you came to apologize and I-I could see your throat and I got scared but it wasn't just because you were where I wasn't expecting you but because I was faced with my own cowardice. Your neck was all red still and that was, I could've at least tried. And then you kept trying to help and I didn't feel like I deserved your help. I didn't want it because I hadn't helped you. I...you keep helping, showing up, saving me or backing me up. But I didn't, not when I should've, I could've-" He turned to look at Johnny, the thing he'd told himself thousands of times but hadn't said out loud, "I'm sorry for walking away. I owe you a rescue."

Johnny grabbed one of the blankets on their bed, wrapping it around Daniel's shoulders and pulling him close.

"I never expected your help in that moment, I didn't expect anyone's help. I thought it was...in that moment, me getting my just desserts. That Sid had foretold my death because he'd warned me about talking back."

Daniel wrapped his arms around Johnny's waist, turning into him and hugging him as tightly as he could. "Every person who came after me went after you and I didn't stop a single one of them. I didn't save you. I know Chozen didn't mean to, but he still hurt your arm and knocked you out, kept bothering you, stole your jacket. Silver sent Barnes and his goons after you and Kreese went after you again. And I walked away from you twice."

"Twice?" Johnny asked.

"When I got jealous and didn't listen to you, I drove off after I found out you'd apologized to Ali for kissing her."

"Oh, right. You do know I apologized to her not because you kissed me and that made me think of it right? That I liked you a lot back then. I just wanted to kiss you when you weren't drunk."

Daniel nodded with a soft smile. "I think it's because you get kiss drunk."

"Kiss drunk?" Johnny asked.

"Your brain stops working a bit. If someone's drunk then you can't get kiss drunk."

"My brain does not stop working."

"Not always true," Daniel said thoughtfully. "But sometimes you get this kind of hazy look in your eyes. You lose focus."

Johnny blushed lightly looking away. "It's because I like kissing you."

"Clearly since you picked the most ridiculous number of kisses to put me in debt," Daniel said with a soft laugh pressing a soft kiss into Johnny's neck.

His skin was warm and soft. Daniel wanted to touch him, but in a lazy way, without any goal. But that'd be cruel. Right? Just touch and feel and focus on skin. He still didn't feel good or even really okay. But he liked touching Johnny and he felt like maybe that'd make him feel just a little better. But maybe that was procrastinating, avoidance, avoiding everything that felt wrong and broken inside of himself.

Johnny's hand was on the back of his neck, his shoulders, massaging at his skin. "Next time I'll call you okay?"

"Huh?" Daniel asked.

"Next time someone tries to fight me I'll run into a phone booth, shut the door and call you. You can come fight them."

Daniel laughed at the image.

"You better."

Johnny gently set his chin on Daniel's shoulder, arms going around him again. "I never expected you to come help me in that parking lot. I didn't expect anyone too. I might've also not handled your help in a good way. I mean I ran away from the guys. Just slipped out when they weren't paying attention. I was pretty shaken up, my mom calmed me down, made things more...clear."

"See? Even your mom does more than I do."

"She's my mom," Johnny said with a laugh. "It's her job."

"I want that job."

"Gross, no."

"Not like that. I want to be...I want to be someone I'm proud of, that Mr. Miyagi is proud of and I'm just not there yet."

"Mr. Miyagi is really proud of you," Johnny said .

"I fuck up all the time though, especially lately."

"It's really hard to focus anger into something calming like Mr. Miyagi wants," Johnny said gently. "And you're like the fiestiest person I've ever met, even more so than...Ali was, is. Because of that, it's hard to just go with the flow like Mr. Miyagi wants. But here's the thing, he loves you, he's proud of you, he doesn't expect you to be perfect. You expect you to be perfect. No one else does."

Daniel frowned. That was it. He turned and tilted his head back to look at Johnny.

Johnny kissed his forehead. "You're too hard on yourself. You put all these expectations on yourself. And you're upset that you haven't bounced back from being manipulated and hurt? It takes time. That ended only like a month ago? A few months? You gotta give yourself time and be prepared that there still might be bad days. I have bad days. I have bad mornings, bad nights."

Daniel knew he did, knew that sometimes but less often then he used to Johnny would have nightmares, or would get up in the middle of the night. Sometimes Daniel could catch him in the midst of a nightmare and help, but sometimes when he woke in the middle of the night he'd find Johnny in the living room reading. Daniel would come out and lay down on top of him bringing a blanket from their bed and they'd fall asleep there.

There'd been a couple mornings where they woke up with their friends staring down at them.

It didn't happen often but usually Daniel would hear them talking softly and would glare at them with everything he could because they always came so damn early.

But they seemed to get it, that if they were out in the living room Johnny hadn't slept well. The book in his hand usually was pretty obvious. At Mr. Miyagi's Daniel would find Johnny sitting out in the garden, would wrap a blanket around himself and lean against him, throwing half of it around Johnny's otherside. He shifted, leaning against Johnny curled up in his arms.

"What do you want to do for Valentine's Day?" Johnny asked after a while.

"Huh? I guess a quiet dinner at home and sex."

"So a regular night?" Johnny asked with a laugh.

Daniel tilted his head to look up at him. The thought of moving dozens and dozens of boquets sounded exhausting which is what he expected if he didn't say anything. "Yes, I don't want to do anything big. But...I know you like big things, do you have some idea of what you want to do?"

Johnny ran his fingers along Daniel's arm thoughtfully. "Can I make dinner?"

Daniel blinked. He sounded so...tentative. Like he was shy about cooking even though he had cooked before. He'd made Daniel all sorts of Japanese dishes and Okinawan dishes and was now learning with him mom and Abuela so maybe he had some Mexican dish he wanted to try? Or maybe Yukie had taught him something new he wanted to make but was nervous about.

Daniel pushed himself up a little and kissed Johnny's chin.

"Sure. But in exchange, don't get me any flowers," Daniel said settling back down.

Johnny looked down at him in surprise.

"If you're cooking then I'm buying you flowers," Daniel said drumming his fingers on Johnny's legs. That was going to be the best way to avoid drowning in flowers. Plus he liked that idea.

Johnny wrapped his arms around him, pulling him close to his chest.

There was a shop near campus, he could get them after his classes were over, but he'd have to put the order in asap, he assumed Valentine's Day was going to be pure chaos.

As the weeks passed Daniel got used to his schedule. He got used to going to school, to the drive, to the layout of the campus and the his classed. He learned his classmates names, not all of them but more than he'd thought he would at the beginning of the semester.

As February rolled around Daniel went to the flower shop on campus as soon as he could. The woman sitting at the desk looked bored and uninterested, flipping through a magazine.

"Hello," Daniel said.

"Hello, here to put in an order for Valentine's Day?" she asked picking up a pencil and holding it over a notebook.

"Yes."

"How many roses?"

"Oh, no roses."

"So the cheaper carnations?"

"Uh no actually my partner knows floriography. I want to get him something he can enjoy."

She sent the pencil down, looking up at him. "Oh," she grabbed another piece of paper and a pencil. "What do you want the bouquet to say?"

"I want it to be romantic," Daniel said shifting a little awkwardly, "And sweet, and sexy."

"Do you have any flowers you want to be in it?"

"I don't know."

Daniel had meant to go through Johnny's book that morning to get some ideas, but Johnny had been wearing his robe and it was just so easy to grab the edges of it and pull Johnny close and into a deep warm kiss and he'd lost track of time. Johnny had pulled away first quickly giving him a final kiss before running off to get dressed and then out the door.

Daniel was willing to bet that Johnny had taken the stairs instead of the elevator, running so he wouldn't be late to the shop where Mr. Miyagi was expecting him. Daniel had leaned against the counter dazed before realizing he too was in danger of losing the time he'd allotted to put in his request for flowers at the shop before his classes started.

She nodded. "How about pink and red Alstroemeria, lilac but in magenta, and iris?" she asked turning to grab a binder off a shelf and flipping it open, pushing it across towards him. "Alstroemeria in pink is a playful love, red is passionate, they're tiny lilies, there's also a bit of devotion in their meaning too. Lilac is usually thought of in purple," she said flipping the page to a purple and pink flower made up of a whole bunch of tiny flowers, "But I have a supplier who does magenta and while Valentine's Day is a romantic holiday no one usually goes for it so I should be able to get some in time, it's a stronger type of love, plus they smell amazing. And then there's iris which are purple and hold a whole lot of meanings but would tie the color scheme together quite nicely I think. I'd also add some greenery. I could do ivy which is affection, fidelity and friendship, Maybe some sorrrel or spearmint and fern." she said thoughtful.

"It sounds nice," Daniel said nodding.

"Okay, this should be fun, what time can you pick it up?"

"I get out of class around 5 pm on Valentine's Day, can I pick it up then?"

"Yes. I'll set it aside. I'll need a name because I'll have staff helping me then because it's going to be packed."

"Totally understandable."

"Valentine's Day and Mother's Day I am always flooded by last minute customers. So you'll tell the staff your name and they'll hand it over."

"Daniel LaRusso." Daniel said leaning over and watching her pencil out his name hovering over the La, "Russo, R-u-s-s-o."

"Got it, it'll be ready in time. If you can come by let's say tomorrow or Wednesday I can give you how much it'll cost then, I have to check with my supplier first. And then on Friday you can just pick it up."

"Thank you," Daniel said. "I'll swing by then."

The week went by fast. Soccer practice and classes, his apprenticeship at the mechanic, all ate up his time and before he knew it he was pushing his chair back from his final class, his classmates buzzing around him.

"Daniel, we're going to the bar, they have this special for single people on Valentine's day, you bring enough friends you get free shots. They won't card you if you start talking mechanics like you did last time. The bartender totally thought you were a middle school student until they started listening to you."

"I've actually got plans."

"You've got a date?"

"I do."

"How'd you manage that?"

"It's the convertible," another classmate said. "It's a really cool car."

"It's yellow though, come on man you gotta paint it something else. Like anything else would be cooler."

"I like my yellow Ford," Daniel said putting his stuff away.

"He's also doing soccer and learning mechanical engineering in his free time, plenty of girls would go after that."

"True. Actually Daniel, if your date doesn't work out I might have a couple girls I could set you up with."

"I don't think he's going to need it, did you see the girls bringing him chocolate this week?"

"Shit right, well if it doesn't work out let us know."

"Nah, his date's going to snap him up tonight."

"Why are you so sure?"

"Dude's going to be all cool rich and professional when he graduates. It's like what those snobby investment guys are always talking about. Getting in on the action at the ground floor."

They laughed and Daniel shook his head fondly.

"Still on for next week though?" one classmate asked.

"The study group?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah."

"I can still make that."

"Thank goodness. Well we won't keep you from your date, hope it goes well."

"Hope you get laid."

There was laughter, good humor, and he knew they were going to go to the same bar they always went to, full of other college students and they'd drink cheap beer and shots and they'd flirt with girls and complain about missing out on getting chocolate from girls like they used to. If Daniel went he'd share the ones he'd gotten from classmates who he had to turn down. Had to tell them he appreciated it but he couldn't accept, and they said "As friends then, enjoy the chocolate."

He didn't feel like he was going to miss out. He'd made chocolates at his mom's house, and he was going to pick up flowers and then he was going home to Johnny.

He could've told them. He could've corrected them. But he liked being just Daniel. He liked being just a classmate who had a date. Who had plans. He liked being a friendly mystery. He liked keeping his life separate. He liked how he felt at school and at his soccer club. He liked listening to his classmates mundane issues. Like when was it to early to move in with their girlfriends/boyfriends and having no good advice because he'd pretty much moved in before they started really dating. He counted Okinawa. But he liked nodding sagely, to hear other people's issues that were so easy. He wanted that. To worry about what color to paint the living room or what to have for dinner.

But tonight was different. He wasn't worrying about a date or feeling the weight of lonliness while surrounded by pink and reds and couples being annoying. He got to go home and just spend time with Johnny. They weren't going out. They weren't doing anything fancy because they'd agreed. And it was low stakes and lovely.

Daniel stopped by the flower shop to pick up his boquet, telling one of the harried staff members his name, and collecting his boquet. It was as pretty and different then everyone elses and he felt like he'd done good. Tried something different and Johnny was going to like it.

The way home was long, not because it was longer than any other day but because he wanted to be home.

He wanted to see what Johnny was making.

He expected fish. Maybe he and Mr. Miyagi had gone fishing. Maybe they'd agreed, some cute idea of cooking for the people in their lives with fish they'd caught. Daniel expected Mr. Miyagi to cook for Yukie and Sato. And Chozen, belatedly, awkwardly at their table now that Kumiko was back in Tokyo. She was probably going on dates in Tokyo after dance class. Probably giving out chocolates and she'd get flooded with more on White day.

Daniel probably would find something weird at home when he got home. Something Chozen sent. It'd be for the both of them, that's what Johnny would say but it'd be really for Johnny and then Yukie would remind them about white day and they'd have to get Chozen something out of politeness.

Daniel curled his fingers around the steering wheel a little too tightly then sighed, shaking his head. It wasn't worth the energy.

Chozen was lonely. It was fine to every once in awhile get a gift from him because Daniel already won, he already had Johnny.

Jessica said she was sending something too. For everyone. She'd mentioned it in their last call. So he had to stop by the front desk and see if anything had arrived. There might also be stuff from their Moms. They were doing a fancy tea time and then going out for drinks. Which was something also worth worrying about. Mostly because the last time they'd had a drunken outing Daniel had been needled by his mother later about when they were moving into a house, if there were discussing the future. A very drunken reminder that even though Daniel was in a relationship with Johnny didn't mean she didn't still expect grandchildren. Somehow. And Daniel had nearly hung up on her.

They had enough going on. He wanted to enjoy being two. Just Johnny and him. Besides, next time his mom called he'd reminder that technically he already had adopted 4 cobras, three girls and reluctantly Chozen. He couldn't take on any more.

He parked and gathered up his things, lifting up the boquet as carefully as possible. He'd learned while moving 19 birthday boquets that they were fragile, part of their charm he supposed.

He double checked that he had everything and then headed to the front desk, carefully setting the flowers down to take the box the security guard had for him. Balancing it all carefully he headed to the elevator and up to their room.

It'd worked up to this point without squashing the flowers or having to set anything down, but now he had to figure out how to open the door. He didn't want to set it all down. He'd wanted to make a grand enterance but he thumped his head against the door with a sigh trying to figure out the best way to dig out his keys without having to set everything down and possibly squishing the flowers.

The door opened and Daniel stumbled forward, glancing up to see Johnny looking bemused.

"Ah, wait, don't look," Daniel said curling himself over the flowers.

"Well now I want to look."

"Let me put everything down and then give these to you properly," Daniel said.

"Okay," Johnny said stepping back with the door and holding it open for him to come in and take off his shoes, staring up at the ceiling.

"Still don't look," Daniel said quickly kissing his cheek and hurrying past to set the package from Jessica on the coffee table.

He carefully picked up the boquet.

Johnny had shut the door, locking it and wasn't moving.

"Okay, you can look," Daniel said holding out the boquet.

Johnny turned and crossed the distance between them kissing Daniel who quickly held the boquet out of the way.

"Welcome home," Johnny said.

"Don't crush the flowers!" Daniel said. "Get a guy flowers and he kisses you instead of paying any attention to all the hard work you did."

"Okay okay, let me see them," Johnny laughed carefully taking the flowers from him.

Daniel watched him study the boquet, looking at each of the flowers, engrossed the way he was when he was reading. It was cute and also nerve wracking. Like what if the lady at the shop had gotten it wrong? What if she'd stuck something in there that meant something bad? Daniel wished he had Johnny's book to look it over, to compare, cross reference, that maybe he should've done that first.

How long could a guy spend looking at a boquet?

Daniel shifted, feeling his palms sweat.

Why was he so nervous? It was a boquet. Should he have gotten roses instead? Or carnations? Buried Johnny in flowers the way Daniel feared he'd be one day if he let Johnny do as he pleased.

"I'm going to put these in water," Johnny said.

That was it? That was the response Daniel got for getting Johnny flowers? Who gave the guy flowers other than his Mom? He doubted anyone had.

He'd expected tears.

He'd expected something.

Anything.

Daniel sunk down onto the couch and opened the box from Jessica.

The welcome home kiss had been a better response. He pulled out a strange doll that he set on the coffee table with a frown, staring at it. It was terrifying. Brutus was written on it's striped chest. He pulled out a heart shaped box and laughed opening it. Buckeyes. All of it was buckeyes. There was a note, her university mascot was also a buckeye named Brutus. He was going to have to find the most creepy mascot he could to send her back. He wondered what the local mascots were. He'd have to ask around.

He caught movement out of his pariphial and looked up. Johnny was leaning over him, fingers gently under his chin, lifting his chin up, other hand was leaning on the other side of the couch, blue eyes dark. Daniel's heart pounded.

When was the last time Johnny had snuck up on him? When had he gotten so quiet? Had he always been that quiet? That fast? Or had Daniel been that distracted?

"They're beautiful, I love them," he said before leaning in for a kiss.

Daniel had spent now practically 2 years in love with a man who curled up and read, who was quiet and warm and let Daniel paw at him any chance he got. He was so used to a sort of passive Johnny that he'd forgotten in there somewhere was a man trained to strike first, to move swiftly and hard and to give no mercy. He knew that Johnny could probably kick his ass, but he hadn't equated it much to other aspects of Johnny or his life, the kiss he was giving Daniel gave no mercy in possibly the best way and Daniel curled his fingers in Johnny's shirt pulling him closer.

He didn't want to stop, he wanted to pull Johnny down onto the couch, to forget about anything else and just touch and kiss and- Johnny pulled away a smug look on his face.

"What?" Daniel asked.

"You are beautiful."

Daniel felt his face burn and swatted at him.

Johnny shifted back, away from him and Daniel wanted to run after him and jump him. He was pretty sure Johnny would catch him.

"Dinner is ready, when you are," Johnny said moving around the kitchen.

"I'm ready," Daniel said.

The sooner he ate the sooner they could do something else...no, Johnny had been nervous about this. Whatever fish it was, he'd put a lot of work into it and Daniel was going to compliment Johnny into a blushing mess. He passed the flowers, they'd been very carefully and lovingly transferred into a vase and Daniel leaned over to smell them. Johnny had liked them. Pride bloomed in his chest. He'd done well. Especially if the result had been a kiss like that. Maybe he needed to get Johnny more flowers.

He sat down in his seat.

That was a fun thing. Having a chair that was his. Because he sat in it. And Johnny had his chair. At their table. Just like they had spots on the couch and sides of the bed and spots for their toothbrushes. Some of his classmates, some of his teammates bemoaned moving in with one another and Daniel didn't get it. He loved it. He loved every little minute moment of it. All the small things.

A salad was set down in front of him and Daniel stared at it. He'd been expecting a fish. He'd been expecting rice. Why was he being given a salad?

He watched Johnny sit a salad down at his own place and then head back to the stove putting on oven mitts and grabbing a container with a lid. Oh, it was a side, or a starter. He guessed sometimes Mr. Miyagi made salads.

Johnny held his oven mitt over the container thought about it and changed his mind sitting down nervously in front of his own salad. They were going to start with the salad. Okay fine. Keep your secrets Johnny. Just a little longer.

"How was the shop?" Daniel asked.

"Busy."

"How many people gave you their number?"

"We were too busy for me to count. I think Tommy's aunt put in an ad for us that a bonsai would be a good gift for Valentine's Day. So we were as busy as a florist."

"Did you get a lot of chocolates?"

"Some, but I sent them home with Mr. Miyagi to share with everyone," Johnny said with a shrug.

Daniel stabbed at a tomato.

"How about you? How was school? Did you get any chocolates?"

"Yeah, actually, a couple girls gave me chocolate, I turned them down but they insisted."

Johnny nodded, like he'd expected that. Like it made sense that girls had given Daniel chocolates when they hadn't ever before. Daniel ate the last of his salad with a frown.

"Kumiko gave that magazine our info so they could ship something, and I think maybe you need to see it."

"I want to see what you made."

Daniel was hungry. He wanted to eat the main course, give Johnny his chocolates and move on to the real dessert.

"You will, just, I think I need to get it," Johnny said getting up and disappearing into the bedroom and coming out with a big box. He came back and sat it down next to Daniel.

"What is it?" Daniel asked.

"Just open it."

Daniel opened the box and looked in at a whole bunch of envelopes.

"What is this?"

He picked one up and studied it. It was in Japanese but addressed to him, he recognized his name, Kumiko had taught him how to write it. He scanned the letter. He knew some of the words. He looked over it at Johnny.

"They have 10 more boxes."

"What?"

"Our modeling stint was a hit. Everyone liked all of them, but you are getting a ton of fan letters. Kumiko said they'd reached out to her to see if we could go back, or more accurately, if you could go back and do more shoots."

"Me? Why?"

Johnny made more sense. He was classic looking.

"You are hot Daniel, you've got an unofficial fan club now."

"An unofficial fan club? What even is that?"

"I had Kumiko sign me up to find out, she just laughed, but I'm signed up. I get my first welcome packet in a couple of weeks. I'll let you know."

"What?"

"I'm debating being incognito or challenging the president of the club to a duel to become president of the club. But I think I'll have to greatly improve my Japanese."

Daniel looked down into the box. "All of these are for me?"

"Yes."

"And there's 10 more boxes?" Daniel whispered.

"Yup. It's one of the reasons they want you to go there, so they don't have to ship them. It gets pricy."

"I don't understand."

"Daniel, you didn't get chocolates at our school because of Ali. Because all the girls were scared of talking to you or flirting and then we were on bad terms to start off with and they're friends with Tommy. It wasn't because you weren't hot, or they didn't like you. High school is a mess, and everyone was just trying to survive without social repercussions, and I'm sorry about that. I didn't realize how much would ripple. But it's not you."

"I didn't get any growing up either."

"Neither did I."

Daniel blinked looking at Johnny and then frowning. He would've given Johnny all the chocolates. Would've begged his mom to get him the best Valentine's Day gifts at the store to give Johnny.

"Bobby told me this hypothesis he has, and I'm going to share it with you. All through high school and up to high school people are struggling. They're trying to fit in and do what they can to have a somewhat smooth ride. It means making bad choices and pretending to be a person they're not. But then when they go to college there's so many more people and they don't know you and don't have the same cliques and you get to start over, so when they reach this age they get to try and be themselves again. It means the girls who thought you were cute before and didn't say anything now feel like they can. Though they can't, because you're taken, but it means they'll try. Because its a new frontier."

"Am I the new frontier?" Daniel asked amused.

"No. College. Life after high school. Being an adult."

"Do you feel that way?" Daniel asked.

Johnny played with the napkin ring, something Daniel never thought he'd own, never thought he'd have in his home, didn't even know it was a thing until Laura had descended upon their apartment with fancy little things and Daniel loved them, because they were pretty and tied the table settings together. Made home cooked meals feel even more special.

"I don't know if it's so much school being over, or being free," Johnny said. "But I feel like I can be more comfortable now. Now that Sid and Kreese are gone."

"I suppose you and Bobby are right. I feel better now that I'm doing my own thing."

It was also nice to realize people liked him. Actually truly liked him. Not just fake liked him.

He frowned.

He didn't like that realization.

He tried not to think about Silver or about the whole past year after getting back from Okinawa. He tried to focus on the good stuff. He hadn't realized he didn't trust people to be...real. For their actions to be not tied up in some grand scheme. To be liked just by being himself. But there was a box sitting next to him full of notes in Japanese that he was going to practice his Japanese with and dig out his dictionary to better understand. And there were chocolates in his bag and he'd been invited to hang out and something that'd been sticking in his chest felt a little looser. Something he hadn't noticed.

He blinked rapidly. He was not going to cry during dinner over some self realization.

"Okay enough stalling, what did you make?" Daniel said.

Johnny blinked looking across the table at him.

"Right."

Johnny stood.

He cleared the salad bowls.

He was procrastinating.

He was putting it off.

He came back and took a bowl in one hand and then lifted the lid and Daniel pushed himself up to see, to see why Johnny had handed him letters rather than show him what he'd made, had made salad like he needed to have something safe just in case dinner was a disaster.

It was pale yellow.

It was crispy on top.

It smelled amazing.

Daniel looked up at Johnny then noticed something behind him in the kitchen that he hadn't seen before. A familiar looking machine. One that Daniel knew how to use. That Nonnia had taught him how to use.

Daniel felt those tears well up.

"Did you make your own noodles?" Daniel asked.

"Yes," Johnny said heaping a pile into Daniel's bowl and passing it to him.

Daniel leaned forward taking the bowl in both hands staring into it, stunned.

His favorite food.

Made from scratch.

Johnny hovered awkwardly, waiting.

Daniel grabbed a fork and took a bite.

It wasn't his mothers recipe.

It wasn't his Nonnia's.

It was different.

But the root was there.

Just like Mr. Miyagi said Daniel's karate had a root of Mr. Miyagi's karate but then was something else, would become something else. There was a part that Daniel realized meant Johnny had talked to his mother, his Nonnia, and had pieced together a recipe out of their memorized unmeasured recipes and then made it his own.

It was very good and it was a mystery.

It was salty and creamy, the perfect blend of cheeses, and Daniel couldn't recognize them all in one bite, which meant he'd have to eat more, figure out what it was.

The noodles were perfect.

"This is amazing," Daniel said, mouth full watching as Johnny, relieved, filled up his own bowl and took his seat again. Daniel hooked his leg around Johnny's the way he had long ago, but also not so long ago.

"Yeah?" Johnny asked softly taking a bite.

"Yes, you made great noodles and amazing mac and cheese."

Johnny relaxed and nodded, eating.

Daniel wondered how many attempts Johnny had made.

Who all had taste tested?

Johnny was the type to perfect things which meant a ton of effort had been put in on his behalf.

Johnny knew it was his favorite.

One dish, one meal, and if Daniel poked and prodded he was sure he'd see hours of phone calls, lessons with his mother, friends taste testing under secrecy, Laura probably taste testing as well, learning how to use the machine, collecting feedback and just so much work.

To be on the receiving end of that...to know that Johnny would never admit it. Knowing it'd probably been how he always was, a young Johnny working hard to be perfect at everything and for no one to recognize it for so long. Daniel didn't know if he wanted to save it or eat it all. He tried to eat slow, savor it.

"I don't know what all came in the mail, but Jessica sent us buckeyes."

"Oh. We didn't get anything in the mail, but we have enough sweets to last the rest of the month or possibly longer."

Daniel was going to bet Chozen. That Chozen had arrived and burried Johnny in chocolates under the ruse it was for the both of them.

"What were you sent home with?"

"The Browns dropped off a cake via my mom, it's a red velvet. She said she had to fight to get us something normal. They apparently were trying to send her with boozy cupcakes and she had to remind them we're not 21 yet. But she still had like a dozen of those, I think she took those to have with your mom."

"That seems unfair," Daniel said around another mouthful of mac and cheese.

"Your mom asked me to give you something."

"Wait, so how many times did our moms pop by the store today?" Daniel asked.

"Four times. Different levels of drunk," Johnny said.

Daniel could only imagine. Laura popping by in the morning with the cake and the boozy cupcakes, leaving, coming back after a boozy brunch with his own mother with a gift for Daniel and then gone again. Only to do that four times total, on a busy day at the store.

Daniel loved his mom, but he would've snapped at her.

"Chozen came by around lunch. He was very specific over who got what chocolates. There was a little note. I'll show you after dinner."

Daniel frowned, he bet Johnny's were nicer than his. Because of course they would be.

After dinner he swatted away at Johnny every time he tried to help clean up, instead of fishing the truffles he'd made at his mother's apartment for him out of his bag. He set the box in front of Johnny, pushing him back into his chair, leaning down to kiss him gently. "You cooked, I clean."

"But-"

"Don't say I picked up flowers or went to school. You also worked, and interacted with our drunk mom's multiple times today. So please enjoy something sweet."

"Are these the ones you made last year?" Johnny asked opening up the box.

"Yup."

Daniel watched Johnny carefully open the box while he moved leftovers into containers, pleased that Johnny had made so much. He was looking forward to eating those leftovers. Maybe for lunch after a lazy Saturday morning. Maybe he'd take it to class with him and to his apprenticeship. It was a valentine's day gift he could enjoy for awhile.

Johnny had bitten into one of the truffles and Daniel noticed a box sitting on the counter with his name on it. It was in Johnny's hand writing. He wanted to open it but first he had to do the dishes. He forced himself to wait, turning around scrub at the pan, to wash up the last of their dishes that couldn't go in the dishwasher so that they wouldn't have to do it tomorrow and so that the pile in the sink didn't pile up and bother him.

When he finished up and turned around Johnny had moved. He was no longer sitting at their kitchen table but sitting on the couch looking at the stuff Jessica had sent.

The box that had been sitting on the counter with Daniel's name on it was gone. The flowers had been moved over to the coffee table as well.

Johnny picked up the Brutus doll then set it back into the box.

Daniel plopped down next to him. "I could've sworn I saw something with my name on it."

"You did," Johnny said. "But I figure you should see what your Mom got you and Chozen."

"So that box is from you?" Daniel said kicking up his legs over Johnny's lap. Johnny hooked his arms around them. "Yes."

"Alright, let's see," Daniel said picking up the one in his mother's handwriting. That one was easy. Perugina Baci.

"Mom always gets me Italian chocolates. Here, you should try one. They've got love notes in them."

"Love notes from your mom?" Johnny asked raising an eyebrow but taking one of the candies.

"Her and Dad used to exchange them and I'd get like other candies. But when he passed she missed getting them so she made me a deal. She buys a big box on Valentine's Day and I get half," Daniel said unwrapping his. He frowned looking at the note. A mum's hug lasts long after she lets go. It was like the chocolate knew it was from his Mom.

"What's yours say?"

"Lovers can live on kisses and water. It says it's an English proverb, I haven't heard of it. British English maybe?"

"I like that one."

"Really? Kisses and water? Not anything else?"

That felt like a trap. Answering that felt like a bad idea. Especially with Johnny's amused tone and the hand he'd put on Daniel's thigh.

"Okay there are more things I need then just that, it just feels like I could subsite on kisses."

"Yeah," Johnny said. He had a thoughtful look, like he agreed.

"Alright what did Chozen get you?"

Johnny picked up a little box with kanji written on it 本命チョコ. It was pretty, nice paper and Johnny popped it open to show chocolate hearts. They were clearly hand made with little toppings added in. They were cute and looked good.

Daniel was going to steal one of those and eat it. Just to make sure it wasn't poisoned. His was probably going to get like a single ball of chocolate that had fallen off the tray when Chozen had made Johnny's.

"These are yours," Johnny said picking up glossy black boxes and handing them over to Daniel.

"What?" Daniel said staring at them in confusion. The note in kanji was scribbled through multiple times. 超義理チョコ was marked out then 義理チョコ was also marked out and then 友チョコ was written out. Daniel looked at his box and then at Johnny's and then back at his box and then up at Johnny.

"Are you sure those aren't for me and these are for you?"

"Chozen was very clear. The big box is for you."

Daniel opened the box. There was too much inside. Chocolate dipped fruit, gold flaked truffles. More chocolates then he'd seen before, each different, some were colorful. He leaned back eyes wide then back up at Johnny.

"There's got to be a mistake."

"No, that's Compartes," Johnny said. "Chozen bought you that. Plus I can read your note."

"You can read my note, what does that mean?"

"友チョコ*, Tomo choco*, friend chocolate," Johnny said. "Maybe it's an apology?"

"If I got friendship chocolate then what the hell did you get?"

"Homemade chocolate? I don't know I can't read this as well. But he got you the good stuff, that's uh...very expensive."

Daniel stared at Johnny then down at the box horrified.

"What? What do I do now?"

"I don't know. We'll ask Kumiko next time she calls."

"Can we call her now?"

"It's like 11am on Saturday, let her sleep in."

"11am is sleeping in! That's plenty!"

"She said she was going out with friends and dancing. I doubt she got back before 4 am."

"7 hours of sleep is plenty," Daniel said but not moving, staring at the box, at the chocolates. "What do I do with all of these?"

"Eat them?" Johnny said with a shrug before carefully taking the boxes from Chozen and putting them on the coffee table.

"Eat them you say and then you move them away, Johnny what does that mean?" Daniel asked with a laugh.

"Here," Johnny said handing him a box. A familiar looking box with his name on it.

Daniel quickly opened the box, getting a whiff of lavender. He expected circles, stars, but instead all the lavender cookies were hearts. He grabbed one.

"Part of me wonders why we bother when we get so much from other people."

"I can take them back, give them to Mr. Miyagi to take home and share," Johnny said reaching over.

"No, these are mine," Daniel said holding his box of cookies out of the way and shoving the one in his hand into his mouth. "I'm not sharing."

Johnny laughed softly, picking up one of the chocolate hearts and taking a bite.

"Are they good?" Daniel asked around a mouthful of cookie.

"Yes," Johnny said.

"Is this how the rest of our lives are going to be? We try to keep things simple and fail and then everyone else adds to it and then we're just in a mountain of sugar and sweets?"

"Probably. The Browns told me to expect that one of the first times I went to visit them."

"Seriously?"

Johnny nodded. "I'm just relieved Abuela didn't send anything."

"I think we just finished off all the stuff from your birthday."

Johnny set the boxes of treats on the coffee table and leaned over, putting a hand on the armrest next to Daniel's head, kissing him. Warm and sweet, tasting of chocolates. Daniel dug his fingers into the soft fabric of Johnny's shirt, trying to pull him closer though Johnny didn't need the prompting. He shifted, gently moving Daniel's legs off his lap so he could get closer without folding Daniel in half.

Sometimes they lost themselves in kissing. They'd make a decision, just the two of them to watch a movie, or a show and instead when they came up for air again they'd realized they'd missed the whole thing. It's why they'd gotten a vhs machine and started taping their shows, setting the timer, just in case while physically there to watch it, they weren't actually there.

Johnny smelled nice. His hair was soft in Daniel's fingers when he reached up and hooked his arms around Johnny's shoulders. His weight wasn't fully on Daniel, but enough of it was pressed warmly against him, solidly that Daniel liked. It was comforting. Like in this little corner of the world he was safe.

He knew that had been Johnny's top priority when looking at apartments.

Security. Security cameras. Safety.

Daniel's had been sound proofing and privacy. But now he was grateful for it. Hadn't realized how much he'd tightened up about it. That sometimes when he was home, if Johnny wasn't home he didn't relax until he got there. How much worry had settled into his muscles and he'd just accepted that as normal? This high level of functioning under stress and worry and anxiety?

But Johnny made him feel safe. And there was something about having him on top of him that was comforting.

"Let's try it," Daniel said quickly when Johnny pulled away for a breath having moved on to kiss his collar bone. He froze, lips pressed to Daniel's skin, head popping back up to meet his gaze.

"Try what?" Johnny asked.

"You."

Johnny blinked at him it didn't translate, it was too vague.

Daniel's nerve was dying fast. He could be so blunt but this time, for some reason, it just wasn't easy. His face was burning.

Maybe if he kissed Johnny more he'd get more courage. It was well worth trying. For Johnny when things were off the table they were off until explicitly told they were back on, so he wouldn't even be thinking about it. It wouldn't be on his list of options unless Daniel was clear. There were benefits of it. It meant he didn't ever pressure Daniel or ask about things he knew Daniel wasn't interested in.

Johnny's hand was under Daniel's shirt, pushing it up to kiss more skin, so they were going in the right direction. Just not clear.

"Did we bolt the door?" Daniel asked.

Johnny sat back, fingers trailing down Daniel's stomach which tickled and glanced over at the front door. "Yes."

"Okay then," Daniel said sitting up and pulling Johnny's shirt up.

Johnny looked back at him amused, taking it off.

That helped. That helped a lot. He poked at Johnny's chest. He had a plan this time. If he got tense or overwhelmed he'd touch more. It was a good plan. He liked his plan. Simple. Effective. Fool proof. Well he hoped it was fool proof for himself. That meant he was the fool.

"Are you sure we should be here and not-"

"Here is good," Daniel said. He didn't know why but he found the couch comforting. Maybe it wasn't romantic, maybe he'd find Johnny disenfecting it before the next time friends came over, but there was something about being shielded on one side that he liked. Or at least was working for the moment.

"Where-"

"The box under the coffee table," Daniel said.

Johnny turned to look at the lower level of the coffee table, the ornate box sitting on top of the coffee table books Laura had gotten them, the one Ali had gifted them. Big photography books of cars that Daniel found useful, record covers and photographs of musicians from rock music Johnny listened to, a travel book on Japan, and one on flowers.

Johnny picked up the box and Daniel add his clothes to the pile, nervous in a way he hadn't felt in a while grabbing one of the blankets off the back of the couch feeling too exposed all of a sudden and curling up in it.

"Is this what's in all these decorative boxes?" Johnny asked.

"Not all of them," Daniel said. "The one in the kitchen has nutmeg in it."

"Nutmeg?"

"Like the actual seed. There was a sale at one of the spice shops, so we just grate it ourselves. I was going to bake a lot with it," Daniel said draping one leg over Johnny's lap. He'd have to move it eventually. Probably. Maybe.

"Shower caddy in the bathroom, this box here, glove compartment in the cars..."

"Cookie jar in the kitchen."

"That's a dangerous one," Johnny said looking at him surprised.

"I thought it was kind of fun."

"You do realize the guys might think there are cookies in there and then-"

"Get a handful of condoms instead?" Daniel asked with a laugh.

"Yeah."

"What did you think was in there?"

"Nothing," Johnny said. "I almost put cookies in there."

Daniel smiled tugging him down for another kiss.

"I did get you something else," Johnny whispered.

Daniel blinked up at him. He'd hooked his legs around Johnny's waist hoping that'd make it clearer. But now he felt protests riling up. Johnny had already made dinner who knows how much from scratch, noodles from scratch but Daniel was going to look in the fridge later and see if Johnny had made his own cheese too, feared he had and was hoping he'd just picked some up at the sanctuary. He'd made cookies. Now he wanted him to make one more thing.

He couldn't handle more gifts.

Just love. Focus on sex.

"I was at a shop," Johnny said. "I found this artisan who works with glass."

Daniel looked at Johnny in confusion. Why was he thinking about glass when they were going to have sex?

When Daniel was trying to position himself to be as obvious as possible at what he wanted without saying it.

"Will you show me after?" Daniel whispered his chest a little tight.

Johnny smiled and nodded kissing him again. Better. Hands-on him, exploring, touching, feeling. Daniel arched up against him. After a moment Johnny held the box in his hands and looked at Daniel.

"You want to try again? Like-" words seemed to escape him and Daniel bit his lower lip waiting.

He nodded. Maybe Johnny had caught on.

He was pulling away.

No.

Johnny had moved back, slightly down and then Johnny was taking him in his mouth. Daniel pulled the edges of the blanket around his chest, gasping in surprise. Moaning softly as Johnny worked. Maybe he hadn't needed to say anything. He wondered if he should've. Maybe.

Johnny always worried when he wasn't talking a mile a minute. But this was pleasant. He kicked up a leg over the side of the couch, ankle on the back of it to give Johnny more space. Maybe he'd gotten quieter. Had trouble talking as much as he used to. Got locked in his own head more ever since they got back from Okinawa. There were a lot of things he tried locking in boxes and tried not to think about. Lots of things he wanted to avoid. He tried to think he got over them but hadn't, not really. Or at least avoided facing them head-on and just buried them.

A slick finger was in and timed impressively well and Daniel moaned. He was 90% sure he'd be able to go through with it. He hadn't expected it take him this long to feel comfortable. In the grand scheme of things it hadn't been long but it felt long.

One of his classmates hadn't moved in with her boyfriend until after they dated for two years. She didn't think they'd get married until after five. The Cosmo he'd read while bored at the dentist had had a quiz on when to move in together and Daniel had gone through it wondering when they'd recommend and none of them recommended less than a year. And yet here he was.

Maybe it was different when one of you had an abusive ex-stepfather, a parent going through a terrifying and messy divorce, and the other's home had been demolished and mother had moved across the country to take care of a sick family member.

It had just made sense and it was better.

Sometimes Daniel missed it.

Living with Mr. Miyagi.

He missed the garden and the quiet afternoons with tea and he missed being asked to go fishing. But he wouldn't trade it for the world. The privacy or the time they had just to themselves. A lot of the magazines talked about finances and an idea of becoming a team, a unit and discussing all the big lifestyle choices. But Daniel kind of liked being two individuals with separate bank accounts, who were making enough that that sort of question didn't come up. They split their bills and they split chores. Just like they had when living with Mr. Miyagi.

Sometimes living together didn't work. Someone did more cleaning or cooking, someone felt like they were contributing more financially and sure Daniel worried sometimes that maybe everything wasn't nice enough for a boy from the Hills. He dreamed of buying a house out there in Encino with a pool and a nice garden and to live there with Johnny. That would be what Daniel expected Johnny to want. A big house with a nice yard and lots of plants. Something fancy.

But Johnny seemed perfectly happy with their apartment. A quiet reminder that anything that was theirs was enough. If it'd had good security Johnny would've probably been okay with a studio apartment.

If his mother hadn't won her divorce. Maybe that's what would've happened and maybe even that would've been good enough.

He was so easy to please and had such low expectations that Daniel wanted to spoil him. To give him everything he could because Johnny didn't think twice about doing the same for him. He made it seem so easy to spend all his savings on Daniel. Because he knew what to do when there wasn't any money. He knew how to survive. Back up plan after back up plan.

Daniel never wanted him to have to think of back up plans like that again.

He wanted to dream nice dreams of the future. No worries about dangers or money or anything at all. And Daniel was so sure they'd get there. Sooner than any plan he'd made in a guidance counselors office.

His ten-year plan.

Graduate, move on from his apprenticeship, open his own place, move into a bigger apartment, buy a house, marry Johnny. But he kept his plan in his head because saying it out loud sounded like too much, that there was a chance he'd jinx it. He wanted to keep these wishes secret and deep in his heart until they were for sure.

"Okay," Daniel hurried to say before it was over. Before a combination of sensations tipped him over the edge. He felt like a wreck. Did Daniel tell him enough how good he was at this? Probably not.

Johnny's head rose up with a wet pop and he shifted, watching, waiting, still going slow but Daniel didn't mind this time. He felt like some of that irritation had been smoothed. The need to protect Johnny, to keep him safe, to always keep an eye out for danger....it'd all settled into a nice mundane life.

Daniel no longer questioned why his classmates talked to him.

He didn't over-analyze every single interaction he had with them, with his teachers. Every time someone slapped him on the back and told him he was doing good he didn't wonder if they secretly wanted something from him.

It wasn't perfect.

He still was uneasy when the barista on campus chatted with him, or if a professor said they wanted to talk after class about a project.

He didn't trust that any compliment was genuine or that every smile was real.

But he no longer jumped when someone walked up behind him, or someone taller than him leaned too close or brushed up against him. He no longer only felt safe in a select few places or with Johnny.

Somewhere along the way that feeling that had been a seed when he moved to LA, when he got jealous of all the Encino kids and their cool cars and their cool bikes and their big houses had festered rather than healed.

Having Johnny look at him, the way he did now. The way he always did helped that busted ego of his.

It was like a balm that Johnny let him touch and have what he wanted. That he got to be in control of the few things he could be in control of.

That he felt... wanted. And Johnny definitely wanted him. And that was a thrill.

He worried that if he hadn't been with Johnny if their paths had diverged then he'd have isolated himself after Silver pulled the rug out from under him. That he wouldn't love or be loved for a long time, too scared to be around anyone, to trust that he'd made it until he proved it to himself.

He'd be alone, except for Mr. Miyagi for a long time.

He was grateful, grateful to have Johnny and the guys, that his mother was in the same city, that everyone was there and that because of Johnny he had ridiculous experiences. Chances to feel cool and badass.

No one else he knew got hundreds of letters because they showed up in advertisements in Okinawa on a whim because the guy they liked got to model.

No one else got a gigantic box of chocolates from a once upon a time enemy that said they were friendship chocolates. And while Daniel still had a bad feeling about it, that there was something bad he was missing, he'd still been included and they were nice chocolates.

Johnny was kissing him again, waiting. Waiting for Daniel to relax around him to be less tense, Daniel was pretty sure it'd take years to be less tense, but even just a couple of months, heck a month had been a great improvement.

Socializing, getting out of the house, had helped. Shaking up his routine and starting a new one.

"You okay?" Johnny asked. "I can pull out."

"Don't you dare," Daniel said. "I'm good, you're good, you can move."

Johnny studied his face as if checking for lies.

Daniel nearly asked him why, why'd he'd think Daniel would lie about that, but then remembered how adamant he'd been last time when it'd been a no go. Last time when Johnny's gentle care had been irritating when Daniel felt like he had to prove something. Something that clearly he hadn't been able to bluff.

"Johnny," Daniel said putting a hand on Johnny's chest. "If you don't start moving I will start moving. Or we can both move, but I'm very serious."

Thankfully Johnny didn't need further prompting. Daniel knew his body and what he liked, or at least had figured it out. Johnny though seemed to have a good idea himself. A small part of him thought smugly that maybe he'd showed Johnny what he liked every single time. That he'd learned by example. Because it was good, toe curling, romance novel back archingly good and Daniel didn't know what he wanted any more. There was too much of everything, but he wanted more.

He wanted to spend days with a flip of a coin. He didn't mind. He liked it. Both. And he had a feeling Johnny did too.

Those blue eyes were full of love and want, a need that Daniel felt in his veins. This opened up so many more doors. The more comfortable he became again, the more he healed. He could ask Johnny if he could do it standing, holding Daniel up with nothing behind him, just in the middle of the room, something Daniel wished he could do but knew he couldn't. Johnny could just lift him up, move him anywhere and Daniel liked that idea. Johnny could pick him up and gently set him on the countertops, they hadn't done that yet. There were so many more options, combinations, things to retry from a new perspective.

He was talking. Maybe too much. But Johnny was smiling, kissing him, not on the lips though Daniel noticed. His neck, his cheeks, a peppering of kisses. Daniel threw his arms around Johnny pulling him closer, kissing him, all hunger all need and Johnny met him with the same dizzying intensity.

Parts of it were the same, the intense feeling of pleasure, the feeling of release, but some of it was new.

Johnny started to shift back, to politely pull out and Daniel hooked his legs around Johnny.

"Stay."

"But-"

"Just lay down."

"I will crush you."

Daniel laughed, a breathy tired laugh. "You won't."

Johnny laid down, shifting slightly, brow furrowed, but wrapping his arms around Daniel as best he could. It was a comforting weight and pressure. Daniel waited to catch his breath, a question popping up to the surface.

"Why'd you stop kissing me?" Daniel asked.

"Now?" Johnny asked looking up at him amused.

"No, during."

"You were talking."

"So?"

"I didn't want to interrupt."

"I think you're the only person on the planet who never wants to shut me up."

"Oh definitely not," Johnny said smiling, "There's no way I'd want to do that, especially when you were complimenting me, telling me how much you love me, and also barely able to string together sentences."

"What?" Daniel asked.

"Do you realize what you talk about when we have sex?"

"Sometimes," Daniel said brow furrowed trying to remember what he'd said.

He couldn't. Not all of it. Did he want to know? No. Yes? No.

It was probably embarrassing. That smug pleased look made him think maybe he didn't want to know. Sometimes he spoke and didn't think about it, words didn't stop to register before falling from his lips.

"Well," Johnny said settling his head in his hand, elbow resting next to Daniel's head, looking down at him. "You usually tell me how pretty I am. How hot I am. How good I feel." He blushed a little, ears pink. "You also tell me how much you love me and go into details. This time...how much you were enjoying it came up a lot. How much you liked looking at my muscle from that angle-"

"It is very nice," Daniel said pushing some of Johnny's hair behind his ear. Fingers trailing down his arms. He patted Johnny's arm. "Okay, I'm ready. One more time."

Johnny laughed. "Is that why you didn't want me to-"

"Yup."

"How many one more times do you want?" Johnny asked pushing himself back up.

"How many do you think you got in you?" Daniel challenged.

"Plenty," Johnny said kissing the top of Daniel's forehead. "As long as I get water from time to time."

"Like your little chocolate?"

"The one you gave me? The Italian one? Yeah. Kisses and water and I should be fine."

"I would tease you about taking your time but-" Daniel shifted. He could feel Johnny's renewing interest and energy.

Johnny kissed him gently. "Let me give you that gift first."

Daniel frowned. "Really? Now? Can it wait until after this round?"

"No, it's still time out."

"Still time out? Who says?"

"Just let me-" Johnny reached into a bag Daniel hadn't noticed on the other side of the couch and pulled out something red and made from glass. He put it in Daniel's hands.

A jar. Daniel stared at it.

"For all the stuff you want to try."

Daniel looked at Johnny, then at the jar.

"It's ruby red," Johnny said.

It was pretty but what stuff was Daniel wanting to try. They already had a date jar.

Oh.

"Is this our sex jar?" Daniel asked. "Like are you saying I put all the ideas in here and then we'll draw them out and try them?"

Johnny blushed. "Out of all the things I expected you to call it, that was not it. But yeah. I mean I reserve the right to say no."

"Of course," Daniel said, running his fingers over the red glass, before very carefully setting the jar aside. That would be a fun project. He pushed himself up and kissed Johnny. "It's perfect."

Daniel was making coffee and waffles.

It was a lazy Saturday morning and he was waiting for Jonny to wake up again.

Johnny had already woken up once in a slow soft way in Daniel's arms. Daniel had rubbed up against him, partially a question, partially just to let him know that he was awake and Johnny had responded in a groggy but welcoming way, pressing close. Now he was partially sated, waiting for Johnny who'd fallen back asleep to wake up again. Daniel had only managed to get one word out of him, a response to What would you like for breakfast?
Waffles.

After a while, he heard the soft footsteps and turned to pass a mug of coffee into Johnny's hand. His hair was mussed, made worse from morning sex and Daniel loved it. He was wearing a robe, the short summer one, very loosely tied, like half asleep and well fucked he couldn't be bothered to do anything more than partially cover himself until after he had his coffee. Daniel wanted to grab him by the hips and pull him close and see if that would wake him up if he'd be surprised and turn red. If they could see if the dining room table was the right height to lay Johnny out on to enjoy.

But Johnny had already moved on in his sleepy motions, a warm soft kiss and then he'd plopped down with his coffee at the table, in his chair staring at the brown liquid, waiting for the smell to wake him up enough to drink it.

Daniel pulled the waffle off the waffle iron and plopped it down on a plate, setting it in front of Johnny before turning back preparing the next one and ready to wait, knowing that by the time Johnny finished his cup of coffee, once he'd had his waffle then he'd be down, ready to listen to Daniel's proposition.

A knock sounded and Daniel turned to Johnny. Their friends would've tried to get in with a key first.

"Neighbor kid keeps getting locked out," Johnny mumbled into his coffee.

Daniel sighed heading over to the door, unbolting it and throwing the door open.

"Morning Cuz," Louie Jr. said pushing past Daniel with a bag over his shoulder that he dumped onto the couch. "Oh, waffles! Awesome! Hey

Johnny!"

Johnny waved sleepily, not fully registering the same shock that Daniel was feeling. Louie Jr. was, for some reason in LA, with a bag, in his apartment.

Louie was talking to Johnny who was nodding, not really absorbing anything yet other than a little dose of caffine every once in a while Louie helped himself to the waffle that had finished cooking and was looking at Johnny, staring at the haphazard robe in a way Daniel definitely did not like.

He could feel his morning plans, lazy and sex-filled as they were, slipping from his grasp as he stood frozen at the door.

"Louie, what are you doing here?" Daniel said, hoping, begging the universe that Louie would fold the waffle up, shove it in his mouth, grab his bag, and head right back out the door.

"I came to stay with you," Louie said pouring himself a cup of coffee, taking his plate of waffles, and sitting down next to Johnny, making himself at home.

Chapter End Notes

Recipes:
filetto di pomodoro tuscan chicken arancini di riso
Mac and Cheese
Buckeyes

The chocolates Daniel and his mother enjoy with notes

Brutus the Buckeye mascot

The chocolate explanation.
Chozen made Johnny Honmei-choco. "These sweet treats are often hand-made for an extra personal touch and given exclusively to a significant other"
For Daniel he originally wrote:
Giri-choco – Roughly translated as ‘obligation chocolate’

There are different levels of this. You can read about the different chocolate levels and types given on Valentine's Day here. here.

Compartes. I tried to find a chocolate brand that was expensive and existed in LA in the 80's. This is what I found.

The poem Johnny quotes to Jessica

White Day

Chapter Notes

Hello again.

You may have noticed that the chapter number end is gone. That's because of...writer hubris.

I thought, ah yes I can tie this up in a single chapter. Well the last one was over 100k and every time I tried to transfer the document anywhere it murdered the program and made ao3 grumpy. And this...was 160k before I started editing and then because I guess I have a problem ... after editing it became 180k. 👄

There's no way ao3 would take that. So I've chopped it up into chapters that are more bite sized, which honestly... feels better? So we're going to try how we started. I've got about 15 chapters and I'm going to try and post them daily until we reach the end. 💖

Another note. I got a little confused at where the line is between M and E and at some point gave up and might've tripped over the line. So proceed with caution? If I need to change some tags or ratings let me know but I feel like I didn't fall that far over the line it's more like I lost the line, got confused and then gave up? And since you made it all the way here I'm sure you know it takes nearly 100 chapters for anything to happen so marking a 100+ chapter slow burn fic E feels...cruel? I don't know if that's right but.. I tried. That's really all I can say for myself. And thanks.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

A blanket was wrapped around him and Johnny stared blankly at it, confused. He wasn't awake yet.

He'd still been just sipping at his coffee, had only a bite of his waffle when it'd been draped over him.

It was the soft cozy one. The nice one.

He yawned.

Maybe he should go back to bed. He kind of wanted to. But if he did he wondered if Daniel would join him. A nice lazy day seemed good.

Daniel was standing next to him stiffly staring at Louie. He looked unhappy.

"You know I was kind of expecting something else, but that's a look for sure," Louie said motioning toward Johnny with a shrug.

Johnny looked up at Daniel, his lips were pursed, that was no good.

He reached out, gently pulling Daniel into his lap. He hugged Daniel to his chest and pressed a kiss against the back of his head.

He smelled a little sweaty, a little like sex, but also like waffles and coffee.

Johnny put his head on Daniel's shoulder and cut up a piece of waffle. He offered it to Daniel who shook his head.

Johnny sat back and ate it. Being careful not to get syrup on Daniel or the blanket or himself. That was a huge task. So he switched to his coffee.

He wasn't awake enough.

"So this is what mornings look like here," Louie said.

"Louie how'd you get here?"

"I took a bus."

"A bus?

"Yeah. Easy peasy."

"Does your mom know?"

Louie got quiet eating his own waffle.

Daniel let out a sigh, a world weary sigh. "Louie, are you saying your mom hasn't heard from you for nearly 3 days?"

"It's fine ," Louie mumbled into his waffle.

Johnny took another sip of his coffee. He felt like he needed to focus. To wake up.

The atmosphere was tense. The quiet promises Daniel had made earlier seemed to be disappearing, fading.

The answer was more coffee.

He was still holding his fork, why was he holding his fork?

That meant he wasn't holding Daniel.

He set the fork down and wrapped his arm around Daniel again, sipping his coffee.

"Is he broken? What did you do to him?"

"He's not awake yet, give him time."

"He was more awake in Newark."

"That's because he wasn't comfortable."

"What? Why wouldn't he be comfortable in Newark?"

Daniel huffed another sigh.

"Oh right," Louie said.

"I don't get it either, but sometimes he sleeps really well and this is how he is in the morning. Takes a while for him to wake up on these mornings."

"Why do you look proud of that?" Louie asked motioning towards Daniel with his fork. "Wait, is it because-? Gross. Seriously? I thought you said you weren't doing that enough because your friends kept breaking in."

"They have keys, it's not breaking in. And we weren't expecting company."

Daniel shifted in his lap and Johnny met brown eyes.

He kissed Daniel. Warm, soft, sweet.

He wanted to go back to bed.

He needed more coffee.

Daniel pulled away, slowly, reluctantly and carefully combed his fingers through Johnny's hair, fixing it.

He was going to have to get dressed wasn't he?

Johnny lowered his head and leaned his forehead against Daniel's chest.

He'd wanted to eat his waffle, drink his coffee and see what Daniel had up his sneaky sleeves. Maybe read later in the day. But he got the hint.

He had to wake up.

He sighed and lifted his head downing the rest of his coffee. He set the coffee down and waited.

Maybe Daniel needed to be wrapped up in the blanket.

He could do that.

Daniel's hand took his. Both of them.

"The blanket's for you. I'm going to make myself a waffle," Daniel said kissing his cheek and squeezing both hands before getting up, adjusting the blanket a little.

That made sense.

Daniel should eat.

Johnny scooted in towards the table.

Daniel poured him more coffee setting creamer and sugar out.

He drank his coffee and ate his waffle, looking around.

Louie.

Why was Louie there?

He'd said he'd taken the bus.

That was like a 2 day journey plus 17 more hours if lucky.

The kid had to be exhausted.

"Did you get any sleep?" Johnny asked.

Louie looked up from his waffle.

"Uh, not really."

"You should sleep," Johnny said. "That's too long to be awake. Eat, shower, sleep."

"Johnny," Daniel said softly. "He needs to talk to his mom."

Johnny blinked looking at Daniel who sat down next to him, he shifted towards him, gently pressing his leg against Daniel's.

"You stayed up for most of the flight to Okinawa, that was shorter. Did you call your mom once we landed?"

"Hey," Daniel said, then he studied Louie and sighed and took Johnny's hand in his. "I'll call your Mom and let her know you're here, you can shower and take a nap. Then we should talk. Deal?"

"Deal. Thanks Cuz," Louie said finishing his food and his coffee that Johnny was pretty sure had been Daniel's.

Daniel waved him off and Louie set his stuff in the sink.

"Bathroom is to the right," Daniel called when Louie looked around confused.

He sighed putting his head in his hand turning to Johnny.

"What?"

" What you say. You do realize, we just lost our privacy."

"What do you mean?"

"I could be wrong, but a LaRusso shows up on your doorstep unannounced they tend to not leave."

"Oh, I know that," Johnny said.

Daniel blinked at him then turned towards him fully. "Hey!"

"Best thing that ever happened to me," Johnny said with a grin taking another sip of his coffee.

It was hot under the blanket, it was too fluffy.

He shrugged it off.

Daniel had his mouth open as if he was about to say something but he didn't say anything.

"What?" Johnny asked.

"This isn't fair," Daniel complained.

"What isn't?"

Daniel turned his head towards the bathroom, staring and then turned back to Johnny. He leaned forward, towards him, kissing him warmly, putting his hands on Johnny's thighs.

"I wanted," Daniel whispered. "To spend the day just with you, between your thighs."

Johnny blushed as Daniel ran his fingers along the edges of the robe. Pausing to pull the robe back a little, lowering his head to press a kiss on his chest. Then flicking his tongue out and dragging it across Johnny's skin.

Dangerous. It was too dangerous.

"Johnny," Daniel whispered fingers in the edge of his summer robe. "It's frustrating to have you here, like this, and-" He gestured towards the bathroom. "Torture. It's like torture."

Johnny took Daniel's hand, carefully prying his fingers free from the robe. He kissed Daniel's fingertips.

He got it.

He sighed kissing Daniel, holding his hands in his.

"We'll figure it out, eventually, some time that's just ours. But, something must be up, he's been having a rough time after all."

"I know," Daniel sighed. Pouting. "But I wanted to make love to you after breakfast."

"I wanted to too," Johnny said letting go of Daniels hand and standing up. "I'm going to go get dressed."

" No ," Daniel said.

"No? Daniel I'm not going to just walk around covered in a warm blanket all day."

Daniel sighed with a pout, reaching out and touching the hem of the robe. "I love this."

"Love it huh?" Johnny asked, amused. "Want to borrow it?"

"No, well, maybe, but I love it on you," Daniel said. "I can see your chest, your thighs, there's so many nice options with it."

Johnny placed his hands on the back of Daniel's chair and leaned down to kiss him again.

Daniel's arms wrapped around his waist, sliding down grabbing his ass. Johnny could imagine that sweet weekend dream. A lazy day wrapped up in one another's arms, hands on one another, feeling, touching, being.

But.

They weren't alone.

Louie was there and Louie was a teen. And Louie was having a rough time. Really they were lucky that he'd shown up there and not run away somewhere else. Johnny had nearly done that, but he hadn't thought he had anyone to go to.

He'd have been lost to the wind.

Gone.

Like a ghost.

Damn, he should've walked away.

He should've just kissed the top of Daniel's head and given a little spin or something to tease Daniel and left to put on clothes for the day. Because he really hadn't dressed.

He'd just thrown on the robe when he got up the second time.

He hadn't slept in too long after. But Daniel's hands felt good and they were on his skin, sneaky sneaky hands, and even though he knew it couldn't go there because who knew how long of a shower Louie was going to take… however long it was wasn't long enough, and Daniel still had to call. But...dammit. It was like because his body remembered, it was sensitive or something and he was moaning in the damn kiss he'd started.

Johnny wanted to take Daniel back to their bedroom. But they had to be responsible.

Responsible.

Why?

Why did they have to be responsible?

Johnny was tired of being responsible. He was tired of being in charge.

He was tired.

He wanted- Daniel pulled away.

Johnny nearly lost his balance leaning in after him.

Daniel studied him dark brown eyes and those damn beautiful lips.

"Fuck."

"Yeah."

"Maybe?"

"Maybe."

"No."

"Right."

"Dammit."

Daniel let out a frustrated groan. "Escape, run away,"

"Problem," Johnny murmured.

Daniel looked at him, eyebrow raised.

"I don't want to."

"Now? Now you-- all the times I tried at Mr. Miyagi's to seduce you?"

"I'm tired of being responsible."

"You're having your rebellious phase now? And this is what you're choosing to be rebellious on?" Daniel asked standing up. "Okay, I'm sorry for winding you up. I'm sorry for being a little too handsy. I'm sorry for pulling you back in. I'm sorry for teasing you. I'll figure out how to make it up to you. Sometime, when we have time."

Johnny sighed.

He was right.

This was a bad time.

What had he thought would happen?

He knew what he'd hoped.

That Daniel would make a quick call and then follow him into the bedroom.

He grabbed the blanket off the chair and threw it over his shoulders. He headed towards the bedroom. He tried to think of something else. Tried to pull himself back from the edge. Away from the warmth that was fading from where Daniel had been touching him.

He flopped onto the bed.

Maybe he'd go back to bed.

Restart his brain.

It took a while but he eventually pushed himself back up, got dressed, grabbed a book and headed back out.

Louie was out of the shower. He studied Johnny, then clapped him on the shoulder before passing him.

"We've got a couch, you can sleep here," Daniel said.

"Thanks," Louie said.

There were other blankets on the couch and a pillow. Daniel had probably gotten them from the closet and Louie curled up.

Johnny sat down at the table next to Daniel who was fiddling with a piece of paper. He passed it to Johnny as soon as he sat down.

He left a note. Didn't say where he was going. Aunt is happy he made it safe. Requested we keep an eye on him for a little bit. Things are rough and chaotic at home and the less people around, as awful as it it is to say this, the better. Aunt will call Ma.

Johnny took the note and pen and wrote: What do you want to do?

Daniel took it back, scribbled, and passed it back. Johnny looked at the piece of paper. There was a stick figure bent over a surface You was pointed at it as another figure definitely wasn't just hugging the first one. Me the arrow said pointing at the other figure and there were a few little hearts around the two.

Johnny looked up at Daniel who grinned and winked.

They'd already both agreed that was a fail for the rest of the day.

Now he was just being a tease.

Cruel.

Johnny grabbed the pen from Daniel quickly flipping the paper over.

I meant about Louie Jr.?

Daniel pouted taking the paper back, writing longer than Johnny expected.

I guess he's staying here if that's okay. For a bit. Until things calm down at home and I can figure out why he came to us and didn't just stay with Nonnia and Nonnio. Or can talk him into going home. California might do him some good. For this exact moment I'm thinking I'll get some groceries. Things I know he likes and also something different for dinner. I don't want to leave him alone. Do you mind watching him while I go to the store? I mean you can just read.

Johnny nodded and Daniel got up, kissing his temple and giving his shoulder a squeeze before grabbing his wallet and keys.

It wasn't the day off Johnny had planned. But he read, he exercised quietly in their room, he helped put away groceries when Daniel got back. Louie woke up in the middle of the afternoon for lunch and then watched TV stubbornly sitting between the two of them on the couch.

"I've got class today," Daniel said, facing Louie who was rubbing his eyes from his spot on the couch. "Johnny's going to the shop. We already called Mr. Miyagi, so he knows your coming."

"What?" Louie asked.

"Just be a little helpful okay? Like say hello to customers, help carry stuff. You should be in school but at least staying with Johnny and Mr. Miyagi will keep you out of trouble."

"But Cuz," Louie complained.

"You can't come to school with me and I'm not leaving you here alone."

"But I'm not a kid. What, you think I'm going to find your porn or something?"

"I don't think we have porn..." Daniel said thoughtfully before shaking his head. "No, I don't want you to accidentally set the place on fire or get lost in LA. I'd rather someone be in charge of you and Johnny's offered to hang out with you for the day, so be nice to him. He leaves in like a half hour so don't keep him waiting. I gotta go."

Daniel turned to Johnny, who was pouring a second cup of coffee for Louie, and kissed him.

"Have a good day," Johnny said.

"You too."

Daniel turned pointing to Louie. "Be good."

Louie sighed. "Yeah."

The door shut behind Daniel.

"How do you like your coffee?" Johnny asked. "We've got cereal, you okay with cereal?"

"Yeah, " Louie said. "Uh black."

Johnny nodded setting the coffee down on the table and then grabbing the cereal, a bowl, spoon and milk, setting it in front of Louie. He finished getting ready to go, moving the bonsai and making their bed. When he came back out Louie was standing by the door wearing his shoes and a jacket and with his hands in his pockets.

"Ready?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah," Louie said.

Johnny flicked off the lights and led Louie down to the garage and to the Avanti.

"Holy shit that's your car?" Louie gasped, running up to the red convertible.

"Yeah," Johnny said, unlocking the drivers side door and leaning over to unlock Louie's side.

"Can we drive with the top down?"

"Sure," Johnny said looking around to make sure there was nothing that would fly off when they reached a good speed or the wind picked up, and pushed the button.

Louie had looked kind of down but now he was looking around him in awe. Johnny had worried he'd be sullen, upset that he couldn't hang out with his cousin.

Which Johnny got. He'd also want to spend all day with Daniel if he could.

Johnny drove to the shop with music playing, Louie was looking around in wonder. Taking everything in. Johnny supposed he hadn't seen much, exhausted from such a long bus ride on his own.

He wondered why Louie hadn't called.

Why he hadn't reached out ahead.

They would've picked him up.

Maybe he didn't know?

"If you'd called, we'd have come to get you from the bus stop," Johnny said.

"Thanks," Louie said quietly, almost too quiet to hear over the wind.

Johnny parked the Avanti around back, behind Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees and put up the top, locking the car when Louie got out.

Louie looked up at the building with a frown.

"You really don't mind working here?"

Johnny looked at him blankly, putting his keys in his pocket.

"I mean, this isn't your dream, it's Mr. Miyagi's right? And it wasn't your idea, it was Daniel's. Don't you feel kind of...abandoned?"

"I like plants," Johnny said with a shrug. "And I see Daniel every day."

Louie stared at him and Johnny stared back for a moment, waiting to see if he had anything else to say or ask before heading towards the door and motioning for Louie to follow.

When they got in Johnny went to work setting up. Turning on the lights, taking stock of the stuff from the night before, looking over all the trees with a little clipboard.

"Where's Mr. Miyagi?" Louie asked.

"Every other Monday we take a half day, but we alternate. It's his turn. He'll be here around lunch."

"Why?"

"So we can get errands done. I open on my own this morning."

"Isn't that... a lot of work to do by yourself?" Louie asked with a frown.

He was following Johnny. Closer than Johnny would've liked. But he supposed Louie didn't know where to go, or where to sit or what to do. He'd have to think of something for Louie to do. Too bad he didn't have paper and crayons, but Louie was probably too old to be put in a corner and asked to draw nice pictures.

"It's not that bad. We don't get busy until around lunch time anyway, which is why Mr. Miyagi and I agreed on this time to run errands. You can sit here if you want," Johnny said patting a stool.

He flipped the sign to open and sat down in front of one of the bonsai's he was supposed to work on.

Louie sat down across from him on the stool.

"So, you cut these all day?" Louie asked.

"Not all day. Mr. Miyagi does most of the cutting. When Daniel worked here I did more of the backroom stuff. I'd do supply runs for soil and pots and anything Mr. Miyagi needed. Daniel answered calls and did the sales stuff. I do that now. And then take the books home for Daniel to balance once a month or so."

"So you talk to customers?"

"Yeah. And take orders and do designs."

Louie sat back thoughtfully then leaned forward looking at the tree.

"And your not like mad at Daniel or anything?"

"For what?" Johnny asked.

"Buying this place, setting it up and then changing his entire course of life."

"No," Johnny said. "This is Mr. Miyagi's dream, like you said. I think it's really sweet of him."

Louie frowned. "Why aren't you doing karate?"

"I do kata with Mr. Miyagi," Johnny said. "And Daniel."

"I mean tournaments and stuff. Aren't you some karate badass?"

"I was, I suppose. Once upon a time."

"Once upon a time," Louie repeated. "Seriously? Seriously seriously?

"What?" Johnny asked.

"You. Didn't you win two tournaments? Didn't you go to Okinawa and learn like ancient techniques? And now, now you don't really practice? You just stopped?"

"Louie, karate is...a difficult subject for Daniel and I at the moment."

"How?"

"Do you know about my old sensei?"

"Yeah," Louie said sourly. "And that Silver guy. But you still put in all that work. You put years of your life into studying something and now-- now you're giving it up to cut trees in a dusty shop? By yourself? Where are your friends? Where are the people falling over themselves because you've got trophies? This isn't badass. This is...this is...sad. You've been left behind."

Johnny set his tools down and looked at Louie. He'd spoke as if it hurt him . Not Johnny. Johnny wasn't sure they were really talking about Johnny or karate. Maybe it was a metaphor. A front. Something Louie was projecting onto. Which meant Johnny had to be careful. Tread slowly.

"I'm happy where I am. To be fair, I also put years into learning other things and had to stop learning them as well...maybe I'm used to it. Louie, what do you want to do?"

Louie stared at him for a moment. "What else did you have to stop learning?"

"All sorts of musical instruments, surfing, magic, all sorts of stuff," Johnny said.

"You can do magic tricks?" Louie asked.

"It's been a long time," Johnny said.

Maybe it wasn't that deep. Maybe Louie did pity him or something.

The door opened and Johnny saw Chozen walking in with his two cups of coffee. Louie turned then reached over and smacked Johnny on the arm.

"Aren't you supposed to say welcome to Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees or something?" he whispered.

"Good morning Chozen," Johnny said.

Chozen motioned to Louie with his coffee cup, "Whose this?"

"Oh, wait you're Chozen? Like the Chozen?" Louie asked standing.

Chozen passed a coffee to Johnny.

"Louie Jr. LaRusso meet Chozen Toguchi, Chozen Toguchi this is Daniel's younger cousin Louie Jr."

"Another LaRusso?" Chozen asked. "How many are there?"

"Quite a lot of them actually," Johnny said taking a sip of his coffee watching the two of them carefully.

"Hey, did you really fight my cousin to the death in Okinawa?" Louie asked leaning forward towards Chozen.

"Uh, yeah," Chozen said with a frown.

"What are you doing here?"

"He's a karate master. He's working on opening the Miyagi-do dojos," Johnny said.

Both turned towards him surprised.

"No way," Louie said eyes wide. "Do you do that chores are actually secret lesson stuff?"

Chozen blinked and looked back at Louie. It looked like he regretted coming in and was trying to find an escape.

"No. Government contract. I will teach a regular dojo."

Louie nodded clapping Chozen's shoulder, leaving it there for a second. "When do you open?"

Chozen looked at Johnny who shrugged.

"Not sure yet. Speaking of dojo. Gotta go back to work. Bye," Chozen said raising his coffee in a cheers towards Johnny and heading back to the door.

Louie turned back to Johnny, hands coming down on his shoulders. "That was a karate master? You seriously have sensei's who just show up? And you don't, you don't study? Why aren't you learning with him?"

"His dojo used to be my dojo," Johnny said quietly. "I'm not ready."

"Your dojo," Louie repeated.

His hands were heavy. It was bizarre that he was related to Daniel. He was taller, broader. But he was touchy. Like Daniel.

"Oh shit, Cobra Kai?" Louie asked after a bit stepping back.

"Yeah," Johnny said.

He drank some more of the coffee.

"How'd that happen?"

"I made it happen," Johnny said.

He needed to just cut a few more things and then this bonsai would be done.

Five minutes. He needed five minutes of quiet. Of peace. But he wasn't going to get that and it was unfair to ask for it.

"Asked him to."

Louie sat down on the stool again, slowly. "I bet he's made it different huh?"

"I'm sure he has. My mom went, she said it's different. But... I'm not ready," Johnny said. "If you want to go, we can get you a ride out that way with Chozen or Sato, but I can't, and I don't think you should ask Daniel."

"Yeah, I'm not going to," Louie said quietly looking at the table.

He seemed to get quiet for a bit and Johnny jumped at his opportunity to work on the bonsai.

Focus.

Quiet.

Everything he needed.

He made a snip. He went to work.

It was almost done.

Just a few more minutes.

Just a few more breaths and-

"You like Daniel right?"

So close.

"I love him," Johnny said.

"What do you love about him? How'd you know?"

Louie was lucky. Real lucky. That he'd picked Daniel to talk about.

"I couldn't stop thinking about him. And once I was no longer...mad. Once I was no longer angry, once I reevaluated everything, all that was left was love."

"And Daniel being Daniel?"

"You mean a guy?"

"Well you dated a girl before that right?"

"And a guy before her," Johnny said.

Louie blinked. "Woah really? So it wasn't just Daniel? Did you actually like the girl?"

"I thought I loved her."

Louie frowned. "You did? But don't you...love Daniel? So like if this girl came back would you go back to her?"

"No."

"How do you know for sure? If you loved her then-"

Johnny sighed running a hand through his hair.

"I said I thought I loved her. It was complicated. I'd tied my entire future to our relationship and when it ended so did my plans, safety, and security. Daniel arrived right when this was all crashing around me and right smack in the middle. I was all in. And I got it thrown back in my face. Sometimes I didn't learn my lesson, that if something hurt to avoid it. But with this, with her, I did. I was in love with the dream of a future not meant to be."

"And what was that dream?" Louie asked.

"Nice house. Marriage. Sid would have at least one nice thing to say about me," Johnny said.

" One nice thing?" Louie asked with a frown.

"He liked Ali. He sent me ring shopping."

"You were going to actually marry her? Wait, do you still have the ring?" Louie asked.

"Somewhere. I'm sure I do."

"Did you ask her?"

"Never got the chance. Which is a good thing."

"A good thing?"

"Yeah, this is better."

Louie looked around. " This is better."

It sounded like he didn't believe Johnny. Johnny picked up his coffee and had another sip.

"I feel better."

"So instead of being a rich married karate master, you're happy assisting Mr. Miyagi with his dreams and dating my cousin?"

"Your cousin is wonderful."

"I know that, but…But like don't you regret anything ? Or want more ?"

Johnny tapped thoughtfully on his coffee cup. "Yeah."

"See? Like what?"

"I regret being awful to Daniel."

Louie waved at him. "Yeah yeah got that one, all was forgiven, you're past that one."

"You asked though."

"I meant like with this chick and other stuff."

"I do want more I suppose."

"Yeah. How so?"

"Same stuff. I want to live in a house that's ours and marry Daniel."

Louie let out a groan. "You're a black belt in karate! Don't you want to be out on adventures? Kicking ass, saving people?"

"Karate doesn't make you a superhero."

"You want everything so...mundane and boring."

"It makes me happy. I don't need much."

"Clearly."

As the week progressed Daniel pushed on one thing he said he was adamant about. They cooked every night, which normally they didn't. And every dish was easy Italian, but Louie hated it. Mostly because he made Louie help him.

"Louie come on, you gotta learn."

"I don't wanna."

"Cooking is important. You can't eat out all the time it gets expensive."

"Why don't you cook with Johnny?"

Johnny looked over his book to see Daniel hand held up in the air from where he'd been gesturing, pausing.

"Johnny knows how to cook," Daniel said.

It almost sounded like he was disappointed.

Why would he be disappointed that Johnny knew how to cook? Surely it was a good thing? Daniel liked when Johnny made dinner...right?

"So?" Louie asked. "You two are practically glued to the hip except at dinner time. I know you cuz, stop trying to teach me and play with Johnny."

Daniel blushed, kicking at the tiled floor in the kitchen.

Strange.

Why was he embarrassed?

Johnny mulled over what Louie had said but he didn't get it.

Louie got himself a soda out of the fridge and sat down at the kitchen table picking up one of their magazines. He made a motion towards Johnny and Daniel's eyes met Johnny's.

"Do you want to cook together?" Daniel asked.

"Sure. What did you want to make?"

"See?" Louie said, rolling his eyes opening his can of soda.

"We've got chicken and zucchini, so I was thinking of this garlic chicken recipe."

Johnny put a bookmark in his book and set it aside.

"What can I help with?" he asked washing his hands at the sink.

Daniel gathered ingredients setting them out. He passed some garlic to Johnny.

"Could you mince this?"

Johnny started peeling the garlic and after a moment Daniel peered over his shoulder.

"Can I help?"

Johnny laughed. "Yeah."

He sat the garlic cloves back on the cutting board.

Daniel handed him a knife, then put his hand over Johnny's. "You can press down until you hear the skin crinkle. Then they'll peel easier."

"Why not just microwave them?" Louie asked.

"Huh?" Daniel asked.

"My mom sticks 'em in the microwave for like a minute in cold water. Skin comes right off," Louie said.

Johnny felt Daniel, close, thoughtful, while Johnny carefully pressed down on the garlic cloves, listening for that sound.

He heard it and removed the knife setting it aside.

"You don't want to cook but you want to backseat cook?" Daniel asked.

"I don't think anyone backseat cooks," Louie said with a laugh. "But I get it, you want to be handsy with Johnny so of course that method gives you an excuse. It'd be kind of silly to try and flirt over garlic in a bowl. Though maybe you just haven't figured out the right way to do that. I bet I could."

"No, you stay over there."

It had been a while.

Louie kept sitting between them on the couch so they couldn't cuddle while watching TV like they usually did.

They couldn't do anything in the bathroom because the last time Johnny had gone in just to give Daniel a quick peck on the cheek before he had to run to the shop while Daniel was brushing his teeth Louie definitely thought it was for more and had knocked to tell them that their next apartment needed two bathrooms so that they could bone in a private one and guests could still use the other.

It was just at night, when they were sure Louie was asleep that they got to do…anything. And because they hadn't gotten to relax and chat it was mostly that. Talking about work, about how Louie Sr. was doing and what news Daniel had heard from Lucille and his aunt. What he'd done during the day with Louie that Louie hadn't talked about at dinner.

Work was busy, spring was coming and people wanted plants. And they'd seen the interview with Mr. Miyagi and the photos and Johnny was hauling more dirt in from the shops and talking with more people and he wasn't staying awake as long as he'd like Curled up with Daniel but he always fell asleep before anything happened. And it wasn't like Daniel wasn't exhausted too. When he wasn't working or studying he was dealing with Louie. And Louie was exhausting. Thankfully he had a million questions for Mr. Miyagi when he came to the shop and Mr. Miyagi seemed to withstand the tidal wave.

They'd gotten too busy. And Johnny had watched Daniel cooking with Louie throughout the week though Louie refused to do more than the bare minimum to help.

He liked teaching cooking, and maybe Louie was right, maybe Daniel was looking for excuses.

So how could he help?

"What next?" Johnny asked.

Daniel let go of him and got a lemon and set it down in front of him. "Grating and juicing."

“Any tips or tricks for that one?” Johnny asked

Daniel’s arms wrapped around him as he puzzled over the lemon as if it was foreign and new.

“I can’t watch this,” Louie said grabbing his soda and heading off to watch TV.

“Pick the smallest side of the grater and try to avoid getting any white bits, the pith is bitter.”

Johnny went to work. It was weird to have Daniel latched onto him while he was working. It wasn’t bad, there was also something comforting about it, to feel him warm and against his back.

Daniel walked him through all the steps just stuck close instructing him.

Daniel stepped aside when it was time to cook, moving instead to stand next to him, arm wrapped along the small of Johnny’s back and hand in Johnny’s back pocket that he was trying dutifully not to draw any attention to since Louie was still engrossed in the TV. But Daniel was doing his absolute hardest to make it difficult to focus. He kept squeezing.

It took longer to make dinner that night but it was nice and Johnny didn’t mind.

Louie plopped down at the dining room table, his hair was messy and he was yawning. Johnny flipped through the letter he'd been saving to read that morning, kind of like the morning paper.

He'd wanted to share it with Daniel the night before but Daniel had come home late and tired and had gone straight to bed after kissing Johnny.

He'd wanted to read it together, but he was getting impatient.

He flicked the envelope open and a small glossy card fell out. He picked it up and grinned. Daniel would be delighted. Embarrassed and he'd protest it, but he'd also be secretly pleased and it'd give him a little pep to his step.

Which after a long night working at his apprenticeship might do him some good.

Daniel sat down passing Johnny a cup of coffee and working on his oatmeal with a bleary eyed look.

"You look pleased," Louie said. "What's that?"

"Oh," Johnny said. "It's a letter from Kumiko."

Daniel's face rose from his oatmeal, interest peaked.

"The girl from Okinawa?"

"Yup, she's in Tokyo now. I sent her some money and asked her to help me with something and it came."

"What's that?"

Johnny set the card on the table. It was glossy and laminated and the size of a business card. Johnny was going to put it in his wallet and show the guys the next time he saw them. He'd also have to show it to Lucille.

Louie leaned forward squinting. "I can't read it, it's in Japanese. Daniel, you're studying, what's it say?" Louie asked pushing it towards his cousin.

Daniel picked up the card, mouth moving to read the words to himself quietly, to sound out the kanji.

He spluttered and coughed and looked at Johnny.

"You didn't!"

"I said I would," Johnny said.

"What? This isn't fair, clue me in. Or wait, is this a sex thing?"

" No it's not a sex thing," Daniel said, tone utterly exhausted, directed at Louie. "Johnny joined my fan club."

"What fan club? You have a fan club? Why do you have a fan club?"

Johnny reached over the table and snatched up his membership card. He openined his wallet putting the card away next to the Polaroid he always carried. He stared at it with a fond smile. He had more now.

Lots more. But he liked that first one a lot.

“We did a modeling shoot in Okinawa and I guess it was popular.” Daniel said with a frown.

“And they found out that Daniel did karate and was taught by an Okinawan native and won the championship twice and it sort of snowballed. It’s a small fan club but it’s organized,” Johnny said.

“What constitutes small?”

“At least a couple hundred according to Kumiko,” Johnny said.

“Do you have a fan club?” Louie asked.

“I’m not sure,” Johnny said with a shrug.

“How are you not sure? Don’t you actually model? Like since you were younger? Aren’t you in more stuff?”

“Yeah, but I just like that I can say I’m an official card carrying fan of Daniel,” Johnny said with a grin watching Daniel’s face turn red.

“You’re ridiculous,” Daniel said.

“And you love it.”

“I’m going to go watch TV, this is too much,” Louie said grabbing his bowl of cereal and waking over to the couch.

“We should call Kumiko and chat with her. I’ll let her know it arrived and we can ask her about White Day while we can.”

“Dammit I forgot,” Daniel said rubbing his face. “I’ve got time tonight. And Louie’s going to Ma’s for dinner.”

"Moshi Moshi."

"Hello Kumiko this is Johnny and Daniel. I got the card," Johnny said.

"We actually have some questions for you," Daniel said.

They were pressed in close together on the couch next to the phone.

"I've got a little time before I have to go. What's up?"

"White Day," Daniel said.

"Ah, yes," Kumiko said.

"Chozen got us stuff, and I was talking to Mr. Miyagi and uh...I think I need to better understand what Chozen wrote."

"What did he write?" Kumiko asked, amusement in her tone.

"Um he made me chocolates and wrote Honmei-choco," Johnny said grabbing the piece of paper and reading it carefully.

"And I got something Johnny recognized that was store bought," Daniel said leaning forward to grab the piece of paper for his.

"Oh easy. Johnny, just make some chocolates. I'm sure the Browns could help. Daniel, if it's store bought, you buy something of the same price or worth more for White Day."

Daniel froze mid-reach.

"Pardon?"

His voice came out strangled.

"What did he write?" Kumiko asked.

"Tomo choco," Daniel said, brown eyes wide looking at Johnny.

"Aww how sweet, yeah so friendship chocolate. It means you guys are friends and not an obligation. Which is what Giri choco is. You would not believe the amount of Giri chocolate I had to buy for the dance studio. But come White Day I'll get it all back on the same level or better."

"If it's not?" Daniel whispered.

"Oh then it's a slight, it means you reject the friendship. Tomo choco is an easy soft ball Daniel. Easy win. Johnny's got to make chocolate. Or I guess you could do what Miyagi-sensei and Sato-san are doing,"

"What are they doing?" Johnny asked.

Daniel's hand gripped his so tightly he thought Daniel might crush a bone.

"Aunt Yukie made them chocolates, so they're making her a fancy dinner, oh but it's a secret, don't tell her. They're very excited about it."

Johnny smiled softly, Mr. Miyagi had been talking about a dinner he was planning.

"So Johnny needs to make something, equal to the chocolates in time and difficulty ideally, and Daniel's got to just go shopping. Easy."

Johnny looked at Daniel, remembered the fancy chocolates, remembered the price of those.

"Can Daniel make Chozen chocolates?"

"I mean that's supposed to mean more....why? What did Chozen do?" Kumiko asked voice tinged with suspicion.

"He bought Daniel really fancy chocolates," Johnny said. "With uh, gold leaf and everything."

"Oh."

"Oh?" Daniel squeaked. "What does ‘oh’ mean? I thought we were maybe moving onto something better you know, not that-that Chozen was challenging me to a polite off with money on the line!"

"That..."

Kumiko's voice came through with a breath, like she was laughing and trying very hard for them not to hear.

Johnny heard her take a deep breath and continue.

"Sounds like Chozen."

Johnny couldn't tell what expression Daniel had on his face. Pained. Annoyed. Shocked. Frustrated.

"You know," Johnny said softly. "Maybe my mom can help."

"How?" Daniel asked looking at him wide eyed. "Because most likely Chozen made a big deal about it. So Yukie, Sato and Mr. Miyagi are aware that he's trying to start a new leaf, trying to build that bridge and if I do not meet him there, at this ridiculous high mountain that costs money to get to. I will look bad. In front of Mr. Miyagi! And Chozen will win. He cannot win. He wants to do a polite off? Well fine. Fine!"

"Mom knows all the ridiculously expensive stuff, the best of everything, and the people who make a lot of it," Johnny said softly, putting his hand on Daniel's knee, hoping to ground him, to pull him back before he got too wound up.

"Kumiko, do we owe you chocolates?"

"Nope, don't worry about it. Just come visit me and see my show," Kumiko said.

Johnny took over while Daniel chewed on his lip. Asking about the show, about Tokyo, about the troupe, and then wishing her a good rest of her morning. When he hung up he looked at Daniel and gave him a kiss on the cheek.

"Hmm?"

"Don't hurt yourself."

"What? Why'd I hurt myself?"

"You're upset."

"Yeah? So? Chozen is so...."

Daniel couldn't seem to think of a good word and just let out a frustrated sound and shook his hand in a way Johnny had noticed seemed to be an angry LaRusso family tradition from back in Newark.

Johnny reached out and pulled Daniel into his arms.

"I'm sure you'll think of something. You can win a polite off."

"Since when is this my life?" Daniel complained turning to press his face against Johnny.

He had that look in his eye, the one he got when he was upset and was going to bite Johnny.

"Hey, it'll be okay, just don't-"

Too late. At least it wasn't as hard as that first time. That one had hurt and had been in public.

Johnny sighed, rubbing Daniel's back. He'd let go and moved, nose pressed against his neck. Johnny had a bad feeling he was going to get bit again. He could feel Daniel's breath on his neck, felt the warm wet brush of his tongue and shivered.

"Want me to call my mom and set up a time for you two to come up with a solution?" Johnny asked quickly.

He was trying to keep them on track. Focused. Because Louie could come home at any minute.

"What are you going to make for Chozen?" Daniel asked, voice low, hand trailing low.

"I don't know. I'll talk to the Bro-ah-wns," Johnny squirmed as Daniel gave a firm squeeze.

Bad idea.

Again.

Louie.

Any minute.

The kid had keys.

" Daniel."

He tried to sound normal, stern even, a warning that this was a bad idea, but instead it came out almost like a needy whine and he flushed red.

He tried to clear his throat.

Tried to focus, to breathe, but Daniel palming at him wasn't helping.

"Whatever you make I want to taste."

"I'll bring you home plenty," Johnny said, hands gripping Daniel's shoulders as Daniel moved his hand, slipping beneath his clothes. A cool soft touch.

"Should we celebrate White Day?" Daniel asked thoughtfully, an air of faux innocence.

As if he wasn't aware of what he was doing. As if Johnny wasn't struggling to pay attention or could hold an actual conversation anymore.

"H-how?"

He'd been so focused earlier.

He'd had a plan.

To keep them on track and now, now that was out the window.

It couldn't be his fault if Louie came back.

Once he'd thought their apartment was perfect. That for him and Daniel, their friends and family it was absolutely the best place. He remembered touring it and thinking it was wonderful. Perfectly secure. But now as Daniel smiled at him whispering dirty things in his ear. He realized maybe they needed a bigger place.

Or rules.

Or a vacation.

How long would they need to live by themselves before it wouldn't feel like they were stealing moments anymore?

Was it because Louie had showed up or because of their separate work lives?

Or was this going to be their entire lives?

It didn't matter. Thoughts were gone. Instead just the pleasant torture of Daniel crowding into his space. But not in the way he liked best. He wasn't going to ask for more though. They didn't have time.

Thankfully, arguably, it was over fast.

Daniel pulled a blanket over him as he came back down.

"We'll do something fun, something nice."

Johnny nodded, not quite trusting himself to speak when he heard the keys in the lock. He pulled the blanket closer around himself. Feeling too exposed despite being fully dressed.

Daniel sighed. Grabbing tissues and cleaning off his hand. "When's that kid going home?"

"Hey cuz!" Louie called toeing out of his shoes. Which was a relief because that had been a big sticking point at first. Something that Daniel had suffered to try and explain for days. Leading to the weirdest argument Johnny had ever witnessed. "You okay Johnny?"

"He's fine. Hey, let's make Auntie's Caprese Chicken for dinner tomorrow huh?"

"What? Why?" Louie asked with a frown.

"Because you gotta learn how to cook Louie. A LaRusso must cook."

Louie sighed, "Fine."

Johnny watched them go over the recipe, to talk about dinner with Lucille, waiting for his heart to calm back down and when it did he gathered the blanket around himself and headed off to their bedroom to change.

Next apartment had to have two bedrooms.

Johnny sunk down in the booth. He was the first one to arrive and went ahead and ordered an appetizer. Dutch arrived next sitting next to him and helping himself the the chips at the table.

"How's having Louie over?" he asked with an amused smile on his face.

"Has Daniel been complaining to you about that?" Johnny asked.

"Near constantly."

"When do you guys even talk? He's been so busy with school and the apprenticeship I feel like I barely see him."

"I get coffee with him on campus. They've got this nice coffee shop I like. And he gets a student discount."

"You don't need to take advantage of a discount."

"I know, but it makes it feel like the real experience you know? That's what they're all doing. Trying to live on a budget and trying to focus on learning and living on their own. Yet they're not. They're so close to home that if anything comes up it;s fine. I just want a taste of that, so I'm bothering Daniel and having coffee with him."

The way Dutch said it gave Johnny pause and he turned, studying his friends face. His natural hair color was peeking out under the roots. It'd been a while. A long time since he'd seen that.

"Why are you having coffee with Daniel. Really?"

Dutch looked at him surprised. Shocked.

"It's just coffee man," he started and then his shoulders slumped. "Fine I've been worried okay? The guys have each other if something happens. But Daniel's been through a lot and like we used to go for runs and what not and I could keep an eye on him. I had like a temperature gauge. Knew whether he was sinking into a dark place and could try and help push him back up. And now, well I'm leaving soon and I won't be able to check in on him as easily. He can be, squirmy you know? Squirrelly. He can shut down and hide how he's feeling if you don't catch the signs and it can fester. I don't want that happening. Not while he's alone. I mean yeah he's got you but you're at the shop. And he's at that job and school. The guys see each other all the time. So...so fine, I'm making sure no one's bullying him on campus or like preying on him. Happy now?"

Johnny smiled softly reaching over and squeezing his arm. "Dutch."

"You take your hand away or I'm going to fucking hold it man," Dutch threatened.

Johnny didn't move his hand.

Dutch snatched it up. Looking away from him. "I just want to make sure you're all okay before I go."

"I know," Johnny said, giving Dutch's hand a squeeze. "You need to have fun on your trip. Don't worry about us. We'll be okay. Not because you're gone, but because we know even nearly 6,000 miles away you'll have our back. Because you always do. No matter what dumb shit we do. You're a great friend and I don't want this goodbye that's coming up to be sad. Don't distract yourself in worrying about whether we're getting into fights or not, or if we're getting into trouble. Focus on you. Focus on your adventure, on all the things you want to do. Your own fights. Your own stories and we'll be there. We'll come visit. I promise. And we'll call. And we'll ask you all about what's going on and how it's going and we'll listen to all your stories.

Look forward without worrying about us behind you, because we'll catch back up with you as soon as we can."

Johnny moved closer, wrapping his free arm around Dutch.

"You'll leave us in a good place, promise. But we'll still miss you."

Dutch leaned against him. "You both need to be careful okay?"

"Yeah?"

"Yeah, I won't be here to keep you out of trouble."

"Wouldn't you rather get us into trouble?"

"Hey, I've graduated high school. I'm grown up. Technically an adult. I'd rather you guys live a nice peaceful boring life while I'm gone."

"We'll try," Johnny said with a laugh.

"Hey, sorry we're late," Tommy said.

"We're not starting the going away sad stuff yet are we?" Jimmy asked.

"No of course not," Dutch said with a frown. "You guys just were so late that we got bored."

"Sure, this is what it normally looks like when we're late," Bobby said with a laugh.

"So where is Daniel?" Tommy asked.

"He's out with my mom, buying chocolate for White Day," Johnny said.

"What's that?"

"A holiday in Japan and Korea," Dutch said. "If you got candy on Valentine's Day or anything you're supposed to return it."

"When'd you learn that?" Jimmy asked.

"Chozen mentioned it," Dutch said.

"Since when do you hang out with Chozen on your own?" Tommy asked.

"Listen, y'all are away at UCLA, I'm taking care of everyone on the home front."

"You do realize you sound like a tired parent right?" Bobby asked with a soft laugh as the waitress came over and they ordered.

"It feels like that sometimes," Dutch said.

"I wouldn't have ever thought you'd try and take on that responsibility,"

"Why? Thought it'd be you?"

Bobby frowned looking at his straw, unwrapping one end and lifting it to his lips and blowing, sending the other half like a rocket at Dutch.

"I'm trying to enjoy being not in charge," he said with a grin.

"Oh, that's how we're playing it huh?" Dutch said letting go of Johnny's hand and grabbing one of the straws, quickly shooting his at Bobby who laughed and ducked out of the way, hitting Tommy instead.

It devolved quickly until Johnny grabbed the rest of the straws. Laughing as they turned on him, until the waitress returned, clearing her throat to warn them that their food was hot.

"Sorry ma'am," Bobby said, sitting up straight.

"Yeah we'll clean up," Tommy said.

She nodded, setting five new straws on the table before walking off.

"Right, where were we?" Jimmy asked carefully gathering up stray bits of straw paper.

"Dutch hangs out with Chozen without the rest of us."

"I'm trying to keep him out of trouble."

"He's been doing okay at that on his own though," Johnny said.

Dutch turned to look at him. "You think? Really?"

"Well...yeah. Hasn't he?"

"We took him to a hockey game and some bastards picked a fight with him for no reason. We won that fight but Johnny, he's in a new country trying to make a fresh life for himself. It's not going to be easy. He needs support and Daniel's going to fight against him every step of the way. Which I get. I do. But I think Chozen's okay. He's trying and I think because of that he should be helped you know? Oh what's something Miyagi-like? Okay, think of him like a new plant. You're not going to get mad at a plant you moved and transplanted for not blooming immediately. You gotta take care of it and help it grow right? Keep away deer and shit that wants to eat it? Chozen's throwing all of himself into Miyagi-do. And I feel responsible for that okay? Like Miyagi-do is taking the place of Cobra Kai in the Valley, filling that void so something worse doesn't crop up. We could've, maybe, stood up to Kreese at some point and been like this is terrible and told someone about it and him and we didn't."

"We were kids," Bobby said.

"I know, but I still feel responsible. I don't want what happened to Johnny or Daniel to happen to anyone else. So I want Chozen to succeed. So if that means I'm checking in on him from time to time, which I'm going to blame Ms. Lawrence on-"

"My mom, why?" Johnny asked.

"Because she does that. She's fucking badass and she cares about people and she shows up and makes sure everyone is okay and when I grow up I want to be as cool as your mom. Right, so if you guys have to celebrate White Day to make him feel welcome I recommend it."

"Daniel hasn't complained about White Day to you yet has he?" Johnny asked amused.

"No. Why would he? You get gifts you give gifts back, what's wrong with that?"

"You give gifts back that are of equal value or time ," Johnny said. "And Chozen made me chocolates so I have to make him chocolates, and he bought Daniel nearly $200 worth of fancy chocolate. Daniel now has to find an equal amount of chocolate of nice quality for him or else it's rude. Not just to Chozen but also in Mr. Miyagi's eyes."

The table was quiet and then laughter erupted.

"That's possibly the best prank I've ever heard of."

"The sweetest revenge is literally chocolate."

"Genius."

"Sorry Johnny, I know this is like probably stressful for you and Daniel, but it's also ridiculous. I mean you went from karate to the death to fighting over who can give the better gift. I wish I got enemies like that."

"Right? Hell, maybe next year we should drown Chozen in fancy chocolates and see how he responds."

"He wouldn't be able to handle it, but his honor, man that'd be a delight."

"Someone make a note of that, we need that to happen, a reminder or something. Spoil Chozen on Valentine's Day and see what he does for White Day, because we could use that whole Miyagi thing to our own benefit."

"That's a little evil."

"Hey he's already doing it. Right? Sato and Yukie and Mr. Miyagi would make him return the favor. He's just tugging the string, and we'll pull that one next year."

"Before you all get down to your evil scheming, at least be helpful. What can I make?" Johnny said.

"We just got a whole bunch of bourbon in," Jimmy said thoughtfully.

"Bourbon? How's that going to help me?"

"Oh!" Bobby said turning towards Jimmy. Jimmy grinned shooting him a wink like he'd got it. "Bourbon balls."

"What the hell is a bourbon ball?" Dutch asked.

"You soak pecans in bourbon and they're kind of like truffles but not exactly," Bobby said. "You can come over and we can make some if you want."

"Bourbon and chocolate sounds like fun," Dutch said.

"You can come too." Bobby said.

"Good, because I am."

They finished their meal and made their way to Bobby's. Jimmy met them there, after heading home to pick up bourbon. When he returned they set about following Bobby and Jimmy's somewhat different instructions for bourbon balls. Eventually just sitting and watching the two try and make their own.

"You gotta let the nuts soak," Jimmy said

"I can't believe you said that with a straight face," Dutch said with laugh.

"You just mix it all and let it bake," Bobby said with a frown.

"You ever been to Kentucky?" Jimmy asked Bobby.

"No, but-"

"Nuh uh. Sure sweets are you thing, but booze, I was touring bourbon distilleries at like five man, I know how this works."

"Let's just make our own and we'll see what happens," Bobby said.

Jimmy sighed and Dutch set out a glass in the middle between them.

"What's that for?" Bobby asked.

"I want to try the bourbon."

"Straight?"

"Best way to try it right?"

"Probably better if you have an ice cube at least."

"What? You don't think I can handle straight bourbon?" Dutch asked with a frown.

"I'm not saying you can't handle it," Jimmy said. "I'm just saying this shit's strong and honestly I'm tired of dragging your drunk asses around."

"What do you mean dragging us around?"

"You all are messy drunks okay? I don't want to clean up."

"Then drink with me," Dutch said.

Jimmy stared at him for a moment then sighed. "Fine get me another glass."

"There we go, see it's not that we're messy drunks," Dutch said bumping his arm against Jimmy's fondly. "It's that you're tired of being left out. So drink with us. Isn't that what friends do?"

"Bobby?"

"Yeah, sure."

"Tommy?"

"I'll try it."

"Johnny?"

"I'll skip."

"Got a hot date?"

"Yes."

Dutch paused mid pour and burst out laughing. "You seriously made plans?"

"No," Johnny said taking his glass from Dutch and filling it water. "But anything can be a date."

"Like what?"

"Movie night at home can be a date, we borrowed some VHS's from the video store. Or we could play a card game, or play sanshin together or-"

"How is it possible," Dutch said turning to him, "That after all that time pining after Daniel in your stupid as fuck game of he doesn't like me back that was mutual but so so so dumb , that you managed to miss out on all the hot stuff and went straight into becoming an old man? What the hell Johnny? Like you know what, I'm not worried about you," Dutch said pointing at him with his index finger that was holding the bourbon filled glass. "You're excitement is a damn crossword puzzle at the moment."

"Hey," Johnny said.

"No, Johnny you're fucking 18. You spent all of your life doing what you've been told. Yes sir, no sir, sorry sir. You jumped when you were told to. You took every fucking hit you weren't supposed to. Rebel man. Get out and do something fun. Grab Daniel and go to Hawaii or Las Vegas or Macaui. Like we know okay, we know that you're secretly a nerd who likes to wear soft sweaters and read a book. But you also kick ass, and it's like you're scared to kick ass again. Like you're scared that all of that kick ass Johnny was some evil monster, and I can tell you right now that's not true. Was our sweet little nerd the one who hot wired a car and drove Tommy to the hospital when he got stung by a jellyfish? Fuck no. That was our badass Johnny. You're both. But you're letting a side of yourself to die. Why?"

Dutch was leaning close studying Johnny close.

"Is this because I don't want the bourbon?" Johnny asked.

"No, I just...I'm worried."

"You just said you're not worried. You said you wanted me to have a peaceful boring life."

"I'm not worried that you'll get into trouble, I'm worried that you're torturing yourself in a new way."

"Maybe I'm..." Johnny studied his glass of ice. "enjoying just being. Does that make sense?"

"Yeah," Bobby said.

"What?" Dutch asked whirling towards him.

"Dutch, we all know that weight of expectation. In different ways. You know it pretty well right? What your parents want from you, what they expect?"

"Yeah," Dutch said with a frown.

"Isn't it nice sometimes to not have those expectations, or that weight?"

"I guess."

"Isn't that something you're looking forward to with going to Korea? You're not going to have to deal with your parents or their expectations or not having expectations right? You can just be. You can do what you want and you are doing what you want," Bobby said. "I think, sometimes, it's nice to just like float along. Let the river take you where it's going. And Johnny, out of any of us, has spent so long fighting against that current, swimming harder because everyone's told him to, so if he wants to just float along for a while, he's kind of earned that right?"

Dutch frowned looking at his drink and at the other guys.

"If Johnny wants to be a grandpa type at 18 I think it's fine," Tommy said. "He deserves a rest."

"Yeah, besides, it's not like he's ignoring us for Daniel. He's here right? He's still showing up. I mean we had lunch last week. He came down to campus. He does that like every week," Jimmy said.

Bobby turned to study Dutch. "Don't tell me you out of all people who are still living in the area never see Johnny?"

"No, I do! We have lunch! We sometimes have breakfast. I mean having breakfast there with Louie is kind of weird. He stole my bacon last time."

"Sorry about that," Johnny said with a sigh. "He's struggling a little. I'm not sure if something bad happened back home. I guess he had to get out of the way or something. Daniel's having a hard time."

"I bet," Dutch said with a laugh. "I can only imagine how he's handling having a constant house guest after finally getting you to himself."

"What does that mean?" Johnny asked feeling his ears burn.

"I know just woken up Daniel and his dirty dirty mind. Remember we used to go on runs? Dude's like whole dream was moving in somewhere private to just have you to himself. I know more about his hopeful sex life with you then probably any one would every want to know."

"Seriously?" Jimmy asked with a laugh.

"Serious. When we all went running? Daniel just kept talking about Johnny's ass."

"Please change the topic," Johnny said flushing red.

"I thought his angry moments whenever we were there was just because we interrupted...and because it was a new relationship. Are you saying you think Daniel's just constantly on that level?"

"I think if you're a starving man and someone brings you the best tasting cake you've ever seen and then people keep coming over to talk to you and keep you from enjoying your cake you'd be pissed too," Dutch said with a laugh.

"Johnny's a tasty cake for Daniel?" Bobby asked with a laugh. "That's kind of cute."

"Oh, Bobby, you wouldn't last a minute with Daniel talking early in the morning about Johnny."

"What do you mean? You don't think I can handle dirty talk?" Bobby asked.

"I think maybe you're a little vanilla for Daniel."

"Excuse you, I could last a half hour listening to him talk about Johnny," Bobby said pointing the whisk he was using at Dutch.

"Like to see you try,"

"Well then let's make that a challenge. We'll all meet up with Daniel early in the morning and compare notes and see how it goes. Johnny you think he's free for early morning coffee tomorrow?"

"What is happening?" Johnny complained.

"You know sometimes people talk to their friends about their sex lives. You don't. So we'll talk to Daniel instead," Tommy said with a teasing smile.

"You ever think maybe I don't want you to know that stuff about me?" Johnny asked, feeling his skin burn.

Who knew what Daniel would say. If that filter wasn't there, if they talked to him in the morning even a little about Johnny then, then, it'd be too much.

"Wow, you're as red as a tomato," Jimmy said.

"We're teasing," Tommy said. "You're allowed your privacy."

"You really think Daniel would go into detail?" Bobby asked with a frown.

"He really just complimented your ass for a half hour," Dutch said. He walked over with his bourbon and sat next to Johnny. "It was more detail then I expected. But it wasn't, you know, detailed detailed."

Johnny drank his water, trying to will the blush away.

He should punch them.

But he didn't feel that anger he used to feel, that desire to snap back. Maybe Dutch was right. Maybe all his fight was gone. He didn't know if that was a good thing or a bad thing.

He was tired.

He was tired of fighting and he just liked his quiet domestic life with Daniel.

Maybe it'd be good if he told Dutch how much that quiet domestic life meant to him. He was still working on understanding it. But maybe...maybe he hadn't really talked to the guys about that side of himself.

About his past.

They knew, but they never asked.

And that's what they wanted.

The teasing was because he wasn't putting his walls down. So they went for the easy shot.

He looked down at the water held in both of his hands.

"I spent so long not having a place to really called home. I really am just enjoying having that. The mansion wasn't a home. It was...a place I didn't ever feel comfortable. I took short showers and barely slept so I could sneak out the window if I needed to. I locked my doors but listened for the sound of footsteps towards my door. And before that...mom and I lived in our car. And that was it. We didn't have a bathroom of our own. We didn't have our own shower. I'd run into the ocean as a kid to like rinse off. I have no clue what mom did. How she got by. We didn't have a kitchen. We didn't have a TV. Or a couch that we could just chill on and watch TV.

“When we lived with Mr. Miyagi, it was nice, and it was peaceful but it was also destroyed by Silver and Barnes. They broke in and I couldn't sleep because I was worried that I'd sleep through something. That they'd come back and I wanted to be prepared.

“But now. Now I have a couch I can sit on and watch TV or movies with Daniel and there's a microwave we cook popcorn in. There's a stove and an oven and a fridge. All these things I didn't have for a good chunk of my childhood. Or that I couldn't use because they weren't mine. And these aren't...mine. They're ours . And I'm like, relaxing.

“I'm enjoying long showers and not worrying about every little sound because if the door opens its one of you idiots coming in to raid our fridge or it's Louie snoring on the couch or it's Daniel moving around and things are nice and they're safe and I'm not as...tightly coiled? I'm not stressed or at least not the same way.

“It feels like this big weight on my shoulders, cinder blocks that I've been walking with around my feet, it’s all just gone and I'm enjoying not having to answer anyone. Not having to make decisions beyond what do I want for dinner and actually being able to make that choice. Not being given food I hate or just having to eat what we have. If there's nothing I want to eat in the house we can eat out or we can go somewhere else, or Daniel will think up something I hadn't ever heard of that he thinks I might like or I might think of something and I can cook it. So if I'm an old grandpa at 18 because of it, I think I'm okay with that."

Johnny looked up, around at the guys, at the quiet of the kitchen.

Dutch set his bourbon down, his eyes were filled with tears which was a look Johnny didn't see too much and then Johnny was pulled into a hug, a tight one, where Dutch rested his head on top of Johnny's.

"I'm so sorry Johnny. You enjoy that nice stuff okay? I'm sorry for not thinking. But you're right."

Johnny heard him sniff.

"You enjoy all that nice domestic stuff."

It felt like Dutch was trying to squeeze the life out of him, but after the shock of it, Johnny sighed and hugged him back.

"What I'm trying to say, is that I'm going to be okay I think. And it's mostly because of you guys and Daniel and Mr. Miyagi."

"Johnny," Bobby said softly and Johnny shut his eyes.

He didn't want to see the tears he could hear in Bobby's voice. If they were all crying again, he couldn't handle it.

He'd cry more. And that hadn't been the plan. He'd planned to just enjoy a night with his friends.

"Man he really didn't want us talking to Daniel about sex huh?" Bobby said with a watery laugh. "You pulled out the big guns on us."

Johnny felt a hand on his back soothingly rubbing it. He felt grateful that they were there. That he had them, that they'd found one another. As he was hugged, as he was held. He wasn't alone and he hoped they knew that too. That across the ocean or just in a dorm a half hour away or wherever they went that he'd be there.

He just also wanted to spend time at home doing stuff he never got to do. Like feel comfortable making popcorn. The popping once had been too loud, it took too long. But it was nice to just enjoy it with Daniel. To not have to think about it. Or like the several first movie nights where he just stared at the box of popcorn that Daniel had bought. The way he'd almost said no when Daniel asked if he wanted some because it was too loud, but then realized that didn't matter anymore.

And it was the gentle smile Daniel gave him with the bowl of popcorn and telling him really they could have it whenever he wanted, and how Daniel had teasingly thrown a piece at him, unhurried, unworried about the mess, playing and at ease by his side. And he was trying to play back and it was fun and he didn't mind the mess. Johnny had enjoyed the games they played. Stuff he hadn't gotten to do before at places he was told were home but hadn't felt like it.

And maybe...maybe that was sad. If he said it all. If he said he didn't get to just have fun unless it was with the guys. That when he left their homes it wasn't the same. When their nights out were over they went home but for him it hadn't been to a nice warm home that he returned to. It'd just been uncomfortable and he'd avoided it. Putting it off, biking around, walking around, driving around, sitting on the beach and watching the waves.

But now he liked going home. He liked throwing popcorn at Daniel, liked trying to catch the popcorn Daniel threw at him in his mouth. Pleased when either managed it. Dumb things. But he loved them.

Maybe it was why he loved the bonsai so much. Because it was something he got to hold, a gift given to him that was an actual gift. Something someone gave him with a bit of trust and hope in him. And he'd done it. He'd kept it alive and it was thriving. It never had to visit the little bonsai hospital they had set up at the shop.

And maybe thriving wasn't something Johnny would say he himself was doing, but he was better. He wasn't as burdened. He wasn't struggling as hard as he had been. He was learning how to just live without jumping at every sound, anticipating what he had to do to retaliate or to head it off or to strike first.

"You deserve to enjoy nice things," Tommy said. "Not just basic things. But you'll get there. And maybe we'll still talk to Daniel, but that's because we like talking to Daniel."

"Yeah who knew that annoying punk you fought on the beach would be one of our favorite people," Dutch said with a soft laugh.

"We like him because he helped you. Because he makes you happy and better."

“And just because he’s him.”

"Stubborn little bastard sometimes, but like in the best way."

"How did shopping with my mom go?" Johnny asked setting down his boxes of bourbon balls and the supplies to make more.

"Exhausting. Who knew there were so many different chocolate makers in LA and the surrounding area? But I think I've figured out what I'm giving Chozen. How are the guys?"

"Good, they’re going to be hungover at the Browns though."

"I thought you guys were going out for dinner," Daniel said. "Though that explains why you smell so sweet."

"You want to try some?" Johnny asked opening up one of the boxes.

"Yes. But first I think we should get this over with right? White Day's the 14th. Let's drop off our gifts early."

"But it's late," Johnny said.

"True. Okay, tomorrow then."

"Before you go to school or during lunch? Or in the evening?" Johnny asked.

Daniel frowned chewing on his lip and then turning to Louie.

"Hey Louie?"

"Yeah?"

"You want to have dinner with Chozen tomorrow?"

"What?" Louie asked from the couch.

"I agree with Louie on that one, what are you talking about?" Johnny asked.

Daniel leaned forward, voice dropped low so Louie wouldn't hear.

"Mr. Miyagi and Sato are taking Yukie out for dinner right? How about we invite Chozen here? Louie and I make dinner, we give him his chocolates? Mr. Miyagi will be happy Chozen didn't spend the night alone. Really everyone will. And with luck we can get the two of them out of the house and have the apartment to ourselves."

"So you're goal here," Johnny said softly, matching Daniels quiet tone, "Is to get rid of both Louie and Chozen tomorrow night by explicitly inviting them both over for dinner?"

"Yeah. We have dinner and then send them out to the movies. Louie's been talking about this movie he wants to see. I don't really want to see it and Chozen's got nothing better to do. It'll be the most expensive movie I ever paid for but I feel like I gotta get something back out of spending over $200 on chocolates. He owes me."

Johnny laughed softly shaking his head. "So you're secretly hiring Chozen to be a babysitter for Louie? Seriously?"

"Why not?"

"He actually does have better things to do you know? The dojo is supposed to have its soft opening soon. He's got the actual government coming to check in on the dojo."

Daniel's demeanor sort of deflated. "What really? Who told you that?"

"The guys told me."

"Well then it'll be a nice break for him."

"Something you don't want to do though," Johnny said carefully putting the chocolates in the fridge.

"Can you blame me?"

"I don't know how to answer that," Johnny said.

"Let me rephrase that," Daniel said stepping in close and pressing up behind Johnny.

Johnny tried to focus on the contents of their fridge. What could possibly be made for a White Day dinner from the condiments and sauces, and leftovers. They'd need to go to the grocery.

It wasn't a good enough distraction from the warmth behind him, the hand that found it's way under his shirt.

"Wait so why's Chozen coming over for dinner tomorrow?" Louie asked a little closer then he had been, meaning he'd moved.

Johnny quickly shut the fridge, trying to keep a regular expression on his face.

"Tomorrow's White Day, it's like Valentine's Day part two in Japan and Korea."

"But Chozen's from Okinawa," Louie said setting his soda on the counter, folding his arms across his chest.

"Well he still celebrates it," Daniel said pulling away ever so slightly. "Chozen gave us gifts so we got him gifts and since the rest of his household has plans, we thought it'd be nice for him to come here."

"Really?" Louie asked suspiciously. "Because you don't like Chozen, you said he's just after Johnny's-"

"It'll be fine!" Daniel said loudly letting go of Johnny completely and swatting at Louie. "So you want to make dinner with me?"

" Again ? Why are we always cooking? I heard you guys usually do take out or like eat with Mr. Miyagi. I cook more here then at home."

"You can never be too young to learn healthy habits. Besides Johnny already ate."

"What are you an after school special?"

"Well we're cooking today and tomorrow, so think of what we should make for dinner tomorrow and let's get to work on tonight."

"Is this a punishment? I didn't know you didn't want him to know? I figured you've mentioned it."

"Come on Louie wash your hands and lets get to work."

Louie groaned but did as he was told shooting Johnny a look, a plea of rescue, but Johnny just carefully stepped aside heading off to grab his book and curl up on the couch to read.

Chozen set a cup of coffee down on the counter for Johnny. It was from the cafe between the dojo and the shop but on the way from Mr. Miyagi's. Chozen always went there, almost like clock work, on his way to the dojo he'd stop and he'd get coffee and bring it over. He'd talk for a little bit and then head out.

Except if he saw Louie. Lately he dropped off the coffee, greeted Johnny and left. But Louie was out with Daniel grocery shopping and planning dinner.

It was good coffee and Johnny wondered if he was being spoiled. But it wasn't just him. He brought stuff for Mr. Miyagi too.

"What are you doing tonight?" Johnny asked.

Chozen who'd started to open his mouth, closed it, looking a little surprised.

"I suppose it's best to say what for before you give your answer," Johnny said quickly. "So you can say you're busy if you are. Daniel and Louie are making dinner and we thought you might like to come over and eat with us."

"Me?" Chozen asked.

Johnny laughed softly, smiling. "Yeah you."

"Yes," Chozen said. "What time?"

"Six, is that okay?" Johnny asked.

"I will be there," Chozen said, reaching out and patting Johnny's hand, then looking at the clock. "Ah, have to go to the dojo."

"I hope it goes well," Johnny said. "You can tell us about it at dinner."

Chozen nodded, saying a quick goodbye to Mr. Miyagi and hurrying out the door.

"Dinner sounds like event," Mr. Miyagi said as he worked on one of his bonsai.

"It was Daniel's idea," Johnny said. "But I hope it goes well and that Chozen enjoys it. I don't know what they're making."

"Glad boys are getting along," Mr. Miyagi said with a nod. "Important since lives are, intertwined."

Johnny kept offering to help but he was banished to the living room to read. Hosting duties, which hadn't started yet since Louie was helping Daniel cook and Chozen wasn't expected yet for hours.

He'd finished his book, he'd cleaned, he'd worked out, he'd showered and dressed nicely. Now he was reading another book and trying not to ask every five minutes if they were sure they didn't want help.

Louie looked like he wanted nothing more than to escape but every time he lost focus Daniel gave him a gentle whack with with the spoon he was using.

Johnny didn't even know what they were making. He was given a look every time he got close to the kitchen. A quick excuse of You cooked for Valentine's Day. or Louie's got to learn.

Louie had a lot of cooking to learn apparently. Daniel was determined, utterly fully completely determined that Louie would know how to cook anything and everything by the time he left their apartment.

Johnny wasn't sure if it was to make sure he could take care of himself or punishment for crashing with them. It seemed to be a bit of both. Especially since Louie complained but made no move towards going home or talking to them about whey he'd left in the first place.

Mr. Miyagi had seemed excited when Sato came to pick him up. They'd chatted about their dinner plans in Okinawan and Sato had patted Johnny's shoulder.

Thank you.

Huh?

Invite nephew. Know Daniel-san not....like. But appreciate. Share thanks.

Johnny didn't know what to do but nod. It seemed weird to say that the whole thing was a ruse, a gamble to get Louie out for hours. The truth to it was that Daniel wanted to have sex. And Johnny was trying not to think about it. He was trying not to get his hopes up. Let it roll up on him like a surprise. Focus on the trees, on getting home, on picking up the wine Daniel had asked him to get.

But it had been a while since they'd had the apartment to themselves and he kept catching himself and forcing himself to stop thinking about it, turning mentally back around and going back to safer topics. Not Daniel's soft lips or warm skin. The way they felt intertwined.

"Johnny?" Daniel asked.

Johnny looked up from his book, Daniel was smiling, leaning over the back of the couch and gave him a kiss.

"Dinner's almost done. Chozen should be here soon."

Johnny nodded putting away his book.

He set the table and then when there was a knock at the door went to get it. Chozen was dressed nicely, and he seemed surprised at how quickly Johnny had opened the door.

"Come on in," Johnny said. "Daniel said dinner's almost done."

"Thank you," Chozen said leaving his shoes at the door. "Um, I brought flowers."

Johnny took a bouquet of sunflowers and smiled, "Chozen, aren't we supposed to be giving you things?"

"I couldn't pass them up, they seemed like they belonged here," Chozen said.

"Well I'll put them in water, thank you Chozen," Johnny said getting a vase his mother picked out a while back for him and filling it up with water.

He carefully unwrapped the flowers studying the stems trying to determine if they needed to be trimmed before placing them in the water and setting them on the coffee table. It seemed the safest as the dining table filled up with food.

“Louie you’ve met Chozen right?” Daniel asked.

“Yeah at Mr. Miyagi’s shop.”

“Nice to meet you again.”

"You taught in Okinawa?" Louie asked.

"Yes."

"Kids?"

"Military."

"Oh. Right. I knew that. How do you fight military men?"

Chozen studied Louie confused, trying to figure out the point to the questions. "The way you fight anyone."

"No but it's got to be harder right? Military guys? I mean you look at them right?" He waved a hand towards Daniel and Johnny. "You'd think Johnny would win every fight. But Daniel uses that Okinawan style and he won. But you also use that and Daniel won again. So I'm wondering if you know the secret to it."

Chozen dug into the breast pocket of his jacket and pulled out a business card, he hesitated a moment before holding it out. "Come, learn for yourself."

"Seriously?" Louie asked taking the card. He turned to Daniel. "Can I?"

"That might've been a mistake," Johnny said softly to Chozen as Louie showed Daniel the card.

"Ah, yes, I have been...played," Chozen said. "Expected different response. Didn’t realize he was fishing and I was fish."

"Dinner is ready," Daniel said after nudging Louie with is elbow. Louie sighed sticking the business card in his back pocket and helped carry food out to the table. "Lemon chicken piccata."

"Have you had much Italian food?" Louie asked Chozen, taking his plate and filling it up with noodles and chicken and capers.

"Uh, no, not as much. We have restaurants but often I ate at home. Or American food."

"What like burgers?"

"Yes, or steak or seafood."

"Steaks good. So these are capers, they're not peas, Daniel made sure I knew that, kept shaking the bottle at me and saying ‘Louie these are are capers, don't get them mistaken with peas, peas have a vastly different flavor profile.’ And then he made me eat one. They're not...well they're good, but I don't like them on their own. Salty. I mean I’ve had them before on Lox, but by themselves is a bit much. Oh and this, we made a salad too. Daniel said we needed vegetables and I guess we had to be like a damn Olive Garden, so we made a salad. Have you ever been to an Olive Garden? I think they opened a few years ago and they're just everywhere now. Italian food but like a chain.

“Anyway salads are awful to make because you have to rinse off everything. You have to wash so much stuff. Every leaf, every tomato. I suppose I should be happy I didn't have to wash off the croutons or the cheese. But it's so much washing. And then everything is all soaking wet and you have to dry it. Why can't they just sell it like that? I mean they do. They sell those ready made salad packets, but it's cheaper to buy the actual head of lettuce, which that's weird right? "head" of lettuce. Why? But yeah, you have to wash everything and then dry it off and then cut it. I hate making salads. You'd think it'd be easy right? It's just vegetables. But I swear, drying the leaves are such a pain.

“Oh and then we made bread and pasta. Because for some reason Daniel's got it in his head that no one's teaching me the way Nonnia cooks. Like the old country or whatever. So those right there are handmade noodles. Which is ridiculous because you can get the same noodles for like a buck at the grocery store and not spend hours making them. You have to like feed the dough through a machine very carefully and you get just absolutely covered in flour. Same with the bread. But at least with the bread you get to punch it a little. Hey, you're a...sensei. You punch a lot of people? I mean other than my cousin. Like did you get into a lot of fights in Okinawa? Have you gotten to fight anyone here?"

Chozen blinked. The only tell that he was overwhelmed by the LaRusso's chatty nature. "I got into a fight with Cobras."

"You fought the cobras?"

"No. Strangers. At hockey game."

Louie nodded like that was the only logical choice, a common occurrence at any sporting event. "Did you win?"

"We won, yes. And I got into fights in Okinawa until I was too strong to pick a fight with. Then only new unaware military pick fight."

"Ah, so you're a notorious figure in Okinawa?"

"I suppose."

Johnny met Daniel's eyes. They were on him, watching him, dark. He knew that look now. Knew that Daniel wasn't paying attention to the conversation, that he was lost in some daydream. Johnny looked away quickly feeling his ears burn. If he wasn't careful he'd fall into the same trap and he'd been doing so good throughout the day to avoid the thoughts, the same quick spiral.

"-so it's really supposed to be a fun movie. Daniel won't see it with me and Johnny, well it's a set you know? Take one you gotta take the other. But I apparently can't go wandering off in LA by myself. Even though I can definitely take care of myself."

Ah, he was laying the ground work on his own. For the movie. Maybe they'd make plans together without Daniel or Johnny having to do anything. Life couldn't be that easy could it?

Daniel was filling plates with food and smiling to himself, pleased. Louie was explaining the movie and Daniel looked at Johnny passing him his food, his eyes holding so much promise.

It'd been a while since they'd had time to themselves and every look Daniel gave him was electric. The gentle touch of caress of his fingers when he handed him the plate, where he went out of his way to touch him, for a moment too long, sent a shiver down his spine.

"Have you ever been to a theater in the states?" Louie asked.

"No, not yet," Chozen said.

"Then we have to go. You have to get all the snacks too."

"I think this is filling," Chozen said motioning to the food.

"But it makes the experience you know? Like okay, have you had an Icee?"

"An icy?"

"It's like a snow-cone, flavored ice but a drink," Johnny said.

"See? you gotta try it."

Chozen was listening and Johnny ate his food. It was good. But that wasn't a surprise. Everything Daniel made was delicious.

"What did you do for White Day in Okinawa?"

"Nothing really," Chozen said.

Daniel tensed, the spark of anger shooting through him.

Johnny shifted, catching one of Daniel's legs between his and giving it a gentle squeeze in the hopes it'd calm him down a little.

"Seriously?" Louie asked.

"Not like Kumiko," Chozen said softly rolling his fork to collect noodles on it. "She gave chocolates out to almost everyone for Valentine's Day and it was easy. They'd come back to her too, on White Day. But she always avoided me. And other kids didn't share with me either. I wasn't particularly popular and I was…grumpy so they avoided me. My friends shared theirs, but, I never gave out White day chocolates. I tried to do Valentine's Day for Uncle one year when I was little, since it was just us and all the other kids were doing it. Their families seemed happy about it. And Uncle said it was a waste of time."

Chosen set his fork down and took a sip of his water.

"The only one who celebrated with me was Miyagi-sensei. He started it. Gave me Valentine's Day candy, so I made sure to celebrate White Day with him. He was always delighted by it. This is...my first year without him, not celebrating with him. So...thank you for celebrating with me."

His voice sounded a little watery.

"Of course," Johnny said gently patting his arm.

"Well that does it, we have to go to the movies! This can't be it for your night. We need to do something fun! And a movie with fighting and things exploding is perfect."

Louie turned from Chozen to Daniel, big puppy dog eyes.

Daniel knocked his knee gently against Johnny's and Johnny let go. "You should go to the nice theater."

"Seriously?" Louie asked, unable to keep the excitement out of his voice.

"I trust Chozen to keep you safe. But you gotta behave. Best behavior."

"I will!"

"Speaking of White Day," Daniel said getting up.

Ah, now.

Johnny got up as well.

His chocolates were in the fridge.

He carefully got them out while Daniel handed his fancy bag to Chozen.

Chozen took it with wide eyes.

"Daniel spent weeks trying to figure out the best chocolates to get you. He had to call in reinforcements," Louie said.

Daniel smacked him gently before sitting down again.

"What? It's the truth."

"Don't you dare take any of his chocolates, those are for him."

"But, you both got him so much!"

"You can make do with theater candy."

"Unfair."

Johnny held the box out to Chozen who looked up from his bag of chocolates and then reached for Johnny's box with both hands, fingers brushing his.

"They've got a little bit of alcohol in them. I made them with some bourbon, if you like it, let Jimmy know he can easily get you a bottle," Johnny said.

"I- thank you both. I thought dinner was my gift, I wasn't expecting-"

Chozen looked a little overwhelmed. It was probably harder than they expected. Who knew how many sudden pitfalls lay ahead? How many other traditions that hadn't seemed like much would suddenly hit like a brick wall once they rolled around?

Johnny glanced at Daniel, he probably knew. Knew how hard it was to be suddenly without a person you cared so much for. That heavy and inexplicable burden of grief

"Dinner's from me," Louie said quickly earning another smack from Daniel. "What? I did most of the work and you just supervised and nitpicked."

"I don't have something for you."

"The movie will do it. And put me on your list next year," Louie said with a grin.

"I will," Chozen said softly.

"If we're discussing next year, make me something simple next time will you? A cake or something. I'll make you something in return. We've got some good family recipes. It'd be a good excuse to make it," Daniel said.

He was giving off an air as if he didn't care. Like what he was saying was flippant. But Johnny knew it was a desperate bid to not have to drop another $200 or more on chocolates.

"Ah, Bobby offered to teach me how to make western sweets. I have nearly a year to train with him to make something then," Chozen said thoughtfully.

It was the subtlest twitch in Daniel's face, the tightness of his jaw. The implication that next February he'd be given some unknown highly time intensive sweet and would have to best it. A new battle a year away, the gauntlet thrown down innocently. Johnny could read the curses balancing on Daniel's tongue in his face.

"The Browns house is a lot of creative chaos. I hope you enjoy it,"

Johnny said with a warm smile as they settled back down to their meal.

He felt something brush his leg, pressing against his thigh. He pushed Daniel's foot away. He was not going to take his annoyance and shift it to bothering Johnny. Dinner was almost over. They were almost in the clear. He could hang in there just a little longer before Louie dragged Chozen off to the movies. And then, then the silent promise could be met with lips on one another, hands on skin, touch starved, but only in such a very specific way.

They just had to wait, they just had to get through finishing up dinner and waving Chozen and Louie off. They just had to wait. But Daniel was frustrated and since politeness wouldn't allow him to snap or vent his frustration at the budding relationship he had with Chozen, he was focused on playing with Johnny.

Johnny managed to get some conversation going, to talk about karate, Okinawa, and Kumiko. But eventually Louie got antsy, the food was finished and he was spouting out show times he'd memorized, and how long it'd take to get there and he was tugging Chozen out the door, who promised to bring him back safe before midnight and thanking them for dinner and the gifts.

The door shut and Daniel pushed back his chair.

"I can't believe that worked," Johnny said staring at the door.

"I can't believe that bastard is going to outdo me in baking. You heard that right? This is going to become a yearly nightmare."

"He misses Miyagi Sensei," Johnny said standing up and carrying his plate to the sink.

"He might miss Miyagi sensei but there's no need to challenge me . Buy me a Kitkat or something. But fine, if he wants to challenge me then I'll kick his ass. Again!"

Johnny put his hand on Daniel's shoulder and kissed his cheek. "Of course you will."

Daniel spun towards Johnny, grabbing his shirt and pulling him into a kiss, pushing his tongue into Johnny's mouth.

When he pulled away he looked just a little calmer.

"You know he'll probably do the same thing to you."

"Huh?"

"Make you something fancy. If you're bothered by it you should speak up."

Johnny turned, cleared the dining room table, heading to the sink to start washing pots and pans. "I appreciate his effort."

"You appreciate his effort," Daniel repeated with a frown, hand sliding into Johnny's back pocket. "What about my effort?"

"You are amazing," Johnny said leaning over and kissing the tip of Daniel's nose. "Now let me focus, you had plans tonight. Let me clean up so we can get on that."

Daniel sighed wrapping his arms around Johnny's waist and pressing up against him Johnny could feel his head pressed to his back. "Amazing huh?" His hands moved, slipping under Johnny's shirt and running up, along his torso and then to his chest. "You're the one whose amazing. So tonight...I've got goals."

"What kind of goals?"

"You'll see," Daniel said rubbing the tips of his fingers over Johnny's nipple and pinching it. There was no escape. Daniel had him pinned between him and the sink.

"Let me finish these up," Johnny said.

"Not stopping you," Daniel said one of his hands moving down, pulling away just enough to give himself the room to pull Johnny back and to slip his hand down the front of Johnny's jeans.

"No, but you're making this difficult."

"Ah, you can't wash dishes while I touch you?"

"It's not simply touching is it?" Johnny asked. Daniel was rolling his hips against him.

"I'd say this counts as touching, or barely, you can't be mad about this," Daniel said.

"I don't think you realize how absolutely unpleasant this is."

"How is it unpleasant?" Daniel asked.

"You've pulled my shirt up, I'm getting soapy water all over myself."

"Hot."

"Don't act like this wasn't your plan all along."

"Lucky accident," Daniel said.

"So what's the plan?" Johnny asked finishing up the final pan and twisting towards Daniel and wrapping his arms around him.

"Step one, naked," Daniel said tugging at Johnny's clothes, helping him out of them. "You're up for anything right?"

"Yes," Johnny said kissing him.

"Perfect," Daniel said moving them around. "The table then."

Johnny had said yes, but Daniel had also told him repeatedly if something bothered him to complain. To complain more often. He wanted to continue and really it was nothing. But-

"Daniel I-"

"What is it?" Daniel asked pulling away, taking that warmth with him.

They didn't have a lot of time, they'd already lost a bunch on clean up after dinner and to complain seemed-Daniel put his hands on either side of Johnny's face.

He was waiting, but just barely.

Johnny had to speak. It felt so trivial but-

"You said to complain more often."

"You want to complain?" Daniel asked.

There was a hint of amusement in his tone, curiosity, a press of his thigh between Johnny's legs, reminding him of where this was going.

"It's going to be cold," Johnny said quickly before he could swallow his complaint down.

Daniel blinked, slipping an arm past Johnny to the table behind him, palm pressing onto the cold surface. He had a thoughtful look on his face.

"Easy fix," Daniel said after a moment.

Johnny nodded wondering if they'd go elsewhere. He wasn't sure exactly what the fascination was with their dining room table. They could go to their bedroom, the floor, the-

Daniel was getting out a table cloth.

"It's kind of like a blanket," Daniel said thoughtfully spreading the table cloth over their table, carefully. Then patting the table cloth with a sit here tapping.

"What am I a meal?" Johnny asked.

"Now that's a thought. Maybe I'll go get those chocolates you made leftovers of. I can melt a couple and-"

"Do we have time?" Johnny asked moving to sit on the table.

They were going to have to destroy the table. They'd have to buy a new one. Burn the table cloth. He'd never be able to look at it the same way again.

Daniel turned and glanced at the clock and then smiled back at Johnny. "It's like a two and a half hour movie, they're not watching it at the nearby theater they've gone closer to the nice fancy theater further away. We've got plenty of time to take this slow ."

Slow.

Johnny wasn't sure if he'd be able to handle that. Ever since Louie had showed up on their doorstep it'd been hard for them to find time to themselves. Everything was fast, stolen moments when they were lucky.

Daniel was working so hard at his apprenticeship that it felt like their time together, their alone time specifically was few and far between. So Johnny understood why Daniel wanted to savor the moment, why he'd bolted the door and had stuck a chair against the door to keep anyone out. Like a barricade that felt silly but also one hundred percent serious.

He just wasn't sure he'd last. It'd seemed like it was going to go fast, immediate gratification and satisfaction and now he felt a little too exposed sitting on the kitchen table. Sure it wasn't as cold as he'd expected but it was strange. He tried to find a comfortable position while Daniel got out his chocolates.

"Hey Daniel," Johnny said sitting up suddenly as he remembered what was in them.

"Yeah?"

"Those can't go in the microwave, there's alcohol in them."

"You think they'll catch fire?" Daniel asked.

"I think I really do not want to chance that right now."

"Right," Daniel said looking down at the bowl of chocolates Johnny had made and set them next to Johnny. "I guess I did buy some chocolates while I was out with your mom, I'll melt those."

"They don't have gold flakes or any alcohol in them do they?" Johnny asked, leaning against his knee, amused.

"Hey, I'm not going to make the same mistake twice," Daniel said. "It's cheap plain chocolate."

Johnny nodded picking up one of the bourbon chocolates and taking a bite. They had turned out well, there was still a slight bite of bourbon to them, but not enough to do much.

Daniel removed the microwaved chocolate and set it aside looking at Johnny.

"Is this just a staring thing?" Johnny asked taking another bite. "Cause you could just watch me shower if that's the goal."

Daniel laughed softly. "Some day. Some day I will just enjoy that show."

"You'll have to hurry or else I'm going to charge an entrance fee."

"An entrance fee to watch you shower? How much is that going to cost?"

Johnny finished the bourbon ball thoughtfully. "I'll give you two options."

"Oh, I get two huh?" Daniel asked hand on Johnny's knee. "What are my two options?"

"Well you can add to your kissing debt but I will take kisses in payment while showering. So the needle wouldn't move too much."

Daniel smiled nodding, applying a gentle pressure, carefully pushing Johnny's legs apart. "And if I want to completely just watch and not participate?"

"I'd ask if you were sick," Johnny said amused. "I thought you said this was going to be slow."

"It is," Daniel said, pressing a kiss against his inner thigh. "You haven't said how much the show would cost."

"I thought you'd go for kisses. I didn't really think that far ahead."

"How about when you finish your shower I give you a blow job?"

"I-wh-"

Daniel smiled looking way to pleased at Johnny's speechless expression kissing his hip and moving up onto the table and kissing Johnny.

"You should ask for more," Daniel said. "Think of things you actually want. I will kiss you, I will kiss you so many times throughout your life that you'll lose track and I'll lose track, though I haven't yet. You have spent so much time wanting so little. There's got to be things you actually want. I know it's a lot," Daniel said as Johnny sunk down to his forearms looking up at Daniel who dipped his index into the chocolate and ran his finger over Johnny's shoulder.

"I ask you to complain and you did. You spoke up. I wouldn't have realized until I got up here too that it was cold. And that's great. But you should also do what you want. Ask for what you want. I want to spoil you. Can you believe that? I do. In a bunch of different ways. I'm not where I want to be yet to do everything, but I will get there. And when I do, you will not know what to do with yourself."

He drew a heart on Johnny's chest, then dipped his finger again, continuing his doodles.

"I want to make love to you on this table. Slow and languid until neither of us can handle it. I want to enjoy every moment we've got.

And I have a feeling this chocolate's probably not going to feel so great later so we can take that shower together. And I have a feeling after so long I might get a second wind. Maybe a third. Maybe five. Who knows. Let's go at it like rabbits huh? That's what I want to do. How about you?"

Daniel's gaze rose from his designs, his little sketches.

Johnny pushed himself up grabbing Daniel's wrist, dragging his tongue along Daniel's finger.

Daniel's focus remained on his lips, watching his finger disappear into Johnny's mouth.

A tiny revenge. A tiny re-do. A chance to turn the tables from that one night nearly a year ago at the lodge. Maybe it wasn't whipped cream, maybe it wasn't exactly the same but the look on Daniel's face was worth it. Whatever he'd been using to keep himself calm, steady started to crumble. He looked like he wanted to say something. But what exactly just wasn't connecting. And Johnny smirked up at him, carefully letting go of Daniel's finger.

"Sounds good to me," Johnny said, brushing his hair back and out of his face.

He knew, knew that movement would draw attention, a movement of muscle that showed off just a little, that the nonchalant tone as if they were deciding what to do for the day rather than a go for it green light.

Daniel stared at him, and Johnny waited for his brain to start up again. Waited for the synapses to fire again, gently bumping his leg against Daniel's hip. While it wasn't as cold as it could be, it still would be better if the ball got rolling. If he wasn't awkwardly on the kitchen table. Dining room table? They didn't really have a separate room. It was cozier like that. But maybe one day. After all if everyone they loved came to visit they'd need a bigger table. Because this one was going to get chopped up and burned. Never to be sat at again.

Daniel lunged forward, a sudden movement kissing him and catching him off guard that Johnny lost his balance, slipping back.

Daniel's hand was on the back of his head, keeping it from hitting the table.

Johnny grabbed the front of Daniel's shirt and tugged. Pulling at it.

Daniel pulled away from his kiss, getting the hint, taking off his shirt throwing it off towards the living room, letting it disappear into a sea of darkness beyond their little space together. He pressed his lips against Johnny's neck, then his collar bone, working his way towards the chocolate, looking up at Johnny as he dragged his tongue along his skin.

Johnny tried to press his hips up against Daniel and Daniel smiled but made no move to help or to move his focus. He'd thought he'd sped things up but Daniel seemed determined to keep moving slowly. There were parts of him that he never thought had been particularly sensitive. That he hadn't really paid much attention to that Daniel seemed to pay close attention to, to lavish his affection on and Johnny wasn't sure if that's what got him or if Daniel had kindled something new. Or if it was the idea or just knowing that Daniel seemed to be so into whatever he was doing.

He shivered, wondering what to do, he needed to do something. Daniel wanted slow, so he needed a distraction. He went with Daniel's hair, touching it, playing with it the way Daniel sometimes did with his own.

He tried to focus on something else.

Maybe he could try and talk?

The quiet, the focus would get to him. Not the same way it used to. It didn't make him as uncomfortable, not in the same way. Not in a worried way, but in an overwhelming way. Knowing Daniel was so wound up that he was quiet, and zero'd in on Johnny.

"Why the kitchen table?" Johnny asked, after clearing his throat.

Daniel pushed back, looking at Johnny thoughtfully then going to their cabinet and getting a small colorful container out.

Johnny stared at him.

"It's what I wanted to do when Louie showed up. I got all riled up for it. And now it's stuck. An itch I need to get out of my system."

"And the sprinkles? The chocolate isn't enough sugar?"

"You made your own chocolates," Daniel said motioning towards the bourbon balls. "I'm making my own."

"Why did this turn into a crafting project?"

"Well you said I could do what I wanted for White Day right?"

"I guess?"

"This is what I want. At least to try it. I think it'll be pretty."

Johnny slumped back on the table. They really were going to go slow. He felt the pieces of sugar fall and watched Daniel and sighed. "Okay Mr. art's project, is this a fine pose for whatever you're working on or do I need to move?"

"Hmm," Daniel said thoughtfully tapping his chin and studying Johnny. "How long can you flex?"

"No clue, I guess we'll find out," Johnny said moving, adjusting and tensing his muscles, watching Daniel.

He looked so damn happy. Weirdo. Lovable weirdo. Daniel gently touched tense flexed muscle with the tip of his finger and went to work with chocolate and sprinkles, along the ridges. It was a lot of work. Johnny didn't know what for. But Daniel was having fun and it was such an easy thing to do.

"You know," Daniel said stepping back to enjoy his handwork. "You could probably get me to eat anything I didn't want to eat if it was served so nicely."

"Don't you like almost everything?" Johnny asked.

Daniel studied him closely and headed off to the couch to get one of the softer throw pillows and came back sticking it behind Johnny, under his head. "Get cozy."

"Get cozy, you say. Who gets cozy on the kitchen table?" Johnny said laying his head down, he saw spider webs.

How'd he miss those?

When had that happened?

Had they lived there long enough for spiderwebs to happen?

"Where are you?" Daniel asked with a soft laugh.

"Huh, oh, there's spider webs," Johnny said pointing at the lights.

"I lose your focus as soon as you have a chance to look at something else. A guy's feelings could get hurt from that you know."

Johnny pushed himself up looking at the teasing smile on Daniels face, licking away at Johnny's sweet decorated skin.

"Well I feel like we just cleaned and I'm trying to figure out how I hadn't noticed them before."

" Now? You're trying to figure that out now? You're 18, how on earth are you already an old man?" Daniel asked with a laugh. "If the guys call and ask what you're up to I'm going to tell them that you're contemplating spider webs we missed when cleaning, and that's you're excitement."

"Not going to tell them you decided to try and decorate me like a cake?"

"Bobby would be disappointed, you decorate a cake with icing not chocolate,"

"You could. I mean we have put chocolate and sprinkles on cakes. It goes on top of the icing, it drips down you know?"

"I stand corrected then, but you gotta show me next time."

"Are you sure you haven't been missing some chaos or something in your life?" Johnny asked looking at himself and the array of doodles and sprinkles melting on his skin.

"What do you mean?" Daniel asked.

"I'll get you some paper and finger paints next time I'm at the store, seems like you need to let off some creative steam."

"Can I just paint on your back?"

"Is it just an excuse to touch me? I didn't think you needed one."

"I don't but it seems like fun," Daniel said.

"You're not going to eat this all are you?" Johnny asked amused.

"It's not that much," Daniel said leaning down to lick up some chocolate.

Johnny felt the pinch of teeth and watched as Daniel worked on a spot that would bruise. The point, after all. He was going to have to put off going to the beach for a while, it looked like he was going to be covered in love bites.

"Should I get you chewy candies?"

"Hmm?" Daniel asked moving to a different spot, clearing away sprinkles with his tongue.

"You like to bite."

"Just you," Daniel said, pausing and looking up at him with concern. "Am I hurting you?"

"No," Johnny said, "Though, could you give me a kiss before you go back to torturing me?"

"Torture? Me? How ever could that be possible?" Daniel asked leaning up to oblige with a warm kiss.

"You keep hovering right over it and then moving away," Johnny said pressing against Daniel, he'd gotten rid of the chocolate so he wrapped his arms around him, pulling him in close. "I know you said slow but this is too slow."

"Too slow? Is that even possible?"

"Well I'm about to start just taking care of myself or escaping to the shower early," Johnny said.

Daniel pouted. Then he sighed. "I suppose this is why they say you shouldn't play with your food."

"I'm not food."

"You're not but it seemed apt."

"Maybe don't tease your boyfriend."

"Feedback received," Daniel said kissing him again, warm and sweet and tasting like chocolate

Johnny ran his fingers across Daniel's skin, reaching for his waist, for the belt around his waist. A good challenge, could he remove it without looking? Answer seemed to be, a successful yes and he grinned, working on a button and zipper. Then Daniel pulled away and Johnny flopped back with a frustrated groan.

Daniel laughed.

"You would've liked that, I'm not going to do it now," Johnny said, arms crossed.

"I’m sorry I just feel like the tables have turned, pun not intended, but usually I'm the one dying to do it."

"Dying?" Johnny asked.

"Exaggeration, but," Daniel said pressing a warm kiss on Johnny's inner thigh, close enough to make his breath hitch with hope. "I'm sorry for teasing. I think this might help."

A warm mouth engulfed Johnny so suddenly that he almost jumped in shock. He pushed himself to look at Daniel who met his gaze with an amused and way too pleased look on his face. His hand was on Johnny's thigh to have something to steady himself but his thumb occasionally moved, pressing against him and Johnny tried to focus on his breathing, he wanted to watch but he couldn't handle it.

Daniel had gotten him too wound up. Teased him too much. He dug his heel into the table, into the cloth. He'd try, he'd try to pay attention to the obscene way Daniel was moving...he could sit up again... except Daniel was moving on. Adding to the sensation with his slicked fingers inside of Johnny and he gave up. He wasn't going to be able to handle looking. He wasn't going to move.

He'd focus on his breath. Maybe the damn spider webs. How many were there? In two sweeps of some duster he could get them.

Nope.

Not distracting enough now.

Daniel had found a good rhythm and Johnny moaned, trying to keep still. Incredibly still.

"Daniel?"

There was a sound of a curious hum that sent a shiver over his skin, goosebumps and he tried not to squirm. Tried to gather up what he was going to say. Tried to remember.

It'd been a request. It'd been something he wanted. What else could he have possibly wanted? Daniel was focused, between his legs, no longer teasing him in the same ghost of a touch. The absence of himself. Johnny couldn't think of anything else. He could barely think.

That warm mouth, nice fingers the weight of Daniel left and Johnny pushed himself up when there was a change. When Daniel pulled away gaze, down, away from him. Enough. Enough teasing. Enough pulling away. Johnny was tired of being teased. There was a chair nearby. When Daniel stepped back, getting ready, Johnny pushed Daniel back and he fell onto the chair with a startled look of surprise.

Johnny didn't wait, slipping off the table and onto Daniel's lap. He wasn't sure when Daniel had gotten ready. Didn't care. He was tired of being teased and he was going for it, for what he wanted. He'd been ready and waiting for too long. He needed to move to take charge.

"Johnny-" Daniel said before whatever else he was going to say turned into a warm sound of pleasure. A deep sound that Johnny loved.

"You okay?" Johnny asked.

"Me?" Daniel asked. "What about you? That was a bit fast."

Johnny shifted thoughtfully, a roll of his hips. Daniel's hands went to his hips fast.

"I'm fine," Johnny said. "Better now."

Now he could actually see Daniel easier. He could touch him. He could get the show on the road. He started to move but Daniel's arms wrapped around his waist and held him close and tight.

Johnny gasped at the sensation, the friction, he wanted to squirm, to feel more.

"Sorry," Daniel said.

"Hmm?" Johnny asked.

"We just don't get...a lot of time to ourselves. Maybe we should've watched a movie or had our own date night. Gone out dancing or something. But I missed touching you, tasting you, and I couldn't pass it up. I owe you good dates."

"I owe you good dates," Johnny said, wrapping his arms around Daniel's shoulders, curling around him. The tile beneath his feet was cold the air was a little chilly but Daniel was warm. He seemed...horny but bummed? Why? "You don't like me on your dick? Thought you wanted..."

Daniel laughed. "I do, this is great, hot, but I did want to fuck you on the table."

"Took too long."

"I see that now."

"Take responsibility," Johnny complained, shifting, trying to get some movement going.

"Good to know that you'll go for what you want," Daniel said, his breath warm on Johnny's skin. "That you'll still be fast and shocking when you want to be. Honored it's my dick you want."

Johnny laughed. "You promised going at it like rabbits. I want what I signed up for."

"Really?" Daniel asked pulling away a little.

Johnny looked at him, smiling softly.

"I'm down. I'll tell you if it's too much."

"I'm holding you too that."

Johnny nodded and gently squeezed Daniel's arm. "You mind letting me move?"

"What you don't like just sitting on it?"

"This is a different kind of torture, you can fuck me on the table after, just let me move. I've spent all day trying not to think about it, and now you're dragging it out."

Daniel grinned releasing his heavy grip and Johnny moved. Normally he'd pay attention to Daniel. Normally he'd try and be romantic and see how he was doing and what he liked but everything was fried from being teased. So he moved how he wanted. He went for what he wanted, hands holding steady on the back of the chair.

"Johnny," Daniel whispered reaching up and gently touching Johnny's face.

Johnny had an idea of where it felt best, of where that spot Daniel went for was. A better understanding of his own body that he'd learned from the way Daniel touched him. From touching Daniel.

He'd done this before, a couple times, but usually the idea was to let Daniel relax. Now it was because he was impatient. Tired of being teased. He'd missed being with Daniel, feeling him inside, that odd full feeling. Daniel gaze made his chest tight, his skin tingly.

He was tired of trying to behave, tired of having a guest and not seeing Daniel, of only stolen moments. He was tired of not feeling him. Tired of not getting what he wanted. Constantly unsatisfied. He'd spent his whole life unsatisfied. Daniel's hand was on him, talking to him warmly, soothingly. He thought he had it, control, but Daniel made him stutter, the heat of his gaze, how it felt to be guided the rest of the way until he came, fingers digging into Daniel's shoulders a little harder than he normally would've.

"Fuck Johnny," Daniel whispered.

"All I'm asking for," Johnny murmured into his neck.

Daniel laughed softly, gently moving them.

"Been waiting all day...all week."

"Yeah?"

"You made a plan. If we were...more active. Then it probably wouldn't be so bad. But being teased, after barely getting to spend time with you, it's cruel."

Daniel wrapped his arms around Johnny, hugging him close and Johnny gasped softly at the sudden movement.

"Sorry about that, but you usually are a little harder to read on stuff like that. You..." Daniel chuckled softly. "Were prepared to be celibate because you thought I wasn't interested so I assumed, your drive wasn't quite as strong as mine so I wanted to to go slow today."

"I enjoy it. I never said I wasn't interested. I specifically said I was."

"I know, I know. My mistake. Sorry for teasing you. But that-"

Johnny could feel Daniel's warm breath on his neck, his hands slid down his back, grabbing his ass. Johnny squirmed.

"was very hot. You being enthusiastic-"

"I'm always enthusiastic."

"True. But...maybe that was different then enthusiastic...I don't know. You wanted it so badly. Needed it? Needed me that badly? Fuck I don't know how to handle that Johnny," Daniel's fingers were pressing gently into his skin. "Wanting me?"

"Of course I want you," Johnny said a little confused.

Daniel made a humming sound, fingers moving between to touch where they were still connected and Johnny jumped a little startled. "Can I play with you just a little bit? Now that you've satisfied yourself? Think you can move?"

"You want me back on the table?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah."

Johnny carefully put his hands on Daniel's shoulders, pulling away from the embrace and standing up, and carefully moved to sit on the table. He didn't really care, he was okay now. Sated for the moment. He could handle a little more teasing. He laid back down, head on the pillow, he could take a nap, but wouldn't. His muscles were burning in a nice way, like after a good work out and he shifted so his knees were bent but apart. Not quite sure what Daniel wanted.

Daniel didn't move so Johnny pushed himself up again looking at him. He was staring.

"Daniel? You know you can touch right? Or are you just mentally having sex with me right now?"

Daniel's eyes rose to meet his and he smiled. "My daydreams are not as good as reality. You know," he said standing up again and putting his hand on Johnny's thigh. "I had a lot of ideas for this evening. And you sent all of them flying off."

"Well honestly thought there'd be more touching then there was."

"I was working on it. Let's go back to where I left off okay? Let me see if I remember correctly what I was doing. I believe these were here," Daniel said thoughtfully sticking a couple fingers inside of him. "Was it two or three do you remember?"

"No."

"Let's go with three then just to be safe."

Johnny pressed down on them, trying to take in more, missing that full feeling. Daniel was teasing, again. But it wasn't as bad this time.

"Well you definitely weren't doing that last time," Daniel murmured, pressing his lips to Johnny's knee for a soft kiss. He glanced up at Johnny with a mischievous look on his face as he moved his fingers. "Which is better? My fingers or my dick?"

Johnny tried to meet his movement, tried to twist himself in a way that would get them to where he wanted them to be, but Daniel's hand was on his hip holding him still, not enough for Johnny to be completely unable to move, but enough to give him pause. He was maybe making more noise then he had been in a while, melting a bit, no longer biting his tongue because they had a guest. He was sensitive and Daniel smiled dipping his head down between Johnny's legs and while he tried to think of a response, tried to figure out what Daniel had asked and his response Daniel's mouth wrapped around him again and all that came out was a heady moan and a string of curses as he grabbed hold of the table cloth.

Maybe it was because he'd already orgasmed once, or maybe it was because they hadn't had time to themselves in a while and even though once had been good, maybe he was still pent up. But no matter what way it was, no matter the reason Johnny wasn't able to keep hold of a single thought. Just a buzz of pleasure that felt obscene. It probably was. He was trying not to think, trying not to care. Just to enjoy the ride, whatever Daniel wanted now, it'd be fine.

He'd be able to handle it.

It was just a beautiful warm pleasure building.

Oh.

"Daniel, I'm-" Johnny pushed himself up, ready to warn or push Daniel away but Daniel moved and gently pulled Johnny towards the edge of the table. He looked at Daniel stunned that he'd managed to move him so easily, shocked after being so far away he was suddenly there within reach and not hiding, not trying to escape his grasp. He wrapped his arms around Daniel. He wasn't going to let go. He was going to hold onto him this time.

"Hold on a second," Daniel murmured focused still with what he was doing.

"I am," Johnny said a little dazed. Close. It'd been close. "Not gonna last long," he murmured more of a thoughtful note.

Daniel looked at him and kissed one of the arms near him, moving, adjusting his position and Johnny felt him. He waited as the space between them disappeared. As Daniel's eyes held his steady. Once that stare had burned him up inside. Those brown eyes had pissed him off. But now they set everything in him on fire in a different way, a pleasurable fire that burned inside him. It was weird. He never spent so much time looking into someone's eyes before. But Daniel's, he knew those eyes well. Knew that what he'd once thought was fear or anger, when he'd been trying to figure Daniel out, now, when looking on him so warmly was different. Lust. Love. Eros.

He never was prepared for it. For the way Daniel looked at him. It was overwhelming and he wondered if some day he'd get use to it. To being in that spotlight after so long in the dark, unnoticed. It was easier to get lost in his eyes, studying the brown that studied him back, knowing that he didn't have to hold on anymore, because he wasn't alone. Because there were gentle hands held out to catch him. Whether it was in a closet at Jimmy's house or falling in to Kumiko's car in Okinawa.

He was so used to having to catch himself, of being pushed down, that he'd never noticed anything else, until those hands were on him, persistently supporting him. Not letting him fall. He was always at a loss for words, unable to put any of those feelings into words, kissing whatever piece of Daniel's skin was near him.

He loved so much that it was overwhelming. And to see it reflected back, something he'd been so sure wouldn't be the case, it tied his tongue up in knots. He didn't mind that he'd be covered in bruises tomorrow, covered in love bites, like a secret message between the two of them. While Johnny was busy through the day it'd be a reminder and Daniel would see it when he got home. When he came home to Johnny.

"Johnny?"

"Y-eah?"

"Having you is sweeter than any chocolate."

Johnny stared at him, the sincerity in his tone and felt his skin burn. Everything felt warm like honey, just as sweet. He grabbed Daniel, pulling him close, wrapping his legs around him, and kissing him until he couldn't hold on any longer.

"Are you okay?" Daniel asked gently washing Johnny's back.

"Yeah, why?"

"You're standing weird."

Johnny felt his ears burn. Was he? Everything was kind of sensitive. He'd wanted to shower and go to bed and sleep it off.

"How much time do we have?" Johnny asked.

"You're ignoring the question. Maybe a half hour?" Daniel said, hands going lower.

"We gotta clean up."

"Isn't that what we're doing?" Daniel asked, giving Johnny's ass a squeeze.

Johnny's legs nearly went out from under him. He blinked looking back at Daniel.

"How are you still....okay? You're like somehow more energized."

"You're not?" Daniel asked pressing in close and Johnny felt a tired twitch of interest that didn't agree with their water pressure.

"I'm ready for a bed. You got your wish."

"What wish?" Daniel asked kissing his jaw.

"You wanted to go at it like rabbits. I don't think I've got another round in me."

"You sure?"

"Very. You can still? How? Nope. Don't want to know how. We've got a half hour. I want to finish this shower, clean up the kitchen table and go to bed."

"We should get one of those waterproof chairs, like they had in the bath houses in Okinawa. Maybe you could sit and I'd wash your hair."

"Hmm," Johnny said. "I don't think we've got the room."

Sitting did sound good though. And they'd cleaned recently. But would he be able to get back up?

Maybe.

"Hey where are you going?" Daniel asked.

"Got an idea. Might need help up later," Johnny said.

"You going to get stuck down there?" Daniel asked amused. "What's going to happen when we're old? If you're already thinking you might get stuck?"

"I'm just tired. It's not going to be the same thing at all."

"Uh huh sure, hey-"

"You can wash my hair if you want," Johnny said taking one of their soap containers and washing Daniel's legs and taking his time on Daniel's dick.

"I thought you were tired."

"Can't handle anything else down here," Johnny said motioning. "I lost track of how many times I came. But my arms aren't tired," Johnny said. "Plus it's about to be clean and my mouth isn't tired either."

He grinned looking up at Daniel

He leaned back a little so the water rinsed Daniel off, focused on the task at hand, then looked up at Daniel keeping eye contact as he gave it a long slow lick.

"You seem interested," Johnny said.

"Of course I'm interested," Daniel said. "You're sitting there all pretty and naked at dick level, and that wasn't washing, that was totally the start of a hand job, you can't even pretend it wasn't. You're teasing me on purpose."

Johnny laughed. "I've got to get revenge somehow. But I hope, sincerely, that bed time is after this."

"I don't even think it's ten pm Johnny," Daniel said. He was leaning forward palms flat on the tile looking down at him.

"You can stay up, I need sleep," Johnny said eyes going back to what he held in his hands, gently moving it so it wasn't facing away from him but instead towards his lips. "I can't believe you actually still have energy."

" Johnny !"

Johnny laughed, moving carefully so he had enough room and hopefully wouldn't slip and hit his head. It was one of the reasons he hoped Daniel would wash his hair, keep him from losing his balance and knocking himself out like an dumbass. Which was also why he was sitting and not kneeling, that and because his knees felt as weak as a regency era heroines. They'd be fine later he was sure, especially if he manged to talk Daniel into going to bed early.

He got past the tip on the first go, it was a skill he was still working on and bananas were not good practice partners. A good attempt, but he still had work to do. But a glance up at Daniel showed that Daniel didn't seem to care, that the act itself got him going. Hands were in his hair, soft and gently shampooing. He pressed forward, trying to figure out a decent bob that didn't get water in his face, that wouldn't eventually lead to soap in his eyes. He had time, time to figure it all out, to swallow Daniel down in a way that he wouldn't be able to stand it. To make his knees buckle in pleasure.

It was a secret goal.

One of them.

Oh. That was faster than he expected.

"Shit, sorry," Daniel said cupping Johnny's face and gently rinsing it off. "I didn't get any in your eye did I?"

"I'm fine," Johnny said. "How you can come and then panic so quickly is a feat."

"Well I didn't want you to lean forward to rub it off and get soap in your eye, so I panicked."

Johnny laughed softly turning his head to kiss Daniel's palm. "Maybe next time I'll try sitting in Seiza."

"Don't tease me about that," Daniel said.

"Interested?"

"Extremely."

"Okay, next time. Help me up will you?"

"You were serious?"

"Yeah, I was serious, it stings okay?"

"Johnny, why didn't you ask me to stop?"

"Because I was also enjoying it," Johnny said taking Daniel's hand and standing up carefully. "Which is why I'm looking forward to cuddling with you in bed soon."

"Let's maybe wash your face first."

"What? Didn't get it all off?" Johnny asked amused.

"Of course I did! But still, Just in case."

Johnny smiled kissing him quickly before turning to wash his face and run a hand through his hair to make sure there wasn't anything left in it.

"Are you satisfied with your White Day?"

"For now."

"For now? Louie did all the ground work for getting Chozen to take him to the movies. I lost track of how many times I came. You got your dining room table sex that you wanted."

"And a beautiful surprise lap dance sex."

"I didn't dance."

"No, but you moved beautifully to the point that I don't think a lap dance could ever compare."

"Uh huh, you got chocolates that I made,"

"And I ate chocolate off of you which was fun and you gave me a shower blow job."

"Yeah so how is it good for now, today was practically like your birthday."

"That's what I want for my next birthday."

"Huh?"

"I want to have so much sex that you forget how many times you came on my birthday."

"Daniel."

"I want you to get all weak in the knees and turn into an old man who wants to go to bed because he's tired of coming. I want your voice to be hoarse from moaning and crying out for more. I want to make you come with just my fingers."

"Daniel you're a horny monster, are you done bathing? I'm done. I'm leaving. You can stay here talking dirty to the walls but I'm going to curl up in our cozy bed," Johnny said kissing his shoulder and the stepping out of the shower, grabbing his towel and heading off to their room.

"Wait for me!" Daniel said and he listened to the water shut off and the sound of wet feet on the tile.

"Don't run and fall," Johnny said turning in the doorway and catching Daniel who hugged him tight around the waist.

"One, it's no fun if you're not there listening and blushing. Two. I bought popcicle molds and got bored and filled them with water. Want me to stick an popscicle in? Might help."

Johnny stared at him, speechless.

"No."

"You sure? If it's bothering you maybe I should take a closer look."

"Nu-uh you leave my ass alone. You've done enough investigative poking around. That's why it's the way it is in the first place."

"I didn't poke around. I made love. I was also trying to be very gentle but your the one who impaled himself on my dick first chance you got."

Johnny let go of Daniel, walking into their room and pushing back the covers.

"Wait you're not getting dressed."

"No."

"Shit," Daniel said looking around, wrapping his towel around his waist and hurrying back out.

Johnny curled up on his side of the bed and yawned. He could hear Daniel moving around the apartment and he sighed rolling over and hugging the whale shark.

"Did you fall asleep already?" Daniel asked crawling into bed next to him.

"No, you didn’t bring a popcicle did you?"

"No, but I cleaned up and I left a note for Louie telling him we've gone to bed and not to wake us up unless he wants to die."

"Don't murder your cousin,” Johnny said softly feeling Daniel’s warm skin on his, arms wrapping around him. He couldn’t even keep his eyes open long enough to see Daniel turn out the light, just feeling him close and the kiss pressed to his head before drifting off.

Chapter End Notes

Garlic grilled chicken with pesto Zucchini ribbons ways to peel garlic

Bourbon Balls

Chicken Piccata

Herding

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Daniel stood on the mansion doorsteps with the guys holding his bag. Really mansion didn't seem the right word.

Castle?

Dutch's home was intense. It was beautiful. And Johnny had promised they'd be spending the night. It seemed he was the only one who had. It was kind of shocking since the cobras seemed so glued at the hip that Bobby, Tommy and Jimmy hadn't slept over. And it was kind of sad that it was happening for the first time the night before Dutch left.

Daniel heard Johnny shut the Avanti door, getting the last of the stuff he wanted and they moved aside to let him pass, some unspoken word that Johnny should be the one to knock.

Johnny knocked but it was only met with quiet.

"Maybe no one's home," Daniel said softly.

"No, Dutch is home. It just takes him a while to get to the door," Johnny said.

"There's no staff?" Jimmy asked.

"Not usually. They don't get a lot of visitors," Johnny said. "The staff just clean and sometimes cook."

Daniel frowned. So an entire castle and more often then not the only one in it was Dutch? That didn't seem okay. Why hadn't Dutch had the guys over every second and minute he could? Or maybe that's why he was never home, why he could be found at their apartment eating the last of Daniel's ice cream.

"How do you know he's home?" Jimmy asked.

"His car is here."

"Which one?"

"All of them."

The door opened and Dutch stood there staring at them blearily from inside the dark home.

"What are you all doing here? I thought I was meeting you all for dinner..." he glanced at his watch with a frown, "In like five hours."

"You didn't miss anything," Johnny said stepping forward, pushing his way into the house.

"Wait, why do you have bags?" Dutch asked.

"We're spending the night," Johnny said.

"Listen the staff isn't here and my parents aren't here and-"

"I know ," Johnny said.

He stressed it, and the tension left Dutch's shoulders, they slumped and he sighed.

"If you'll give me a second you can stop panicking," Johnny said setting his bag down and patting his red jacket pocket for an envelope. "Trust me."

At that, the trust me, Dutch completely relaxed and shut the door behind them, waiting.

"Voilà," Johnny said pulling out a thick envelope Daniel remembered seeing come in the mail the week before.

He passed it over to Dutch.

Dutch opened the envelope, reading through it. His eyes shooting up to look at Johnny.

"You wrote to my parents?"

"Yup."

"You got permission to spend the night?"

"I did, but you should know this was going to happen one way or the other. There's no way you're spending your last night before your big trip alone. If I'd have failed I'd have sent Bobby or my mom after them," Johnny said, picking up his bag and resting it over his shoulders. "You've helped all of us move, helped us adjust to new things, made sure Jessica and Kumiko got to the airport okay, multiple times on Jessica's part. Now it's your turn. We're not leaving your side."

Dutch's eyes looked glassy and Daniel decided fuck it.

He'd learned this group was the cuddliest group of friends he'd ever met and it was Dutch's turn.

He gave Dutch a hug prepared to hold on tight.

"Don't start," Dutch said with a huff, trying to pry Daniel off.

Daniel didn't budge.

"Hey don't look at me," Johnny said. "If Daniel wants to do something he goes for it and there's no stopping him. I've learned to accept this. I also know that his grip is strong and there's no escaping that either."

Daniel laughed and Dutch sighed hugging Daniel back. "You're a stubborn terror and I'm going to miss you."

"Me? A terror? What about you!" Daniel asked with a laugh.

"Hey I never pretended to be anything but what I am. You're the one whose all peaceful meditation Mr. Miyagi style on the outside and little scheming demon on the inside."

"I blame you."

"Don't blame me! I can't be the one who corrupted you. You were already full of mischief. I refuse responsibility. Absolutely refuse. Ah man, seriously, all of you lemme go, you get to spend the night here for the first time ever, except you Johnny, and we don't even get past the damn foyer? Johnny, get 'em off me."

Daniel listened to the guys laughing hugging Dutch.

"Nah man, enjoy your cuddles, get used to it. You're doomed. 'sides you should hear Daniel sometimes. He's like itching for revenge."

"Revenge? What revenge?" Dutch asked.

"Ah, I didn't mention? We're sharing your bed tonight," Johnny said.

"What?"

"I'll go hide your porn magazines," Johnny said with a laugh footsteps retreating into the house.

"You seriously live alone and just leave skin mags around?" Bobby asked.

"Shut up, there's no wining this conversation," Dutch said sourly. "Why do you all have to stay with me? Why my bed? You do know there are perfectly good beds elsewhere in this house. There's a ton of guest bedrooms. You could be so spread out in the house you wouldn't even know the rest of us were here."

"That's the opposite of what we want," Tommy said.

"Yeah why would we want to be on the whole other end of this gigantic fortress when our plan is to spend time with you?" Jimmy asked.

"You know we always stay with each other. Hell nine times out of ten we share Jimmy's bedroom. We created that habit because of Johnny and now I refuse to break it," Bobby said.

"But Johnny needed it," Dutch said winding up for a protest. "I don't-"

"You do too," Daniel said. "This big place by yourself. That sucks."

"I spend plenty of time not here, with you guys."

"True," Bobby said. "and you're always welcome. But I'm glad we're here to be with you tonight."

"This is so sappy!" Dutch complained, squirming but failing to dislodge any of them. "Johnny! Johnny come take them away!"

"No!" echoed back down the hallway.

"Take your boyfriend back at least or else… I'm going to kiss him!"

"You wouldn't dare!"

"You don't know that! Maybe that's the best way to get them all off of me!"

There was silence, all of Dutch's muscles were tense.

A voice floated down from somewhere above, Johnny had moved from wherever he had been.

"1. I trust Daniel. 2. Daniel will kick your ass if he wants to and you know it. 3. I don't think you could handle kissing him. As for the rest of the guys, go for it. I don't doubt it hasn't happened, like do you remember how drunk we all got after you got out of juvie for breaking that dart board?"

"You went to juvie?"

"Like once...or twice," Dutch said sourly.

"We celebrated his release by going to Jimmy's cousins bar because a couple of times before, our first time out, a bartender served us dish water. Like actual dish water," Tommy said. "I still drank it."

"No one believed we were the right age to be drinking and I guess the bartender wanted to teach us a lesson so we wouldn't try it again, but it failed," Bobby said with a laugh.

"Not our fault the only one who knew what beer actually tasted with was Jimmy," Dutch said sourly. "But anyway someone was being a dick."

"And Dutch broke the dart board and the bartender picked the other guys side."

"So I went to juvie."

"And when he got out we went to Jimmy's."

"Johnny picked me up from juvie on a bike," Dutch said softly.

"And we got plastered. My cousin didn't mind us celebrating, just made sure we didn't drive our bikes home. I think when he closed up for the night he drove us to my house and we sort of stumbled out and spent the night at mine?"

"I don't remember that," Tommy said.

"That's because we had to like carry your ass. You were such a light weight," Dutch said with a fond laugh.

Daniel felt someone ruffle his hair. "You're lucky, we were such a bad influence. But I'd say we got better."

"We weren't always drunk or high," Bobby said. "And it's not like we've given it all up."

"Yeah you gotta enjoy everything while you still can Father , " Dutch said.

"Don't call me that."

"Okay Pops ."

"Wait so why did Johnny make it sound like you guys kissed?" Daniel asked.

"We didn't, not really. Johnny fell asleep early and we had a really really dumb idea for a joke," Jimmy said.

"It was really bad," Bobby agreed. "We borrowed his mom's lipsticks, tried it on and then like left marks on each other so it'd seem like Johnny and Tommy slept through and missed a bunch of babes."

"Jokes was on them though," Johnny said with a laugh. "They were so drunk they forgot to wipe the lipstick off their own mouths."

"How old were you?"

"I think it was our first year of karate," Bobby said thoughtfully.

"No wonder the bartender knew we weren't old enough," Tommy said with a laugh. "Have you looked back at pictures from our first year? We were so small."

"No way anyone got babes back then."

"Not the kind that wore lipstick anyway," Johnny said with a laugh. "Now, Dutch, traditionally for our sleepovers we hang out in a room for a bit. Have snacks, eventually have dinner."

"I know that," Dutch said. "How many sleepovers have I had with you?"

"More than I can count."

"Exactly."

Johnny was smiling. "We've brought snacks, drinks, board games, and our pretty faces."

"Pretty faces," Dutch repeated with a laugh. "Daniel's the only one with a pretty face."

"Thank you."

"Hey!"

"But first, un-fun stuff," Johnny said. "Are you packed?"

"Partially," Dutch said.

"Then let's help you finish packing first."

"What?"

"Follow me," Johnny said walking off down the hall again.

"Wait a second," Dutch said.

Daniel let go following Johnny, looking at the parts of the house he'd never seen.

House seemed too common for the shiny marble and the statues.

He reached out and took Johnny's hand. Johnny laced their fingers, leading Daniel up a spiral staircase.

"What's going to happen while you're gone?" Bobby asked. "Aren't you the only one who really lives here?"

"Half the wings are already closed off," Dutch said. "They'll just also close off my wing."

"What about your peacocks?" Daniel asked.

"Staff will feed them when they come to do basic stuff. Though really the greenhouse is a self contained ecosystem."

They entered a long hallway with massive paintings on the walls. Not portraits, like last time but impressionist paintings and still lifes. They passed a couple doors and then Johnny pushed open the door on the end.

Daniel wasn't sure what he expected.

No.

He knew what he'd expected.

He'd expected one of those fancy replica rooms that museums had or something out of a fancy period drama. He expected it to match the rest of the house.

But it was a cozy room. There was a fireplace which Daniel wondered if it ever got used since it was almost never cold in LA. There was a comfortable looking couch, posters for bands on the walls, every single one of them signed, signed guitars next to them. There were a few signed movie posters too. Dutch had his own TV, VHS player, stereo, and Daniel spotted a computer on Dutch's desk. But as his eyes passed all the tech they fell on the bed. It was massive.

"That's your bed?!" Daniel gasped.

Johnny grinned watching him and the guys take in the room.

"Uh, yeah," Dutch said.

"You mean to say you crowded into my bed countless times, and Johnny's bed, when we all could've been here in that?!"

"Shit Dutch, you seriously sleep by yourself in a California King size bed?"

"Yeah, what's wrong with that?"

"You ever get lost in that thing?"

"I like not touching the edges at all."

"How long does it take you to get out of it?"

"It takes a while, especially if you're in the middle. A lot of scooting," Johnny said with a laugh.

"You wanted to put us in other rooms when we could share that thing with you? Seriously? What you got creepy stuff or something in here?" Jimmy asked.

"What? No!" Dutch said.

"He's just not used to having guests," Johnny said.

"Rooms can tell you a lot about a person," Daniel said looking at the wooden carved animals on the mantel. "When did you get such a big bed?"

"Third grade."

"What? Seriously?"

"Parents thought I was old enough."

"Is it comfortable?"

"You're going to find out tonight aren't you?" Dutch asked.

Daniel blinked and grinned. "Hell yeah I am. And you won't have to shove me on top of Johnny for there to be enough space."

"How will you survive?"

"He'll probably still latch onto Johnny," Tommy said looking at the stained glass over the windows, with their window seats and view of the gardens and long dramatic curtains.

"So what are these?" Bobby asked picking up a soft octopus sitting on Dutch's desk. "You packing this?"

"He better," Johnny said as Dutch scooped it up.

"It's nothing, Just an octopus."

"That octopus looks familiar," Daniel said turning and walking over. "Oh! Is that the one from in the paintings?"

Dutch stared at Daniel. "You're too observant for you own good."

Daniel grinned. "I knew it! You gotta take it."

"So your childhood toy is an octopus?" Jimmy asked.

"My parents liked naval stuff," Dutch said with a frown. "I dressed in a little sailor suit a lot as a kid. It was their favorite outfit of mine."

"Did you have a ship?"

"I have three."

"You have three ships?"

"I have a yacht and actual ships I can go out on."

"You also have a canoe and a sail boat," Johnny said.

"What? Why didn't we go out on any of those?" Bobby asked.

"Dude we could've spent our senior year on a yacht. Seriously?"

"It's a pain," Dutch said. "I have to call my parents and get permission and they have to contact the captain and they have to get the food and the drink and besides we spent the rest of our senior year trying to get these two bozos together. A yacht party just didn't seem...worth it?"

"Maybe we would've gotten together faster if you'd put us on a boat together," Daniel said with a teasing grin turning to look for Johnny who had zero'd in on Dutch's suitcase and was digging around.

"Dutch, why's your suitcase like eighty percent deodorant?" Johnny asked.

"My packing list I was given said that they don't really sell deodorant there."

"Seriously?"

"I mean it might be available on one of the US army bases, but I've kind of had my fill of that. I don't want to meet any more Kreese or Silvers."

"Can I see that list?"

"Yeah let me find it."

Dutch searched through some papers on his desk, past his passport and grabbed a piece of paper handing it to Johnny.

"How long are you planning to be gone?"

"What why?"

"I mean, this is enough deodorant for like five years."

Daniel walked over looking at Dutch's suitcase and leaning down to rest his head on top of Johnny's.

"Too many?" Dutch asked with a frown.

"I mean are you going to college there or something? Are you planning to become a master? Aren't you going to come back, visit, and restock?"

"How much should I take? I mean I'm going to be working out," Dutch asked with a frown.

"I don't know somewhere between like four and six probably," Johnny said. "Not, what is this, thirty? What'd you do buy out all the deodorant in the Valley?"

"I didn't know," Dutch said. "I panicked okay? I've never left the Valley for this long. And they don't sell it."

"Just like take out half. What else did you pack?" Johnny asked taking out a couple sticks of deodorant.

"Is that a towel?" Daniel asked, leaning over Johnny and reaching for the towel.

"Yeah. I've packed two."

"Like Hitchhiker's Guide to the Galaxy or something?" Jimmy asked.

"Apparently the towels are small."

" Prince and the Pea much?" Tommy asked.

"I'm sorry did I judge all of you and your packing choices?" Dutch asked whirling on them.

Bobby held up his hands. "This is new territory for all of us."

"If you don't take 30 deodorants you can fit other stuff. Like spice packets," Johnny said holding up the packing list. "Or jello."

Dutch frowned studying his suitcase and sighed. "If I run out or wish I had these I'm going to complain to you and make you come here and ship them to me."

"Spices won't weigh as much either," Jimmy said. "Though really if you miss anything let met know and I'll ship it to you."

"Thanks," Dutch said.

"Did you pack any clothes?" Daniel asked.

"Not you too," Dutch complained turning towards him.

"Sorry, you've done a fine job packing. But you should take some clothes."

"I said I wasn't done," Dutch said, then sighed. "It gets cold there okay? So like yeah I'm going in March but should I take winter clothes? Like what I wear to the lodge?

"Probably for the best," Bobby said.

"Okay, Johnny you can take out some of the deodorant, but leave me with six," Dutch said turning and opening a door. "What games did you bring?" he called.

Daniel got up and walked towards the door, curious about the echo.

Dutch's closet was another room.

He stood in the center of the room with the light on looking at his clothes with a frown.

"I don't think I've ever seen a guy with so much clothes," Daniel said.

"This isn't a lot. My dad has one of these that's just suits. Let's see where'd I put my winter jacket."

"We brought Conspiracy," Jimmy said. "Woah."

"That's four players max though."

"Yeah, thought Daniel and Johnny could play as one person."

"Hey we like competing against one another."

"That still is 5," Dutch said opening up some doors and looking with a frown at the clothes. "We're six."

"I brought Trivial Pursuit," Tommy said.

"See, Tommy at least knows you need a game for enough people."

"I also brought Aggravation," Jimmy said.

"At least you admit it."

"The board game," Jimmy said.

Dutch leaned back grinning at Jimmy. "I know."

"Do you need some help? Did you get lost?" Bobby asked.

"No. Of course I didn't get lost in my own closet."

"Just checking."

"What should our prize be?"

"Huh?" Dutch asked arms full of clothes walking past them and back out into his room.

"For the winner of the board games?" Bobby asked.

"It can't be booze," Tommy said.

"Yeah not with you having a flight in the morning. Flying dehydrates you enough, especially flying overseas. You don't need that on top of it," Jimmy said.

"Man, who are all of you, my parents?" Dutch asked dumping his clothes on top of Johnny and his suitcase.

"Hey."

"You brought them here," Dutch said shaking his head. "I blame you."

"It's love man, accepted it."

"I do, that's the messed up bit."

"Then hang in there a little longer."

"Shut up," Dutch said spinning and walking back to the closet. "Truth or Dare," he told Bobby as he passed.

"With a veto option," Bobby agreed.

Daniel watched Johnny carefully folding Dutch's clothes and putting it away. He walked over sitting next to him. "You okay?"

"Yeah, we're all just kind of, sad," Johnny said softly. "It's going to be a rough night."

"You think so?" Daniel asked, helping Johnny fold the clothes and pack them.

"He's trying not to cry and we're trying not to cry," Johnny said. "We want him to have a fun adventure but we're sad to see him go, and he's excited but he's sad to leave. I mean this happens every time someone leaves. You'd think we'd be used to it by now. But Dutch is..."

Johnny frowned looking at one of the shirts Dutch had dumped on him and sighed. He looked incredibly sad. Daniel got it, or at least he thought he got it and he pushed clothes aside hugging Johnny tightly.

"I know," Daniel said.

"They're all important to me and it was hard to say goodbye even just that half hour distance," Johnny said softly. "But this is way further. He's going to another country, not for a couple of weeks, not for a summer vacation or a month like they've done in the past. He's going to be gone for an open ended amount of time."

Daniel could feel him holding on, hugging back tightly, like he needed to feel how solid Daniel was next to him, anchoring him.

"We'll visit him," Daniel said rubbing Johnny's back.

"Yeah, I know but...he's the one who comes to the shop. He visits you on campus right? He's at our place more often then anyone else. Well...other than Louie."

"It means no one's going to scare me half to death at six in the morning sitting in the dark eating my ice cream," Daniel said.

"That was once right?"

"Three times," Daniel said.

Johnny laughed softly and the worry Daniel felt lessened.

It felt surreal, to be sitting on the floor of Dutch's fancy room with Johnny making sure he was packed.

Dutch.

The guy who delighted in making his life hell, who Daniel never expected to apologize to him. The guy who got in trouble in gym class on purpose to sit down next to him and say I suppose I should start with sorry for being a shit. His first attempt to talk up Johnny. Something about how Johnny not being as bad as Daniel thought and inviting him to Jimmy's senior year party. Pushing them into a closet together where Daniel got to catch Johnny, being sneaky all the time trying to not just make sure Daniel was having a good senior year but also that he and Johnny were together as much as possible. From giving him pieces of gum on the way to class, to hanging around his locker. All the guys had taken Daniel in, but Dutch always turned around and made sure Daniel didn't lag behind. Like one of those dogs that herds.

Daniel hadn't realized it at first. Not while they were in school. But when they got back from Okinawa, when Daniel was training Dutch was keeping him moving. Kept pushing him forward. Every time Daniel didn't want to get out of bed, enjoying sleeping with his hand on Johnny's pec and not wanting to leave the warmth of their embrace Dutch was there dragging his ass out of bed and making him move. Even after Jessica left. He'd been there, a pain in his ass for so long.

Dutch and his dumb van that hadn't prepared Daniel for his house. A van that smelled of stale weed and played ABBA and opera but fit all their friends. Dutch and his regal pecking peacocks and honey bees. Dutch and pushing Daniel over onto Johnny so he could sleep next to them.

Daniel was sure if he asked Dutch would say he couldn't sleep comfortably on the floor, but Daniel was pretty sure he knew, that when things were bad it felt safer surrounded.

What was it called? Brumation that cobras did? How snakes all slept together so they stayed warm.

Dutch who came to campus and waited for him outside his classes like he didn't have anything else to do or anywhere else to be except to hang out with Daniel. It'd been such a relief to see him the first several times. It was unspoken. They'd never say it. But Dutch was there to make sure Daniel was safe. That no one was bothering him. That if he didn't feel okay that Dutch was there, waiting outside his class.

He knew if he'd told Johnny Johnny would've skipped working in the shop to be there. But he wanted to try and do it on his own.

And Dutch was there because he heard they had good coffee on campus.

Because he was curious what campus life was like.

Because he was bored.

They were all excuses.

It was because the guys didn't get into that much trouble and were together at UCLA, it was because Johnny was safe with Mr. Miyagi. It was because Daniel was alone at school, alone at sea and Dutch was there as a life guard keeping an eye from the shore so that he could swim safely amongst the waves.

There was so much. So much to say to Dutch, so much that Daniel felt overwhelmed.

Daniel felt a warm hand on his back and sniffed.

"Stop it you two," Bobby said with a whisper. "This isn't allowed. Johnny don't give me that look. If one of you starts crying the other will start crying and then I'll start and then we'll all be up all night sobbing. We agreed to try and stave off tears until the flight at least. Until he was gone."

"I'm trying," Johnny whispered, not pulling away from Daniel or loosening his grip, his voice sounded tight.

"Are you two literally holding each other together? Like if I pulled you apart right now would you both just start crying? Seriously?" Bobby asked and Daniel felt a tug on his shoulder, not strong enough to actually pull them apart. Then a sigh. "We'll finish packing quick and then move on to a game. So just this one time, pull yourselves together huh? You guys brought snacks, go do snacks and come back when you've pulled yourselves together."

"Yeah," Johnny said and Daniel felt him move, felt the arms around him shift and then the ground went out from underneath him as Johnny lifted him up.

"Hey," Daniel said.

"Sorry," Johnny whispered, he was walking fast from the room, still holding Daniel tight.

"Is it really that bad?" Daniel whispered.

"We all made a deal," Johnny said.

"To not cry?"

"Yeah."

Daniel sighed pressing his face into Johnny's shoulder. "Why didn't you tell me?"

"I thought you'd be fine, but I wasn't expecting to be the first to cave."

"Wait you're crying?" Daniel asked pulling back and twisting to look at Johnny, tears were running down his cheeks and his brow was furrowed like he was mad that he was crying.

"Johnny," Daniel said wiping them away with his thumbs and kissing his cheek. "He's your friend, it's normal."

Johnny set Daniel down.

Daniel cupped his face. "Maybe it'd be better to let it out now huh? While it's just us?"

There was a twitch in Johnny's jaw, the glassiness of his eyes was there again.

"We can talk about it," Daniel said. "I mean I'm going to miss him too, you know?"

Johnny nodded rubbing at his eyes.

"He's been a much better friend then I ever expected. I mean if you went back and told me hey you and Dutch are going to be great friends I would've thought you'd lost it."

Johnny laughed softly.

"Now tell me I would've fallen in love with you I would've denied it, but then I'd have taken a second look at you, and been like yeah no I can see that," Daniel said. "But Dutch...out of all your cobras, I don't know, I didn't trust them as much. Together you all were a nightmare, but on your own you were less bitey. Dutch terrified me you know? And I know you two are close. I know all of you are close. I mean you all share a damn bed. Do you know what a pain in the ass it was to wake up having gone to bed with just you and waking up to find one of the guys, usually Dutch, also in our bed? I've never woken up so much with a strong desire of just murdering someone I care about. But at the same time-"

Johnny held him tight again. Daniel slid his hand into Johnny's hair, playing with it carefully.

"I'm going to miss it," Daniel finished softly. "I'm going to miss him too. And I'm kind of looking forward to that giant bed of his and I'm also kind of pissed that we've all been crammed in like sardines when we could've been here sleeping in that thing. And you! You've slept in it before haven't you?"

He felt Johnny nod. "Yeah."

"Why'd you never say anything? Why'd you never push us to come here?"

"With his parents...it's not easy," Johnny said softly. "They don't trust anyone. They trust the guys now because they saw us cheer him on at the tournament and saw all of you show up at the trial. But before that...a lot of people didn't want to be Dutch's friend to be his friend. They wanted to be a friend of his money and his things. You thought I was a spoiled rich kid right? That's what people think Dutch is too and they assume if they're nice to him they deserve to be given power and money. But they also always look out for ways to force him to do that stuff, you know?"

"Not really," Daniel said with a frown.

Daniel felt Johnny move, pressing his face against Daniel's shoulder and he sighed. "People who said they were his friends, who said they wanted to be his friends were always looking for him to trip up so they could blackmail him. Can you imagine not even being ten and your classmates trying to blackmail you? He got really awful food poisoning shortly after we met and I made sure he got home and I stuck with him because I was worried and he told me My parents won't give you anything, no matter what. Like he expected me to tell his parents he'd eaten something awful and use it to blackmail them into giving me money or to try and win over money.

“I didn't understand a word he was saying. I thought he was delusional because he was sick or something. It didn't click until like a year later when we ran into some other kids who used to go to his old school and tried to blackmail him because they caught us smoking and tried to get him in trouble. He ended up in juvie that time," Johnny sighed.

"What if he gets into fights overseas? He's over 18 he won't go to juvie he'll get deported or thrown in jail. What if he gets hurt? I won't be there to back him up. Will there be people to check in on him? I mean the guy tried to pack 30 deodorants, will he be okay on his own?"

"Says you who threw yourself onto a flight to Okinawa without any money."

Johnny pushed back, looking at Daniel, startled from his tears.

"What I mean is, we all make dumb choices. He's probably overwhelmed, just like you are, just like I get."

It wasn't good. Daniel wanted to kiss him. But was it a bad idea when his heart was breaking?

Daniel licked his cheek. Johnny turned bright red and Daniel stiffened. He'd tried to avoid kissing Johnny and instead had just automatically licked up tears.

Why?

Why had that been the alternative?

Also was there a room where he could drag Johnny off into and maybe release some of that stress?

Oh god, why was that his answer? Johnny was sad about his friend and his automatic answer to that was he'll feel better if I fuck him ?

"Can I kiss you right now?" Daniel asked gently, trying to push down his desire to pepper Johnny in kisses, to grab his ass and turn those tears into tearful moans.

Was this avoidance?

Was he avoiding how he was feeling about Dutch leaving?

Probably.

Was this a good distraction technique?

Maybe.

Maybe it was a perfect one actually. Distract both of them with a bit of sex.

Johnny seemed to be absolutely speechless and Daniel smiled softly. "Cat got your tongue? Mind if I check?"

Daniel kissed him, a warm press of lips and waited to see if Johnny would kiss him back, if he didn't he'd pull away. But Johnny shut his eyes and kissed him back, fingers gripping his shirt tightly and kissing him in a needy desperate way that made Daniel's heart pound.

Maybe they could?

No, that'd be bad right?

But it wasn't like anyone would come looking for them. Bobby would make them all avoid them, because if they saw Johnny cry they'd cry too. So no one would leave that room until they came back which meant he could try something.

Maybe, just touch? He'd test it out.

He slid one hand into Johnny's back pocket and gave a squeeze.

"Should we...distract each other? Get rid of some pent up feelings?" Daniel asked trying to sound as casual about it as possible even though he knew Johnny could tell, could feel how badly he wanted to do something.

Johnny looked thoughtful lowering his head to Daniel's chest, breathing carefully.

"Okay."

"Okay?" Daniel asked, trying to sound like he was confirming and not excited.

He was too excited.

Maybe it was bad, was there something wrong with him?

Johnny was sad.

Hell, he was sad.

But he could push past it if he could make Johnny moan in his ear. He ran a hand down Johnny's chest, squeezing and rubbing at Johnny's nipples.

It helped.

Or at least it helped him . He studied Johnny's face, kissing him softly.

Why was it suddenly so easy to put aside his own concern because Johnny was letting him touch him?

Was he that easily distracted?

Who was he kidding, of course he was.

Johnny sometimes just had to walk past and he'd forget what he was doing.

It was driving Louie nuts. Hey cuz, earth to Daniel. Seriously?

Johnny was just going about his business, his life and Daniel was like one of those old school cartoons wolves that couldn't control themselves.

"Daniel?" Johnny whispered, voice already raw sounding from trying to stifle tears. "What do you want to do?"

Great question.

Wonderful question.

What wasn't going to be chilly?

Johnny hadn't liked that last time.

Also, he hadn't brought anything because Johnny said they were all sleeping together.

Daniel looked around the kitchen.

It was massive.

Like the kind he'd seen in the back of the country club but not nearly as busy or chaotic.

Empty, shiny and clean.

Probably rarely used.

He spotted some olive oil and grabbed it before returning to Johnny.

"I always want to do a lot. But how about, you hop up here," Daniel said patting the countertop.

He bet it was marble. He thought maybe bending Johnny over that would be beautiful but, he needed coziness and he hadn't moved far away from Daniel yet. Turning his back to Daniel was probably going to be too much right now. He'd add it to the list though.

Maybe at home.

If Louie ever left their apartment.

He'd been asking about the dojo a lot.

Maybe he could figure out how much it'd cost to send Louie to study under Chozen.

It sounded awful. A terrible decision, but if he could get Louie out of the house more?

If it meant more time to spend alone with Johnny then it'd be worth it.

Maybe.

Plus Louie could annoy Chozen a little.

Johnny lifted himself up onto the countertop with ease, a fluid movement. He'd picked the shorter of the counter tops. Waist height, perfect height to hook his hands behind Johnny's knees and make room for himself between them.

One day, if he owned a home, no, when he owned a home his goal would be that everything would be this height, the right height to lay Johnny out on or bend him over. But comfortably.

Maybe not ideal for cooking.

He'd have to rethink it.

Could he have both?

"You know what?" Daniel whispered into Johnny's neck giving him a kiss under his jaw.

"Hmm?"

"I'm not going anywhere. You need me just look over and I'm there okay?" Daniel said.

"I know," Johnny said softly. "Why do you think I grabbed you and ran?"

Daniel grinned.

Johnny had done that hadn't he?

He couldn't handle it and just picked Daniel up and left.

"Well," Daniel said carefully unbuttoning and unzipping Johnny's jeans. "I didn't bring condoms, I mean I have some but they're in the car and I don't particularly want to get caught or seen from a window going to the car to get condoms, so hopefully this will be okay for now. I know you probably also don't want to take too long hmm?" Daniel asked taking Johnny in his hand.

It'd been a while since White Day, since they'd gotten to make love. And Louie had come back and been even more of a pain then before.

He'd literally sat between them on the couch during their movie night the day before.

Again.

Daniel tugged Johnny by the hips a little closer, poured a little oil into his hand and pressed against him, rubbing together.

He wanted to do more. So much more. But this was better and Johnny was thrusting his hips up to meet him, panting and not crying any more. Though his eyes were still wet looking. He looked a little desperate still, for whatever Daniel could give him and damn did Daniel wish they were home, that Louie was elsewhere, that he'd stuck the condom in his pocket like he'd planned to before they got out of the car. But Johnny was already trying to carry everything on his own and Daniel had to rush if he'd help.

But of course there'd been more. There was always more somewhere in the car.

Johnny grabbed the sides of his face and pulled him into a hungry kiss. One of his long legs was wrapped around Daniel's waist like he was using it for purchase when he moved against him.

Daniel leaned down, pushing Johnny down on the counter top and pushing his shirt up. Johnny's hands were in his hair, moaning into the kiss, nipping at Daniel's lips.

He wanted a vacation, just the two of them so badly.

Clothing optional.

But he wanted it at their own apartment where he knew where everything was. Where all the lube was, all the condoms, all the soft blankets and pillows. Or heck, in the Avanti would be nice. That one went straight to his dick. Hmmm he'd put that one in the jar. Johnny in the backseat of his car like this but wanting more. Yeah that was dangerous, a dangerous thought if he wanted it to last a little longer.

He hoped it helped. That this made it better not worse. He knew that sometimes it became overwhelming, Johnny had cried afterwards. At least once. But he was hoping that this popped whatever emotional bubble was bother him, popped it and settled it so he could enjoy the time with the cobras, and that Daniel could focus. Focus on saying goodbye...or goodbye for now and thank you. Because while all that hard work the cobras did didn't get them together, a storm in Okinawa and Mr. Miyagi's final wish got Johnny moving.

All those dates with the cobras got the ball rolling, got them closer, and Daniel was forever grateful to them. For Johnny.

He also needed it. Needed to be close to Johnny, a moment to themselves to restart. To shed some stress and what better way then working their way to an orgasm? Johnny's hand with his, adding pressure right where Daniel needed it, moaning Daniel's name. It sent him over the edge, such an easy addition that made him wonder if Johnny secretly knew all the right buttons to push like a cheat code on an arcade game. But Johnny was there with him, holding him close, lips on his neck, on whatever skin was near him.

It was soothing, loving, the way he ran his fingers along Daniel's skin, along his back until Daniel pulled back to get stuff to help clean up. Johnny sat up on the counter taking what Daniel handed him.

"Any better?" Daniel asked softly.

"Yeah," Johnny said sliding off the counter looking remarkably put together for someone who'd been crying out Daniel's name only moments ago.

He didn't like how untouched he looked all of a sudden, he liked basking in the messy afterglow but there wasn't much. Instead Johnny was smoothing down Daniel's hair.

"Sorry messed it up a bit. What kind of snacks should we take up?"

"What does Dutch usually have?"

"It fluctuates, sometimes a little bit of everything, sometimes stuff from other countries, sometimes nothing," Johnny said opening one of the fridges. "Looks like we're leaning towards nothing."

"That makes sense."

"Yeah we've got string cheese and pudding," Johnny said with a frown.

"Grab both?"

"Aha, Jello."

"What's with the Jello?"

"Dutch likes Jello," Johnny said with a shrug filling his hands with cups of snacks and filling a pocket of his jacket with spoons. "Want to grab some sodas?"

Daniel nodded, filling his arms then following Johnny back through the halls up to Dutch's room.

They were sitting around a board game, the bag was fully packed and zipped and sitting by the door, a stack of deodorant sat on Dutch's desk.

"Welcome back, I'd have worried you'd got lost if Johnny hadn't been with you," Dutch said glancing up from the board. "We'll play something we can all play next."

"Anyone win yet?" Johnny asked holding out snacks that the cups took and passing out spoons.

"Not yet, but soon," Tommy said.

Daniel set the drinks down on the edge of the table and sat down watching the game, listening to the guys talk. Bad jokes and intensity fighting off the impending gloom and melancholy.

He watched them, he could see the brave faces they were putting on.

He wouldn't have been able to tell a year ago, but the signs were there, the way they talked, the way they laughed, it was hidden in their eyes, the sadness there, waiting for a moment of quiet.

He'd seen it when they'd said goodbye to Jessica the first time, when they'd said goodbye to Kumiko.

Johnny was the easiest to read but that was because Daniel knew him too well.

He was steadier than he had been, laughing and teasing Tommy who was losing, in a playful manner, leaning against Jimmy.

They hadn't gone to the ski lodge that year. From what Daniel had learned, accidentally while visiting the guys on campus it was the first year those five hadn't gone to the lodge since they'd met.

They'd joked saying it was because of finals and their first year at college. But Daniel knew it wasn't because of that.

It was because of him.

Because Daniel was training to compete.

Because of Silver and Kreese and Barnes.

Because Johnny didn't feel safe leaving Mr. Miyagi alone for long.

Even if the man could kick all their asses with his eyes shut. Johnny didn't want to leave anyone alone. And the guys didn't want to be out of reach, they wanted to be near the phone.

Jenny had mentioned it once, on accident, not realizing while she'd been walking between Johnny and Daniel, arms hooked through theirs on the way to a UCLA game while the guys had run to go grab seats and she'd complained quietly to them about the shoes she was wearing being new.

"Jimmy was a wreck last winter you know? We weren't dating yet but I kept inviting him out of the firm or out from class to go do stuff and he just didn't want to be far away from his phone. I got him to go out to this all night show once, the last time I wore a new pair of shoes. Should've learned my lesson then. It was fascinating though. He gathered all of them up and made sure they knew where he was and how to get a hold of him. I wanted to hurry because I'd started to feel my shoes pinch and realized that I needed to trade them out but it was kind of too late. I ended up going barefoot. Dancing barefoot to the music once we got there.

"I'd asked him about it while we were there because I'd never seen so many checks and balances in a friendship. Like my friends and I ask each other to let us know when the other gets home right? Like I wait till they go inside before I drive off and what not, but this is a whole other level. But then you know he talked about it, the actual trial with this creep and I got it. Like all the evidence we were collecting and everything, I mean I'd be worried sick about my friends too. And myself. Like what if that guy's focus left the target right? What if it spilled out onto someone else? I'd be terrified if that guy turned and I was in his sights. I don't know how they all managed. But they did.

Oh, oh , I forgot, Daniel I forgot, I'm sorry, you two had the worst of it. I can't believe-"

"It's okay," Johnny had said. "We know it was rough for everyone. Thank you for your help."

"Yeah," Daniel had said.

That was all he'd managed until they got to their seats, Johnny making him go first so he sat between Johnny and the guys.

Herding.

They all did it, made sure Daniel was safely in the middle and he'd never noticed it until then. Like he'd known Dutch did it, but it wasn't until that night that he took a closer look at how the guys moved to make sure Daniel was safely surrounded. The way he'd once noticed they'd done for Johnny. The way they sat so they could keep an eye out.

It'd been automatic, with Bobby's arm around his shoulders like it was any normal day chatting with some girl sitting behind them that he knew from class, with Johnny's knee pressed against his, arm around his waist. It'd been insufferably hot out that night sitting in the stands to watch the game but he'd felt safe in the crowd with them so close that he hadn't complained, hadn't shoved them off even though part of him wanted to.

He wondered how many other things they'd dropped, how many other things they'd let go of for him.

It wasn't their job, it wasn't their duty, but they were ready just in case. And he got it.

He got why they were all putting on brave faces, because Dutch was usually the first one there. The first to show up if they needed something and they were trying to show up for him. To give him a fond bon voyage, to send him off warmly because they wanted to be happy for him first. Supportive, just like the arms that always found a way around Daniel's shoulders.

Dutch won and with a wicked grin turned to Jimmy.

"Truth or Dare."

Jimmy looked startled and frowned thoughtfully.

"Truth."

"What's happening with Jenny?"

Jimmy turned bright red. "What?"

"You heard me. You love this chick? Or is it just a crush?"

Jimmy frowned looking away.

"Do all of you have the same tell?" Daniel asked with a laugh.

"Huh?"

"Johnny also turns bright red. Especially when he tries to figure out ways to tell me how much he loves me."

Daniel caught the blush flooding Johnny's face and grinned.

"Hey-this truth or dare has nothing to do with me, or us," Johnny whispered.

"It's my favorite thing though," Daniel said leaning over and kissing his warm cheek. "I can't help it."

"It's just..." Jimmy took a deep breath and then sighed turning back to Dutch. "Fine, yes, I think I love her."

"See was it that hard to say it?"

"What? Of course it was hard to say it! I haven't said it to her! I haven't said it out loud."

"Oh come on, we say I love you all the time, it's not that hard to say," Dutch said.

"That's different."

"No it's not. Listen," Dutch said, leaning close. "I love you. I care about what happens to you and I want you to be happy and healthy."

"That's too intense."

"Is it?"

"Yes! I can't tell her that."

"I don't care what you tell her, I'm telling you , " Dutch said then turned to the rest of them. "It goes for you all."

"We love you too Dutch," Johnny said.

Dutch leaned back with his arms over the back of the couch. "All I mean to say is, you gotta go for it Jimmy. You know what you want with your life. You want to be a lawyer, you want the picket fence, the girl and the kids. If this is the girl, you gotta keep moving forward. Kreese was full of shit, but you can't just sit on your hands with your emotions. You can't bottle them up. Do you want to be like Johnny?"

"Hey!"

"Or Daniel?"

"Excuse me?"

"Those two were head over heels in love with each other for like almost a year before they made a move, and then they didn't bone for even longer. Don't waste time Jimmy. Don't be like those two idiots."

Jimmy frowned with a hand to his chin, looking thoughtful.

"Dutch is right."

"Of course I am."

"Can I borrow your phone?"

"Yup, give your gal a call and get that ball rolling. But, hey, don't tell her you love her over the phone. That's weak as fuck, you got to tell her in person."

"Right," Jimmy said with a nod, walking over to the phone at Dutch's desk.

"I can't believe you used us as a warning ," Daniel said arms folded across his chest with a frown. "We're very happy thank you."

"I know," Dutch said. "But you two wimped out for so long. And unlike with the two of you I'm going to be far away. I can't keep an eye on him from Korea. And it's not like Bobby or Tommy have anything going on for me to really worry about."

"Hey!" Bobby complained.

"I'm very busy thank you," Tommy said.

"Sure you are," Dutch said with a knowing smile ruffling Tommy's hair. "Get a lover will ya? So I can hear all the juicy details over the phone."

"I'm going to side with Johnny on this one," Tommy said with a frown. " No juicy details."

Daniel sighed stretching then noticing a pack of cards on the table.

"Why do you have a hanafuda deck?" Daniel asked.

"I've played a couple games with Chozen and with my taekwondo teacher, though she plays it a little differently," Dutch said with a grin. "I left it out so I remember to pack it so I can play with people in Seoul."

"I didn't know Chozen played," Tommy said looking at the deck of cards.

"Yeah, everyone at Mr. Miyagi's house plays. I went over to see if they needed help with anything because I was bored and Mr. Sato roped me into playing. Chozen taught me how to play because Mr. Sato was pretty deep into the wine at that point and was mostly speaking in Okinawan and Ms. Yukie was struggling to translate. So Chozen took over and it was fun, so when I'm bored I go over to the dojo and play with Chozen."

"Ah, you've been to the dojo?" Bobby asked sounding shocked.

Daniel took Johnny's hand in his and gently rubbed his thumb over the back of it. Johnny laced their fingers together and Daniel wondered if it would be possible to see what else they could intertwine.

"Yeah Jessica talked about it a lot before she left, so I wanted to see it."

"How's it look?" Tommy asked.

"Could barely tell that I spent years of my life sweating in there," Dutch said with a grin. "It's coming along very nicely. I'm actually kind of bummed that I won't be here for the grand opening of Miyagi-do. But you know, I think it's safe, or will be safe to go to you know? He's worked really hard."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah. Hey Daniel, I know that look don't you dare think of sneaking off to another room with Johnny."

Daniel felt his face burn as he was caught, watched Johnny turn to look at him and then turn bright red at the realization and turned to look at Dutch.

"What?"

"I know you too well Mister. Dial it back. I'm sure you weren't gone that long just for snacks too. So I hope you at least cleaned up."

Bobby and Tommy burst out laughing and Daniel sighed rubbing his face.

"Seriously?"

"Yeah seriously. You're really easy to read. You've got like all your needs on your face. Pissed, hungry, horny."

"Hey that's not all I feel."

"Yeah but it's usually one of those three. Though honestly, usually the last one."

"Speaking of hungry," Johnny said quickly. "Mr. Miyagi and everyone gave us a dinner to bring you."

"Huh?" Dutch asked.

Daniel leaned against Johnny grateful for the quick change of subject, even if Dutch was right, he didn't like that he was that easy to read.

"I was also given a note," Johnny said digging through his jacket pocket and passing the sealed letter over.

Dutch took it carefully, his carefree teasing smile fading into a serious look.

"What? Why?" Dutch asked, voice barely a whisper as he opened the envelope.

"I know we just had a snack, but want me to go prepare the dinner? It'll take a bit," Johnny asked. "I can take all the guys. I'll keep them from making trouble."

"Yeah, thanks," Dutch said softly holding the letter carefully.

Johnny stood slowly shooing everyone out the door including Jimmy who had just finished his call.

"Why would I make trouble," Bobby asked as he was pulled from the room.

"What's the big deal?" Jimmy asked.

"Probably some heart felt Miyagi wisdom," Daniel said.

"Oh, you think so? I'm a little surprised," Tommy said.

"Why? He just said he's been hanging out with Mr. Miyagi," Bobby said.

"Yeah but I didn't expect a letter. Or food."

"The food was more of a combined effort," Johnny said as they walked down the hall and down another spiral staircase back to the kitchen.

"Every time you turn a corner in this place I find something even more intense then before," Jimmy said rushing to an oven. "These are massive. You could bake almost anything in there."

"Don't fall in Hansel," Johnny said opening up a fridge and pulling out things that he handed to Daniel.

Daniel recognized the containers as Mr. Miyagi's.

He watched Johnny move through the kitchen like he knew where everything was, handling food like he knew what to do.

When had that happened?

When had Johnny gone from not knowing how to cut a tomato and letting Daniel guide him through cooking in the cabin to knowing his way around a kitchen and being entrusted by Mr. Miyagi and Yukie to cook?

Hell, Johnny cooked for him and it was good.

He still sometimes daydreamed about his Valentine's day mac and cheese.

He just had loved teaching Johnny.

He'd liked how studious he was and the chance to teach him something new, the excuse to be close.

Louie had seen through him on that and Johnny had played along. But Yukie had beat him to it. Taught him how to cook.

He was glad Johnny felt comfortable in the kitchen. It was wonderful the nights that Daniel came home tired and hungry and dinner was waiting for him.

Daniel did like that, Johnny waiting for him at home. He didn't understand why his professors complained about someone waiting for them at home.

Daniel loved it. Loved the way Johnny smiled at him, welcoming him home. He loved welcoming Johnny home too.

He liked having a home.

Wasn't that the point?

Being excited to go home?

To get off work and spend the journey home looking forward to being home?

To making love in your bed?

Or relaxing in front of the TV curled up together watching a show you both enjoy?

Or catching up over a meal?

Someone who listened and talked?

Someone with their own ideas to share?

Someone you loved?

Daniel felt hands on his shoulders.

"Man, you really got it bad huh?"

Daniel looked at Bobby who grinned, arm around him.

"Makes me happy actually."

"Huh?"

"Well a lot really. But this," he tapped his index finger to Daniel's chest. "The fact you both look at each other with those lovey dovey gooey eyes. I'm glad he's got you and you've got him. I was worried you know. We all were. After Silver and us moving to college and with Dutch leaving. But I mean the way you look at him, I don't know, I'm not as worried. One less thing to worry about you know?"

Daniel got it. Or he thought he did. He still worried a lot. About a lot of things. But how he felt wasn't one of them.

"What all did he make?" Tommy asked Johnny watching him unwrap things and reheat different things on the stove top and in the oven.

"Well he and Sato and Yukie went out fishing. Like out out, and then whatever they didn't catch Chozen went to a store to get. It's a lot of seafood. So I was given very specific instructions," Johnny said as he moved about the kitchen. "They gave me some stuff to make as well. Like Sato wanted me to steam some clams in sake," Johnny said opening a bottle of sake.

"They tried to catch an eel but it was too slippery and Yukie stopped Chozen from buying one because it wasn't as fresh as she wanted, so they went with catfish, so that is catfish kabayaki. This," Johnny said taking packets of foil and sticking them in the oven "is miso butter mushrooms and glazed eggplant and there's a jar of pickled ginger Chozen made in the fridge. This is Chanko Nabe which they kind of argued about because it's for sumo wrestlers I guess? But it's got shrimp and crab and a whole lot of meat in it because Yukie was adamant about it," Johnny said carefully taking a pot and setting it on the stove. "They did not however do desert because I told them Bobby always does. But it's a lot of food."

"I did! I made a pina colada inspired bunt cake," Bobby said. "I wanted to send him off with something tropical."

"That sounds good," Daniel said tilting his head to look back at Bobby.

"You like coconut?"

"Yeah."

"Then you'll love it."

"Does he have snacks for the flight?" Jimmy asked going through the cabinets curiously. "I mean I brought stuff, but like sometimes they don't feed you enough. Is he flying commercial or privately? Economic or first class."

"First class, his parents insisted," Johnny said.

"Oh then he should be fine. But I'll still give him his snacks," Jimmy said.

"You checked with customs right?" Tommy asked.

"Of course I checked with customs, no matter how much law I try and shove in my brain to drum out food and beverage customs rules it always just pops right back up," Jimmy said with a sigh, watching Johnny cook.

"Look at you," Tommy said patting Johnny's back. "Remember when you couldn't boil an egg?"

"I could boil an egg, I just couldn't make fancy soft boiled eggs like you like," Johnny said then frowned tilting his head. "Actually still don't know how to do that."

"Daniel could probably teach you," Bobby said giving Daniel a squeeze. "Right Daniel?"

"Yeah, I mean it's just timing," Daniel said.

"It smells great."

Daniel turned seeing Dutch who ruffled his hair as he passed. "Look at you Johnny."

"Okay okay I get it," Johnny said with a sigh.

"I mean I wasn't worried because you live with Daniel and I've eaten leftovers at your place."

"Aha so you admit it!"

"What? Your leftovers are good!" Dutch said with a shrug. "I can't believe Mr. Miyagi and well, his household I guess, made all this for me."

"Well for us, but to celebrate you," Johnny said checking on the stew. "You're timing is good actually, where do you want to eat? It's almost all done."

"How about in your favorite spot?" Dutch asked.

"Green house?"

"Better then the dining room."

"Very very true," Johnny said with a look of distaste before turning to Jimmy and Tommy. "You guys mind putting on oven mitts and helping me carry stuff?"

"Uh sure."

"Where are the oven mitts?"

"Third drawer on your right Jimmy."

"Daniel mind getting drinks? Bobby your dessert? Dutch silverware and plates?"

"Aye aye captain," Dutch said with a laugh.

"Drinks again huh? I can lift heavy things you know."

"I know," Johnny said with a grin.

"Aha, sneaky bad joke, that doesn't even work," Bobby said with a laugh.

"Huh?"

"Well Johnny's too tall, but isn't it some flirty joke housewives do? That he's a tall drink of water?" Bobby asked.

"I didn't even make the actual joke," Johnny said.

"But I know you, I know that's why you keep making Daniel get drinks huh? Terrible flirting that doesn't make any sense. But it amuses you."

"Yes, it does," Johnny said smile.

"At least you're entertaining someone, even if it's dumb and yourself," Bobby said rolling his eyes. "Good luck with that one," he said to Daniel before heading off to get his cake.

It took a bit of time and a few more trips but they managed to set up dinner in the green house. The temperature was pleasant and it smelled nice with all the flowers in bloom.

Johnny explained what everything was as the guys filled their plates and it was nice to see him confident with the food. It wasn't new, but it was a new setting.

He looked nice amongst the flowers and the lush green plants setting up the meal.

He looked, happy.

Daniel had seen Johnny interacting with the guys a lot.

He'd watched them at school, the way they hung off each other in the parking lot around their bikes, the way they laughed and chatted at lunch.

But it seemed back to normal, finally, after all that time. The slow steps they'd taken in New York and now it was all hands on.

He might admit to himself he was a little jealous watching him with his sleeves rolled up filling plates and bowls with food and blonde hair tucked behind his ear while he talked and the guys listened. But he was surprised at how hard his heart was pounding.

Sure, he'd thought he wanted to be with Johnny for a long time. He knew Johnny was planning to be around for a long time but his hands were sweaty and itchy.

He wanted to grab Johnny's hand and not let go. He didn't want to just live together in a nice house.

He wanted to celebrate it.

He wanted to do what his parents had done.

He wanted to buy a ring and have a fancy ceremony and see Johnny stand in front of everyone they knew and loved and cared for and see how he responded to him saying that he loved Johnny again.

In front of everyone.

He'd thought marriage was okay.

He hadn't really focused on it.

It was a ceremony, a tradition, and it seemed more work than he thought it was worth.

His parents had done it and he liked looking at the photos, of the giant party they had but the pricing just seemed ridiculous. Why bother?

But standing next to Johnny, in a nice suit, or a wedding dress...he wouldn't be able to talk Johnny into that in front of people, but it'd be a nice daydream.

But to celebrate love?

That would be nice and he liked to think about it sometimes.

The cake he knew. But what Johnny wore changed. The decor changed. What he'd say changed.

It'd be nice to have a ring. So that the times Johnny was by himself people would know.

Taken.

Off the market.

He wanted to pick out flowers, pick out a baker and still taste cakes even though he was still set on that one flavor. He wanted to have a nice party to show how far they'd come. And, he wanted the honeymoon.

He wanted a sex vacation that was expected.

No friends, no family, just the two of them at a nice hotel in some place they wanted to see together.

Explore together, the town, the culture, each other.

He wanted to marry Johnny. And the sudden serious realization of it settled cold in his gut.

It'd been an occasional thought for a while that flitted back in. Especially when he walked past wedding decorations and parties. But it wasn't possible. His mom talked about it sometimes. Places where they could be "partners" but not married. He hadn't thought it was something he wanted that badly, he didn't even know if it was something Johnny wanted, but he wanted it now .

He didn't want to drive off to Vegas and elope, but he wanted the option. He wanted choices. He wanted a piece of paper with their names on it together. He wanted to kiss Johnny in front of a crowd that came there to see him do exactly that. He wanted to see the guys in suits, crying because of course they would.

He wanted forever.

Something sharp hit his thigh and Daniel yelped looking at Mrs. P who'd snuck up on him looking around at the food on his plate and for any dropped food.

"Seriously? Are you like a dog? What do you want?"

"Did she get you?" Dutch asked.

"Yeah," Daniel sighed. "I don't think she broke skin or anything, mostly she just shocked me."

"Well she wants to sit in your lap and eat your food," Dutch said. "It's what Mr. P is trying to do right now too."

"Huh? Where's he?" Jimmy asked.

"Here," Dutch said moving one of the plates and Daniel could see Mr. P's head at table height eyeing all of the food.

"Is this normal?"

"Not always, but there hasn't been...well I haven't really had a lot of friends in here before so I think their curious."

"I got pecked out of curiosity?"

"Probably."

"You also might've gotten pecked because she wants to steal your food. Not that she'd really enjoy any of this, or should have any of it. So don't give her any. They both eat like royalty. They have a dietitian who comes by to check on them and adjust their diet," Dutch said as Mr. P stepped away from the table and to circle around them watching.

"So there's a chance we're going to keep getting pecked?" Tommy asked with a frown.

"We?" Daniel asked. "So far it's just me."

"No, they really don't peck that much, I mean sometimes, but it's not hard, it's like a hello?" Dutch said. "I mean they like to go for Johnny's ankles sometimes but that's like a game, a really bad habit they have with him."

"A bad habit? And who gave them that bad habit?" Johnny asked eyes checking in with Daniel that he was okay.

Daniel gave his hand a gentle affirmative squeeze.

"I didn't start it."

"We were in here and you were bored and you kept kicking at my ankles-"

"Not hard, I didn't do any damage."

"No, but Mr. and Mrs. P saw you and decided it looked like fun and now I got to wear thick socks when I visit or be on guard for pecking birds."

"He was wearing these pants that were too short you know? Like they were jeans but they didn't go all the way down and you could see his ankles and I was talking to him about how in the Victorian era during the day time that was a no no for women's fashion and was teasing him about how it wasn't night time yet, so why was he showing off his ankles? Had his pants shrunk?"

"I hadn't cleaned my closet in a bit and they still fit," Johnny said. "They just were a bit short. I mean I wear shorts at gym so I didn't see what the problem was. But Dutch entertained himself on that for most of the afternoon. And then because Mr. and Mrs. P keep a close eye on Dutch they followed suit. And now one afternoon of teasing has led to years worth of birds continuing said teasing."

"And surprisingly they don't peck everyone's ankles, it's just dependent on their mood. But Johnny, it's how they greet him now, little game of can I give him a kiss on the ankles before he notices I'm there and jumps away ?"

"You think that's what they're doing? Giving me a greeting that's a hello kiss? Because I'm pretty sure they're being brats."

"He doesn't mean that," Dutch said turning to Mr. P. "He knows you guys like him."

Mr. P ruffled his feathers and wandered off. Quiet fell their table for a moment longer than Daniel expected and he looked around, at the wavering.

"I'm kind of bummed," Tommy said moving food around his plate.

"Tommy," Bobby hissed elbowing him.

"No," Tommy said moving. "Johnny's been here enough that the peacocks know him. But this is my third time here. Over five years of friendship, practically inseparable, and three times. It bums me out. Especially since you're leaving."

"Yeah, I get that," Dutch said. "But honestly it's not fun here. It's always just been me. My parents are rarely here and because I bit so much as a child the staff avoid me. It's better to be at your place, you know? Less echoy and quiet. I'd rather hang out there then here. Because when you leave I just suffocate in the silence. Every time Johnny left it was just somehow bigger, somehow quieter. My parents didn't like guests, they worried over every little thing and Johnny only got past that because he's...I don't know a dumbass? Like he saw this place and didn't give a shit. He also didn't really know what a Ming vase was or a Fabergé egg or any of that and I guess my parents liked his personality."

"Hey."

"Like you guys are too...smart and knowledgeable for them… at least when we were younger."

"Are you saying we got dumber?" Bobby asked.

"No? Yes? I don't know. I think my parents got chiller because of Johnny. Like they're still a pain, but I would've never guessed they'd have let all of you spend the night before. Wouldn't have dreamed of it," Dutch said. "I mean I wish I could've had you over more, but like while my parents aren't Sid, they did have the ability to just ship me off to another boarding school. I mean they didn't care whether I was home or not, just so long as random other people weren't here unsupervised and they didn't trust me to supervise if that makes sense. It took a lot of effort to get them to let me go to public school with you all and not some dumb boarding school in Europe which they wanted me to do for high school. And I didn't want to lose that...or you."

"You wouldn't have lost us. I'm sure we could've scrounged up money to sneak into whatever fancy boarding school you got sent to," Jimmy said.

"Just like we'll do to visit you in Seoul after you get settled in," Bobby said. "I'm expecting you to play tour guide and translator you know?"

"Yeah I figured," Dutch said.

Dinner turned into questions about Dutch's trip.

It was like watching someone try and walk on ice for the first time, carefully feeling for cracks, scared of falling.

Johnny asked about plans, things he was excited to see, Bobby asked about food, what he wanted to eat, just little things. Was he ready? How was his Korean lessons going? Was he still doing okay in Taekwondo or was he getting his ass kicked?

Eventually the sun began to set and the lights in the greenhouse flicked on and Johnny started cleaning up, being careful of Mr. Miyagi's containers and pots and pans.

"What times your flight?" Daniel asked as they walked back to the mansion.

The lights in the garden had flickered on and it was a different type of beautiful. The fountain was going and there were string lights everywhere.

"I'm taking Korean Air around 12:30, I'll get into Seoul nearly 13 hours later at 5:20pm the next day. They're ahead of us, time wise."

"Call when you get in," Johnny said.

"It'll be like 1am here," Dutch said.

"I'll be awake," Johnny said.

"You should be in bed at 1am," Dutch said. "You go to the shop at like 6am."

"Not always, and Mr. Miyagi knows you're leaving. Sato and Yukie are helping out."

Dutch frowned wrapping an arm around Daniel. "You going to be up at 1am?"

"If he's up I'll be up," Daniel said.

"Seriously?" Dutch asked amused.

"If he wakes up, usually I wake up shortly after," Daniel said with a shrug. "I don't get it either."

"Based on how you two sleep that makes sense," Jimmy said with a laugh.

"You do sleep like you're keeping him locked in place. If he even tried to roll over I figure that would wake you up," Tommy said.

"Yeah I don't know how you can sleep like that," Bobby said. "Sleeping next to him is fine, and honestly he doesn't move much, but I feel like I'd just accidentally roll over and smack him."

"Probably because you have done that, you can't stay still. You move around a lot," Johnny said.

"No I don't."

"You definitely do," Dutch said. "We stopped trying to fit more than two people in a bed at Johnny's specifically because you can't sleep well with others and beat people up in your sleep."

"It only works if you're on the end and Johnny's on your other side. He's the only one who will suffer through it."

"No way," Bobby said turning to Johnny. "I don't, do I?"

"Yeah, you do. You do like sleep karate."

" No ," Bobby said. "What are we going to do tonight?"

"You're sleeping on an end. So if you beat someone up we can just push you off the bed." Jimmy said.

"What? No, I was fine at Johnny's the last time though. And I don't beat you all up when we're sleeping on the floor right?"

"Well no, because we move out of reach," Tommy said.

"What about when I was drunk at your place Jimmy?"

"Oh drunk, you're too like weighed down to move. Then you just talk."

"How could you all not tell me this?"

"You have siblings we thought you knew."

"That's why they don't run to me when they have nightmares any more," Bobby whispered.

He had a horrified look on his face like his whole world had just been turned inside out. Which meant when they got back to the room and dug out the other board games Bobby was the first out every time. Occasionally he leaned over to ask Tommy something but Daniel wasn't sure what.

He tried holding onto the moments, collecting every thing he wanted to say and to soak up every story, every joke, every shared memory of them, all together for the last time...for a while. But before he knew it he was curling up next to Johnny in a big bed, wondering how much he'd let slip past.

If he should've said more or done more.

Daniel stood at the gate. They'd parked, carried his bags and now they were standing around waiting for his flight to Incheon to be called.

The air was tense.

Tommy had already run off to the bathroom feigning indigestion only to come back with puffy eyes. No one wanted to be the first to break and it was the worst heavy feeling.

Fuck it.

Daniel didn't know if it was leftover from Cobra Kai, some Kreese thing about crying and manliness, or if they just were being stubborn. But he didn't care.

He'd break first, it was fine.

Daniel threw his arms around Dutch and hugged him tight. Tighter then he had before.

"I'm going to miss you," Daniel said.

He wasn't going to hold it in. He didn't care.

Dutch had been there.

He'd dragged Daniel out of bed when he didn't want to get out of bed, when all he wanted to do was stay glued to Johnny. He got him moving, kept him going. He pretended to be Daniel's boyfriend when Silver showed up to do who knows what at the club.

He made Daniel sound popular and cool while keeping him safe from a dangerous situation.

Dutch was leaving, going on some adventure in Seoul. He was going to study and Daniel wouldn't see him as much.

He wouldn't show up on campus with his ugly van pretending it was cool, a van that Daniel could spot a mile a way and had grown fond of because they had so many adventures in it together.

He was going to miss the terrible music choices and the stale weed smell and listening to the guys talk while sitting in the back with Johnny on the way to some spot they'd all enjoy.

It was full of memories, from that trip out to the mountains where he got to sleep in Johnny's lap and by his side, to every sports game imaginable, to trips to the beach, out to fancy restaurants, to the mall, the arcade, the zoo and aquarium.

They went everywhere.

When they had said they were going to make it up to Daniel they'd meant it. 6 months of terror and pain and then Daniel was pulled into the back of a van, equally terrifying but only to be given snacks and fancy drinks.

He'd spent 6 months doing little else but train. He'd barely seen LA. He'd kept close to home, close to Mr. Miyagi or Ali like they were shields. And they, the cobras, his cobras, made sure he saw everything else.

Friend dates. Making up for lost time. Welcoming him and annoying him, not leaving him alone. They hadn't been able to touch Johnny out of fear of setting him off so they touched Daniel instead.

How many times had he seen the way they hung off of each other in the parking lot or around school, that tactile friendship he hadn’t had? He’d wondered about it, felt jealous for it. But it was like seeing a poisonous snake, colorful and beautiful but dangerous.

Now he was a part of it. Arms that leaned against his shoulders, around his waist like they were keeping him from running off but more like they were keeping him grounded and safe. He wasn't sure when exactly that switch had flipped, out of terror of how close they got to a relief that they were there. But he was grateful. Grateful to have had them when he needed them most.

He never would have expected, in a million years, how important that angry bleach blonde cobra would be. He wouldn't have expected to have been fond of any of them. They all surprised him. But Dutch, he was a secret lynch pin. He wasn't afraid to be blunt but in a way that showed he cared. He called Daniel out on his bullshit yet kept turning around to make sure he was there and would go back and get him if he dragged too far behind, tired from running and training and life.

He snapped Daniel out of his spirals while they were on campus. Digging around and finding whatever was bothering him and with precision he thought only a select few had, got to the root of the problem and yanked Daniel back into reality, out of his issues.

He didn't laugh at Daniel's secret goals. Like wanting to get strong enough to pick Johnny up. He didn't ask why. Dutch listened when he complained. He just seemed to understand. Like of course Daniel wanted to pick Johnny up. That was normal. Not like Louie who laughed at him when he mentioned it. And kept laughing. For too long.

Dutch recommended exercises and gyms, college clubs to join and he teased but in a loving manner. Made him flex while on campus and then pointed out the looks Daniel hadn't realized were directed his way.

He was a balm, a salve, and he had Daniel's back.

He cared, he had a bigger heart then Daniel had expected or ever had realized. He'd seen that his friend had a crush and had jumped into action, hadn't questioned it. Johnny had liked Daniel and the cobras had gone to work trying to win Daniel over, and they had. He accepted that his life was going to include these four.

He complained, sure, a lot. But he was going to miss having breakfast with Dutch, watching him drive Louie nuts over breakfast, seeing him at the shop leaning over the counter and laughing with Johnny and helping Mr. Miyagi. He was going to miss their friendship.

Dutch was wild. But Daniel knew without a doubt how much Dutch loved them. He loved his friends so much. Those dumb ex cobras. But they weren't just Johnny's friends. They were also his friends. Dutch was his friend. And Dutch loved him. And maybe he needed to say that. They said it all the time. But had he said it? Had he told Dutch how grateful he was? How much he appreciated everything he'd done? How much he cared about him?

"I love you you know? Like I don't know if you know that. I may complain, rolling over in bed and finding you there because you snuck in in the middle of the night with your spare key, but I don't hate it. I mean maybe just a little. But I want to say a couple things. One, thank you. Thank you for staying by my side. I don't know...I don't know how bad Silver would've been without you, I don't even want to think about it. If I hadn't had you by my side heckling him almost every step of the way. If I hadn't had you running and training with me after Jessica left…

“Thank you for being my fairy godparent for prom, for finding places where I can dance with Johnny, for having my back this whole time. Thank you for making up excuses to come see me at school and having coffee with me after class. Thank you for keeping me grounded while also stroking my ego.

“I'm an only child. I have a big family but I'm it. When I moved here it was my mom and me and that was it. And I hated it. I hated all of you. But now, now you're like my brother. I love you and I know you love me and I know you've got my back and I hope that you know I've got yours. That I'm excited for your journey and to visit you and to hear all about it. I'm excited to welcome you home whenever you come home and to drive you nuts just like you drive me nuts. I'm grateful for your long chats, your wisdom, your terrible and wonderful ideas and trying your food.

“I'm grateful that you decided you wanted me to be a part of your little family whether Johnny and I got together or not. Because I'm so happy to be a part of it. To hang out with you and the guys and your absence is going to be like a gaping hole in my heart, but I know it'll be okay because you've left me in good hands.

“I've got Johnny and Bobby and Jimmy and Tommy. And they have me. I'll keep them safe. I know Louie would laugh at me saying that but you know how much I mean it. I mean I think that's why we get along so well now. Were both a little wild. I'm also proud of you. It's not easy finding things you like to do or what you want to do. I mean I'm not always sure I'm making the right choices. And you're taking a chance. Whether you love it and stay there a long time, or hate it and come back home, not matter what you do I'm proud of you.

“I looked at all those paintings you know? At your house and you know the biggest difference in them from the start to now? You look happy. You found your happiness and maybe it's a bit self important and egotistical to say it's because of us. But I do believe you're happier because you found these dorks and me. You're figuring yourself out and you're taking your own path and you're cool. Like really cool. And I'm so proud of you for taking that leap. For going after something you want, after spending so long taking care of us. Helping us move, helping my mom move, showing up for so many things you never had to do but you did automatically. Your actions speak so loud so I know even if you don't say it, that you love us too," Daniel said, eyes burning and tears running down his face.

"Bastard," Dutch said, his voice wavering and scratchy, thick from tears, but he held Daniel just as fiercely. "You know, I didn't know what I was getting into with you. But even though you kicked my ass at the tournament in a badass way I figured you'd be cool on some level. I just didn't expect you to bond so well with us. I didn't expect to care so damn much about what you did or who you were or worry so much when your bad luck and penchant for danger spiked.

“I worried myself sick while you were in Okinawa, but I knew Johnny and Mr. Miyagi were there and we had shit to do here. To make things better for Johnny. And every time I saw Silver I wanted to punch him in the face because he gave me the creeps. I'm proud of you you bastard, for always getting back up. Like you say I helped you up? Nah. You're usually already getting back up, I just pull you up a little faster. You're also stronger than you look and I wish you had more confidence in that, but you're working on it and I'm proud of you for it. You will sweep Johnny off his feet at one point some day and it's going to be delightful. I bet he'll scream," Dutch said quietly so only Daniel could hear.

"And I'm grateful that you're here to keep him safe. He needs someone who loves him as fiercely as you do. Someone who teaches him how to be a person and not just someone who bends over backwards for everyone or tries to fit into the molds he's been given that aren’t him. You're helping him break those molds and become himself. And I know he'll be safe with you keeping and eye out for him and he'll keep an eye out for you. So I'm not worried about leaving.

“I'm just going to miss you all. So much. It's kind of...terrifying to go somewhere so far away from all of you. Because whenever I got lonely and whenever I got sad I could just pop over and visit someone and fuck around. And I did it all the time. But now I won't have all those places to go to. And I'll miss you too. And fine, yes love you too. All of you. Stop looking at me like that. If you're going to stand there crying you might as well give me a hug."

Daniel wondered what they looked like. Six barely adult men sobbing in the international terminal by the gates. He doubted it looked normal, probably a little strange, but he didn't care. Dutch was leaving. An important part of their family was going overseas and had no plans yet to return.

They wouldn't known that five of those men had spent most of their teenage years together, having each others backs unknowingly poisoned by someone they trusted and helping each other heal but bottling it up at every turn. They didn't know that Daniel had been bullied by them but then befriended. Won over when he looked beneath the surface and actually got to know them. When they finally let him in.

That they'd had his back during the worst times of his life. That these men listened to him when he talked about his dad, which very few people did, who didn't just befriend him, but made themselves such a deeply rooted part of his life that Mr. Miyagi cared about them, his mom cared about them, Louie thought they were cool and even his Chozen hung out with them.

No one knew how much they'd gone through, together. No one knew how hard it'd been when Bobby, Jimmy, and Tommy had gone off to college and left Daniel, Dutch and Johnny behind. Even though it wasn't far. This was that wound but bigger, more jagged and it was bleeding, an open wound that would ache and hurt for a while.

The only way to heal it would be to carefully stitch it up and call. To talk as much as they could. Write letters and then get on that plane themselves to go visit him. Daniel wasn't scared that Dutch would pull away, that he'd get lost in his new life in Korea and forget them. He wasn't worried about distance or their friendship fading. Because Dutch wasn't like that, the friendship had good roots, the kind of roots that lasted a lifetime and he felt so damn lucky to have gotten to live and grow in the same garden.

It was too soon when Dutch had to pull away, the final call, to board his flight. He looked back once, waved with a tearful smile and they stood watching from the window as his plane left.

"We going to the beach?" Jimmy asked, voice tight and hoarse sounding.

"I could use some ice cream," Tommy whispered.

"Yeah, me too."

Chapter End Notes

The games the guys played
Conspiracy
Trivial Pursuit
Aggravation

How to play Hwatu , the Korean version of Hanafuda

The food Miyagi and co sent and Bobby made
Catfish Kabayaki
Sake steamed clams miso butter mushrooms chanko nabe sumo stew
pina colada cake

The deodorant thing is almost always on the top of any packing list for moving to South Korea. Source: myself and regretting not packing enough and having to go on adventures to find it. 🤦

Frankenstein, who am I?

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Chozen leaned against the counter setting down a cup of coffee for Johnny.

"Thank you," Johnny said.

"I heard Daniel's out of town," Chozen said.

"Yeah, he's at a convention with his classmates. They're learning business models and finance stuff I think?"

"Apartment must be lonely."

"Definitely quieter," Johnny said. "Louie's staying with Lucille until Daniel get's back."

Chozen smiled. "Well if you get too lonely-"

"Thank you, it's probably good for me to get a weekend to myself."

"Will you have enough to eat?"

Johnny smiled softly. "Yukie taught me to cook and Mr. Miyagi and I went fishing last weekend. We're well stocked, no need to worry. Plus every time I think I finish the food Abuela brings over I find more in the freezer. "

"Well I'm around if you need anything," Chozen said lifting up his coffee and tapping it against Johnny's before wishing Mr. Miyagi well and heading out.

Johnny got home and set his keys is the dish and put his bag down.

"I'm home," he said with a smile to the bonsai walking past them and opening up the cupboards.

He pulled out a rice cooker and set it on the counter removing the inner bowl and carefully scooping out a cupful of rice and listening to it scatter into the bowl, he rinsed the rice off and filled it up, returning it to the cooker, replacing the lid and pushing the button.

He walked to the fridge, pulling out one of the fish he'd caught with Mr. Miyagi.

He hadn't thought he'd enjoy fishing. But there was something peaceful about it. Just sitting in a boat with Mr. Miyagi in the early morning. Sometimes Sato joined them but not too frequently. They didn't do it too often, but whenever Mr. Miyagi invited Johnny he always said yes. Because he knew sometimes Mr. Miyagi wanted to be alone and liked that time to be alone and think, but other times he wanted to talk, he wanted someone with him, and sometimes he got lonely.

Johnny never brought it up, but he thought, maybe, just maybe, Mr. Miyagi would think about how he went fishing with his father, with his grandfather and would think of that son he should've been fishing with. And sometimes he wanted to fish and think of those ghosts. Other times he wanted to pass that skill on, that tradition. And Johnny was honored that Mr. Miyagi picked him in those moments. Even if Johnny was wrong. Even if he wasn't Mr. Miyagi's first choice, but Daniel was so busy with school and his apprenticeship that Johnny still was happy to be his third choice.

He set about preparing the fish, filling a pan with oil and cooking it, making his sauce, working on his soup, humming along with the radio he'd turned on.

It was quiet.

A rarity.

Daniel was usually home for dinner. Or someone else was over. Or Louie was around. But Louie was at Lucille's while Daniel was out of town. Johnny had said it was okay but Lucille had laughed and said he should enjoy some peace and quiet. A home not full of LaRusso's was strange. A new adjustment.

He had his night planned out. He'd eat dinner, watch a movie he'd rented on his way home from work, take a shower, read his book and go to bed. A simple night.

Maybe he was boring.

But Dutch was gone and it was the middle of the week and the guys were a bit too far for an impromptu hang out, he didn’t want to bother them if they had classes or homework, dates and plans. And he didn't want to bother Chozen. Plus he had to learn how to live with himself. To get comfortable being on his own again. He hadn't really been a lone in a very long time. But Daniel couldn't stay glued to his hip for the rest of their lives. He'd have important business meetings and events. And Johnny was going to have to be able to withstand being alone.

It seemed easy. He'd been so used to just having himself for so long but now it felt weird.

He missed Daniel. Missed the sound of his footsteps, of him talking, moving around the apartment. Sometimes their apartment felt too small even though that felt silly because Johnny had lived in such smaller places. But he realized now that Daniel was such an important presence, a presence that found him no matter where he went in the apartment.

He could be in bed, their decent sized bed and Daniel wouldn't sleep anywhere but intertwined with him. If he couldn't sleep and moved to the couch, something that was becoming a rarity it only took a half hour before that woke Daniel up, being alone in bed and he found him on the couch.

Someone might find it suffocating. But it was comforting. Even if Daniel came into the bathroom sometimes while he was showering to brush his teeth and talk. As if he had been holding in all his words throughout the day waiting to shower Johnny in them.

Sometimes Johnny thought he was trying to escape Louie. Wanting a bit of peace from his cousin who had a thousand questions as soon as he came in through the door. And if Johnny was in the shower then Daniel could hide in there too. Amongst the steam and sit on the counter and talk.

Johnny had asked once if Daniel wanted to join and Daniel had said Louie would for sure hear then. And then his aunt would yell at him. Johnny had said they could try to be quiet and Daniel had gotten a look in his eye he didn't understand and he flatly said "No, never again."

His stomach had done a somersault at that. Because he'd gotten it. He wanted to hear Johnny and not stifle him. And he'd looked away burning red at a loss for words.

When his food finished cooking he moved over to the table and sat in his seat and looked across at the empty chair.

He got up, went into the bedroom and got the giant whale shark and set it in the chair.

He'd asked Daniel if he wanted to take it with him and Daniel had said that no one went to an academic conference with a plush animal that big. And then had softly patted the whale sharks head, besides you might need him more.

Johnny frowned. It wasn't enough.

He turned his focus instead on the bonsai. He moved them ever so slightly, blocking the view of the empty chairs and talked quietly to them about his day while he picked up his chopsticks and plopped a bit of fluffy rice onto his tongue.

The apartment felt too quiet to speak loudly in.

He wondered what Daniel was doing.

He hoped he was having fun.

Daniel needed some fun.

It was like he always just threw himself into something new. All in. Daniel was completely focused on learning everything there was to learn about cars and business. Even though Johnny didn't like his apprenticeship.

He hadn't said anything yet. But the guy, the owner out in Tarzana, seemed to take advantage of what essentially was Daniel's free labor. Scheduling him to work for long stints of time. And Daniel came home exhausted.

Johnny didn't like it. But Daniel seemed determined. He had a million excuses. That this is what he'd be doing no matter who he apprenticed with and even though the owner was hard on him he was on everyone. And he was the best in the area.

Being the best didn't mean you had to be a jackass. Johnny understood the irony of him saying that and so he didn't. Instead gently pushed Daniel to do more school stuff. The school stuff Daniel wanted to do but waffled on.

Like this trip.

Daniel liked his classmates, his professors, he liked his school. And he deserved that experience of being just a regular college kid. Even if he was anything but regular. He was amazing and Johnny enjoyed that secret fact. That there were all these people who were meeting Daniel for the first time and would slowly discover it for themselves.

It didn't mean though, that he wasn't lonely. That he didn't miss Daniel. Even though it felt ridiculous.

He'd left just that morning.

How ridiculous was he?

That he couldn't handle this?

He'd spent nights without Daniel before. Hell it was just dinner so far. He'd spent that alone plenty of times as Daniel went out with his classmates or had dinner with his mom or worked late at the awful apprenticeship.

Maybe it was selfish. To be lonely.

Daniel deserved a chance to have fun on his own. And maybe it was just a compounding of them growing up, taking those steps into adulthood that were separate. He knew they were coming. He'd been the one to comfort Daniel about it. There was going to be more of it.

There'd be work trips. There'd be all sorts of things they'd do separately. It wouldn't be like high school, or that summer in Okinawa or their time together at Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees.

Daniel was going to grow up and he was going to soar. Just like the cobras. And Johnny... Johnny was going to just stay home and talk to their bonsai and eat dinner alone.

The phone rang.

"Pardon me," he told the bonsai getting up and answering the phone.

"Hello?"

"It's me."

Johnny carried the phone back to the table with him.

"Me who?" he said putting as much confusion as he could into his voice, smiling, amused, sitting back down.

He heard a huff breathed through the receiver. "Who all would you be expecting phone calls from?"

"Well it's a Wednesday night. Could be my mom."

"I'm not your mom."

"Oh definitely not. Her voice is higher and I've never heard her sound annoyed over the phone. Could be a maintenance guy."

"You fix everything! What is there for a maintenance guy to do?"

"Well some things are best left to the professionals. Could be a car repair guy."

"Did you get into an accident?" concern flooded through the phone.

"Oh no, but it's around the time I should be doing regular maintenance for the Avanti."

"So what your car repair guy calls and gives you reminders like a dentist harassing you about your teeth cleaning?"

Johnny laughed. "No. Hmm. Could be a friend."

"Johnny, you know it's me."

"I know. How was the drive?" Johnny asked carefully shifting the phone into the crook of his shoulder as he ate, moving the receiver away so Daniel wouldn't have to listen but he could still hear Daniel.

"Awful. I didn't leave when I should've and got stuck in traffic for hours. Next time remind me that it's not worth it."

"I won't."

"What? Why not?"

"Because you're going to meet people and have a good time. Hard work and skill get you so far, sadly rubbing elbows with a bunch of people you don't know and exchanging business cards and small talk in stuffy rooms over over priced meals and wine get you a lot farther faster."

"I want to rub elbows with you."

Johnny laughed. "What does that even mean?"

"I don't know. What are you doing? Are you eating? Let me guess, ham? Fried baloney?"

"I made fish. Teriyaki salmon, some miso soup and rice. What did you have for dinner?"

"Dry steak, I'd rather be eating with you," Daniel complained. "I had to drown the steak in A1 sauce. What a waste."

"Are you at least having a good time with your classmates?" Johnny asked.

Daniel sighed. The more Johnny listened the more he was pretty sure Daniel was a little drunk.

Which made sense.

His classmates liked going to the bars, liked drinking, found amusement at Daniel's youthful face getting them stopped and then once Daniel opened his mouth, once he started talking about the mechanics of a car, or something the bartender or bouncer didn't think a kid would know in such detailed they'd let him through. He wasn't 21 yet, but once he started dropping knowledge he got in. At least one of the places the guy asked for Daniel's business card, wanting to get his car fixed.

Johnny had tried to tell him that might solve all his issues, if he had professional business cards. But Daniel said all he could put on them was apprentice and student which Johnny disagreed with.

Karate champion could go on there but Daniel was trying to set that aside, let that sit on a shelf and become dusty and Johnny didn't want to push it.

He also could put model on there but Daniel didn't believe him.

Or business owner but Daniel was adamant that the business was Mr. Miyagi's. He was just a silent partner who occasionally did the bookkeeping and filed the paperwork.

Johnny listened about Daniel's classmates and professors and the people he'd met at the event as he ate and it wasn't so bad.

It was nice to hear him at least on the phone.

He'd thought it'd be a lonely night, thought Daniel would take the night to settle in. But he was pleased Daniel had called.

It made it less lonely.

He finished his dinner and set everything in the sink and was debating heading to the couch which Daniel stopped his retelling of his day with a question.

"What are you wearing?"

Johnny stared down at himself. "Button up and jeans. Why?"

He heard Daniel moving, the creak of a bed.

"What are you wearing Daniel?" Johnny asked.

"A very awful suit. But I'm going to remedy it."

"I thought you liked your suits."

"I do, but I didn't know this was a fancy tie dinner tonight so a classmate lent me a suit jacket and tie and it's too big. It's supposed to be black but it's a dull black."

Johnny heard the sound of fabric as Daniel continued. He could practically hear him fumbling with a tie, loosening it.

"The jacket is bad, and so is the tie, it's a novelty grandfather gift tie. This guy's like only two years older than me but his taste in clothing is...awful."

"But he let you borrow it, so that seems nice."

"It is," Daniel said with a sigh. "But if I'm going to borrow someone's suit that's not my own, which fit me really well. Like in your books right? How they say it fits like a glove or like smooth like butter or something like that, mmm actually-"

"What?"

"I like how you fit like a glove."

Johnny stood rooted in the spot.

"You know what I mean right?"

"Yeah," Johnny managed.

"Anyway if I'm going to borrow a suit I'd rather borrow yours. Yours are nice. But, you know what my favorite suit of yours is?"

Johnny felt like it was a trap. Like Daniel was sitting in some hotel room taking off his borrow suit jacket grinning like a Cheshire's cat.

"The navy one?"

"Mmm that one is good," Daniel hummed. "But no, my favorite is your birthday suit."

Was this that type of call?

It wasn't that late. Had he drunkenly left his classmates and new acquaintances on purpose to make this phone call?

Or was Daniel just...Daniel?

Both.

It was probably both.

He turned looking around the apartment. Front door was locked. Blinds were closed. The stove was off. The oven was off. The rice cooker was off.

He covered the bottom of the phone so Daniel couldn't hear him.

"Good night, be good," he whispered to the bonsai and whale shark plush headed towards the bedroom.

Knowing Daniel this was going to be a long call or...a very short one if he passed out. And knowing Daniel it'd be best if he was safely ensconced behind a second locked door. Just in case.

"I did wear my own pants though. I figured I could get away with nice jeans."

"Are they nice?" Johnny asked.

He didn't think about clothes as much as Daniel did. He had things he liked, but mostly he liked being comfortable. Which for a long time meant going through lots of pairs of jeans until he found ones that could withstand his kicks and he stuck to those.

He shut the door behind him and locked it, feeling bad leaving the bonsai out on the table, but he didn't think he had time to carry them somewhere else.

Daniel was too far gone. Too focused based off the voice in his ear.

"Mmmhmm, tight. Like you."

Johnny wondered if he should've gotten a drink. Jimmy had brought them some stuff, but Johnny tried not to drink too much.

Daniel was fairly drunk and he was bound to get a lot more weird compliments and innuendos.

Johnny might tease him instead.

"Are you stuck?" Johnny asked, a soft laugh as he sat on the bed. Hearing a frustrated huff in his ear.

"I am not stuck," Daniel said, "This is just a two hand job and I don't want to put down the phone."

"You might have too."

"What are you going to do?"

"Sit here."

"Where's here?"

Johnny wondered if their bedroom sounded different over the phone some how. If Daniel could tell he moved.

"Bed."

"I miss our bed, it's very comfortable. This one's too stiff. Okay don't do anything exciting."

"What could I possibly doing?" Johnny asked innocently.

"With you that's almost anything so just, don't move okay?"

Johnny laughed and listened to Daniel set down the phone. It was weird to listen to him moving, knocking into furniture.

He was pretty sure he had an idea of the pants Daniel had packed. The ones that Daniel really liked. Johnny liked them too. But they were too tight. In the, can't get them off, type of too tight. But Daniel tended to think they were the best pair of pants he had and would wear them to "events" and nice dinners.

Johnny didn't disagree. But usually Johnny had to help him out of them. Which resulted in a bit of laughing. It was kind of silly, kind of fun, and Daniel would always forget what a pain it was to get out of them and Johnny would find it hilarious. It was always a treat when he wore those.

He could only imagine how a drunk Daniel was trying to get out of them.

Was there a trick to them?

Johnny tried to remember how he usually went about it. Usually Daniel had to lie down and it was nice because it was an excuse to touch him. And Johnny usually went frustratingly slow about it trying not to laugh too much. Until Daniel got frustrated and annoyed all wound up but without any way to deal with it.

Eventually he heard the sound of heavy breathing of the last bit of clothing being kicked off and hitting the floor.

"That sounded exhausting. Should I wish you a good night?"

"Don't even tease about that," Daniel said. "If you hang up I will keep calling you all night."

He did always want a treat after getting that pair of pants off.

Johnny laughed softly "Sorry for teasing. I'm not going anywhere."

"How many buttons are buttoned?" Daniel asked.

"Huh?"

"On your shirt? It's the same one from this morning right? The blue one, with the short sleeves?"

"Uh, yeah," Johnny said.

He was surprised Daniel had remembered. He'd been so frazzled, in packing chaos. He'd given Johnny a good kiss but that was about it. He'd been distracted by making sure he had everything.

"Uh top two are unbuttoned," Johnny said looking down at his shirt.

He didn't know why that mattered. That was still relatively tame. It all seemed tame. But he had a feeling that wouldn't last long.

Daniel seemed to take this information in. He heard him move it sounded like he was getting comfortable, settling in.

"I like your clothes now. And I know you like them too. But I kind of wish sometimes," Daniel said. "That I'd just ripped off your shirts before. Sent buttons flying. Like you had all this nice clothing you didn't like. I just didn't know you didn't like it. And if I'd known, it would've been so satisfying. You had this silk shirt you wore to graduation. And then you wore it to help build the guest house and to Okinawa and I loved that shirt. Not because it was silk but because you looked good in it. Even a mess. And I wish I could've grabbed the you from then and just ripped that shirt off."

He remembered that shirt?

Johnny wondered if he still had it.

He might.

He hadn't kept a lot of the clothes Sid gave him. But he had some of it.

Johnny wasn't even sure which shirt that had been.

Maybe he'd have to just let Daniel loose on his clothes.

Tell him to pick something and he could do that.

As long as it wasn't...sentimental.

Like the shirt Kumiko had bought him in Okinawa.

Or his red jacket that he'd bought so long ago and Daniel had sewn that bonsai patch on.

Or the sweater Nonnia had made.

"Stuff like that?" Johnny asked. "You just wanted to rip up my clothes?"

"You always looked perfect. I wanted to mess that up. Like you ever see a beautiful cake and just want to shove your hand in it? Or like freshly fallen snow un-touched and you just want to jump in it or walk through it? Or like that satisfying feeling being the first to open a container of peanut butter or butter and being the first to use it?"

Hmmm. Interesting. Maybe he could- this would be embarrassing. Though he assumed it was going that way anyway.

He'd just tip it over.

"You were the first person to fuck me," Johnny said thoughtfully. "Is that similar?"

There was a intake of breath. Like he'd shocked Daniel with that. It was maybe cruder than he'd meant that. It'd actually been wonderfully romantic. And he knew Daniel had been pretty pleased about that. Meteor shower and a picnic and just the two of them.

"I'd rather say made love, but I guess," Daniel cleared his throat. "Nuance aside, yeah. Damn Johnny."

Daniel was quiet for a moment and Johnny wondered if he'd over done it. If Daniel had already been barely holding on and he'd short circuited.

He supposed he might as well say what he'd thought of.

"If you want, I think I might still have that shirt. When you get back I can wear it," Johnny said.

"Hell yes."

“You might have to help me find it though. Which one it is exactly.”

Johnny smiled softly, moving down on the bed to lay down, closing his eyes. If he was careful about it he could pretend. Pretend Daniel was there. Beside him.

"I wish I could've brought you with me," Daniel said softly.

"It'd have been cool to see you in your element."

"I'd rather see you naked in this hotel bed," Daniel said.

Maybe he hadn't short circuited or killed the mood.

"It's unfair that you're so far away and saying things so casually. I don't think you realize what you do to me," Daniel continued.

"Well I know what those tight pants of yours do to me."

"I'm thinking about burning them."

"Don't you dare. You're at least a little tipsy, you could get hurt."

"Then you better keep me distracted."

"With what?"

"Hmm...you could touch yourself and I could listen."

Johnny pushed himself up a little looked around the room, confirming he was by himself.

"What?"

"I'll join you in a bit, but you could get started."

He made it sound easy.

"I mean if I was there I'd help you with it. Or remind you of that first time that you reminded me of. Not that I don't think of it often. Or that look on your face when you started to get into it and were so surprised. The first time you relaxed and opened up. That's a treasured memory."

Johnny felt his face burn. Whatever he was going to say completely died. He was tongue tied.

"Johnny," Daniel said. "You ever think about what you'd tell the old you? If you could go back? Sometimes I think I'd go back and tell you it'd be okay, or like just rescue you earlier. Kumiko made fun of me for that. Told me I wanted to a be a prince or like a hero in a fairy tale. But I also kind of want to go back in time and tell you I'd rock your world. That I knew what you looked like actually relaxed and under me enjoying it. Everything I do to you."

"I-I don't know how I would've handled that," Johnny managed.

"You probably would've turned bright red, might've gotten mad, but man, I love it when you blush, plus I've sparred with you so much now that past you, I think I'd be able to figure out what your moves would be. I think I could take you. In more ways then one."

He'd been so mad back then. So angry and had taken so much anger out on Daniel. That even if Daniel had won Johnny wouldn't have just melted under him, like he did now. It would've been a mess. It might’ve started things earlier. But he thought maybe he'd have not known what to do with compliments, with flirting from Daniel. Blush bright red for sure, but he still might've lashed out. And if they'd still fought he would've seen red. He didn't trust that he wouldn't have just accepted the flirting. Unless...no. Well. If he hadn't seen Daniel with Ali. Then maybe. Even if past him had only been like 2 years ago.

Now. Focus on the now.

He'd start with buttons.

Unbutton a few because why not?

Why not strip a little?

That's what Daniel had done.

He was out of his suit. Besides it felt weird to still be dressed for the shop but sitting in bed.

"What are you doing?" Daniel asked, pulled out of whatever time travel dirty day dream he was having.

"Unbuttoning my shirt," Johnny said.

"What? Why are you going so fast?"

Johnny paused. "Didn't you want me to start-"

"Yes, but I wanted to pay attention. I stopped paying attention and you, hold on, I'll give you my full attention now."

Johnny could practically hear him pouting, moving to get more comfortable in the bed.

It was kind of weird. It was like a show but not. Was he supposed to be telling Daniel what he was doing? Like narrate?

That seemed weird.

He hadn't ever done this before. But mentioning that seemed silly.

It felt obvious.

He unbuttoned the last of the buttons and shrugged out of his shirt. They had a hamper in the corner of the room.

He balled it up and threw it.

It landed.

He heard Daniel laugh.

"What?"

"Did it go in the basket?"

"Yeah. Was that...bad?"

He hadn't realized it was silly. But he supposed it wasn't...what they were going for.

"No, it was cute. I hadn't thought of what you'd do by yourself. I mean I expected you to eat baloney and stuff like that. A quick meal. Not that you'd cook yourself a nice meal. I mean I'm glad you did. You're always surprising me. It makes me a little homesick you know? I want to eat teriyaki salmon that you've made. I want to sit at our table and watch you cook. Eat your cooking. I want to kiss you."

"I missed our evening kiss," Johnny said softly.

"I'm going to bury you in kisses when I get home," Daniel said. "Your lips, your nose, your ears, behind them, your neck..."

He was just going to list everything.

He'd exhaust himself.

Johnny listened, if he closed his eyes, with how softly Daniel was speaking, the breathy way he was getting he could try and imagine it.

It felt silly but why not?

He laid down again and listened.

It was like a ghost.

He knew what it felt like, better then he thought he had, like without meaning to he'd memorized the feeling of Daniel's lips on him.

Though, maybe that wasn't so strange.

He did think of Daniel's mouth a lot. Of his lips. His voice. His tongue. The warmth of it whenever he settled between his legs with a devious smile. It didn't matter where that mouth was or what it was doing.

Talking was enough to drive him nuts.

There was something wrong with him. He shifted to touch himself.

In the past he used to think about Daniel's hands, the way his wrists had felt in his hands, about his legs. About his smile. The way when they'd fought, which really was unfair because Johnny was rougher, meaner, but the way Daniel's mouth usually opened. How light he was and how easy he was to move.

Maybe he'd spent too much of his time thinking about Daniel before. He'd thought it'd been about Ali. But it wasn't. Not with the amount of focus that shifted to Daniel. He hated thinking about that time now.

But his legs usually still plagued his thoughts. Like those short shorts he thought of too many times, about his cropped shirt on summer days, holding iced green tea, the way he ran his hand through his hair.

It'd all been a guess. What it all felt like.

Other than his hands, his fists, the pressure of his punches and kicks.

He always knew what those hands felt like. The way Daniel's hand started on his knee and just slowly worked his way up, until it was like he didn't care anymore to try and pretend. The way his finger tips felt along his thigh.

He shifted his knees apart. He remembered the way sometimes Daniel liked to start, a kiss here or there, his tongue tasting Johnny like he a popsicle. Possibly the worst thing to watch Daniel eat because he knew. He ate it with a purpose to get under Johnny's skin if they were alone together. Too lewd for public and absolutely dirty at home. A preview of possibilities on hot days.

It'd been pure torture when they'd been at Mr. Miyagi's, living with him and Mr. Miyagi was off doing something else and Daniel would catch his eye and it was game over. Johnny had made himself a promise that one day while they were alone, at home, and Daniel was teasing him he was going to see if Daniel could keep it up, if Johnny treated him the way Daniel treated whatever popsicle he had in his mouth.

He just worried Daniel might choke on it if he moved too fast. But if he delayed then that sticky sweet mouth would be on his and he'd lose focus and Daniel would win. Though Johnny would also win. But Johnny wanted to return the favor. To not just let himself be taken over by the tide every time Daniel got that look in his eye. As much as he hated Cobra Kai now, he wanted to strike first at the first opportunity.

"You sound amazing,"

Johnny flushed red, moaning as he bucked his hips. It was almost the same. Something Daniel would say when he was there.

His own hand was different though. Even if Johnny pretended. But with that voice in his ear, it almost felt like he was in the room watching him. And he could see that. Daniel enjoying a show for him. Some game where he could watch and listen but not touch. Where it was up to Johnny to start.

If Daniel was there, he'd give him more of a show. Tease him for just watching. Tempt him. There was some lube in the bedside drawer.

He could try. Make it more worth it.

Daniel caught on. Knew that sound too well. The snap of the cap. The breathy way he said Johnny's name sealed it. Johnny wasn't the only one coming undone. It wasn't the same, not even by a long shot. But he had a better idea then the last time he'd tried it. When he'd set it up like a birthday gift. Like he was the gift. Hidden amongst a fancy hotel in Bel Air, dinner and relaxing spa time, Daniel could just slide right in, but that hadn't gone as planned.

Daniel had been so surprised, so shocked that he kept touching him, eyes dark and lust filled. Those big brown eyes that burned when he looked at Johnny like that. More attention then he'd gotten for most of his life. All that attention on him. At a loss of words.

In the moment, he'd worried maybe he'd overdone it, worried maybe it'd been more forward then hot. Because who knew what Daniel wanted? But now he knew what that look actually meant. So turned on that Daniel couldn't act, just kept touching, like he was the most beautiful, hottest thing he'd ever seen.

Johnny didn't know how to handle all that attention.

That sole focus on him. It made his mouth dry, hard to swallow, hard to breathe, and it sent his blood every which way, to his ears, his face, and straight to his dick.

It was embarrassing. But he was trying to relax, trying to enjoy it. To enjoy knowing the effect he had on Daniel. The way his breath was hitching over the phone by his ear when he let out a soft moan because he'd figured it out. Found that spot Daniel always found so easily. The way that made Daniel curse, as he pressed into his own fingers wishing it was Daniel but it was okay because he was there, listening, even hundreds of miles away struggling to keep his own pace.

He was alone. But he wasn't.

It'd never be the same way it once had been.

Daniel was everywhere even when he wasn't there. Johnny could smell him in their bedding. There were all their photos on the wall, Daniel's clothes in the closet next to his, the tea he'd made the way Mr. Miyagi had taught him in a pitcher in the fridge. His books for school, his shoes, his cologne, the after shave and face creams he liked.

Even if Johnny wanted to be alone there wasn't any escape. His finger prints were everywhere on Johnny's skin, burned into his memory, inside of him. His voice was in his head, the taste of him on his tongue. Even if he chased his own pleasure it'd be with Daniel. Even if Daniel hadn't called. Even if they weren't doing this together, even if he was in the shower, he still would've closed his eyes and imagined a ghost of a memory of Daniel. His teeth pinching at his skin, whispering about how hot he was, complimenting him as he fell apart, a mess that Johnny didn't think was attractive but Daniel loved.

It'd be okay, even if Daniel had to go on longer work trips. If something happened that led them apart for those moments, longer then a couple nights. Because Daniel was rooted in his heart.

He pulled the phone closer to him, listening to Daniel's heavy breathing, the soft sounds he was making as Johnny cleaned up.

Did Daniel need encouragement? Maybe he hadn't realized how embedded he was in Johnny's memory, like Johnny hadn't realized.

"The memory of your touch is in my skin, I can still feel you, if I try. Everywhere. Your hands on my thighs, squeezing my chest, or my ass. If I focus I can remember how it feels to have you inside of me."

"Fuck Johnny,"

Everyone always told him to talk more. This probably wasn't what they meant. But-

"I mean I figure that's the plan when you get home. Though, I don't think, even if you're gone for a night, that my body can forget how you feel. And it makes me wonder, if I can't even remember what I wore once upon a time but you can, but I can remember the feeling of your tongue on my skin, then you, who remembers so much, so many small details, probably can do the same thing huh? You can remember my hands, how they feel on you, gripping your shoulders, touching your back, your ass, asking for more. Because you learned how to listen so well. To my quiet requests of more.

“The way I kiss you, like I need it more than air, because sometimes I feel like that. Like I need you more than anything else. To kiss you, to feel you deep inside. So yeah, when you get home, let's do that huh? Because I miss you. Not just listening to you talk or being around me, but maybe when you come home you can fuck me so hard that I can't think or walk straight."

The sound Daniel made was fascinating to hear over the phone. Telling. Very telling. And Johnny grinned.

There was some fun in turning the tables on him. In striking back in a way that left him stunned. It might not be striking first, but it definitely packed a wallop.

"Deal," Daniel said as he caught his breath. "We're going to go until we can't anymore."

That wasn't the challenge he'd issued was it?

"I'll ring you out till there's nothing left,” Daniel promised.

Maybe a bit much. Maybe a bit drunk still. Daniel was trying, in that dazed after way he got some times.

"I can't wait to see you try," Johnny said, challenging tone.

"You won't be smirking when I'm done with you."

"You can tell if I'm smirking over the phone?" Johnny asked with a soft laugh pulling the blankets up towards his chest, curling up on his side, turning the bedside light off.

"I can, you always smirk when you're challenging me to something.

And I refuse to lose."

"How would one lose this? I figure we'd both win."

Maybe it'd been a bad idea, instead of sated and tired like he assumed Daniel would be, how he felt himself, stifling a yawn, Daniel was amped. Ready to go into a ring or like some bad movie you got from the back of the adult section of the local video store.

"You're tired?" Daniel asked, tone soft.

"More like I'm comfortable."

In the dark it did feel like Daniel was there, by his side and he could reach out and touch his warm skin if he wanted, but he knew better than to attempt it, to scare off the illusion.

He hadn't been sure how he'd sleep that night, but if he tried soon. Then maybe, maybe he'd sleep.

"I'm going to call tomorrow," Daniel said quietly.

"I look forward to it. What are you doing tomorrow?"

He heard Daniel laugh softly. Listened to him talk about his plans for the next day. It felt like, just for a moment, those miles weren't there. That they were in the same place again. And with that comfort, even though he didn't mean to, Johnny fell asleep.

Johnny woke up hugging one of their pillows. He sighed when he woke up, the phone on the pillow next to him.

He missed Daniel. He hadn't slept as well without him.

He'd slept better than he feared but not great. What if he got the whale shark and tried to put Daniel's red hoodie on it? Would the smell help?

It wouldn't work. And Daniel would tease him when he got home.

He got up, dressed, tucked the whale shark in when he made the bed, on Daniel's side, and made a bowl of cereal that he ate in front of the TV.

It was Sunday. The shop was closed. He had no plans.

His mother was on a trip, the guys were on campus, busy.

Sure he could go to Mr. Miyagi's and hang out with them and play card games.

He could go check out the dojo. But he wasn't ready yet. He still felt nervous at the thought. That even though he knew Kreese was in jail that he still might be there, hiding in a dark corner ready to jump out.

He had small things he could do. He had books from the library to read, so after his breakfast he read. Finished a book. He checked on the bonsai, moving them to get better light. He saw some dust on one of the shelves and went into their closet they kept full of cleaning supplies and went to work.

He dusted, vacuumed, mopped, cleaned and scrubbed.

He gathered up trash, recycling and took them to their bins.

He read some more.

He exercised.

He had lunch.

He touched something sticky in the fridge so he cleaned the fridge, then the freezer.

He threw out expired frost burnt things.

He did laundry.

He looked at his cleaning supplies, put them back, grabbed his car wash and wax, a bucket of warm water and a soft microfiber cloth and tools and headed out to the garage to wash his car.

He dug around in his car, collecting trash, things he'd forgotten to take inside. He checked the trunk, checked that the food that had been in there hadn't expired and wasn't going to expire soon.

A few boxes of oatmeal were close so he put them in his bag to take in. He checked his tires, popped the hood, looked at the oil level, cleaned off dirt and grime and grease where he found it and once his car was sparkling and waxed, he headed back to the apartment.

He cleaned up and made a shopping list, took the elevator down to the ground floor, said hello to the doorman and headed out.

He wondered what Daniel would want for dinner when he got home. He was due back late Monday afternoon pending traffic. In time for dinner.

Louie was due back from Lucille's on Tuesday.

Daniel had complained about steak the night before. So that was out.

He'd just look around. See what was on sale. What sounded good.

He also needed to decide what he was going to eat for dinner. He'd enjoyed the fish the night before but maybe, he'd just heat up a tamale.

He grabbed a basket and looked around the produce section. He wandered around.

A hand tapped his shoulder and he turned to look at an elderly woman. "Could you get me one of those boxes off the top shelf?"

"Oh sure," Johnny said turning to see where she was pointing and grabbing the box.

She glanced at his basket. So far he'd just grabbed cheese because it was on sale and Daniel liked it.

"Going to a party?"

"Oh, no, trying to think of what to make for dinner tomorrow."

"You know," she said. "Something easy to make is a good pot roast. I make it at least once a week. Do you have a slow cooker?"

"Uh, yeah," Johnny said.

Jimmy had gotten them one. Said it was nice to have one at school. He said he threw it all together in the morning and it was perfect because it was done cooking by the time he was done with classes.

Neither Johnny nor Daniel had tried it yet. Mornings had become hectic with Louie around.

She patted his arm. "Come along, I'll show you what you need. My mom taught me and you know, I adapted it for my slow cooker and my mom and I argued about it for months. But I still think my versions better." She laughed softly and Johnny followed her to the meat counter. "Now you need 3 lbs of chuck roast. That's a good one,

a good price too."

Johnny picked up the one she pointed to.

"My family had pot roast every single Sunday my entire life. I decided when I turned thirty and got married that I was sick of it," She picked out some steak and set it in her basket. "Decided to switch to brisket."

Johnny followed her through to the fresh produce. "Get an onion, yellow one is good. Could you hand me one of those bags?"

Johnny got two bags, one for her and one for himself. She looked around at the fresh produce, picking out some onions. Handing a yellow one to Johnny. He put it in the bag.

"My husband used to cook too. He'd make the most wonderful things. His soups were always amazing. He got me my slow cooker. We ended up having a few of them. He'd get up at five in the morning and make a soup and then go off to work. And while I was home, throughout the day that soup would smell amazing and he'd always leave this little note for me. Telling me to give it a try for lunch, add to it if I thought it needed anything. It was really sweet. Because I'd clean during the day and take care of the kids and I didn't have time to make myself lunch, but he always did. He always got up early and made me lunch, and we'd have it on the side with dinner. You're going to need three big carrots and about 2 pounds of those potatoes. Yup those are the ones."

Johnny got the stuff she recommended carefully putting them in his basket.

"On my worst days, the days where the kids didn't want to go to school or I burnt something or just got frustrated I could go into the kitchen and read his note and have a little soup. And one day, instead of making soup he made a pot roast. And it wasn't quite right. It wasn't like how mom made it. So I kept messing with it throughout the day." She added garlic to her cart and potatoes. "You're going to want about five cloves. Do you know how to mince?"

"Yeah," Johnny said.

Daniel had taught him how.

She nodded. "We made sure all our kids could cook. But they didn't pass that on. My grandkids can't cook. I tried. But they're not there yet. They like to eat out. Or those frozen meals you know? Which is fine, they like it. But I miss cooking with them. It's nice to see a kid who can cook. Okay, you got salt and pepper at home?"

"Yes."

"Cornstarch?"

"Yes."

"Beef broth?"

"No."

She nodded, grabbing a few more vegetables and some fruit. Johnny followed her. Getting what she said to get, things he knew they didn't have. She smiled at him when they were done, listening to her tell him what he needed to do. How to make the pot roast.

She didn't have measurements. No specific amounts. It was kind of vague but he thought he got it. Essentially clean then chop everything and throw it into the pot, let it cook all day.

He could do that.

He thanked her and she wished him a good day as she left to check out. He then was stuck with what to have for dinner that night. He found himself in the canned section looking at the corned beef and hash that was cheap.

They had eggs and bread at home.

That'd be good enough.

He grabbed the can.

His mom used to make that.

He wondered if she still liked it.

He remembered watching her heat it up in a pan.

He checked out, carried his paper bags home and back to the apartment.

He checked the machine for messages and put everything away, getting out the eggs and bread setting the can on the counter.

It was still too quiet.

He thought about turning on the TV.

He wondered, why the silence bothered him.

Why he didn't like how quiet it was.

He opened the can scooping it into the hot pan, covering it with a lid, waiting for the hash to get a crispy, the way his mother made it.

The mansion was quiet a lot.

If he made a sound while Sid was around he got yelled at. But it wasn't that.

He wasn't scared of Sid, not here, not anymore.

The flash of anger in his mothers eyes and Daniel's whenever his name was mentioned made him pretty sure that if Sid even so much as ever stepped foot out of jail he'd have a rough time keeping the two out of jail themselves. He wouldn't ever show up where Johnny was.

The apartment was safe.

He poked and prodded at the feeling as he toasted the bread, cracked an egg and made space for it amongst the corned beef and hash, watching it cook.

He missed Daniel, missed his constant stream of conversation. Maybe that was a band-aid for something. But for what? Had he forgotten how to be alone? Utterly alone? He shouldn't have, he'd spent most of his childhood alone.

Running.

Maybe running wasn't alone. Maybe it was haunted and the waters were too choppy to be still. Maybe, without the stress and worry because of the people in his life he didn't want or ask for he hadn't had time to contemplate life alone beyond some idyllic peace.

He'd daydreamed about being alone in the woods, in the mountains, just him and no one else. Not being a bother to anyone and no one bothering him.

He thought it'd be perfect.

But now.

Well he knew that he'd miss everyone.

He couldn't do it.

Not for the rest of his life.

But maybe not even for two nights.

Which was concerning. It wasn't like he'd been alone all day. He'd talked to that lady at the grocery store. He'd gotten out of the house. He'd seen Daniel on Friday, he'd seen Mr. Miyagi then. He'd babysat the kids on Thursday. So that wasn't it.

Did he miss his mom?

He'd seen her Friday for lunch.

Was it just him?

Was he uncomfortable with himself?

Did he forget how to entertain himself?

He was an only child who'd been left alone most of his life. That was his default setting. Knowing how to live with himself by himself.

Did he still hate himself?

Was that it?

He didn't like who he was when he was by himself? Because he didn't have a distraction to keep from reminiscing on the terrible things he'd done?

He turned the heat down to low and walked to the bookshelf. He ran his finger along the spines grabbing Frankenstein and walked back to the kitchen staring at it.

The guys had a freshmen course. One where they had to read Frankenstein and think about who they were. There'd been a lot of long phone calls between them with Dutch trying to figure out how Frankenstein tied into the theme.

The guys were so sure it was just tacked on for like a freshmen reading. But Johnny hadn't been so sure. He didn't think they knew what it was like to feel like a monster. A nameless creature that just wanted to love and made terribly horrific mistakes and bad choices band what it was like for the people he loved, the people who had created him not want him.

Johnny had understood that.

How can you know yourself if you're just trying to survive?

How can you look beyond the parts other people gave you that aren't your own?

How do you decide what is you?

But he didn't say it. Because the topic would've changed to trying to tell Johnny he wasn't a monster. And maybe Johnny knew on some level that he wasn't a monster, but he knew how it felt like to believe you are one.

He sympathized with the monster.

He had the syllabus somewhere.

A copy that the guys had made and given to him over one of his lunches with them on campus after they'd moved in. Making sure they'd settled in okay.

He dug around for it in the desk. They'd printed it on a highlighter orange piece of paper that clubs used to get people's attention but really was just hard to read and Johnny studied it.

They'd been supposed to write an essay about who they were, who they had been and who they wanted to be.

That was something.

Everyone had asked him what he wanted to do, not who he wanted to be. And maybe if he tackled the future from a different angle he might dislodge something.

He grabbed paper, a notebook and pen and set them with the book on the table. He checked his food, crispy like he liked and the eggs were done.

He turned off the stove and filled up a plate, grabbing toast and butter and sat down.

Breakfast for dinner. He liked that.

It was easy.

One can, two eggs, and two pieces of bread.

He looked at the piece of paper. Who had he been? Did he start all the way at the beginning? Only son to a single mother? Homeless? Bullied? They were facts. Stepson to a man who didn't want him? Also fact.

Bookworm at a library because it was free and a form of escape? Because they had snack time and free food? Adults around that scared off bullies?

He had always on the look out for free food, things he could take to share with his mom. He didn't know how many times he'd been given a cookie from the librarians and then mustering up the courage to ask if he could have a second and then given it to his mother when she'd come to pick him up. How sometimes he couldn't bring himself to ask so he split it in half saving it in his jacket pocket to share when she arrived.

He had been a karate student, a champion.

He'd been the best in his class.

He'd been award winning...which now, after working at the animal sanctuary felt like he was a prized cow that some kid had raised for a 4H club.

It was a sour taste. All that hard work. All that time of his life spent training. Only to become a bully himself.

He'd been a model. He'd studied a lot of different things. He'd been a boyfriend. He'd nearly asked someone to marry him. He'd traveled. He'd left LA. He was a friend. He was still a son of a single mother. He was still a boyfriend. Just to someone he couldn't marry.

Did he want to be a husband?

He did.

He really did.

Okay. He could write that down in a corner of his sheet of paper.

He had spent his childhood at a flower shop and now he worked at a bonsai shop. He was still a student, of sorts.

He babysat, though the family was talking about moving. They'd leave soon. More people leaving.

It was getting quieter.

Lonelier.

Everyone was living out their dreams.

Or attempting it. Taking a shot at the their futures. The futures they wanted.

Dutch, Bobby, Tommy, Jimmy and Daniel.

Heck Mr. Miyagi was chasing his own dream.

And Johnny...Johnny was just existing.

He was fine with that. But he did feel left behind.

Chozen was opening a dojo, had moved to the USA, was working with the government with his uncle, Kumiko was dancing.

Everyone was doing something except for him.

Not exactly accurate he supposed.

He was babysitting but not for much longer.

He was working at the animal shelter when they needed it but apparently one of the veterinarian schools had started a program with them and they hadn't needed him in a long time.

He worked in the bonsai shop with Mr. Miyagi.

It wasn't a bad job, he liked seeing Mr. Miyagi almost every day.

He liked the smell of potting soil and plants.

He went down to UCLA for lunch at least once a week, talked on the phone with the guys, Jessica, and Kumiko frequently enough to make him worry about their phone bill. He drove Louie around. He had dinner, lunches, brunch, breakfast with his mom.

What did he want? Where did he see himself in five years? Ten?

He still saw himself in LA.

Daniel was going to be going to school for a couple years, who knew how long he'd be stuck at the apprenticeship.

Who knew where he'd go from there. But Johnny didn't want to go far from him. He wanted to stick together.

He wanted....

a home, a house, a garden, a nice kitchen, a bath tub, good lighting for their bonsai. He wanted space to have guests.

Louie was sleeping on the couch.

He wanted to go to the beach.

He wanted to swim.

He wanted a pool?

Maybe.

He wanted a big tree that gave them shade. He wanted space for his books. He had space for his books. But he wanted to buy books. He wanted a place for those books.

He wanted space to work out, to exercise, to spar and practice kata. He wanted a bigger table and a space that fit that table.

He wanted a wedding.

He scratched that one out with a sigh eating his corned beef and hash and egg.

Maybe he should write what he liked.

Kids were okay. He could work with them. But he didn't want to be a teacher or something. Not like at an actual school.

He didn't think he'd like it.

He wouldn't be able to handle kids getting bullied and being told he couldn't outright do anything. He'd get mad and make a scene. Probably get into a fight.

Daniel would have to come get him and he'd have to explain why he fought some kid or teens or heck their parents.

He liked working with animals but the amount of schooling the owner complained about sounded exhausting. Johnny knew himself. Becoming a doctor even for animals wasn't something he wanted to do.

He liked nature. He liked books. He could talk to the librarians and see what it took to be a librarian.

He could see what was needed to become a park ranger. Work outside. Might be fun.

He didn't know. He supposed, like Jimmy, he'd try on different hats and see what he liked. Maybe he'd find something new. Maybe he'd like a different job. Like accounting.

Accounting?

No way.

An office job sounded like hell.

But he'd think of something. Maybe he could be a professional lifeguard. He liked being on the beach. Was that a job?

Coast Guard?

Ugh.

He closed the notebook and ate more with a frown.

Why was it so hard? How come everyone else had their lives together, knew what they wanted to do? Why didn't he just automatically know?

What was missing?

The phone rang and he got up to get it. "Hello?"

"Johnny, what's wrong?" Daniel's voice came through, concerned.

"Nothing, I was just trying something and it didn't work. It's fine," he said pushing the book and notebook aside and sitting back down to finish his meal. "How's the rest of the conference?"

He didn't sound drunk this time. But there was noise in the background. He wasn't in his room.

"Where are you?" Johnny asked taking a bite of his toast, putting a bit of egg and corned beef and hash on it.

"At the hotel bar. I've been given a pina colada and some snacks that someone brought in."

"Shouldn't you be socializing?"

"I am, but I'm tired," Daniel complained.

Johnny could practically picture him pouting, sitting at the bar with the phone playing with the straw of his drink.

"Why are you tired? Did I keep you up too late?"

"No, my classmates banged on my door at 5am because they wanted to go to some greasy dive for breakfast before the seminars we wanted to go to. I tried to tell them I'd prefer to sleep and have the hotel breakfast but they offered to pay and I couldn't say no. What did you do today?"

"Cleaned the apartment, worked out a little, cleaned the Avanti and went grocery shopping. I'm boring."

"Johnny, you should be enjoying having the place to yourself. I'd be curled up on the couch watching TV all day until my brain just turned to static and I was all stiff from not moving."

"I figured I might as well later. I got a lot done today," Johnny said.

"Have you eaten?"

"Eating now."

"What are you having?"

"Corned beef and hash, eggs and toast."

"We ate that a lot growing up," Daniel said.

"Yeah? My mom used to make it too. Saw it at the store and thought why not?"

"Like you remember?"

"A bit. Looks like I'll have leftovers so I guess I'm having it for breakfast too."

Daniel laughed softly. "I can't wait to be home."

"Yeah?"

"I miss you."

"I miss you too. I think you should go spend time with your classmates though, meet industry people or whatever you're supposed to be doing. Eat something."

Daniel sighed. A big, heavy sigh. "I wish you were here."

"It'd be kind of weird right?"

"No, I think it'd be nice. I miss sleeping next to you."

"You probably don't want to start that up again while you're at the bar," Johnny said.

"I mean I can't, but you can."

"I'm still eating, sorry."

Daniel sighed. "Not even a little?"

"Not really sexy food,"

"What is sexy food?"

"Dunno but this isn't it."

"Sushi?"

"Sushi is your go to? It's raw fish, how's that sexy?"

"Bite sized?"

"So what Vienna sausages are sexy?"

Daniel laughed and Johnny smiled, it was such a nice sound.

"I mean they are what they are."

"Yeah, I don't think anyone on the planet is going to agree with you on that one."

"Wine's sexy?"

"Is it or do you just like the feeling after a glass?"

"Hmm that's it. Bananas?"

"Are you just picking things that are phallic shaped?"

"Mmm...maybe. Whipped cream."

"I can see that one," Johnny said remembering Daniel eating whipped cream off his finger at the lodge.

"Yeah?"

"I'll give you that one."

"Hmmm so condiments? Like chocolate syrup? Honey?"

"You can't just say condiments, someone might say ketchup or Worcestershire sauce."

"Ugh."

"Vinegar, hot sauce, soy sauce, sauerkraut,"

"Okay okay I got your point. Desert condiments."

"Sprinkles?"

"Hmm. Yeah they were kind of hot on White Day. I think we got to go with sweets. A banana split."

"So that's what, ice cream, bananas, whipped cream, cherries-"

"Cherries are a yes."

"So all fruit?"

"Gotta be."

"Sexy grapefruit? Pomegranate?"

"I mean isn't that the whole thing with Hades and Persephone?"

"Kiwi?"

Daniel laughed warmly in his ear.

"Sexy kiwi. Daniel that's what you've said. You've gone with vienna sausages, kiwi, and sauerkraut."

"I did not. I took some of those back."

"You sure? You really sure?"

"Peaches."

"Pears? Are apples sexy?"

"The caramel from caramel apples?"

"Don't those just harden till you can't easily bite into them?"

"True. But they sell that dip. That's kinda sexy."

"So what fondue?"

"Yes!"

"Cheese is sexy?"

"Maybe," Daniel said thoughtfully.

"You're going to have to make a list and give a presentation on it, start a debate next time we go down to UCLA or the guys are over."

"Ohhh that does sound like a fun debate. What do you think of blueberries?"

"Maybe. Berries and cream are good."

"Now I just wanted desert. I'm not going to want dinner."

"You tend to like to skip straight to the good stuff."

"Is that a good thing or a bad thing?" Daniel asked suspiciously.

"Neither good or bad?"

"You sure, I've heard a ton of complaints this trip about peoples lovers being bad at foreplay."

"You’re great."

"Am I?"

"Do you want me to reassure you now?"

"Yes."

"How'd we get from me having dinner to this?"

"I don't know, I've just been thinking about it. Like how do you know if you're any good at anything? Like I may think I'm good at certain things, but how do I actually know? Like okay, I think I'm good at cooking but am I? Am I really?"

"You are good at cooking," Johnny said.

"Now you're saying that but you love me so-"

"Daniel, cooking is in your blood. What would your mother say if she heard you saying you weren't good at it? Or hell Louie?"

Daniel sighed. "Okay, so you can tell you're good at cooking. I know I'm good at cooking. I can tell because people can't always fake that they like food. And no one's told me my food was bad. But sex is a different matter."

"Haven't we had this conversation? Didn't I already tell you that I don't fake anything?"

"Well yeah, I know that, and like you said yesterday I remember and I know from your face and how you respond that you enjoy it."

"I can't believe you're sitting at a bar and this is the conversation you want to have over the phone," Johnny said.

"Okay, well listen you hang out with enough people and they tell you all these horror stories. Like they're just a few drinks in and I know more about their sex lives then I want to. And the foreplay is like the biggest complaint. That and I guess finishing early and passing out before returning the favor. But, like how do you know if you're doing enough? Or if you're doing it right? I was reading this magazine because like someone brought it with them and it's been passed around while we were waiting for stuff to start and I swear. Absolutely swear that 90% of the magazine is sex tips. And like I flipped through it and we're not doing like half of it."

"You do realize that some of those magazines are bullshit right?"

"But-"

"The guys and I read those when we were younger and one of them recommends playing tennis with your partners balls. Do you want me to try that? Is that what you're saying?"

"Oh god no. What the hell?"

"People like to gossip. And everyone is different. No two relationships are the same. Right? Like your relationship with Ali was vastly different from mine right?"

"I...honestly don't know. You almost never talk about it," Daniel said quietly.

Johnny sighed. "I shouldn't have brought her up. The point was that my relationship with her is different then my relationship with you. And that's a good thing. I think we have a great relationship. A wonderful one."

"Are we having enough sex? That was another complaint. Long term couples said they just stopped, they got bored."

"There is a red jar filled to the brim with little notes of things you want to do. There's no way we're getting bored."

"We're not?"

Johnny sighed putting the last bit of toast down. "I don't know whose bothering you and making you doubt yourself but I'm happy. Stop reading that magazine and pass it on to the next person or dump it in the trash."

"I miss you. It's just nice to hear your voice. I wish you were here with me. Even though you wouldn't like it. It'd probably be super boring and you might feel out of place, but having you beside me is reassuring and I miss sleeping next to you. I think I only slept last night because I passed out from booze."

"Not the phone sex?"

"That helped. And you're right my memory is good. Especially if I can hear you. Like right now I'm closing my eyes and I'm pretending you're sitting next to me because that, ghostly memory feeling feels better. Better than the reality that you're miles miles and miles away."

"And you'll see me tomorrow."

"I will and I feel lucky. So many people here are happy and I just...I'm not the same."

"You're not happy? What's wrong? Has someone done something?" Johnny asked.

It'd take a couple hours but if he left now he could be there maybe before Daniel went to bed.

"They're happy because they're not at home. They view this as a party, an excuse, to avoid responsibilities they don't want to have. They don't want to see their kids, they don't want see their wives or husbands. They don't want to see their loved ones, the people they picked, and they joke about it. And then they turn to me and I'm silent because I don't feel the same. I said that. I said that I'm quite happy at home. Someone laughed and asked well how long has it been and I said we met in high school, started dating over the summer, and they said ah, that's just the honeymoon period. Is it? I don't want there to just be a period of happiness. I want it to flood the rest of our lives. I don't want to be like them. I don't want to come here to talk about how much I hate being home. I love being home with you.

“They look at me like I'm young and it's a joke but, I think it's all so incredibly sad. They drink, I drink. We all drink and they complain about the most mundane things. So and so's husband clips his nails somewhere she hates and so and so's husband is always gone playing golf with his friends. Lives are meant to be lived, and love is meant to be loved. Why say you love someone if you don't? I can't relate. I feel so out of place.

“I want to learn you know? I want to learn about best practices and things to expect and the stories people have to tell. But not these. I don't want to laugh because people have gotten comfortable, have swallowed all the conversations they need to have. And I miss you. I miss you terribly. Because it's like a seed. Like one of those seeds you didn't plant. You didn't want it and it's there. A little seed of doubt, of worry. And I didn't have it when I got here. I mean I had plenty, but not that one."

"Daniel, breathe," Johnny said softly. "Like the way Mr. Miyagi taught you. Yeah let me hear it."

Johnny listened to him breathing audibly over the phone. "Yeah, just like that."

He moved to the couch, taking the phone with him, curling up with the soft blanket they kept on the back of the couch. "What are you supposed to do tonight? What haven't you done yet?"

"We're supposed to go to dinner."

"Do you want to go? Should you go?"

"Yeah, it's the last night."

"So go. Ask the bartender for some water. Make sure you eat something that sounds good, order something you want even if it's different. Don't just get something because everyone else is. Because it's better that you have a good time rather than you make yourself miserable following their footsteps. You hated the steak yesterday so look over the menu and pick something you think you'll like. If you don't know ask the waiter what they recommend. Get yourself dessert if you want it. Who cares? Get water with dinner. Or a soda. Skip the alcohol. Eat dinner, chat about the convention, about the things you learned.

"Ask what they went to and what they liked the best. Best speaker, best bit of work related advice. It'll be a nice change of pace. And it'll be good to remember and to compare notes. Then after dinner go back to the hotel, to your room. Shower, or at least wash your face and brush your teeth. Then call me. Okay? I love you. I'm happy. I..."

Johnny felt his skin burn, his heart was pounding. He had to say something right? They weren't going to have that conversation, not the same as the night before, but Daniel needed to hear something.

"-meant everything I said yesterday. It's true. It's not heat of the moment stuff. The only thing that didn't make yesterday better, the only thing missing was you. You. Your touch, your mouth, your body on mine. I remember how all that feels and it helps, but having you home doing those things...it's better, preferred. And I'm sorry that your..." He carefully cleared his throat, pulling the blanket around himself. "-that your classmates and the people you're with are so sour about their own lives but you are amazing, and I don't think...no, I know," He pulled the blanket up over his face. "That I've never orgasmed so much in my life and I doubt I would without you. Not the same anyway. And I am looking forward to you coming home and showing you how much I missed you."

"I...I am going to call you as soon as I'm done eating," Daniel promised voice in a tone Johnny knew too well.

"Don't rush your dinner. I'm not going anywhere. I'll just be here," Johnny said gripped with the sudden fear that Daniel would try and scarf down his food and choke or hurt himself.

"Yeah, waiting for me. I hate to leave you waiting. That's a Miyagi warning I remember him repeating often. Don't leave the person you love waiting. Okay I'm going to try and get everyone moving. The sooner we get to dinner the sooner I can eat and then call you."

"Love you."

"I love you too. Talk to you soon."

Johnny rolled onto his side.

He turned on the TV, flipped through the channels watching a bit of one show then another.

He read for a bit.

He carried the phone into the bathroom and got ready for bed, taking a shower and trying to listen very carefully in case Daniel called.

He hoped Daniel was enjoying his dinner, hoped that he'd calmed down. Hoped that he was having fun.

He turned off the shower and dried off. He headed to the bed crawling in and opening his book. He read a couple chapters before the phone rang.

"Hello?"

"I'm so sorry. The restaurant took forever," Daniel was breathing hard.

"Did you run?" Johnny asked.

"I did. Straight from the car and up the stairs to my room because the elevator was taking too long."

"There was no need to do that."

"But it's getting late you were about to go to bed."

"No," Johnny said.

He wasn't going to go to bed, he was in bed. He was going to stay up and keep reading until his eyes burned.

Daniel laughed softly.

"What?" Johnny asked.

"Sometimes you're more of a morning person. You start getting sleepy around this time."

"I do not."

"You do," Daniel said with a soft laugh. "What have you been doing? Reading? Is it a good book?"

"It's getting good."

The words were getting blurry though. Maybe Daniel was right.

How'd he skip being young?

How'd he move straight to being an old man because it was only...it was early.

He put his bookmark in the book and set it on the bedside table.

"Weren't you going to brush your teeth or something?"

"I'll do that after."

"What'd you have for dinner?"

"Spaghetti."

"Really? How'd they do?"

"It's really hard to fuck up spaghetti, not impossible but hard. It was decent, a hell of a lot better than that steak. It came with garlic bread which was like that Texas toast garlic bread? The stuff that's thick and huge? That was good."

"Dessert?"

"Oh yeah I got one of those lava cakes with ice cream. I swear everyone got super jealous because they just got more booze. And it was like the same damn price. The lava cake was much better. And unlike those guys I'm not going to have to worry about driving home with a hangover now."

He sounded proud, pleased, preening.

Johnny smiled softly. "Yeah, that's definitely no fun."

"I can leave early and be home before lunch because I'm going to bed at a decent time."

"Is this a decent time?"

"See! You're totally sleepy. You wore yourself out cleaning and doing errands and being responsible. You don't have to you know. Like we share that stuff and since Louie is crashing on the couch uninvited he should be pitching in too. You shouldn't take your freedom from LaRusso's as a time to deep clean. You should enjoy the quiet."

"I learned I'm not the biggest fan of the quiet."

"No?"

"I miss hearing you talk."

"Yeah? I can talk your ear off as soon as I get home."

"Can't wait."

"Me either. Did you watch any TV today?"

"Just a little. Mostly read this evening."

"How many library books do you have left?"

"Library called I've got another five on hold waiting for me, so I've got to rush through them."

"I swear the libraries call almost as much as Ma," Daniel said with a laugh. "How do you pick all these books."

"Oh they recommend them. Or I read the reviews in the paper."

"You know I think most people our age are still reading the comics and just checking the movie showings and times or sports. But you're actually reading book reviews," Daniel said in a such a soft loving tone.

"Was dinner better?"

"It was."

"And what was your favorite part of the convention?"

"They had a cool keynote speaker who talked about like all the stuff we're learning about in school but from the perspective of someone whose been implementing those practices for like decades and about how times have changed and all the good changes she's seen and it was cool. Oh and there was this small business, like mom and pop shop thing and I ended up talking to some people about Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees and it was kind of nice to put everything into perspective from that point of view."

"Do you miss it?"

"The shop? Yeah. I miss you. I miss working with you throughout the day. I miss kissing you when we didn't have customers. I miss the way you look when you're focused on a bonsai. I miss listening to you and Mr. Miyagi talk. I miss watching you lift heavy things like they're nothing. I miss having coffee with you. I miss having lunch together and Dutch coming in to hang out with us. I miss when Mr. Miyagi would go into the back and I'd running my hands along your back or grabbing your ass or just touching you in general. I miss driving together to work and I miss driving home together. I miss spending time with Mr. Miyagi."

"You should go fishing with him."

"I'm not a fan."

"He doesn't dump you in the water when you actually go fishing."

"I know that. I just, I feel like I talk too much. Like we went fishing one time and there were other people around and they said 'Kiddo you gotta shut up you're going to scare off all the fish' and I was stunned. Was I talking too much? Was I scaring off Mr. Miyagi's fish? I didn't know but I felt awful. I was worried about it. And I felt bad. I think of it as a boring thing to do but at least I got to talk with Mr. Miyagi but then I realized oh maybe I'm wasting both our time."

"We talk when we fish," Johnny said.

"But I doubt you'd ever scare off fish. I...I talk a lot. I don't want to ruin Mr. Miyagi's fishing trips."

"You're like a son to him, fishing and Miyagi's are like a father son thing, you should do it again. I know it'd make him happy. He misses you."

Daniel sighed. "I miss him too. I mean I know we see him at least every other week for dinner, but it's not the same right? Not the same as living with him. But his house is full and I much prefer having our own space."

"Yeah, I get that."

"I mean I don't want you to be silent, and we'd have to be at Mr. Miyagi's. You were very very quiet at Tristen and Moshe's." Daniel said. "And that worried me. Like that I'd fucked up, you know with that challenge."

"Huh?"

"You...you spent your whole life trying to be unseen and unheard. I want to hear you. I didn't like that."

"But we've been quiet since Louie's been here."

"But not silent. There's a different. You're not as loud, but you're still there. You're not holding back. I think that's it. I don't want you to hold back. If you don't like something then that's fine. Say so. If you're uncomfortable say so. If you're enjoying it, please let me hear it."

Johnny blushed.

"I like listening to you. I know I talk a lot so it may seem like I'm not listening. But I am. Every little sound you make. I hoard those like a dragon hoards treasure."

"That's the weirdest dragon hoard."

"Hey, some people treasure gold and silk and fine things. I treasure you. You're worth more to me. Just as you are. Wouldn't trade you for a thing."

Johnny didn't know how to respond to that, didn't know what to say. He knew that if Daniel was there he'd just kiss him.

Maybe he should say that? Maybe that was the type of speaking up he meant? Probably not but worth a try.

"I'd kiss you if you were here."

"I'm looking forward to that."

"To kisses? Just kisses?"

"Not just kisses. I'm looking forward to everything. The comfort of our couch. Our nice towels. Our nice bed. You in our nice bed, on our couch. You anywhere in our home really. I want to come home and I want to just be one."

"One?"

"With you. It's been too long."

"Two days?"

"I get by when we can't do it by having you close. By kissing you, by touching you, cuddling and talking. But it's so much worse when you're not nearby to touch or talk to. By not having you close it's like a million times worse."

"A million times. How are you surviving?"

"Subsisting fully on daydreaming up what I'm going to do when I get home. Though I will say I woke up this morning and took a shower and thought more about what you might be doing throughout the day."

"You gave me a fictional day?"

"Daydreamed. You know how people do."

"Uh huh, sure, so what did daydream me do today?"

"Well it's not fun since I know what you actually did today and now I feel bad."

"You feel bad? Why?"

"Well you cleaned and you did errands. But um… you just sort of touched yourself and moaned my name a whole bunch."

"I mean I did that last night right?"

"Yeah. But like I imagined you spread out on the couch doing that."

"Louie sleeps there now. I'm not going to-"

"Listen Louie is not any part of my daydreams."

"These aren't daydreams Daniel. They're sexual fantasies."

"Whatever you want to call them, the point is it was hot."

"I thought you said you felt bad."

"Only a little. Did you do that today?"

"No."

"Could you?"

"Do what?"

"That?"

"You want me to touch myself and moan your name?"

"Yeah."

"I'm not moving."

"Where are you?"

"In bed."

"That's fine. I like you in our bed. Preferably naked. Are you naked?"

"No."

"Why not? You've got the whole place to yourself. You could just have spent the entire weekend nude. Could've worked out naked, ohh I kind of want to watch that. Let me sit on your back while you're naked and doing push ups. Clean in the nude. You can cook wearing nothing but an apron. You know in case there's hot oil or something. I like that."

"I'm not going to spend the whole weekend naked. That kid still gets locked out and comes over from time to time."

"It's been months since that kid's gotten locked out. I think they put the key on a necklace or something."

"Still I'm not scaring a kid or having to run to my room to get dressed."

"The apron at least?"

"Maybe, sometime."

"I'll take it."

"Is that what you'd do? If you were home alone?"

"What?"

"Just be naked?"

"Hmm maybe part of the time. It's not as fun if you're not there."

"How do you know?"

"I tried it one of the mornings that I had the place to myself. We'd had sex in the morning and then you got up and got dressed and went to the shop and I just put off getting dressed and it was fine but like it's not as fun if you're not there to be naked with. At least for me."

"Huh."

"Huh? Why huh?"

"I thought you'd like that."

"I mean it's fine, it's nicer because it was cooler and I didn't have to turn on the AC like I usually do but I realized part of the fun of being naked is that I can just touch you and you're usually naked and I guess I don't like being fully exposed? I like only being naked if I'm with you."

"So you don't want to sit on the couch naked together."

"Will you be in my lap?"

"No."

"Will we be cuddling?"

"For this experiment no. Just chilling naked next to each other."

"I guess not. I like it when I'm touching you. Even if it's just naked cuddles. Weird."

"Weird?"

"Well Louie asked if one of the joys of having our own apartment was just being naked all the time and I said we couldn't be because the guys had keys and came over but that was like during school breaks and when everyone was in town. But I like seeing you naked. Doesn't matter what you're doing. But I need to be touching you. Like naked with you in bed, easy. Love that. Even if we're not having sex. But I don't want to wander around the apartment completely nude by myself."

"I feel like a lot of people that's their go to."

"Yeah. That's why it's weird. I thought it was mine too."

"I mean I wouldn't mind."

"You wouldn't?"

"I like looking at you too. Like when you decide you're not wearing anything to bed I like that. I like looking."

"You do?"

"Yeah. I like seeing you naked."

"Hmm I'm going to have to think about that one then."

"What changed?"

"Well I guess if you're looking it's more...pointed? Then it's kind of hot? It's weird. I want you to look. Like at the library. I hadn't realized you'd been looking at me that way until we went to the library at Newark."

"You...seriously?" Johnny asked.

He felt like he was always looking. Or trying very very hard not to look.

"Well I'm usually so busy looking at you-"

"You nearly killed me when I first started coming over to Mr. Miyagi's to help out and you wore those tiny shorts and would hand me glasses of iced tea."

"I did?" Daniel asked with a laugh.

"Yes. I thought it was practicality obscene! You weren't wearing that to school. But for some reason at Mr. Miyagi's you were wearing less. My heart nearly stopped. You ducked down to like play with my pants and I panicked. Nearly died on the spot."

"Oh! I remember that. I thought it was weird you were wearing pants when it was so hot out. But that was after I scratched you right?"

"Yeah and Bobby wouldn't stop teasing me about it. Because he knew I liked you so he was trying to figure out if we'd done anything and I couldn't explain that you just accidentally scratched me because I was making you mad and we were all crammed into Mr. Miyagi's truck. He didn't believe me."

"I'm sorry about that. I didn't mean to scratch up your lovely thigh. I would've kissed it. When I get home I'm kissing your thighs. To make up for it. It didn't scar, but I'm still so sorry."

"Well I scratched up your back so I think we've both-“

"You scratched me up during sex, it's not the same. I scratched you when I was mad and sure that was an accident but I didn't mind you scratching my back because you were holding onto me for dear life."

"Yeah, dear life is accurate. I thought we were going to die."

"We didn't, but again, I knew for days, just by like twisting and looking in the mirror that I'd fucked you real well because you'd scratched me up so much. I was kind of proud of that."

"I'm just grateful none of it got scarred or like infected or anything. Could you imagine going swimming and your mom asking what happened? I'd die."

"I'm sorry but I'd wear it like a badge of honor."

"Not to your mom."

"I don't know what I'd say. I think I'd accidentally give myself away, she'd like ask Honey what happened? And I'd say nothing but I'd probably like glance at you or something and I think she wouldn't ask anything else but she'd know. Because she reads me too easily."

"Ugh."

Daniel laughed softly. "But that does remind me, we should go swimming soon. When was the last time we made it out to the beach?"

"It's been a while....we'll have to take Louie."

"Yeah. He'll like that....are you naked yet?"

"No. We've been talking about family. I'm not going to strip during that."

"Fine. No more family."

"I'm setting the phone down."

Johnny set the phone down taking off his pajamas and then getting back into bed. He wondered if he'd care if he hadn't spent so long always being dressed in case he needed to run. If it wouldn't feel so weird to be so exposed even in bed if that wasn't ingrained.

Maybe eventually he'd stop caring.

"So, how's it feel?"

"Weird."

"Weird?"

"I'm dressed usually so I can get out of bed and move faster."

"Like if you've got to run?" Daniel asked softly.

"Yeah," Johnny said. "This...slows that down."

"You don't need to run anywhere right?"

"Right?"

"You can just spread out in bed and enjoy it."

"Hmm."

"Try it."

"I am," Johnny said. He wasn't relaxed, but the point wasn't the nudity. Daniel wanted to talk. Wanted him to touch himself again. And that was different. "I think we're going to have to talk more."

"Not a problem," Daniel said.

He talked about the convention. About the things he'd done that day. He told him about the pressure of the water at the hotel being abysmal, almost like the pressure in their apartment before Johnny fixed it. He talked about his classmates and how once they started talking about the conference it was better, he'd learned about the stuff he missed and had a better time.

Johnny yawned, tried to stifle it. It wasn't boring but he was tired.

"You're not gonna huh?"

"Hmm?"

He wondered if he'd fallen asleep.

"When I get home do you want to do take out?"

"I already got dinner planned," Johnny said.

"You do huh?"

"I mean if it's bad we can do take out."

"I'm looking forward to seeing what you make."

"When are you getting in?"

"Hopefully before lunch."

"I'll see you then."

"Yeah. I love you."

"Love you too."

"Good night Johnny, sleep well."

"You too."

He heard the soft click and he carefully set the phone next to the whale shark and curled up, unable to keep his eyes open.

In the morning Johnny woke up and stretched, he got dressed, taking a little longer to pick something out. He didn't always care but he realized he'd fallen asleep on Daniel the night before and wanted to make an effort.

He heated up his leftovers and went to work making the pot roast in the slow cooker, chopping up vegetables and dumping everything in, covering it and turning to look around the apartment.

He had a couple of hours left.

What was missing to welcome Daniel home?

Flowers. Flowers would be nice.

He double checked the clock. He could make it to the market and have plenty of time to spare.

He grabbed his wallet and the car keys. It'd been a while. When was the last time he'd gone?

When he lived with Sid, Sid had florists he was supposed to use. He used them for Ali's bouquets, for flowers for his mom for mothers day. It was one of the few things Sid didn't care that Johnny bought because it was always for Ali or his mother and it made his mom happy.

Johnny had liked going to the florists, but it was also tainted because they knew Sid. Because he knew every purchase and choice went back to Sid. So the florist he knew best he couldn't bring himself to go to.

The market though was different. He hadn't bought anything from the market. He always wanted to. Usually he just walked around, enjoying the hustle and bustle, seeing the flowers loaded off the trucks in the early morning and looking at the displays. Flowers he'd never seen before shipped in from far off lands he never dreamed he'd get to see.

The first time he'd stepped foot in the market he'd been little. It'd been early. Way too early in the morning. The sky still black and the air cool. The elderly couple who'd owned the florist shop had held his hands. His mom had something that morning and he remembered her dropping him off early with them. He remembered rubbing sleep from his eyes and them saying, "Oh it's no problem Laura, he can come with us to the market."

He had thought they were going grocery shopping. Sometimes there were sales if you showed up early and he and his mom did that. Or if you waited till right before they closed and they had to get rid of stuff. That was how they got their bread. Waiting for those closing sales. But instead he'd ridden in the back of the van and then found himself in another world. A busy bustling world of flowers. More than he'd ever seen in his life and the people he was with were on a mission.

He remembered the woman telling him important things about the market. How the market worked, the best ones to get, all her secrets to being there.

He was pretty sure as he stepped into the market walking through the aisles, hands stuffed in his red leather jacket that there was a chance that he couldn't buy what he wanted. That he'd go overboard if he wasn’t careful accidentally drown Daniel in flowers. But it was so familiar. He'd gone when he was bored in high school. When he woke up too early and needed to do something, to get out of the house and the beach was crowded or the library just didn’t feel right. When he wanted to be somewhere loud and to get lost in a crowd. He'd just show up and walk around. He knew the people there. Even though they probably didn't know him. It was his favorite busy haunt. He liked disappearing amongst them. Lost in the hustle and bustle.

He walked for a while, taking stock of what was there, what was in season, surprised at what he remembered, what he recognized. Things that were grown nearby, the flowers shipped in from overseas, names for things he'd thought he'd forgotten bubbling to the surface of his mind. The meanings they held. It was like being amongst old friends.

He looked at his watch.

He'd wasted so much time just walking without a purpose, lost in nostalgia. He had to hurry. He walked to a few sellers, bought a couple things here and there and hurried home.

He put the flowers in water, set them out on the table and curled up on the couch with his book to wait and read.

Johnny heard the key in the lock, heard the bolt move and the door open. He listened to shoes being removed, a coat being hung up and a bag being slung into a corner as some keys were dropped in the tray. The door shut, was locked, and socked feet padded towards him.

He was almost done with his page.

Very close.

Just one more paragraph.

The footsteps paused. Stilled.

Only a few more lines.

He'd be there soon.

The couch sunk as a hand pressed into it, as knees found careful places to hold weight, weight that was sighed out in an almost content sigh as a body lay on top of his and a head on his chest as Johnny lifted his book just a little higher, following the page, those last few words to the end of the sentence, to the period and he flipped the page, reaching around blindly for his bookmark and shoved the bookmark into the book before setting it aside on the coffee table and looking down at the brunette laying on top of him, legs tangled with his and arms gently wrapped around his torso.

"Welcome home Daniel," Johnny said gently running his fingers through the dark hair. "Did you have fun?"

"No," came out muffled into his chest.

"No?" Johnny asked.

He found that hard to believe. Daniel liked his classmates, and talking to people, he liked his professors. But he remembered their calls. He'd hoped though that Daniel had turned it around.

The arms around him tightened.

Johnny waited, fingers twirling locks of dark hair, he wasn't going to rush toward anything.

He'd missed Daniel. Missed the weight of him, the comfort of his breath, even if it was humid on his chest.

Calls were nice, but in person was better.

Daniel was comforting.

He wondered if something bad had happened but he was pretty sure Daniel would've mentioned. He'd talked a lot about- well he'd gotten side tracked a couple of times, maybe it'd been to ignore someone being mean?

Had someone picked a fight with him at the conference?

Were there other karate mechanics or black belt business people?

Johnny hoped not. Daniel didn't need to fend off people using mechanical equipment or with brief cases full of who knew what.

He just had to wait, and breathe and Daniel would tell him.

Patience.

The head on his chest slowly pulled up, big brown eyes looked at him and he frowned pouting. Lower lip jutting out.

Johnny wanted to bite it, a gentle tug of pressure.

"It was terrible huh?" Johnny asked, moving one of his arms to hook around Daniel's waist.

"Never again."

"Never again? Why?"

"I'm going to just stay here, forever."

"LA?"

"No. Closer."

"In our apartment?"

"Closer."

"On this couch?"

"Closer."

"On top of me?"

"Yes."

"You were looking forward to it though, you really didn't have any fun?"

Daniel looked away, at the flowers Johnny had brought home. Safflowers (welcome), gerber daisies in purple and red (love), and babies breath (everlasting love) then he turned back to Johnny.

"It was fine," he said with a sigh resting his chin on Johnny's sternum. "But I don't want to do it again. Only if I can shrink you down and keep you in my pocket."

"Wouldn't I get crushed?" Johnny asked hand sliding down Daniel's back into his back pocket.

"Not that pocket. I'd wear a shirt or a jacket with a chest pocket."

"So what would I do all day?"

"You'd have tiny books and a tiny blanket and it'd be very nice and cozy and I'd give you snacks, but most importantly I could reach into my pocket and pull you out to give you a little kiss whenever I wanted."

Johnny grinned. "Ah I see. You did the math and realized whenever you're gone for a long time you fall deeper into your kissing debt."

"Not my fault, you just need to be travel size," Daniel said holding up his fingers. "This big. And I'd give you all the snacks and treats and you could sleep next to me on my pillow. It'd be perfect."

Johnny laughed shaking his head. "I don't think you'd actually like it. But, speaking of kissing debt. I demand a payment."

"Demand a payment? I just got home."

"I know, but someone promised kisses," Johnny said untangling his fingers from Daniel's hair and tapping his own lips. "Payment at least on the interest please."

Daniel laughed, shifting forward. "I can't resist if you say please, very unfair."

His lips brushed warmly against Johnny's and then he pushed himself back and away and Johnny frowned.

"I believe though, you gave me a bunch of promises."

"What promises?" Johnny asked.

"You'd show me how much you missed me?"

Johnny pushed himself up, following Daniel. "I do remember that. I remember we had a couple long conversations about different things," Johnny said kissing him, holding him close. He wondered if he'd notice. If he'd remember. How long it'd take. He ran his hands along Daniel's sides, his hips.

"We've got all day right?" Daniel asked.

"Believe so. You bolted the door right?"

"I did."

"Then we should be good," Johnny said. "Though I believe what you said you missed was our bed?"

"Yes," Daniel said hopping up. He pulled on Johnny, tugging him gently towards their room.

"What would you like to do first?" Johnny asked.

Daniel studied him for a moment, at the clothes he wore, then looked up at him in shock. "You found the shirt?"

"Is think so, is this the right one, do you like it?" Johnny said.

It'd been in the back of the closet. A grim reminder of Sid but also of graduation and Okinawa. He hadn't been able to throw it out.

Daniel moved fast, knocking his legs out from under him and pushing him back onto the bed.

He blinked a little stunned.

It'd been a while since he'd seen Daniel use any karate, he'd stopped after the tournament as if it was cursed. Another thing to go in the back of the closet. As if he didn't want to have anything to do with it.

He barely was willing to do kata with him or Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny and Mr. Miyagi agreed to leave it alone. They didn't talk about karate.

Johnny focused on doing non-karate workouts when Daniel was around. But now he was on his back on their bed because Daniel had swept his feet. Had essentially thrown him on the bed. And not slow.

He hadn't telegraphed that.

It was fast. Like all those months without using it hadn't meant a thing.

Johnny pushed himself up as Daniel got on the bed, putting his hand on his chest and pushing him back down. Daniel settled on his hips leaning down and kissing him. Johnny gave back as best he could. He knew, absolutely was aware that Daniel was riled up. But he hadn't realized by how much. He'd underestimated.

Daniel pulled away and Johnny looked up at him feeling breathless. Daniel was running his hands over the shirt, palms pressing into his pecks, running down his torso, pressing and rubbing at his muscles through the silky shirt.

Johnny watched Daniel, he was focused, bitting his lower lip. Thinking, making a plan. He grabbed at Johnny's shirt and pulled.

Surprisingly, not as many buttons broke off as Daniel had probably wanted. But he got to do what he wanted.

The fabric did rip and he ducked down to kiss the exposed skin. To lick and bite where he could, like he'd been given a wrapped present and he was focused on unwrapping Johnny.

Daniel looked so pleased. Maybe Johnny could get more shirts he didn't care about. Maybe it was cathartic or something?

Daniel wasn't even paying attention as Johnny helped him out of his own shirt, as he tried to help Daniel get undressed. He was too focused on the skin he had in front of him.

Johnny ducked down, taking Daniel's hands and kissing them gently. Daniel kissed him back. He was a little lost in a horny haze. Quiet but in a focused way. Moving off of Johnny to get rid of the rest of his clothes, throwing it onto the floor of their bedroom.

Johnny reached out for him, to try pulling him close but Daniel slipped out of his grip, gathering supplies from the bedside table and getting ready.

Johnny reached for him again, sitting up and kiss his shoulder and arm, his chest and neck, peppering skin with kisses.

Daniel bit him sometimes, maybe he'd try it.

He let his teeth graze Daniel's neck, sucking a bruise. He went for Daniel's collar bone while Daniel's hands went between his legs, fingers slick, and he moaned softly into Daniel's skin. Daniel pulled away, slipping between his legs, guiding his thighs apart and kissing his inner thigh like promised, so reverently that Johnny's breath hitched and Daniel smiled up at him, too knowingly, too aware of the effect he had.

How he ever doubted himself Johnny didn't know, since he played Johnny like a puppet on a string, sending him to pieces, falling a part.

"Daniel," Johnny began, then tried to clear his throat when his voice came out uneven, heady.

"Hmm?"

"Don't listen to anyone or ever doubt, okay?" Johnny said.

"This is good?" Daniel asked twisting his fingers, breath warm on Johnny's thigh.

"Ye-yeah," Johnny said, though it came out more as a moan.

Daniel smiled pleased, the sort of pleased that was insufferable, but Johnny didn't care. It was true. Confidence was such a good look on him, even if he wore nothing else. Especially if he wore nothing else. Daniel pushed himself in and Johnny reached for him. Daniel caught his hands kissing them and holding them down gently but firmly on the bed.

"If that's a no, tell me," Daniel said before kissing the tip of his nose, his cheeks, his forehead and lips. Peppering him in warm soft kisses.

"It's not a no," Johnny said softly.

Daniel smiled at him kissing his neck. "I dreamed about you last night after we said goodnight."

"You did?"

"Mmhmm. We were hiking and the only way to get across this river was to walk through it. You took off all your clothes and in just your boots crossed the water and waited for me on the other side. I could get across. You told me I could do it and I'd get a reward if I did. So I figured out how to do it but I ended up falling in a couple times and getting soaking wet. You said I'd have to let my clothes dry so we went to a field and I set my clothes out in the sun to dry."

"What was your reward?"

"This," Daniel said smiling down at him as he rolled his hips. "You tried showing me the flowers that were in bloom but I asked you that question. What was my reward and you climbed on top of me and rode me and you said a lot of dirty things."

"So even though… we didn't have phone sex… you had a nice sex dream? You kind of get what you want… don't you?"

"Only to wake up and miss you so terribly," Daniel said leaning down and kissing him.

Johnny had missed him too. He wrapped his legs around Daniel's hips, trying to pull him closer.

"Welcome home," Johnny said.

Daniel laughed softly, smiling warmly, free hand running along Johnny's body. "You're home. You know that? You're it. Wherever you are is home."

Johnny gasped as Daniel's hand wrapped around him.

"You're my home too," Johnny said, squirming a bit for more, moaning when he got it. Feeling better when Daniel kissed him. Teeth gently tugging at Daniel’s lower lip, deciding it was just as satisfying as Daniel made it look.

Chapter End Notes

Teriyaki salmon
Frankenstein by Mary Shelley
Slow Cooker Pot Roast

Where the Ocean Meets the Desert

Chapter Notes

> Previously the chapters were every other for POV. And there was a massive 100K chapter from Daniel. These final 15 chapters were originally supposed to Johnny's chapter, so a lot of it isn't the back and forth as it was. So it's more heavily Johnny's POV for a lot of this.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"If you win then you can have whatever you want," Johnny said.

Daniel stepped in close, "That's a dangerous thing to promise Johnny."

His voice was low and Johnny laughed.

"It's not dangerous."

"It is. Why are you laughing?" Daniel asked surprised.

"You always want the same thing, it's sex, don't even try and deny it," Johnny said with a smile.

Daniel looked away flustered, blushing lightly. "Fine yes, but still, I could-"

"I've seen what you've put in the jar. I feel fine with this," Johnny said with a smile kissing Daniel's cheek.

"Really? Really really? Anything?"

"We'll give it a try. I know you Daniel. Plus your the one telling me to complain more. So I know if it's bad we'll stop."

Daniel nodded, gaze heated as he got over his shock. Johnny was going to fuel it just a little more. He stepped back, stretching, knowing Daniel was going to watch.

"As long as it's not you trying to lift me in the shower I think we're good."

"It was one time!" Daniel said, voice scandalized. "You're never going to let me live that down are you?"

"Never," Johnny said with a grin.

Daniel was nervous about his game and Johnny knew it. Knew that Daniel was still adjusting to his new life, to all these people in it. He'd just gotten comfortable with Johnny and his friends and was adjusting to Chozen and Louie being around. Now he was still getting use to school and his professors and his classmates. Sometimes he came back from school and his apprenticeship looking utterly drained.

Johnny wondered if some of it was because Dutch was gone. Wondered if he should visit more.

But he didn't know if Daniel was…out at school. He didn't know if he would automatically reach for Daniel's hand on campus and if it'd hurt them both if Daniel pulled his hand away. He'd seemed so surprised when Johnny didn't care to hold his hand anywhere. It'd made him happy but that didn't mean school was the same.

Daniel needed space to himself. And he was still healing.

Johnny had noticed he stayed close now. When they went dancing or anywhere crowded.

He was polite but didn't talk much to strangers and hadn't for a while. The conference had taken a lot out of him. It'd been useful but draining because Daniel was out of practice. Had dove in the deep end without back up and Johnny hadn't fully realized it until Daniel got home and wouldn't budge to let Louie sit between them like usual.

It'd been a couple of months and Daniel was trying again and he had a game. Taking those baby deer steps back into interacting with his classmates and strangers. And this game was a bigger one. An away game and they'd gotten popular after the last one.

It was going to be a lot of people and the atmosphere was going to be like a tournament and Daniel was so nervous. Understandably nervous. Daniel was tense. He held on tighter in their sleep. Like he was doing everything he could to hold on and hold on tight.

Johnny thought a treat might distract him. He already had a plan. He'd enact it soon.

Daniel was lost in thought, trying to decide what he wanted to do, where he wanted to do it.

Johnny kissed him on the cheek and walked past to make some tea.

Something calming before Daniel got himself too wound up in the opposite direction of where he already had been wound up.

There was time to think about it.

Johnny wore a track suit to the game, sitting in the crowd with the guys and Ali and Jenny, with Louie slapping him on the arm in excitement every time Daniel did something good or the other team did something he didn't agree with.

His arm hurt.

Mr. Miyagi was sitting nearby looking positively excited with Mrs. LaRusso and his mom.

Proud.

Mr. Miyagi had been talking about it at the shop, trying to learn the rules of soccer. Sato and Yukie would come over and help him study.

Chozen would swing by at lunch and complain. It was soccer all the time at home now that Daniel was on the soccer team and playing matches and it was boring. Who cared?

"It's my fault he didn't play in senior year," Johnny said. "So I'm going and going to cheer him on."

"You're over doing it," Chozen said with a sigh, passing an iced coffee to Johnny. "Daniel could've joined a different team right? There's YMCA teams and other non-school teams right? Clubs?"

"Yeah, but they cost money...sometimes."

"He could've talked to the coach to plea his case. He gave up, you can't fully blame yourself."

"Have you ever been scared of anyone?" Johnny asked.

Chozen thought sipping on his coffee. "Not really."

"Then you don't know. You do everything to avoid them. And I think I scared him."

"More I hear of it, less I think so. I think you were nuisance and scary...mmm...some times. But not all the time. I think Daniel chicken."

"He's not a chicken."

"Daniel not accept defeat right? Not back down when against wall. You like that right? He pops back up and keeps fighting. But he didn't fight for soccer. Gave up on that one. I think unnecessary then. He didn't want it badly."

"Agree to disagree."

Chozen sighed. He stopped arguing when Johnny said that, closed up whatever else he had to say and set it aside, like it was a magic phrase and he didn't want to argue with Johnny.

"Heard from Kumiko."

"Yeah? How's she doing?"

"They just started La Traviata, opens in autumn. It's by that author you like. Old one. French."

"Alexander Dumas?" Johnny asked.

Chozen nodded. "She got the leading part. Violetta Valéry. Talked about it long time. Long long time. Almost talked as much as Daniel."

Johnny laughed. "She must be excited."

"Is. Very," Chozen agreed. "They'll take promo photos soon. I'll bring when she sends. Aunt Yukie is very excited. Sato thinks we should go opening night," Chozen drummed his fingers against his cup thoughtfully. "Johnny, you want to come with? See Kumiko opening night? Tokyo?"

"When is it?" Johnny asked.

Mr. Miyagi would probably want to go...if it was too long they'd have to shut down the shop. He didn't know if that was a good idea. But he liked the thought of being there to see her on her first night on stage.

He could get her a bouquet of daisies.

It'd also depend on Daniel's class schedule. He'd want to go too. And they did want to visit Dutch, maybe they'd take the time to do both.

"I'll find out. Tell you," Chozen said smiling warmly and turning, pushing away from the counter heading to where his uncle was laughing and chatting with Mr. Miyagi.

Johnny watched Daniel run.

It was selfishly comforting to see him on the field running.

There'd been a time where he'd worried that that would never happen. That he'd hurt Daniel so badly he'd never get to run, that he'd never get to play soccer again. That he'd ruined Daniel's future. And then he'd felt guilty for loving him. Wondered if on some twisted level he'd broken Daniel to keep him from soaring to keep him down in darkness with him. But Daniel was happy and free and loved him regardless of where they'd started, regardless of the blood and pain.

It was, and he'd never tell Daniel this, similar to when one of the animals at the sanctuary was cleaned up and healed and could be released into the field to frolic and play. Like the overwhelmed sheep they got that hadn't been sheared in years, or the cows who'd been kept in cramped spaces. Once free they played and they seemed happy and Johnny liked watching them. Liked how they came up to him snuffling around for treats and scratches because they knew him, recognized him, trusted him.

He missed going there as much as he used to.

Daniel's team won. And as the team converged, as everyone in their section of the stands cheered Daniel's eyes searched for him, a knowing smile, a smirk, insufferable that he'd won, that he'd get his treat for winning.

They had dinner out, all together with their mothers and friends. Chozen even complimented Daniel on his win and he practically glowed under the praise, hand on Johnny's thigh but hidden by the table with a promise that he decided not to push it down, just shivered and drank his soda. Cheering with the others.

At the end of the night everyone dispersed and Daniel held out his hand. Johnny put his hand in Daniel’s and Daniel laughed softly.

“Not what I wanted.”

"What do you want?" Johnny asked.

"Keys."

"Huh?" Johnny asked.

"I get anything I want right?" Daniel asked, his smile warm, sweet, syrupy, knowing exactly what he was doing.

"I thought-"

"You promised," Daniel said stepping in close, arms wrapping around him, kissing him.

The keys to the Avanti. Only Jessica had driven his car and that was because there'd been a fight and his eye had been bruised.

He thought Daniel would say something like having sex on the beach again or want to try a seedy motel, because that was in the jar.

But a promise was a promise. And Daniel wasn't a bad driver. He wasn't like Louie.

He fished the keys out of his pocket and Daniel pulled away from the kiss taking them with a grin.

"You'll be careful right?" Johnny asked, following him uneasily.

"I'm careful with the Ford aren't I?" Daniel asked shooting him a pleased smile, fingers running along the Avanti.

Johnny stood there watching him get into the driver's seat.

"Let me take you for a ride Johnny."

Johnny opened the door to the passenger seat and sat down.

It was weird.

He rarely ever was anywhere other than the driver's seat of his car. He hadn't slept in it in ages, but even then he slept in the backseat. The passenger seat was always alien to him.

It was well stocked though. Always was. There was water in the trunk. An emergency kit. Spare tires. Blankets, his tent. A sleeping bag. Towels and changes of clothes. Soap and a toothbrush and toothpaste. Cans of food that wouldn't spoil. Oatmeal. He'd also put a box of condoms and lube in the glove compartment after realizing literally everywhere else they frequented had them. Like Daniel was a squirrel or something and it was food he was burying and storing for winter.

Daniel adjusted the mirrors, adjusted his seat, messed with the radio and then turned to look at Johnny grinning, positively ecstatic.

"Ready?"

"As much as I can be," Johnny said softly.

His seat belt was on, he didn't know what to do with his hands. Normally he'd take one of Daniel's but he wanted Daniel to keep both hands free to be on the wheel if need be.

"Did you pick the Avanti because it's red?" Daniel asked, pulling out of the parking lot.

"Yeah. I wanted a red convertible."

Daniel nodded. He was thinking about something, something far away as his hands danced over the steering wheel.

Johnny relaxed. It was weird to be in the Avanti and not driving, but he watched the city pass, the lights of LA at night, wondering where they'd go.

"Tell me about the Avanti," Daniel said.

"Hmm?"

"The Ford was a birthday gift from Mr. Miyagi. I love that car, not because I practiced karate on it by waxing it, but because it was the nicest gift I'd ever gotten. You love this car."

"I do," Johnny said thoughtfully. "Well, I worked hard at the club to make money to buy it."

"Sid didn't-"

"No. Never. I didn't want a car from him. I'd...he'd...he was the type of person who'd keep an eye on mileage and complain about every cent of gas if I'd asked him for a car. I wouldn't have ever driven it except to take Ali on dates if it was something Sid gave me. No, I needed freedom I earned. So I worked at the country club after school and during breaks to save up. I got a lot of tips. And then my mom went with me.

“She hadn't known but like she knew Sid and I weren't on the best terms ever, and some things she didn't fight, but she fought to go with me to get my first car. Said that cars were important to any kid and that I'd shown my responsibility with that job and it had made him look good and a nice car would also make him look good and she wore him down. I'd seen it while looking with Dutch for his van. Saw how much it was and worked hard to get it. It's one of a kind, a custom prototype that some how ended up on the lot.

"Other than your doctors appointment and the tickets to Okinawa, this is my biggest purchase and I want it to last a long time because before Mr. Miyagi and my bonsai this was my lifeline. I could escape any bad thing as long as I had this car."

"Your biggest purchase for yourself. Your only big purchase for yourself," Daniel said thoughtfully.

He was driving north. He sniffed rubbing his eyes and Johnny sat up turning to him.

"Hey you okay?"

"You need to start spoiling yourself."

"Huh?"

"Or I'm going to do it for you."

"Daniel?"

"It's unfair. To live in that big house and still get nothing. Like you left it with so few things except a whole bunch of scars. If you don't start I will."

"You will?" Johnny asked amused. "How are you going to spoil me?"

"You'll just have to wait and see."

"I'm quite happy as is," Johnny said.

"I know, but I want to, I'll figure it out. I've got a couple of ideas. But uh, did you like anything about the country club?"

"I'd figure you didn't like it?" Johnny said. "I mean you ended up covered in sauce."

"Yeah, but I didn't actually get to see or enjoy it. I mean is it worth it?"

"I don't know. That'd be a question for my mom. Honestly? I always had to go on Sid's behalf and I hated it. But going places with you would be nice, anywhere. Which, Chozen said that Kumiko's going to be in a ballet in Tokyo, they're planning to go for opening night."

"And he invited you?" Daniel asked, hands a little tighter around the steering wheel.

"He did. I was thinking, depending on when it is, you and I could also visit Dutch. It's only about 2 1/2 hours from Tokyo to Seoul."

Daniel's hands relaxed and he rested back in his seat, letting one hand leave the wheel to rest on Johnny's knee.

"I'm kind of hoping it's during your fall break," Johnny continued. "We could maybe visit Jessica over your summer break? Drive out to Ohio and stop in Chicago and get that pizza?"

Daniel gave his knee a gentle squeeze.

They were leaving the city. Were they starting that trip now? Couldn't be, Daniel had school on Monday. And then there was always something happening at his apprenticeship.

"I think that'd be nice. We'll do one over summer break and the other over the fall," Daniel said hand sliding up Johnny's thigh.

Johnny stayed still.

He had a plan.

He'd put a cooler in the trunk with wine from Jimmy. Wine he thought Daniel would like. Soda for himself. That had been when he thought he'd be driving. Now he wondered if he should've packed something he'd prefer to drink. Because maybe he'd be the one who could drink that night. He could save the wine for some other time he supposed.

He was used to thinking on his feet. Had for a long time. Adjusting plans as needed. Like changing his route to school if he saw the older kids or his classmates congregating, waiting for him.

He'd assumed they wouldn't be going home. Not with Louie still living with them.

Daniel needed a break. Louie had promised he'd call home and still hadn't and Johnny could tell Daniel was getting frustrated. He avoided all Daniel's questions about why he was in LA and how things were going at home.

An additional burr was bothering him and he wasn't sure which one to help Daniel with. What he could even do. But Daniel was worse, better?, worse. Definitely worse.

He'd come up while Johnny was eating breakfast and drag his hands down Johnny's chest and squeeze. Johnny had learned to wait until Daniel was sitting down to put anything in his mouth.

He should've learned that from when they'd worked in the shop. But Daniel had seemed to have calmed down, reached an equilibrium when they'd been living together just the two of them, but he supposed as long as Daniel was stressed and there was pressure in his life Johnny was going to be a living stress ball. Like Daniel was a cat that needed to kneed something with his fingers and it was Johnny's muscles, or more accurately his pecs.

They were out of the city and in the desert now and it was cool and empty and dark. There were no cars on the road, vast flat emptiness for miles and miles and it was so quiet, except for the music on the radio.

"You liked the stars when we went camping," Daniel said, quietly but loud enough to be heard over the radio.

Johnny was going to freeze. But he smiled, gently placing his hand over Daniel's.

He had liked the stars. Liked seeing them over head but he wasn't particularly looking forward to sand again. The beach had been bad enough.

Daniel drove off the road.

"What?" Johnny yelped, surprised.

The Avanti was not built for off-roading. Not for the sand in the desert. Daniel's hand held onto his tight.

"It'll be okay, there's a spot I scoped out. I took the Ford and-"

The pleasant feeling Johnny had let Daniel cultivate evaporated.

He couldn't believe he'd let Daniel drive. He couldn't believe he let him drive him out of town and into the desert where he was trying to get them both stuck in the sand.

"Anything goes wrong I'll fix it," Daniel said, soothingly, letting go of Johnny's hand and placing both hands on the wheel, focused on where he was going.

There were some rocks off the road and he parked behind those.

Johnny stared at him, stunned. He wanted to scramble out of the car and check on his Avanti. His heart was pounding. He'd literally just...he'd.... he'd told Daniel and then Daniel had-

"I talked to the guy in charge of my shop, where I apprentice, and he said the Avanti would be fine."

"You told him what?" Johnny asked.

"I told him I wanted to go offroad just a little. I brought everything I need to make sure the Avanti is okay. You don't even have to worry about the sand. I'll keep your car safe," Daniel said leaning in close. "Just like you."

Johnny stared at him, looked out at the rocks they were behind for privacy, remembered the jar. Remembered watching Daniel cleaning sand off the Ford and asking why only for him to smile and say it'd been a test. He'd taken his beloved Ford out first, making sure it was safe for the Avanti.

It was okay. Daniel wouldn't ever do something as bad as Johnny had initially feared. He cared, he knew.

He leaned in and kissed Daniel. He could feel Daniel smiling, hands going to his track suit and Johnny grabbed his hands, stopping him.

"I thought-" Daniel said pulling away with a frown.

"Out of the Avanti," Johnny said, shooing Daniel.

"What?"

"If we're going to be out here, before you...before we... wait for me a couple minutes," Johnny said.

Daniel sighed pulling away talking about how he really wouldn't do anything that would damage the Avanti, he got it, it was a precious thing, one of Johnny's few precious things, and he wasn't that heartless or unaware. But still getting out of the car.

Johnny opened his bag, looking through his cassettes, picking one and popping it into the player.

Daniel was leaning against the hood, back to him.

Johnny had learned a trick when he was dating Ali.

Ali layered.

An outfit she wore when leaving the house and then her true date outfit hiding underneath it. It was, in her case, to avoid arguments with her parents. To avoid delays getting out of the house and running down the steps to meet Johnny.

Johnny thought about not going through with it, because he was going to be cold. He'd dressed for LA, for the Valley where it was warm at night. But not for the desert where the temperatures dropped. But there was no way out now. He carefully shrugged out of the track suit, looking at his shoes. They didn't fit but he hadn't brought anything else because he hadn't planned...he hadn't expected to be out in the desert at night.

He'd planned to be barefoot.

He was going to have to stick with the original plan.

He was going to freeze, but whatever.

He folded up the tracksuit and walked towards Daniel on bare feet.

The sand was cold. It felt weird, but Johnny wasn't going to back down now.

"I figured we could start with a dance," Johnny said holding out his hand.

Daniel turned, smiling up at him, eyes on his face, then lowering, lowering, dragging down.

"Johnny," it was more of a breath, an exhalation then his name.

Johnny felt his skin burn and cleared his throat, waiting with his hand still outstretched.

Daniel took his hand but was still looking at Johnny's legs. Maybe he shouldn't have. Maybe it'd been enough to just follow Daniel, see what Daniel wanted to do, maybe he hadn't needed to-

Daniel pulled him close.

"I'll dance as long as I can but-"

Johnny could feel the reason, the heated gaze on his skin. Daniel's keen interest. Whatever interest level he'd been at had clearly tripled. Instead of his usual level it was more intense, more pressing, literally pressing against him.

"Damn," Daniel whispered, swallowing hard before stepping back taking a deep breath and focusing on Johnny's face, dancing to the music Johnny had picked.

The dancing helped. It'd been a while since they'd gotten to dance, since they'd gone to a club with one of the guys. Or all of the guys. It was one of those things that had disappeared with Dutch.

A loss that Johnny hadn't expected.

Louie wasn't really of an age they felt comfortable going to a club with and Daniel didn't like leaving him alone at home too long. Like he was one spark away from a bonfire.

Johnny spun, then spun back and that was fun. He thought he kind of got it now. It wasn't the point but it was still fun.

Daniel looked hungry. But he had that romantic desire that Johnny had. And it was kind of fun to be on the receiving end of it. Of Daniel holding on tightly to go through the motions of trying to woo Johnny whenever and wherever he could and dancing was a good one. He was a good dancer, arguably the best dance partner he'd ever had.

He'd enjoyed dancing with Kumiko but Daniel was passionate and always close.

He was still struggling though. Johnny had thrown him off course and he didn't know if it'd been a good thing or a bad thing.

"Johnny," Daniel said after a moment, clearing his throat and trying again. "Johnny where did you even find- where did you get this?"

"Called the sorority Bobby hangs out with," Johnny said.

The head of the house had gathered like four girls and they'd talked his ear off for like three hours. What to look for. What to ask. How to make sure it wasn't like a Halloween costume because the quality was apparently super shitty. How to make sure it was the right length without trying it on. How to clean it later.

To them it was a joke, like he'd lost his bet. Not something Daniel had expressly been interested in. But they took him serious.

It wasn't like he didn't play dress up with the kids he babysat, or hadn't worn kimono's with Yukie because she liked dressing up and having tea with him in Mr. Miyagi's garden and catching up. Because it made her feel more at home.

It always threw Chozen. He always stumbled over the steps when Johnny had tea with Yukie, he never fell, but he always stumbled, but Johnny supposed this was different. This was shorter. This was specific.

He hadn't wanted to ask anyone they knew. He supposed Bobby might hear of it. But he'd never talk about it. But he knew he couldn't ask Kumiko, or Jessica and for sure wouldn't ask Ali. And the sorority had been nice about it.

Daniel's hand was going low, dragging down his back past the hem of the skirt and hooking up his thigh. He was struggling.

Johnny hadn't expected that.

He expected Daniel to like it, but not that much.

What had he said? Easy access.

He was purposefully avoiding lifting the skirt up as they danced. Maybe it'd been too much.

"I also brought wine," Johnny said quietly. "But that was before I knew you were going to be driving. I brought soda if you'd like that instead."

Daniel cupped the sides of Johnny's face, kissing him. "What if I'd lost?"

"Then you wouldn't be driving the Avanti," Johnny said.

"You were wearing this already?"

"Yeah."

"I was wondering, you never wear...track suits," Daniel said fingers on the hem. "Are you...going to keep this?"

"I did buy it. I don't think it's something to return," Johnny said.

"Can we-?"

"What do you want to do?" Johnny asked.

It was interesting to see Daniel such a wreck. A loss for words but in a good way.

"I was planning..."

"To have sex in the Avanti?" Johnny asked.

He'd caught that one. Figured that's why Daniel had driven it behind some rock far from other people in the desert.

"Yeah," Daniel whispered. "The colors are even right, how did you-?"

Johnny laughed kissing him gently.

Daniel's brain was so scattered. Nervousness was fading. It was clearly a good thing. Or at least like dropping a kid in a candy store with a $100 and telling them to go wild.

"If I'm buying a cheerleader uniform it better match my boyfriend's team colors."

Daniel studied him thoughtfully turning them and backing Johnny up the way he liked to sometimes.

Johnny stopped. Rooted himself, adjusting his stance so he couldn't move.

Daniel frowned.

"The engine's still on. The hoods going to be too hot," Johnny said.

Daniel blinked. "Shit, right."

He seemed to make a decision, hands on Johnny's back. "Can I-"

"Yeah."

Daniel grabbed Johnny's ass then ran his hands lower, dragging the skirt up. He looked at Johnny surprised and Johnny flushed red.

"Nothing?"

"Well I was wearing pants so..."

He pressed his fingers close and Johnny put his hands on Daniel's shoulder to steady himself. "Daniel, lube."

"Right."

"Daniel."

"I just- yeah okay, got an idea," Daniel said digging around in his own pockets.

"There's some in the glove compartment. I thought you wanted to do it in the Avanti."

"I do, but- first I want to touch you," Daniel said giving up on finding whatever was in his pockets and hurrying to the Avanti, opening the glove compartment and slicking up his fingers and rushing back.

Johnny had told himself he'd go along with whatever ride Daniel wanted to go on. As long as it wasn't dangerous.

Daniel kissed him, arm around his waist holding him close as his fingers went back to where they'd been, pressing in carefully.

"Johnny," Daniel said. "You're so fucking pretty."

Johnny flushed red. Daniel let go of his waist, lifting the front of the skirt, looking down, taking his cock in his hand.

"Every inch of you is pretty."

That was a new one, but his thoughts were short circuiting because Daniel was moving his fingers and his hand the way he liked it, right where it made it difficult to focus.

He gripped Daniel's soft jacket tightly in his hands. Maybe it was the skirt, maybe it was how short it was or maybe it was the way Daniel had been looking at him, combined with how he was touching that made it difficult to stay calm, to much more than hold Daniel's jacket like he need purchase on something because it was happening too fast.

"Daniel."

A warning that he wouldn't last, if he wanted him to last it wasn't going to happen. They'd have to stop and he didn't want to stop.

Daniel kissed him, smiling warmly at him. "Come on Johnny, let go."

Unfair.

For him to be focused now when Johnny wasn't, like as soon as he got his hands on Johnny he regained balance and Johnny lost it. But Johnny did, bare knees shaking and he nearly sunk into the sand when it was over but Daniel held him up, against him.

"I think I get why cheerleaders are so popular now," Daniel said smiling at him kissing him gently.

"What?" Johnny asked dazed.

"They bring cheer. Up peoples spirits like you up mine. And I get a nice view of your legs in this skirt, and what legs they are."

Johnny wasn't sure if that made sense but pressed his face against Daniel's shoulder, waiting to catch his breath, shivering in the cold breeze of the desert. He almost regretted saying no to the hood of the Avanti. At least that'd be warm. But he might've gotten burned. Or both of them might've.

Daniel ran his hands through Johnny's hair soothingly.

"I wish I could pick you up."

"You want back problems and knee problems before you're thirty?" Johnny asked.

"Aha, I knew that'd get something out of you."

"Didn't you already do that?"

"Yeah I suppose so."

He sounded so smug. So pleased with himself.

"You know my school has a gym and the soccer team works out sometimes. I think I'm going to join them. So the next time-"

"There's going to be a next time?"

"For the skirt? Or sex?" Daniel asked carefully. "Was it bad? Do you dislike it?"

"The skirt. I figure there will always be sex and no, it wasn't bad. I assume based on what's pressing against my thigh it's not over either."

"I'd prefer if it wasn't, but up to you. Can we continue?"

"In a minute."

"A minute?"

"Don't tell me your checking your watch."

"What? No. Of course not. Okay, yes, yes I am. But-okay don't judge, that was very hot okay, so I want to- well if it's okay... The skirts very hot. Like your little robe you used to wear."

"Your the one who asked me not to wear it."

"Only when we have company."

"So for a while."

"Is that why you wore this under your clothes?"

"Well I'm not going to wear it at the apartment while we have company."

"Just when I think things are starting to get okay with Chozen… Louie has to move in. You know I've asked him fifteen times this week to call his parents."

"I know," Johnny said pushing himself back a bit, feeling steadier.

"Like why us?"

"You're cool so of course you," Johnny said. "If I didn't already live with you I'd want to live with you."

"I should hope you'd want to live with me. Bit late if not," Daniel said kissing him again. "But I also want to live with you. I do not want to live with Louie."

Johnny shrugged. "It's your own fault for being too cool. Too awesome to live with."

"Are you just saying all of this because you orgasmed. What do you want?" Daniel said suspiciously.

"For us not to ruin my leather seats."

"Johnny, I would never, I swear, never ever do anything to purposefully hurt your car," Daniel said walking around to the trunk of the Avanti.

Johnny shivered, folding his arms across his chest.

"And you don't need to butter me up on that front."

"I was teasing."

"I know you were," Daniel said studying the wine and the soda, grabbing the cups and a blanket. "Aren't you freezing?"

"I am. I really wasn't expecting us to be in the desert."

"Where did you think we'd go?"

"No clue. But this wasn't what I thought."

"If I'd picked dancing at a club would you still have worn that?"

"Out? No."

"Then when would I have seen it?"

"Bedroom maybe?"

"So you were going to wear a cheerleaders uniform under your tracksuit all night just in case?"

Johnny nodded while Daniel opened the door to the backseat and laid the blanket down like he was making up a bed for a guest. Not like he was laying down a blanket in Johnny's own car. But the view was nice so Johnny didn't complain and didn't try to stop him. It'd also be warmer.

Daniel sat on the seat, the door open looking at him, waiting. Johnny looked at the front of the car, at the music still softly playing, the headlights on, the engine running softly.

"You want to turn it off?"

"Well we're not using the light anymore. I don't want to drain the battery and then we're stuck out here."

"We wouldn't freeze to death."

"I know," Johnny said walking over and turning off the car.

The lights turned off and they were flooded by silence and darkness.

"That might be better actually," Daniel said.

Johnny walked back around, debating getting in the other side and ignoring what Daniel wanted, but he walked back around to where Daniel sat in the darkness, his eyes adjusting to take him in.

"How so?"

"Now I'll just hear you," Daniel said pulling him down and onto his lap.

Johnny stumbled a bit in the sand, grabbing hold of Daniel to steady himself.

Daniel's hands were warm on his hips, really all of him was warm and that part was nice. He pressed in close as Daniel hooked an arm around his waist carefully pouring him a drink.

"I thought you were in a hurry," Johnny said taking the drink offered to him.

"I'm trying to behave," Daniel said hand on his thigh.

"Since when?" Johnny asked with a laugh.

"Hey, it's very difficult. But I do and I am."

"Daniel I'm still good, that anything still applies. I'll speak up if it's a no, promise. Like the hood of the car."

The hand sliding up his thigh paused and a thumb pressed along his inner thigh.

"Then I want you to know, just in case I researched it and know how to clean up leather seats as well, so just in case, don't get worried. And I brought the stuff to clean it."

Johnny sighed sipping at his drink. "I'm sorry for getting stressed out. I know you wouldn't do something with the Avanti without thinking it through. I know you're prepared. That you like to plan. I just-Sid tried a lot of ways to destroy this car so it's like a gut reaction."

Daniel's arm around his waist left and came to cup his face.

"I'm sorry Johnny. You didn't deserve Sid. No one should've had to deal with that bastard. But you, you didn't deserve to be treated like that, you were just a kid. You were just a boy."

Johnny looked away a lump in his throat.

"Sometimes I want to agree with Chozen. This is one of those things I agree with him on," Daniel said.

"You agree with Chozen?" Johnny asked surprised.

"I want to agree with him," Daniel said with a sigh. "Prison is too good for him. I wish I'd given him a good punch at the very least."

Johnny turned his face towards Daniel's hand still cupping his face and kissed his palm. "Sorry for ruining the mood. I appreciate the thought though."

Daniel's other hand left his thigh to cup the other side of his face. "You are going to be okay Johnny. You're going to thrive. You're going to do whatever the hell you want and you're going to have a better life than he could've even dreamed of. And I wasn't lying. I'm going to spoil you first chance I get. I'll figure out something, but just you wait. It's going to be amazing."

Johnny smiled softly. "Don't you already spoil me?"

"No. Whatever you're thinking of. That's a no. I do not. Not nearly enough. But I'm gonna. Because, you spoil me."

"I do not."

"You do. You really really do. You took care of my leg even when I didn't want to think about it. You spent time with me when I wasn't fun. You picked the slow lane to walk by my side. Wherever that led. You learned how to do push ups with a person on your back for me. And you still do it. When we're watching TV sometimes. And it's a delight to sit on your back while you do that even if Louie complains. Or to hold your ankles when you do sit ups and get kisses for helping. You took the time to spar with me. You spent all your money on me.

And then when you got more you spoiled me on my birthday.

“I know when we started dating you told me you didn't need much. You were just happy I liked you back. And I know that's how you feel. I know that you could be happy no matter what. But you're the one who pushed me to go out on my own, and I...I think you saved me a lot of miserable time. Probably years. You knew I'd come up with something for tonight and yet you still remembered when I talked about you in a cheerleading uniform and you figured out where to get one and wore it. You always surprise me and spoil me. So one day I'm going to figure out how to return the favor."

"So you're going to wear a cliche nurse's outfit the next time I get sick?" Johnny asked amused.

"I was thinking of something a little more. You really are easy to please."

"Just with you."

"Was that an innuendo?" Daniel asked grinning at him.

"Maybe," Johnny said setting his drink in the cup holder and kissing Daniel. "It's been well over that minute."

"So you're saying, you're good to go again?"

"Yes," Johnny said moving to face Daniel, legs on either side of his.

Daniel smiled slipping his hand up Johnny's top, giving his pec a squeeze. His hands had cooled in the cold desert night and Johnny shivered. Daniel shifted his position, sliding down a little and spreading his legs so that there was less beneath Johnny, more space, slipping his other hand under the skirt, fingers finding their way back inside. Sudden and easily as Daniel kissed him.

He moved his hands towards the zipper of Daniel's jeans, reaching for that warmth, for Daniel, hard in his hands, there for a moment before Daniel moved, pulling up close and up, the hand on his pec gone, digging something out of his pocket, a condom that Johnny took, carefully rolling it down.

"Ready?"

"Yeah," Johnny said as Daniel guided him down and onto his cock. Not deep, but a start.

"You okay?" Daniel asked looking up at him.

"Yeah," Johnny said, putting his hands on Daniel's shoulders to steady himself, before slowly sinking the rest of the way down, drawing out a satisfying sound from Daniel whose hands had settled warmly on his hips.

Johnny pushed himself up, just a bit, moving, trying to start a pace. He'd done this before but there'd been more space in their bed. And the bed was more comfortable.

Daniel's grip tightened and Johnny stilled.

"Gonna move," Daniel said.

How? Johnny wanted to ask but then Daniel was shifting carefully supporting Johnny as he laid Johnny down on the backseat.

Daniel pulled Johnny back closer to him, readjusting, finding spots to put his weight, like his hand next to Johnny's head, other hand holding one of Johnny's legs.

"This okay?"

Johnny nodded. He looked up at Daniel in the dark hovering over him. He reached up, gently brushing dark hair back from his face, knowing it was a lost cause, but unable to help himself. He let his fingers trail down the side of Daniel’s face, touching his lips. Lips that parted and licked his fingers. Johnny shivered, not just from the cold this time. The eyes on him were molten.

Daniel dipped down, kissing him, like he'd been holding back and Johnny struggled to keep his breath steady. But he didn't care.

It was like waves, like the ocean that lulled him to sleep all those years, breath came when it did in bursts, when he remembered. Like his body remembered the pleasure from before, the promise that Daniel always brought with his touch, and it was overwhelming but, the mouth on his, the tongue tasting him, was so full of words that there wasn't time to breathe, except when necessary. Except when the waves crashed.

An ocean in the desert.

Maybe, a part of mind thought, his whole life had been a desert. Things bloomed. Things lived. But it was difficult. And Daniel was an ocean. Full of depths, full of sound and passion and storms and life. Different life. And together, the sand, the ocean, the waves, the breeze, the stars in the sky, could become something new.

Maybe a forest, or a field of wildflowers.

Something beautiful.

"Are you okay?" Daniel asked, concerned, stilling his movements. "Are you hurt?"

Johnny looked up at him confused, then felt his face.

Tears.

Huh.

Not trusting himself to speak, pushing himself and wrapping one arm around Daniel, kissing him again.

Daniel kissed him back, a little thrown, but he found his way back.

After, Daniel wrapped him in the blanket and Johnny laughed a watery laugh when he realized Daniel was attempting the burrito wrap he did sometimes half asleep to Daniel. He tried curling up with Johnny, muttering apologies and curses as he tried to find a comfortable way to lay with him.

"You need a bigger back seat," Daniel murmured.

"That is how people pick out cars," Johnny said with a laugh. "By making sure there's enough space for them to lay down with their lover, comfortably."

Daniel sighed. "I know."

"We can blame it on the fact that I picked out this car before I met you, I'll keep it in mind next time. Maybe I should get a van, like Dutch, or a pick up truck. You know there's all these design ideas for vans now. With beds and shag carpeting, it's almost a house. Could get a lava lamp or something and stick a water bed in there."

"You're joking. I can totally tell you're teasing me," Daniel complained, holding Johnny close. "Are you avoiding...something?"

He looked so worried and Johnny wiggled a little to free his hand and touch Daniel's face, to gently touch his cheek.

"I don't think I can explain it-"

Daniel frowned.

"It's kind of weird," Johnny said quickly bringing his hand back under the blanket, pulling it up a little higher.

"Did it hurt? Did I hurt you?"

"No."

"I was just thinking that...I feel like the desert."

"You feel like the desert?" Daniel said eyebrow raised. "Sorry, continue."

"But you feel like an ocean."

"Hmm."

"I like the ocean. And I thought maybe together we can change, you know? Like ecosystems come back to life? The desert is it's own ecosystem. There's nothing wrong with it, but I was thinking...that we can become something new, full of life you know? Like a prairie full of wildflowers or a forest. Something different," Johnny pulled the blanket around him, burying himself deeper in it, embarrassed. "Like I said, it's just a weird thought. But nothing hurt."

Daniel gently lifted Johnny's chin and kissed him, soft and gentle, pressing his forehead against his.

"That's some Mr. Miyagi stuff there. Give me time to think about it, because I'm pretty sure there's something terribly sweet in that that my brain can't parse through at the moment. Metaphors and stuff."

"Sorry, for ruining it."

Daniel looked startled, cupping Johnny's face in his hands, brushing his thumbs over Johnny's cheeks. "You did nothing wrong, you didn't ruin anything. Absolutely nothing to apologize for. It's emotionally healthy to cry, right? I feel like I read that in a magazine or Ma said that, but it's true."

"But like that," Johnny murmured trying to disappear into the blankets. He could feel his ears burning.

"You know, we should probably be surprised you haven't cried during sex more than this."

"That does not make me feel better," Johnny said.

"Sorry, what I mean is..."

Daniel stopped trying to keep hold of Johnny's face letting him disappear into the blanket and instead hugged him tight.

"-with everything that's happened in your life, you never know when something is going to suddenly inexplicably set off an emotion. I mean in general I have that. I just hadn't realized it. When we went to New York for that school trip it was like walking straight into a wall. If you weren't there, if I wasn't so sure that you'd just wander off and get hurt and if I hadn't made it my job to keep an eye on you I probably would've broken down multiple times. Just memories of my dad absolutely everywhere. I'm not surprised I broke down on the Ferris Wheel even though I was so aghast after and in the moment that I did. But you and the guys, it was comforting to let you in. I hadn't realized how tightly I'd like clamped down on that.

"Or, hey you remember at the lodge when I opened my bag and like the smell of that sweater hit me? My legs were like jello. I probably would've panicked or like completely freaked out, but you figured out a solution and gave me comfort. Someone to lean on. It happens. Maybe it was the desert, maybe it was the Avanti, maybe you've just had a day, or maybe you hyped yourself up and then got nervous or relaxed a lot and maybe a dam of emotion released. Since you're adamant I didn't hurt you then, if you're fine, if you're okay then I'm just here. You can hide in there if you want. I'm still thinking about your metaphor."

"But-"

"You know, if you don't want to do something, please tell me right? Or just don't do it, speak up if it hurts. Or if I'm too rough. That's what I was worried about. Hurting you."

"I said no to the hood of the Avanti," Johnny murmured.

"I can't believe I nearly put you on a hot hood of a car. I know that's too hot. I work with cars. It's like an hour before that thing cools enough to touch."

"Sometimes you make dumb choices, like the shower."

Daniel sighed. "If all the blood heads south sometimes you gotta stop me from myself. Before I hurt both of us on accident."

Johnny laughed softly.

"What are you going to do about your Polaroid? You're going to have to change your little note," Daniel asked.

"I'll just add to it, parenthesis unless horny."

"Is there enough room? Daniel LaRusso January 1985, Mountain High Has good ideas, always listen to him. (Unless horny) You sure there's enough space?"

"I'll write tiny."

"What if I'm always horny? I feel like I'm always down, or up, you know?"

"What do you want me to add? Unless horny, which he always is. So really stop listening to his ideas?"

"No, oh god no, you listening to me is like catnip. If you stop listening I may just wilt."

"I can't stop listening. Hmm ‘except during sex’?"

"If you don't listen then you won't turn as red, right? I don't like that," Daniel said.

"Use caution when horny?"

Daniel laughed softly. "That feels more accurate. You need to have some bad ideas or else I'm just going to feel awful."

"I worried that the skirt was a bad idea," Johnny said softly. "That it was too...forward."

"Too forward? Impossible. I love it. But not because it's a skirt. But because it's you. Because you listened to some horny rants I had and took it seriously. My plan was literally let's have sex in the backseat of the Avanti with the top down. And here you packed wine and soda and decided to have fun. And it is fun. Really I should be the one apologizing to you."

Johnny frowned, wiggling out of the blankets just a little to see him better.

"Why?"

"You made a romantic date night and I just wanted to bone. I completely struggled to stay focused."

Daniel moved so they could look at each other easier.

"I didn't do all the romantic stuff. And we don't get to do that as much any more either. Not with my apprenticeship and school and Louie being here. You turned it into a date, a really nice date, and I messed that up."

"You danced with me."

"Not enough," Daniel sighed, running his fingers through Johnny's hair. "I want more of everything. I want more dancing, I want more dates, I want more time with you and this was the perfect moment to enjoy those things, but I couldn't be patient."

"Being impatient would've been trying to have sex in the sand...again."

"Not a fan of sex on the beach, noted," Daniel said amused.

"I'm glad you liked it."

"The skirt? I liked you in it. I liked that you listened to me. You know my family talks a lot right? Like you got to see that first hand. It's just a wall of noise any time more than one of us gathers. I don't know how you're surviving with me and Louie at the apartment. We talk everyone's ears off. And people...stop listening. You can tell. Their eyes sort of glaze over. Like Louie listens to me maybe half the time, more for cool ideas or things to copy or whatever. Ma listens to me maybe about a third of the time if I'm lucky, she tunes in and she tunes out. It's this annoying thing we all learned how to do. I think...you listen really well you know? And you remember dumb shit I say. And you take action.

"You make a plan and then you give me the weirdest things I request. You learned how to make mac and cheese for me. You've fixed everything I ever half mentioned at the shop and the apartment. And I say that I thought you'd look hot in a skirt because I couldn't get the idea of your thighs out of my head and your legs, because you can do those damn high kicks and you did one when we took a shower and tried, well I tried to lift you, and I think my heart skipped a damn beat when you did that. It's like I know you're a karate badass but sometimes I forget, because if you've slept real good after a long night of love making you just aren't quite awake, which is like a different kind of compliment. I take like a stupid amount of pride when you can barely function in the morning.

“Because it means, and maybe this is me just giving myself too much credit, but that I fucked you so good that you sleep well and can't think straight. Like I love those mornings because you run on auto pilot and your auto pilot is to be cuddly and sleepy and completely unaware of how damn hot you are.

“There was a point to this. I got lost somewhere. Your thighs? Listen, maybe that's because like I started touching your knee right? Because you couldn't handle anyone touching your like shoulder or anything close to your neck. And well then I got a little devious because I got upset and shit was it when I scratched you? Which I’m so so sorry about. I really didn’t mean to scratch you. I don't know if that was it, but I got my hands on your thighs and I couldn't stop it. It's like you know how maybe a couple will start with holding hands or whatever and then there's like old movies where they're wearing gloves all the time and holding hands and then they take off their gloves and hold their hands for the first time and there's something about that first touch of skin to skin contact? And everyone is like well damn. That's how I feel about your thighs. I just like touching them. I've got a lot of stuff I like to touch. Truly. And like the skirt gave so many options. Thigh, legs, ass, dick. Whatever I wanted to touch without like a barrier just like a hide and seek but like dirtiest hide and seek and also best hide and seek.

“Wait no this isn't where I was going. But see? Horny brain. Before your leg...before the high kick. Look at you just listening to me. That was it. That does shit to me. Maybe it's silly. Maybe it's weird, but I was reading all these magazines you know? Like while I was waiting for stuff and you read like all these advice magazines and people will write in and you realize, oh people are into that huh? I didn't know that was a thing. Point. The point is that like you listen to me and it effects me okay? Like this? This effected me. You didn't just hear me you listened and you took such a silly random thought and you put in all this work. Like you called people, got recommendations, bought it or ordered it, tried it on and decided to wear it to my game. Under normal clothes so it could be a surprise. Something just for us. It's not just that you put on a skirt and that I get to see your beautiful legs or touch you, it's all the effort that went into it.

“Like I thought you were upset and I was freaking out. Like I fucked up. Of course I fucked up. It's the Avanti and I didn't just drive it to the desert I drove it in the damn sand, right after you told me how much this car meant to you and how hard you worked for it and then here I was freaking out and leaning against the thing so I knew it was hot, how that didn't stick with me I don't know, and then you start playing music and you held out your hand and asked to dance and I was like oh. It was like a balm. But then I realized you weren't wearing the track suit and I didn't recognize that shirt because it's not a shirt and then I took everything in, the top, the skirt, your bare feet as if we were on the beach and not as if there could be scorpions out in the sand. And you remembered.

"You remembered and you looked hot and leg, so much beautiful leg. But you'd heard me and you listened and you'd done all this for a whim of mine and you know how someone feels when they get drenched in water and like the shock of that and how it's usually a bad thing? It was like that but a good thing. Well I suppose. All the blood headed south and my mind went blank. And I'm sorry about that. It wasn't just the skirt or your legs, it was, that knowing. Does that make sense? That you listen, you retain all this information that no one else every listens or cares about. Like you bought those seedless grapes because I can't stand the seeds and I was so used to people ignoring that. The things I actually like. It...cuts deep but like in a good way. It's this sudden blinding feeling of being seen? If that makes sense...at all. Since I'm talking about you hearing me, listening. But it's overwhelmingly good."

"I find it comforting."

"What?"

"Listening to you talk."

"I don't get it, but I love it," Daniel said. "I feel incredibly lucky."

"You listen too."

"I doubt nearly as well as you do," Daniel sighed.

"I suppose, you feel seen because I listen. But I feel seen because you see me. You look at me, you touch me, you make sure I'm included, you ask me questions. You don't let me fade into the background or run away. You make me coffee the way I like it, you make dinner when I'm tired and I don't know how you know I'm tired-"

"You droop a little."

"Like a plant?" Johnny asked with a laugh.

"You telegraph," Daniel said. "It's in your body language. Like when you're tense. It's in the way you stand, hold yourself. It's in your voice when I get home, your eyes."

"I feel like...after being ignored, and purposefully misunderstood by Sid and unable to really figure out how to communicate with my mom or knowing how to be a good friend to my friends all I learned was to listen and act, it's how I survived. And I mostly felt I went...unseen."

"I see you, and if you want or need to be seen better, let me know. I like looking," Daniel said with a big grin. "I like studying your body, but I also like listening to you and I want you to be comfortable around me and to feel safe. So if I get it wrong, because to err is human right? Let me know. I'll listen. I don't want to be anything like Sid and you should be listened to. As keenly as you listen to everyone else. You should be spoiled. You should be heard and seen. And loved. Showered in love. Until everything is warm and fuzzy around the edges and cozy."

"I feel surprisingly cozy right now."

"Yeah?"

Johnny nodded. "You got the soft blanket I like."

"It is the softest one we have."

"I was cold."

"I was wondering," Daniel said with a smile. "I didn't know if that's why your nipples were hard or if I was doing a good job."

"I wasn't expecting the desert."

"Clearly, what if there'd been a scorpion?"

"We didn't have sex in the sand."

"I know but you were barefoot. I'd have been pissed if something stung you."

"Finally get to jump to my defense then huh?"

"Yeah me versus an arachnid. You're the one who takes those guys outside at the apartment. You think I could handle a scorpion?"

"I mean you might. You'd have to catch it if it stung me so the doctors would know which one."

"Can't just describe the guy? About yea big, pointy bit on it's tail, scuttled off into the sand," Daniel said, holding out his fingers.

"Nope, could've been a baby."

"Big macho karate guy gets stung by a venomous baby," Daniel said with a laugh.

"Boyfriend fails at catching it and panics whole way to the emergency room. Neither willing to explain what happened."

"Okay okay mutually another stupid idea. But tell me where else can we park and have sex?" Daniel asked.

"Aren't there spots specifically for that?"

"I'm not taking you to some hook up spot where all the cars are shaking."

"I wonder if it's bad for the suspension."

"You're worried about the suspension? I'm not going to ask my boss."

"No? Not even a little curious? Also do you even know any hook up spots?"

"What? You don't think I heard of the local spots at school?"

"I just didn't think you paid attention to that stuff."

"Last semester of high school I was keenly focused on all the sex tips and dating tips I could gather trying to figure out why as much as I flirted you just didn't seem to notice. So yes, I do know of a few of the hook up spots. And college students share even more of them."

"And you don't want to go?"

"No, I don't want to listen to other people having sex. I want to listen to you, just you moaning or cursing or asking for more or telling me how much you love me. I don't want to listen to some other couple," Daniel said.

"So no orgies in the future, got it," Johnny said with a laugh.

"Could you even handle that?"

"Probably not," Johnny said.

He could barely handle Daniel paying attention to him and lovingly touching him. Other people touching him, multiple people? He'd probably black out. Or cry. It was bad enough when he cried during with Daniel.

"It took so long to get through to each other, to hear and listen on a romantic and intimate front that I don't want to share," Daniel said.

Johnny smiled softly, reaching out, wiggling out of the blanket cocoon kissing him gently. "I want to be selfish too. I want to spent time with you. Whenever we can. I feel bad, because Louie needs support, but I also want to just spend time with you. Which is why I offered. Why I wanted to see what you came up with. Because I miss just laying here talking to you, I miss it being just you and I. I miss having the apartment to ourselves. I miss when you looked at me with desire and acting on it, or at least flirting up as storm so I caught on."

"I missed it all too, and part of me doesn't want to go home. I want to stay here in the back of your car, on this tiny tiny seat."

"It's not that small."

"I'm glad you're not claustrophobic. Glad you like having me up in your space, because if I budge I will be on the floorboards."

"Good luck finding a car that's as nice as the Avanti with a bigger back seat. I bet you the Ford's backseat isn't much bigger."

"Oh we're just going to have to test it out."

"Where?"

"Ugh, that's what I've got to figure out. Because now, honestly? Paranoid about scorpions."

"We can put the top up and roll up the windows if you'll feel better."

"I might," Daniel said. "You'll stay down here right? So you don't get hit as the top goes up?"

"Yeah."

Daniel kissed him and pulled away, taking a surprising amount of warmth with him as he moved to put the top up and roll up all the windows. He seemed to be looking around on his way back, scanning, Johnny assumed, for scorpions.

Johnny pulled on him, tugging him back down towards him.

"You did great at your game you know."

"Yeah?"

"Scored some great goals, you were fast on your feet, it was impressive."

"Why thank you," Daniel said with a grin. "Always glad to please a fan."

"Big fan. I was wondering how do you do it?"

"Do what?"

"Play games with teams that aren't completely enamored with your beauty?"

Daniel laughed. "Well you see, they don't see me."

"Ah, because you're too fast?"

"Yeah, and because everyone's eye is on the ball."

"What a sight they're missing."

"You think huh?"

"Oh I know. Again, huge fan. I heard though that you have one problem."

"What could that possibly be?"

"Well I hear that you are perpetually horny. How on earth do you handle that?"

"Well I make dumb choices sometimes because of it, but mostly I just politely ask my boyfriend if he'd like to have sex."

"And if he says yes?"

"Then I'm a lucky guy if he thinks he can handle another round,"

Daniel said carefully slipping his hands into the blanket. "If he's not pushing himself."

"Curiosity really, and maybe in the same boat," Johnny said shivering as they moved, finding a way to align. A way to meet in a different way in the back of the Avanti. A new way to see one another just a little clearer.

Chapter End Notes

Scorpion stings symptoms and how it's treated
How to clean "stuff" off car seats
I totally get it if you don't want to read that. It's pretty much how to get rid of the stains off anything from goodhousekeeping. But essentially cold water. Don't use hot water it'll stain. Blot. If that's not working use a weak detergent solution or a spray upholstery cleaner but test it somewhere that you wouldn't notice first. And then work with a soft brush. The Avanti's seats are leather, so it's not cloth based so really just a cloth with cold water should work.

Also uh, don't drive your car off into the desert if it's not built for offroading. Tire pressure has to be played around with when driving on sand and you can totally get stuck. So you gotta take a shovel with you. (Daniel's got one in the trunk) Here's some tips for driving in sand. But again, please don't be like try this at home (or you not not at home) without being careful. It can 1000% damage your car. So just imagine that shortly after this Daniel had to drive the car back onto the road and then went to work cleaning sand off of everything before driving them home and then cleaning it again at home in the garage while Johnny teased him by asking if it was worth it. Daniel's answer is 100%.

Rest is Mandatory

Chapter Notes

We've moved forward a bit.

See the end of the chapter for more notes

Johnny walked into the garage, looking for the Daniel. He felt a little nervous, he hadn't visited Daniel at the garage before. Sometimes he waited for Daniel outside of the college campus grounds but he knew Daniel was enjoying the freedom of being relatively unknown. Not infamous because of the All Valley or Cobra Kai.

Daniel hadn't ever said that he didn't want Johnny coming by for lunch, but Johnny didn't want to be in the way. He didn't want to ruin whatever life Daniel had created for himself, but he hadn't looked good that morning. He'd been running out the door and in a hurry so Johnny hadn't had a chance to catch him and investigate, but he thought, maybe, Daniel was sick.

He'd brought lunch as an excuse. To check on Daniel. A bento box Yukie had given him with rice and a canteen of soup and little hot dogs cut up to look like octopi and tamagoyaki that Mr. Miyagi had taught him how to make and a fried fish.

It wasn't cute, not like the bento's Yukie had brought to the shop one day with a little bear sleeping under an omelet blanket, but it'd do the job. Mostly the soup and rice.

He hoped he wasn't being too overbearing. That he wasn't overstepping some unseen boundary that they hadn't talked about. He worried about smothering Daniel, being too much. But being sick required rest. Lots of rest. And Daniel had been putting in long hours and was tired and Johnny knew how that could knock one out.

Rest wasn't optional, it was a requirement. Something he'd fought against for a long time thinking he could do everything and survive on cat naps on the beach.

But Daniel was the one who taught him sleep was important. A combined effort between him and Mr. Miyagi. They'd made such a comfortable safe space for him to sleep that he did. And if he could return the favor? If he could help Daniel with whatever the source of his stress was and make sure he took good care of himself then it'd be...well it'd feel nice.

"Hello! Nice Avanti, what seems to be the issue?" A man in greasy overalls asked wiping his oil covered hands on a handkerchief. "Such a bummer that the company went bankrupt."

He stepped in close towards Johnny, studying the Avanti.

"Actually, how's yours still out and about? All the convertibles were recalled. No one's got one anymore."

Johnny bit back his go-to response which was that he didn't need their help because if something went wrong with his car he could fix it himself. That feeling he always had in the pit of his stomach that he didn't want a stranger touching his car. The way it sent off all the alarm bells in his head.

He breathed.

It wasn't the same.

Not like after he got the Avanti and brought it home all excited with his mom and Sid had recommended he take it to a mechanic to check on it, all fake warm smiles of a proud man, proud of the car his step-son bought and had saved up for, that he'd made such a responsible choice.

Not like when Johnny had still hoped and trusted just a little, and taken his car to the mechanic at the first little strange sound, trusting. only for later the Avanti to be worse, to rattle. Not until he overheard one of Sid's calls, telling the mechanic to slowly destroy the Avanti. Little things here and there every time it came in, until Johnny couldn't afford to have it "fixed" any more. A win win. The perfect lesson for a little monster.

Johnny had tried taking his Avanti to another mechanic, hoping he'd get whatever was wrong with it fixed. And it'd worked, at first. Until Sid found the receipt, the business card, some clue as to where Johnny had taken his business for his car's maintenance and the cycle began again.

Johnny caught it earlier that time and realized he couldn't take his car anywhere, couldn't go to anyone without Sid buying them off. Sid wanted him to have a car so that he didn't ask for rides, he wanted

Johnny to be out of the house and out from underfoot, but he didn't want Johnny to like it.

He didn't want Johnny to enjoy his freedom or to be able to go far. He wanted it to be a leash, to have an end so that when he pulled, when Sid needed a son for that perfect family portrait of smiling faces at the club or at a dinner, Johnny would come back, would be dragged and yanked back.

So he taught himself how to fix his Avanti, how to run tests, how to keep it running smoothly, how to change a tire, check the oil, to decipher what any lights meant, what sounds meant what.

His Avanti became an extension of himself, something he knew so well that he could tell when something was wrong and how to fix it. He'd go out of the Valley for parts, out of Sid's reach so that they couldn't be spoiled or corrupted or fake.

He borrowed his friends garages to fix his car. Setting up shop in Dutch's garage near all the antique classics and race cars, rolling under his Avanti to do repairs while Dutch sat nearby chatting about whatever, asking what he was doing fiddling with the radio to play Abba. Or at Jimmy's. They both had enough space that Johnny could roll into their garage and get to work without being in the way. He could pick some corner and work.

Jimmy always brought him drinks and snacks, watching what he did fascinated, asking how he knew what to do. Johnny couldn't fix other cars with the same ease, but he found comfort in knowing what to do, how to do it. He'd knew he could rely on himself. Self sufficient.

It's what he told Sid when Sid asked why he didn't trust a mechanic to do the work for him, why he didn't let a professional fix his Avanti, why he did such lowly dirty work. Johnny said it was good practice. That it saved money. Usually that Sid got. Begrudgingly let it go, focused on other ways to hurt Johnny that didn't include the Avanti.

But he still didn't like strangers touching his car, didn't like them wanting to look under the hood. He'd caught one of the mechanics Sid had paid off about to pour sugar into his tank and ever since he realized that he only trusted himself. And now Mr. Miyagi and Daniel. And that was it. No one else could touch the Avanti.

"It's a custom modified Avanti prototye and it's fine, I'm not here for it. I'm looking for Daniel LaRusso?" Johnny said holding up the bag with the bento in it.

"Oh."

The mechanic looked disappointed but led Johnny through the garage past several cars towards one with some familiar shoes sticking out from under them. Johnny hung back as the man tapped his shoe against Daniel's and Daniel pushed himself slowly out from under the car.

He looked a little pale, dirty from oil and grease.

"You got a delivery," the mechanic said hooking his thumb back to point at Johnny.

Johnny lifted the bag and Daniel got up, digging a cloth, a colorful bandana out of his overalls to wipe grease off his hands before shoving it back in his pockets. Daniel stepped towards him, a small smile starting to spread across his face, amused, curious.

"LaRusso! I thought you were going to be done with that car an hour ago?" A man yelled from the back of the shop.

Johnny’s gaze followed the sound of the voice, stepping towards Daniel, in front of Daniel, getting between them. He didn't like the man’s tone, his body language.

"Sorry sir, there's a-"

"I don't care what it is, you've got to be faster LaRusso. Customers don't like waiting."

Daniel patted Johnny's shoulder stepping around him towards the man, stumbling a little.

Johnny couldn't help himself, reaching out to feel Daniel's forehead. He was hot. Too hot to be in a garage dealing with heavy equipment.

"Daniel I think you've got a fever," Johnny whispered.

"I'm fine ," Daniel said trying to step out of reach, stumbling, turning paler than Johnny had ever seen. He reached out to grab hold of something and Johnny caught him, scooping him up.

"He's too sick to be working today," Johnny said.

"Him being sick is no concern to me, he needs to finish that car."

"I'm taking him home."

"And who do you think you are?"

"Doesn't matter, these are unsafe working conditions if you're making people work while they can barely stand. You're lucky you have any customers at all let alone that no one has gotten badly hurt."

"Listen here you, you can't just waltz in somewhere and tell someone how to run a business. It's none of your business."

"I'm making it my business. You're giving him the rest of the day off and possibly additional time until he recovers," Johnny said, arms tightening around Daniel, holding him close. His eyes were shut and he was breathing was off, his body was too warm. "And he's going home."

Johnny turned heading back towards the Avanti, glad he'd made more soup and rice at home. He'd put Daniel back in bed, check his temperature, make him some tea and-

"If he leaves this garage then he's fired."

Johnny stopped.

"He's not leaving of his own free will," Johnny said. "Think of it as if he's been dragged away. You can talk about his future later when he's conscious."

He didn't wait. He didn't listen. He hurried out of the garage hoping that Daniel would forgive him. He'd come back with someone to make sure they got Daniel's things, the Ford. But the most important thing was to get Daniel home.

He set the bento box in the back seat and then shifted Daniel in his arms to open the door.

"Where we goin'?" Daniel asked blinking up at him.

"Home," Johnny said.

"End of day already?"

"No, you're sick. Time to go home and sleep," Johnny said gently setting him in the seat.

"Gotta clock out."

"I talked to your boss."

"Oh."

"We'll talk about it when you're better and if I did wrong, I'm sorry. But you shouldn't be handling heavy machinery right now."

"Johnny, I'm fiinnnneeee," Daniel said pushing himself up. "Just took a teeny nap."

"You fainted," Johnny said, carefully trying to buckle Daniel in.

Daniel reached up and poked his cheek. "Didn't faint. Me? No, never. I'm fine."

Johnny stepped back and shut the door, leaning against the window, "Don't you want to go home with me? We'll spend the day in bed."

Daniel stared at him owlishly, big brown eyes studying Johnny's face. He turned, shifting slightly. "Promise?"

Johnny held out his hand, pinky extended. Daniel stared at it. Then back up at Johnny. Then back down and carefully, slowly reached out his hand, hooking his pinky around Johnny's.

Johnny set the bags he'd bought down on the counter and looked around the apartment. Daniel was still on the couch where he'd left him but he'd woken up. He was wrapped up in all the blankets and pouting.

Johnny set his keys aside and walked over, kneeling down next to him. "What's wrong?" he asked.

"You said we'd get to spend all day in bed."

"Soon."

"Where'd you go?"

"The store."

"For what?"

"I called your mom-"

"What? Why?"

"I wanted to know what you liked when you're sick. I got the food she recommended, and the medicine you like. She said you hate the cherry flavored stuff but like grape, so I tried to find that."

Daniel stared at him. "I'm not sick."

"Your fever begs to differ," Johnny said. "Now do you want to change into pajamas and go to bed or do you want to sit here and watch TV while I heat up soup and rice?"

Daniel frowned looking at the TV. "Fine. TV is fine. But I do want to spend most of the day in bed." His eyes flicked back to Johnny.

"Of course," Johnny said leaning down and kissing the top of his head. "Do you want some tea?"

Daniel sunk deeper into his blankets when Johnny pulled away. "Yes."

Johnny smiled watching the pile of blankets move as Daniel got comfortable, rolling over onto his side so he could better see the TV.

"What kind of tea do you want?"

"Peppermint."

Johnny set the remote to the TV back within Daniel's reach then returned to the kitchen. He filled the kettle up with water and set it on the stove and started putting away his shopping. All the things he'd gotten from Lucille's shopping list. When the kettle whistled he made the peppermint tea and headed over to the couch. Daniel had turned on the TV and was staring at the screen glassy-eyed.

Johnny leaned over to set the tea on the table and then kissed the top of his head again.

Daniel made a small sound. Not much of anything. Without any meaning. Just an acknowledgment.

"Tea's ready."

"Thanks."

"Are you hungry?"

"No."

Johnny started to turn but a tan arm shot out from the pile of blankets and held his hand. He stopped and turned back. The pile was moving, shifting as Daniel slowly moved, pushing himself up. He patted the couch pulling on Johnny.

Johnny sat down and waited while Daniel took a sip of his tea and got comfortable, laying back down, head in Johnny's lap.

"Do you want a pillow? Is that comfortable?"

Daniel nodded, eyes on the TV, watch the day time soap opera he'd settled on. Johnny watched for a moment before letting his gaze fall back down to Daniel.

He looked tired. Which made sense. The apprenticeship had been more work then it should've been. It was in part for credits for school.

Johnny wondered if he'd fucked up. By essentially stealing Daniel away from his job. But he wouldn't have changed what he did. There was no way Daniel should've been working on cars if he could barely stand.

He gently ran his hand through Daniel's hair. They'd talk about it later. About how red the guy who owned the place had been. And how Johnny assumed it wasn't going to go well. But that was a problem for later. It wasn't like Daniel hadn't been working there already for over a year. It wasn't like he hadn't already put his hours in. He should've had enough credits. Or at least Johnny hoped he had.

It wasn’t like Daniel was doing it for the money. They paid him practically in peanuts. And they didn’t need the money anyway.

The shop was doing well and his mom kept sneaking money into his account. Johnny read the notes. Payment for ice cream. He hadn't bought her ice cream. He remembered calling and asking.

And she'd laughed and said, "No, I was thinking about ice cream so you should go get some. My treat."

That happened a lot. She'd think of something, something she wanted to do together but didn't want to bother him about and would just put money in his account for like 50 of them. Johnny had reminded her that ice cream didn't cost that much and she'd laughed and changed the subject.

After a while Daniel pushed himself up, a little unsteady, hand on Johnny's thigh and looked around blearily.

"You want your tea?" Johnny asked.

He nodded.

Johnny passed it to him and Daniel leaned against him, not quite laying down, not quiet sitting up, but most of his weight on Johnny. His blanket fell a bit and Johnny pulled it back up over his shoulders, wrapping his arm around Daniel's waist, keeping him up and pressed close.

"You'll let me know when you're hungry right?" Johnny asked softly.

Daniel nodded sipping at his tea.

"Are you still comfortable here or do you want to go to bed?"

Daniel looked in his tea thoughtfully then up at Johnny. "Bed."

His voice was so crackly. It sounded like it hurt.

Johnny hoped he didn't have strep throat or something like that. He tried to remember what that looked like. He could look later or call Lucille or his own mom. But rest was the key for now.

He nodded, carefully moving Daniel and his blanket, scooping him up in his arms and standing. He walked to the bedroom, pulling back the bedding and setting Daniel in the bed.

Daniel gripped his shirt, fist in the fabric holding him as he started to pull away.

"What can I do for you?" Johnny asked.

"Stay," Daniel said.

He had planned to go turn the TV off and come back but Daniel was holding on so tight. Like he didn't want to be left alone. Where did he think Johnny was going to go?

He wasn't going anywhere.

Not again.

He'd just left for a couple minutes to go get supplies. It hadn't even been an hour. But, it was fine. The TV wasn't too loud.

"Okay," Johnny said lifting the bedding up more and crawling in, carefully over Daniel, he didn't know how to move because Daniel hadn't let go. At this point the only way to move was literally to lay on top of him. Which seemed ridiculous while Daniel was sick. Though maybe he could flip that.

He moved carefully, before rolling them over so that Daniel was laying on him, his head on Johnny's chest.

Daniel shifted slightly, letting go of Johnny's shirt and curling up at his side, with his head on Johnny and a leg over his, his arm wrapped around Johnny's ribs, holding on tight, almost crushingly tight.

Johnny ran his hand over Daniel's arm, down his side, along his back and Daniel sighed, a deep breath out of his open mouth and he shut his eyes. He was warm still, but not hot hot. Which meant his fever was going down a bit. He'd thought he'd read while Daniel slept, but there was no way to move without possibly waking him up. And Johnny didn't want to do that, so he just kept tracing lines and shapes along Daniels back and side.

After a while Johnny shut his eyes, listening to Daniel's soft breathing. How he'd stayed awake so long Johnny didn't know. But it was peaceful in their apartment. Even with the TV on in the distance. It was nice to take a break and just rest. Daniel needed it and maybe Johnny needed it too. He let his hand still, resting on Daniel's hip.

When Johnny woke up he was stiff and a little confused looking around the room wondering what time it was.

Daniel was still asleep, or Johnny thought he was, but it was dark in their room. His grip had loosened from his ribs and moved down to his hip.

Johnny felt Daniel move, peeling himself away from Johnny and pushing himself up, a little unsteadily.

"What time is it?"

"No clue."

"This isn't what I thought you meant."

"Hmm?"

"When you offered for us to spend all day in bed. I didn't expect to sleep all day," Daniel murmured.

"It's good for you."

"I'm sorry, I knew I wasn't feeling great but-"

"Don't apologize for being sick," Johnny said, pushing himself up. "Are you hungry?"

"A little, but-"

Daniel's hand found his shirt again, holding on to it tightly.

"You okay?"

"I woke up and you weren't here."

"You mean when I was at the store?"

"Yeah," Daniel said. "I didn't realize that. I hadn't realized I'd fallen asleep on the couch. I guess everything was mixed up, but I just woke up on the couch and that was weird because I don't sleep on the couch by myself, and you weren't home. I usually can hear you somewhere you know? Well not always, sometimes you're really quiet reading a book somewhere. But I'd had this really bad fever dream, and I kept looking for you in that dream and you'd run away, like you used to sometimes? Like in Okinawa where I turned around and you were just gone. We'd been shopping and having a good day and you just disappeared. Same in New York. And I was convinced that this time you actually left left. Did that thing you talked about. Took the Avanti and just headed out somewhere else far away. I thought I'd called out your name, but you didn't respond so I thought maybe the dream was real."

Johnny pulled Daniel into his lap, hugging him close.

"Daniel," Johnny whispered, head on top of his. "I'm sorry. I told you I was leaving, and you told me to bring you back hostess pudding pies. I was gone less than a half hour. I went to the place down the block with a shopping list from your mom because we hadn't really stocked our medicine cabinet right."

"What do you mean?"

"Well if you've got a cut, a broken bone, a gash, a wound or a headache we're good. Get your hand stuck in a jar or something? We've got so much lube. But we didn't have anything your Mom said you like when you're sick. No cough syrup or stuff to help you breathe or heck we didn't have a thermometer that wasn't for candy or a turkey. I'd also planned to go to the store tonight, because we were out of bread, and like simple foodstuff. It's why I made like rice and soup, because we had the stuff for that. But not like toast."

"You got all that in less than an hour and walked it back?"

"You were singing when I left. But like in Italian. You almost never speak Italian. I didn't even know you knew it enough to know a whole song. I didn't want to leave you alone for long. But I wanted to get stuff so we could hunker down until you felt better. And I sure as hell wasn't going to drive to the store and leave you in the car."

Daniel's fist in his shirt hadn't lessened. It still held on tight. The dream must've done a number on him.

Johnny kissed the top of his head. Well, this was fine. Simple solution really.

He wrapped Daniel up in the blanket from the couch, the soft one and scooted towards the edge of the bed, lifting Daniel and taking him with him, out of the bedroom and out towards their living room/ kitchen. It was early in the evening. A sitcom was playing on the TV. Daniel wrapped his arms around Johnny's shoulders. Resting his head against Johnny's shoulder.

"Where'd you like to sit? Kitchen chair? Couch? I'm going to reheat the soup and rice I made for lunch that we didn't eat. I'm not going any further than that."

"Kitchen," Daniel said.

"Your normal chair okay?"

"Yeah."

Johnny pulled the chair out with his foot and then carefully set Daniel down in it.

"Do you want another tea? I don't think you finished the other. Or some water? I also got orange juice. Your mom said you like the pulp when you're sick?"

"Yeah. Uh, tea," Daniel said.

Johnny nodded refilling the kettle and turning on the stove as he got the soup and rice he'd made earlier. "Do you want some fish? We've got some still that's been sitting in the fridge. I already defrosted it."

"Okay."

It was weird, Johnny looked over. He expected Daniel to be half asleep at the table but despite the still sick look on his face, the tiredness and the glassiness his focus was intense and it was on Johnny. Tracking him across the kitchen.

He gathered the ingredients he'd set aside earlier with dinner in mind and went to work, rolling up his sleeves. The kettle whistled and he quickly took it off the heat, pouring hot water into a mug.

"Ginger? Peppermint? Chamomile? Sleepytime?" Johnny asked opening the cabinet.

"Peppermint."

Johnny nodded pulling the box out and setting about making the cup for Daniel. He set it down in front of him and Daniel reached out, holding his hand. Tight.

Johnny looked at the stove. The fish would be fine for a few minutes. He pulled out the chair next to Daniel and sat down taking Daniel's hand in his, loosening the grip and holding the one hand in both, gently massaging it with his thumbs.

"How's it going?" Johnny asked softly. "What's hurting?"

"Just tired."

Johnny nodded. "How's your throat?"

"Warm."

Johnny nodded. "I'll put batteries in the thermometer in a bit. I want to know if you've still got a fever. And then at some point I want to take a look at the back of your throat."

Daniel wrinkled his nose and gave him a look.

"Hey, your mom told me you got strep really bad as a kid. I want to make sure you didn't get that again."

"Doesn't feel like it."

"It could just be a bad cold or something," Johnny agreed. "But I want to be careful."

Daniel nodded, picking up his tea and taking a sip.

"I feel a bit better."

"Good, I'm glad. Let's eat then huh? I'm going to go get the fish, they should be done soon," Johnny said gently squeezing Daniel's hand letting go. He filled a bowl up with rice then paused looking at the fish.

"Do you want fish on your rice or separate?" he asked.

Usually Daniel liked the fish on top of his rice, eating it together so the sauce would mix, so he could eat spoonful's of rice and fish. But if he was sick maybe he'd rather have the rice by itself.

"Together," Daniel said.

Johnny nodded, carefully filling up the bowl of soup and carrying both over to Daniel, getting him chopsticks and a spoon. He then put his together and sat down next to him. He normally sat across from Daniel but here he could do what Daniel did when they went out to eat at tiny tables. He could hook his leg around Daniel's.

Daniel was holding his spoon over his fish and rice and Johnny watched a smile spread across his face. Felt Daniel’s other leg press against Johnny's.

They ate quietly for a moment, then Johnny remembered that Daniel probably shouldn't be the one talking with a sore throat, he should. So he told Daniel about calling Mr. Miyagi and how Mr. Miyagi and Sato brought the Ford over from the mechanics. He talked about the call he'd had with Dutch. He talked about the shop. He talked about all these little things, pieces of conversation he'd been storing up while Daniel had been wearing himself thin for that awful apprenticeship.

Daniel listened, watching him talk, eyes on his lips as he spoke.

It was slower to eat and talk, but there was no rush. Nowhere for either of them to be. And it was nice. Even if Daniel was sick, to just be. It'd been a while. When Daniel stopped eating Johnny gently took his hand.

"What can I get you now? What would you like? Anything you want to do?"

"I-" Daniel pulled his hand out of Johnny's covering his mouth as he sneezed.

Johnny passed him one of the boxes of tissues he'd bought earlier.

"Thanks," Daniel said after a while. "I bought you something,"

"Huh?"

"I was saving it for you birthday, but I think it's also a gift for me. So could you open it now?"

"Where is it?"

"Back of the hallway closet."

Johnny nodded.

He was a bit confused. His birthday was months off. But he opened the closet and flicked on the light looking in, wondering what Daniel got him that was also a gift for himself that sick him would want. That last part, sick him wanted it, knocked a lot of things off his assumed list.

It couldn't be dirty then. Or sex related.

Maybe a big sweater? Though that seemed silly.

He saw something odd. He reached in grabbing the black case and pulled it out.

"This it?" Johnny asked holding it up.

Daniel nodded.

Johnny turned off the closet light and shut the door walking back over to Daniel and setting it down on the table and taking his seat.

Daniel stared at it, then at Johnny.

"Open it."

Johnny did, flicking the latches. He looked down at the guitar then at Daniel. He picked it up carefully.

"I-"

Daniel pulled the blanket tightly around his shoulders and leaned towards Johnny, putting his hand on his knee. His face was serious.

"Anything that got destroyed. All of it. I'm going to get it for you. Even if you don't want it any more. Just in case. So that you can, try again if you want, so that journey doesn't end abruptly."

Johnny looked back down at the guitar. Everything that got destroyed. There were too many of those half gifts. A gift he'd asked for only for it to get taken away.

He felt his vision blur.

It'd always been made to seem like it was his fault. That these things had been left somewhere they shouldn't have been, that it was always an accident. Even though Johnny never had left anything out, always cleaned up after himself, always put everything away. Because even when he'd been little and believed that it was his home too he wanted to be neat and orderly so Sid would like him. So he'd be seen as good.

He'd believed it the first couple of times. That it'd been an accident. Then he learned that it wasn't. That it never had been.

He moved the guitar carefully in his hands, running his fingers over the strings. He listened carefully, making adjustments, tuning the guitar. It was one of those things he'd put in a box in the attic of his mind and gave up on. Just like about everything else. He hadn't expected to pick it up again. For Daniel to see the hints and hand it back to him.

That promise, it was overwhelming.

He knew Daniel meant it. Knew that that warm hand on his knee was waiting. Curious.

Johnny played. The calluses he'd built up when he used to play weren't quite the way they should've been, the strings stung a little, but he remembered all the notes to the songs he'd learned, he remembered how to play them. The way he'd been supposed to for his recital, but Sid had had an event, didn't want to go, didn't want his mom to go. And he was adamant that Johnny couldn't borrow someone else. Said he'd already called and canceled it.

Johnny was used to it at that point.

He played until his fingers hurt, which wasn't long. They weren't used to it any more. He looked up at Daniel and saw his eyes shinny, tears running down his cheeks.

Johnny quickly put the guitar back in it's case cupping the sides of Daniel's face.

"Hey, hey what's wrong?"

"You're good."

"I'm sure I'm very rusty, but thank you," Johnny said brushing away tears with his thumbs and kissing Daniel's forehead. "I'll play it or the sanshin whenever you want."

Daniel wrapped his arms around Johnny burying his head against his shoulder and Johnny smiled softly hugging him back, rubbing his back and holding him close.

After a while Johnny pulled away and Daniel quickly reached for the tissues again, blowing his nose.

"Mind if we check your temperature?"

Daniel groaned but nodded.

Johnny opened up the box, put some batteries in and then handed the ear thermometer to Daniel.

Daniel sighed, moving to lean against the table.

Johnny cleaned up, putting food away, refilling Daniel's tea and getting the phone. He'd promised Lucille he'd call and give her and update. There was a slight beep and Daniel looked down at the screen then flipped it to Johnny.

100°F

He still had a fever.

Well he hadn't taken any medicine yet.

He punched the numbers to Lucille’s in.

"Hello?"

"Hi Lucille," Johnny started.

Daniel stiffened. Pulling the blanket closer to himself.

"Hey how's Daniel doing?"

"We just checked his temperature, it's 100. We slept most of the afternoon, we've had dinner. It was fish, rice and miso soup. We've had tea. I haven't looked at his throat yet, but he hasn't said it hurt. He hasn't been coughing."

"Hmm you should give him something for his fever then."

"Do you want to talk to him?"

"Yes. Thank you Johnny."

Johnny looked at Daniel and held out the phone. "It's your mom."

"Hi Ma."

Johnny set about opening the medicine for the fever and getting a glass of water, listening to Daniel talk to his mom. Daniel got up carefully, pulling his blanket around himself and Johnny stopped, watching him to see where he was going to make sure he didn't fall over or trip over the blanket.

He was headed off towards the couch.

Johnny followed with the medicine as Daniel curled up on the couch picking up the remote and flipping through the channels before settling on something. He glanced up and took the medicine from Johnny and the water, taking it, still talking to his mom.

Johnny sat down next to him and Daniel moved, leaning against him.

"Thanks Ma, we'll call tomorrow," Daniel said. "Mmhmm, yup, love you too. Bye."

He held up the phone towards Johnny. Johnny heard Lucille say, "Bye Johnny."

"Bye Lucille," Johnny said taking up the phone and hanging it up, setting it aside and wrapping his arms around Daniel. "What else can I do for you?"

"Just stay right there," Daniel said leaning against him, patting his thigh and watching the TV.

They watched a couple TV shows until Daniel started yawning again. "Back to bed?" Johnny asked.

"I want to change, brush my teeth," Daniel said.

"Okay," Johnny said leaning forward to hook an arm under Daniel's legs.

Daniel swatted him.

"Let me walk will you?"

"Okay," Johnny said leaning back.

Daniel patted him, gathering up his blanket around him. He stood and waited.

Johnny picked up the phone, prepared to put it back on the holder, walking with Daniel back to the bedroom, turning off the TV and straightening up, just a little, on the way.

He headed towards the bed as Daniel got his clothes. He debated whether he should change the bedding now or later. After Daniel's fever fully went away?

He wondered if he should go in with Daniel.

He worried about the tile.

He felt eyes on him and turned.

"Are you going to shower tonight?"

"I didn't do much today so I think I'll wait," Johnny said with a shrug.

Daniel nodded setting his blanket back on the bed and heading off to the bathroom.

Johnny turned, getting everything he could think of set up on the beside tables. His library books that he'd been reading were sitting there next to the lamp, one of the tissue boxes, the thermometer, medicine, water.

He heard the click of the door and watched as Daniel made his way back to the bed crawling in and under the covers, sitting up and watching him. Johnny headed to the bathroom, he got ready quickly, worrying about leaving Daniel alone too long.

He hoped Daniel had fallen asleep again. He needed more rest. But when he opened the door again Daniel's gaze was on him. Like he'd been waiting.

"You need anything?" Johnny asked motioning to the bedside table of stuff. "Or tea? I can get one of those art books if you aren't tired yet and just want to look at something. Or some magazines."

He was used to Daniel watching him, having his eyes on him. But it was different. Like he was still worried about that dream. Like he was scared to blink and Johnny would just disappear.

"I like looking at you. You're my favorite piece of art to look at," Daniel patted the bed.

Johnny blushed and got in on his side of the bed. He moved in close wrapping his arms around Daniel.

"Your sick and still flirting?"

"Always gonna flirt with you."

He was quiet, sincere. The tone hadn't been implicitly flirty either. Johnny pressed a kiss to the side of Daniel's head. Daniel took one of Johnny's hands in his.

"Is this about the nightmare still?" Johnny asked softly.

“I read this book," Daniel said softly. "About people who disappeared. And I always thought, how could that happen? Like the pilot?"

"Amelia Earhart?" Johnny asked, not quite following, but Daniel was sick. So he’d be lucky if he could. He was just glad Daniel wasn’t stuck in Italian.

"Yeah. I mean it was bad enough when people died. But to not know because they disappeared ? And then I met you and you'd like planned out your own disappearance. And you could do it so easily. You'd be by my side one moment and then gone the next. In this apartment it's been even from my arms. I think if I hold onto you tight enough you won't go anywhere. But sometimes you still do. It's usually fine. But I worry, and sometimes I panic...and in my dream Silver was here."

"Here?" Johnny asked waving around the room. "In our apartment?"

"Yeah," Daniel said hugging Johnny's arm. "He talked to you, and I couldn't find where in the apartment the two of you were but when I found him you'd left. He'd talked you into leaving. And it was just awful. It was safer if you weren't here. And...and I knew that was right, but I didn't want you to leave. And I didn't want to be alone. I woke up and you weren't there and it reminded me of the nights where you aren't there when I wake up. Like here. You're not still here with me. Instead you're out there. And I go and find you. I mean, it's silly right?

"To wake up and panic because you're not there but the light is coming in through the bottom of the door and you're on the other side making fried baloney or you're sleeping on the couch. And it's...unfounded...but I worry, did I do something wrong? I worry, before I realize you're on the other side of the door, that you've gone through with your plans to run away, or that you've gotten tired of me, or that you're hurt or something bad happened. And then when I find you I'm relieved but then I worry that you're upset with me. What was wrong with sleeping beside me? What woke you up?

"When I was at that conference last year I kept thinking about you. Not just because I missed you but...like a baby, if once you were out of my sight you'd disappear. Either taken away or you'd just leave without a word. I worried I'd call too often and it'd annoy you. I wanted to call you every morning and at work and at night. I missed you. No. I miss you. I...don't like being so far from you. I hate that that shop in Tarzana is so far. I hate the distance. I want to see you at school. I want to see you more than I do. I hate how rarely it feels like we have time. I hate how tired I am all the time. I just want to spend time with you. I...don't want to be abandoned again."

Johnny moved looking to see Daniel's face, his glassy eyes.

"I'm not going anywhere," Johnny said.

"I know that. I just...I worry that I'll wake up and everything will be gone."

Johnny studied him for a moment, wracking his brain trying to remember when everything was gone.

"After we got back from Okinawa?" he asked brushing a tear off of Daniel's cheek.

Daniel sniffed and nodded, moving to hug Johnny and to press his face against Johnny's shoulder. "We spent that whole trip worrying that Mr. Miyagi wouldn't make it, wouldn't come home with us. And I was so relieved when we all got on that plane safe and sound. And then...it was like when I looked away from Ma she disappeared. I don't want to look away from you and turn around and you're gone. I mean I always find you but I'm worried about the time I won't."

Johnny wrapped his arms around Daniel holding him close, rubbing his back, thinking.

"I know you're your own person and can go do stuff," Daniel said.

Johnny could feel his fingers digging into Johnny's shirt, gripping it tightly.

"Daniel. I think when you feel better you should talk to your mom about the way she left. I'm sure it was chaos, but I think you'll feel better if you talk to her. Silver's in jail and he wouldn't be able to talk me into or out of anything. This apartment is specifically a no-Silver zone. Security knows to keep an eye out for him, Kreese, and Barnes and hell, my mom made me give them Sid's info too. They're all in jail.

“But I get the fear. You know I didn't use to sleep much right? I sleep best with you next to me, hugging me. But sometimes I still have nightmares. Not much. It’s gotten better here. Or I just wake up and feel like I need to move. I don't want to wake you up. You're so busy with work that I didn't want to disturb you. I didn't realize it was stressing you out by letting you wake up alone.

“Do you want me to wake you up? Just be like, I'm going to go move around a bit and try to sleep on the couch ? Want me to like stick the whale shark in your arms if I've gotten up to sleep in the living room or to get a snack or to the bathroom or something? Like I'll only do that if I'm somewhere else in the apartment? Let's figure something out. I don't want you waking up in a panic. I just haven't wanted to bother you. But...would it be okay for me to come visit you on campus? I know you were looking forward to being someone new there, but would that be okay? We could get lunch together or we could carpool."

Daniel sniffed and nodded. His head felt warm against Johnny's shoulder.

"I thought we were doing a good job communicating but I think we made assumptions again," Johnny said with a soft sigh.

He shifted and Daniel pulled away rubbing his eyes. Johnny handed him the tissue box.

"I want you to bother me," Daniel said taking the box, turning and curling up against him. "Bother me all the time."

He was so used to being alone. To relying on himself. Of making sure he wasn't in the way or bothering anyone. There was a lot of things ingrained, a lot of things he was working on and that one he hadn't even noticed. He was still acting like he was going it alone. He wasn't. Daniel was there. He had someone who wanted him around. A lot. He hadn't wanted to be overbearing or clingy. He hadn't wanted to scare Daniel off.

He'd spent most of his life going places and having no one to tell. He hadn't wanted to bother his mom, and then Sid didn't want to know, didn't care, didn't want to know anything about him. He diddn't get phone calls because he'd had no friends, and then because Sid didn't like hearing the phone ringing for anyone but himself.

Johnny gently brushed hair from Daniel's forehead. "You know, when we went to the mountains with the guys?"

"Yeah?" Daniel sniffed.

"And how the guys called home and you called your ma?"

Daniel smiled softly. "Yeah."

"If we did that now, the family I'd call would be you."

"I wanna kiss you."

"Your nose is running."

"Gross," Daniel complained taking another tissue. "Why is being sick so gross?"

Johnny kissed the top of his head. "Comes with the territory."

"When you were sick," Daniel began, looking and squinting at the trash can and throwing his tissue towards it, missing and letting out a groan.

"It's fine."

"At this rate I'm going to get you sick."

"Probably. But with luck it won't be until you get better, and then I'll have the hottest nurse to heal me."

"I had a point."

"Take your time finding it."

Daniel huffed then sneezed and sighed leaning his head back against Johnny, looking up at him. "When you were sick, you'd look for me a lot. Why? Was it the same thing? We're you scared I'd disappear?"

"Oh, uh I wasn't getting much sleep. And I wasn't sure if you were really there or if I was dreaming."

"You're red! Why are you red?"

"I dreamt about you a lot."

"Dirty dreams?"

"...."

"They were! How long were you having dirty dreams about me? What did we do in these dreams? How long did you have them? Oh my god is that why you wouldn't leave me alone when I moved to LA? Was Ali just an excuse?"

Daniel looked so excited, the glassy teary-eyed look was gone and he looked so focused.

Johnny looked away. It was embarrassing. He could remember that first one. It's stunned him, haunted him.

"I was in my room at the mansion listening to music, and you came in and you sat on my bed. We weren't really friends yet, you'd just been by the mansion a couple of times. I thought you wanted to fight, you were mad or something, but you pinned me down and kissed me."

"I can do that more if you liked it," Daniel said. "Or I can get stuff. Ali told me there's this shop downtown that sells stuff."

"Stuff?" Johnny repeated with a frown.

"Sex stuff."

"We have sex stuff."

Johnny was pretty sure they had more lube and condoms then any active couple needed.

"Toys, I bet they'd have handcuffs. I could get the soft kind so it wouldn't hurt your wrists."

"Wait a second-"

"What other dreams about me did you have? What else did I do after that?"

"I woke myself up."

Daniel pouted.

"That's no fun. Next time you run into dream me stick around, don't run away from me and report back what we do."

"The point was that because I was sick I was checking that you were you and not the dream version," Johnny sighed leaning his head back against the bed frame.

"I had one," Daniel said. "Actually quite a few."

"Huh?"

"Dreams."

Daniel closed his eyes. "Mmm lets see. I had one when I was training for the All-Valley, remember when you pinned me up against the lockers at school?"

"Yeah, sorry about that."

"Well you did that spin kick afterwards and were all huffy. I followed you in my dream and said that you were wrong, you liked me and you were scared of it and I managed to pin you against the lockers and I was right. But I tried to forget that one because I was still dating Ali."

"I'm noticing a trend."

"Hmm?" Daniel opened an eye looking up at him, sinking down and resting his head on Johnny's thigh. "Oh, you wanting me to pin you down and me wanting to pin you down? That's why you might like the handcuffs. Or maybe a nice tie? Oh or a hachimaki. Could tie your wrists together gently and then see where it goes from there. Well. Sex. It'd go to sex. Want to make sure that's clear."

"Aren't you tired?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah."

"Then go to sleep, I'm not going anywhere, just...sleep."

"Not even a little sex?"

"You're sick. You'd probably faint."

Daniel frowned, patting Johnny's thigh. "What if I just touch you ? "

"No, you need to sleep and get better soon. You've still got a fever."

"I was so excited when you said we could spend all day in bed."

"What did you think we were going to do?"

"Lots of sex."

"You could barely stand."

"Well I mean I didn't realize I was sick sick. I thought maybe I just hadn't gotten enough sleep. I figured a blow job was doable, or you could ride me. That's what got me home."

"That's what got you home. Not me carrying you or driving you home."

Daniel patted his thigh again. "Mmm yup. Your very strong, very tough, very good."

Johnny frowned poking Daniel's cheek. "Go to sleep."

"Will you ride me later? I like watching you enjoying yourself. Going bounce bounce bounce."

Daniel peaked an eye open looking up at Johnny with a grin. "So red. Pretty. Okay, that's also a good image. I'll see you in my dreams. Good night Johnny," Daniel said kissing Johnny's thigh and shutting his eyes again.

Johnny leaned his head against the headboard again, breathing carefully. Deep calming breaths.

Daniel stirred again after a few minutes.

"Can't sleep?" Johnny asked.

"Will you read to me?" Daniel asked.

"Any requests?"

"No," Daniel said.

Johnny grabbed one of the books off the beside stand. One he hadn't started yet and flipped to the first page.

" In a distant and second-hand set of dimensions, in an astral plane that was never meant to fly, the curling star-mists waver and part..."

Johnny woke up to light coming through the windows and looked at his watch. Morning. Daniel was pressed in close, warm breath steadily breathed out against his neck. He reached over with the back of his hand and felt Daniel's forehead.

He wasn't hot any more. No longer burning up.

Somewhere along the way he assumed he needed to give Daniel enough space to grow and flourish. To put down sturdy roots. He hadn't thought about the way Daniel always called home, called him , while he was out. If he was at a bar or something he called to check in on Johnny and spent, arguably too long on the phone talking to him and not enjoying his evening. Like even though they lived together, even though they saw a normal amount of each other Daniel missed him.

He knew that, on some level that Daniel missed him. Johnny missed Daniel. It'd been hard when Daniel had decided to leave the shop. How he'd look up when the door chimes rattled hoping it was Daniel, inevitably disappointed every time. Straining without meaning to to hear his footsteps. Looking off towards the counter and the phone, expecting Daniel to be there like he had been at the start. The way he'd forgotten for several months straight that without Daniel he needed to answer the phone. That it was now his job to do that. That Daniel wasn't there to talk to customers for him and Mr. Miyagi.

It was exhausting.

But he'd told himself it was okay because Daniel was going to be happy and would finally get to be his own person without him.

Without them leaning on one another. That was normal. Healthy.

But he'd forgotten something so simple. They were best friends. Not just lovers. Not just friends. They were, their own family. And it made sense that they missed each other. Johnny was so used to not talking to people. Not telling them where he was going, what he was up to.

The guys, they'd been pissed when he missed calls. They'd hammered that in to him. Those calls while he was in Okinawa. And he now made sure he never missed a call. That he listened to their updates, tried to organize his own, no matter how mundane because they were family.

He hadn't realized that Daniel needed that too. Wanted him by his side as much as possible. They were still learning. They were still healing. But rather than needing the space, something they both assumed the other needed, they needed touch. He'd stupidly been touch starving himself without meaning to. And it'd effected Daniel. Culminating in awful fever dreams.

Johnny had been learning how to speak up again.

He'd been taught that his opinion didn't matter. To just listen and smile and nod. To not question anything because everyone else knew better and if he was upset he just buried it. And Daniel always tugged at him, trying to get his opinion, to speak up. And it was getting better. He complained, he talked, he just had assumed some things were too selfish.

Like this. Like wanting to just lay in bed with Daniel. Because he worried about Mr. Miyagi and the shop. Because he worried about Daniel and his responsibilities. But Daniel didn't get sick often. Not like this and his worry trumped everything else. And it was shocking how easily everything fell into place.

How help rose up for Mr. Miyagi. How easy it was to just to ask for help and receive it. He'd almost cried when Mr. Miyagi had said it was fine that he had help he could use to keep the shop going. That if Johnny needed help to just call. That he'd gotten so many calls as news spread that Daniel was sick that he hadn't left when he'd planned to. It wasn't just that they were worried about Daniel. But that they wanted to help. To help him and Daniel.

It was stunning. The realization that he wasn't alone. That he hadn't noticed. He thought he had to handle everything on his own, and it was just a cold. He was pretty sure it was just a bad cold. But he had everyone's notes. Tricks and tips. Recipes he could use that would be good. He'd called and talked to Lucille for an hour. Then it seemed Mr. Miyagi had talked to others. And they began to call. His own mom. The guys. Yukie and Mr. Miyagi. Hell Chozen had offered to bring dinner, something he ate whenever he was sick.

It was just a cold. Something he could've handled on his own. But, he didn't have to. And even if it was just the two of them in their apartment. He realized it wasn't just them. He'd listened to messages on the machine while cooking. Abuela had called and left a message. Her recommendations. What had worked with her kids. Her grandkids. She'd spoken slowly in Spanish, slow enough that Johnny had understood, taking notes.

His mother had told him, "It's not just me and you. And it might take you a while to realize it fully. To see the whole implications of it. But believe me, I've seen it and it's awe-inspiring. I think you won't fully see it until you get married, when I make you invite all these people and see when they show up to celebrate you and your happiness, but you'll see it someday."

And he wasn't married and he might not ever get to...he pushed that feeling down. The point was, he thought he got it. He wasn't alone. He had Daniel, he had his friends, he had his family. Because that's what they were. Maybe not related by blood, but by bonds. Because they showed up when they could. It wasn't just him showing up when they needed him. It was what they'd been trying to tell him all along. What Daniel had quietly been whispering to him all along. That he didn't have to be alone.

He didn't have to pretend things were okay when they weren't. That it wasn't just big things. It wasn't just when bad things happened that they banded together. That it was small things too. Dumb things. Good things. And maybe he'd known on some level but had been too scared to test it and see that it was a mirage. Something he dreamed about but it actually was solid. Solid enough for him to lean against if he needed to.

Maybe, Johnny thought looking at Daniel, mouth open and sleeping still, hair messy, but holding on tightly, he hadn't realized it either. That it wasn't just him. That no one was going anywhere. Well. Not quite. That they went where they were going but they were only a phone call away. All of them.

Daniel had been through a lot too. He was used to things just disappearing out of his grasp, things not being in his control. He wanted stability, that grounding and support just as much as Johnny. He'd made a bad assumption. That Daniel wanted to be alone, to have time alone, and he'd pulled away, not wanting to suffocate him, not wanting to be too much, not wanting to overwhelm or possibly scare Daniel off. And instead he'd just made it worse.

Talk. They'd have to talk about it. He'd have to ask.

Daniel eyes squinted open and Johnny ruffled his hair.

"Good morning. How are you feeling?"

"Ugh."

"Yeah? Mind checking your temperature for me?"

Daniel pouted but held out his hand.

Johnny reached over and got the thermometer and handed it to him. Daniel stared at the screen after a while and handed it to Johnny letting his head sink back onto Johnny's chest.

98.5°F

Back to normal.

"Fever's gone."

"Mmm," Daniel murmured, hugging Johnny.

Johnny wanted to get out of bed. He needed to move. He'd been inside most of the day before, had slept most of the afternoon and evening. Had slept through the night. He hadn't thought too much sleep was a thing. But he needed to stretch or something. Kata?

Even if he caught what Daniel had later, right now he needed movement. Maybe he could pick Daniel up and just walk around the apartment? Daniel probably wouldn't like that and would get bored before Johnny did.

Right. Ask.

"Hey Daniel?" Johnny said.

"Mmm?"

"I gotta move. Somehow. I can carry you around the apartment if you want."

Daniel let out a laugh, pushing himself up and looking at Johnny. "If you carry me around everywhere how will I know that I'm feeling well enough to move?"

"You'll test it eventually," Johnny said, sitting up.

He felt stiff. He rolled his shoulders.

"So, am I carrying you around?"

"No. You go do what you're going to do. I'm going that way," Daniel said pointing towards the bathroom.

Johnny nodded. He waited until Daniel had taken a few steps and seemed steady before getting ready for the day. He started the coffee pot for himself and the kettle on the stove for Daniel. He set out mugs and then picked a spot in the living room he liked and worked through his usual work routine.

Part of it was left over from Cobra Kai. Part of it he'd adjusted from living at Mr. Miyagi's to fit into their apartment or while he had the time. Sometimes when there weren't customers he worked out at the shop, other times it was before work or after dinner.

"Damn," Daniel said voice gravely from his cold.

Johnny glanced over at him pausing in his set. Daniel had flopped down on the couch and was watching him.

"Are you hungry? What do you want for breakfast? Toast? Oatmeal? Okayu?"

"You know how to make Okayu?" Daniel asked.

"Yukie gave me the instructions yesterday," Johnny said moving onto the next set.

Daniel was quiet, processing the information.

"You called Yukie for me?" Daniel asked softly.

"She called me for you," Johnny clarified.

Johnny heard a rustle of paper. All his notes that he'd set over there to go through. From everyone who'd called. Things from Lucille, the stuff Daniel liked, the stuff he didn't. His own moms reminders, stuff from the guys, from Abuela, recipes and recommended things to try. The offer from Chozen.

Johnny glanced over. He heard a sniff. He stood up and walked over. Leaning over the back of the couch.

"I had to fight to be the one to take care of you," Johnny said.

Daniel looked up at him, eyes glassy with unshed tears.

"It's just a cold."

"Yeah," Johnny said. "I know."

The kettle whistled and Johnny kissed the top of Daniel's head before going to make his tea and his own coffee. He returned passing Daniel his tea.

"Did you really?" Daniel asked.

"Hmm?" Johnny asked taking a sip of his coffee as Daniel kicked his legs onto Johnny's lap.

"Fight to to take care of me?"

"Yeah, your mom offered to come over. Then my mom offered to come over. Yukie also offered. I wanted to do it," Johnny said, then frowned into his coffee turning to Daniel. "was that okay?"

Daniel's face was a little pink and he nodded.

"I realized, when everyone called, sort of belatedly, like after they'd called and after you fell asleep, maybe something obvious. And," He looked at the bonsai sitting on the shelf. "I don't know maybe it's weird, like maybe it's like stupidly obvious."

"Johnny."

"Right, but I realized, I'm not alone. You're not alone. We're not alone," Johnny said turning to him.

"You ever do a trust fall?" Daniel asked.

"Huh?"

"In like school or like camp or something?"

"I did, at camp."

"With Judy?" Johnny asked amused.

"Yes, same camp," Daniel said. "We were supposed to catch one another right? And like we were young so the importance of it didn't settle in right? So like everyone thought it was funny to just not catch the other person. Our councilors got frustrated and we ended up moving on. But I think, for me anyway, I kind of didn't trust that anyone was there you know?" He coughed and Johnny took his tea until it subsided.

"Yeah," Johnny said. "I never trusted anyone would catch me after a while."

"I will though," Daniel said grabbing his hand.

Johnny smiled rubbing his thumb over Daniel's knuckles.

"I know. You catch me an embarrassing amount."

"That's because I'm too hot and you get distracted too easily by my hotness," Daniel said with a grin before coughing.

"That is exactly it. How dare you be so hot," Johnny said with a laugh. "You know, though, I've got you too. I just. I'm sorry for disappearing on you in the past. I didn't want to, suffocate you, like a vine or something."

"I will tell you if it becomes too much, promise. I will speak up. But you haven't even gotten close. But you'll tell me if I'm...too...clingy?"

Johnny smiled softly, leaning forward and kissing the top of Daniel's head.

"I'm gonna fight whoever made you think that was even possible."

Daniel looked at him surprised.

"Hey, I thought we agreed no fighting."

"Did we?" Johnny asked innocently.

"We did! You're banned from fighting!"

"Me? What did I do? Why is it mostly me?"

"Because people pick fights with you for no reason."

"They pick fights with you for no reason too!"

"No, not no reason. Dumb reasons! People pick fights with you over nothing but posturing."

"Isn't it the same thing?"

"No! The people who start fights with me try to utterly destroy me. The people who fight you are just dicks. There's a subtle difference."

"You know a lot of dicks?" Johnny asked.

Daniel had been preparing a spiel, that animated spark in his eyes as he was about to lecture on the subtle difference in their fights and enemies and Johnny watched with a grin as it deflated immediately like a punctured balloon.

"Intimately?" Daniel asked, tone innocent, tapping his finger against his mug.

Like this was a serious question, a serious swerve in the conversation.

"Yeah."

"Two."

"Two?"

"I mean I'd say I know mine pretty well and yours at this point. Wouldn't you agree?"

Johnny should've known it was a trap. That as soon as Daniel had got enough sleep, as soon as his fever had abated he couldn't win. That that smile made his brain think of things, things Daniel did with his mouth, with his tongue, and those fingers. Johnny looked away feeling his skin burn.

"You're thinking about it aren't you?" Daniel asked with a soft laugh.

"Just tell me what you want for breakfast huh?" Johnny said.

"I supposed," Daniel said thoughtfully. "I may have been all work and no play for a little too long." He pulled Johnny's hand up to his lips.

"I'll play with you soon, promise."

"Breakfast," Johnny repeated.

"Fine, you're right, food first. Oatmeal."

"Brown sugar?"

"Yes please."

Johnny carefully removed Daniel's legs from his lap and got up making instant oatmeal and getting out brown sugar.

"Do you want anything else?" Johnny called, turning and blinking because Daniel had moved to the kitchen table. "Sorry, didn't realize you'd moved. Wouldn't you be more comfortable on the couch?"

"But the view is better here," Daniel said with a grin looking at him over his tea.

"Is it?" Johnny asked looking around.

Oh.

Him?

He blinked looking back at Daniel who grinned and winked at him.

"Your sick and your still flirting."

"Can't stop, won't stop. It's my favorite pastime."

" Favorite huh?"

"Wait, no, top ten for sure."

Johnny laughed softly setting the oatmeal down and the brown sugar in front of Daniel. "We've got juice, you want your pulpy orange juice?"

"Yes please," Daniel said softly.

Johnny poured it setting it in front of him, sitting down with his own bowl of oatmeal and his coffee.

"You must be feeling a bit better."

"Yeah, a bit."

Johnny took a bite of his oatmeal and then frowned. "So we gotta talk about something."

"Uh oh. What'd I say?"

"Huh? No. I need you to know what happened yesterday."

"What'd I do?"

"Why do you think-no, your boss sucks. And I pretty much just walked in and carried you out and you might've...I tried to argue with him, but he might fire you. Which is complete bullshit, you shouldn't have had to work in the first place while you were sick. He should've taken one look at you and sent you home. But uh, yeah." Johnny had been angrily gesturing at the air with his spoon and then sunk it back into the bowl of oatmeal. "Sorry. I think I made things bad, but I couldn't think of an alternative. Your health is priority."

"Shit," Daniel said leaning back in his chair.

Johnny swallowed hard. "I-you've worked there, as an apprentice, for like nearly 2 years now? Don't you...don't you know everything you need to know? Everything you could learn there?"

Daniel sighed, running his hand through his hair, pushing it back from his face. "Yeah, but you gotta like work your way up."

"Do you?" Johnny asked carefully.

This was a conversation he'd been wanting to have but hadn't know the right way to go about it. Watching Daniel stress out over work had been unpleasant. The way it weighed heavy on him, exhausted him when he got home.

"Johnny," Daniel said softly, tiredly.

"You're learning business at school right? You're going to graduate. But like what do you want to do? Actually? How can that bastard help you get there?"

Daniel studied Johnny's face for a while.

"I like cars," Daniel started.

Johnny nodded, eating his oatmeal.

"The car Ma drove out here, man it sucked. It was falling a part, we had to push and run and jump in to get it started and it was embarrassing. And then Mr. Miyagi had all these nice cars right? He gave me my dream car. Just gave it to me. And it was weird, having this nice well loved car and to drive it but Ma's been driving this awful car she had to push and jump into. And I think, I want people to be able to get the car of their dreams or like a nice working car. You know? I want a place that does repairs but also sells cars, and I want to figure out how to do it so it's affordable. Because it's not like we can get around on public transit. The system here is a joke. Nothing like New York."

"So why do you need to apprentice still?"

"Well traditionally-"

"Are you learning anything from him anymore? Is it for the credits still?" Johnny asked.

Daniel blinked. "No."

"Okay, so this isn't something I'm great at remembering. I mean I still buy the cheap shit, but Daniel...we have money."

"Huh?"

Johnny motioned to their apartment.

"If like it's not enough, we don't have to live here. We can downsize you know? But the shop's doing decent and someone refused to pay me in kisses and I barely spend any-"

"No!" Daniel said quickly.

Johnny stared at him, waiting.

"I can't have you empty your savings for me again," Daniel said into his own oatmeal.

"It's not though. It's an investment. On you, our future."

"That's too much Johnny."

"It really isn't. We can call the guys and that real estate lady and you can get the ball rolling."

Daniel sniffed and Johnny looked at him closer, at his bowed head, he was crying? Why was he crying?

"Daniel?" Johnny asked softly.

"Why? Why do you believe in me so much? What if I fuck up? What if it's a flop? What if I can't do it?"

Sometimes Daniel could cry in a way Johnny found heartbreaking stunning, but sick Daniel was a mess.

Johnny pushed the box of tissues over and Daniel blew his nose. Rubbing at his eyes with the back of his arm.

"Because you're fucking badass," Johnny said. "Like annoyingly so. Everything you do. Karate? Mastered in in months under duress. Model one time? Fan club. The first time you made a soufflé? Fucking amazing. First business? Made Mr. Miyagi's damn dreams come true and it's flourishing. I'd be an idiot not to bet on you. And I'm not an idiot so I'm all in. Worse case scenario? We move in with our Moms for a bit."

"No!" Daniel whined. "No way, if we move in with our moms we move in together with your mom."

"What's wrong with your own mom?"

"Nothing. But I already did that, for like 18 years. And your mom filled your bathroom, of a home she knew you'd probably not live in, with condoms and lube."

"You want to move in with me to my mom's home because she's a sex positive mom? Isn't your mom also-?"

"I feel like my mom doesn't know boundaries that well. She's...like the rest of my family. Barging in. We could actually have sex at your mom's place."

Johnny shook his head. "That was your whole concern? Only thing standing in your way of your dreams?" Johnny asked.

"No," Daniel said, blowing his nose again.

He took a bite of his oatmeal thoughtfully. Then looked up at Johnny.

"You really think I could do it?"

"Hell yeah."

"It'd be a bigger thing. Not just you and Mr. Miyagi. I'd...I'd have to hire other people. I'd be in charge of their livelihoods. I'd hold people's futures in my hands." He looked at his hands, the faded scars, he looked at his palms then up at Johnny wide eyed. "I can't-"

"Let's start small," Johnny said putting his hands in Daniel's. "A simple question. Is there anything else you could learn from the guy you work for?"

"No," Daniel said softly.

"Then quit. We will be fine. Just go to school. Dream big. Plan. I'm not recommending you run out right now and take this all on. Just one step at a time. Quit, heal up, catch up with your homework and focus on school. You don't need to be grinding yourself down under another fucking bastard."

"He's not the same," Daniel said quietly.

"You deserve better," Johnny said flatly.

"Oh, the no arguing tone, don't hear that too often," Daniel said with a small smile.

"I don't like him or the way he treated you."

"Well I appreciate you not fighting him."

"I had my hands full. Couldn't have even if I wanted to. And I did," Johnny said.

"Thanks," Daniel said squeezing his hands. He glanced up at Johnny, curious, "What would you have done if I did have more I needed to learn from him?"

"Would've apologized and either helped you get back in his good graces or helped you find a new one, preferably the latter."

Daniel smiled softly. "I'm going to try, no promises. We may have to move in with your mom."

"That's our emergency plan huh? You're not changing your mind?"

"Nope, in case of emergency we move in with Laura. Actually that could be kind of fun."

"Hold on now, let's not start packing yet," Johnny said.

"You're right." Daniel said sagely. "One step at a time. Get better, make love to you on nice clean sheets, hand in my notice, take you out to a nice dinner and then tempt getting in trouble in the back of the Ford or Avanti your choice, go to classes and figure out what I gotta do to open my own shop. Open the shop, get a nice desk, break in that new desk with you on it."

"I think there were some strange things mixed in there on your list," Johnny said blushing.

"We'd be knocking some of those off the list if I was feeling better," Daniel said.

"I think that's a lie," Johnny said.

"How so? You want to try? I got no promises. I'm definitely down, but you'd for sure get sick and I might not make it long," Daniel asked drinking his juice.

"I think you have written some things on your list in permanent marker and somethings in pencil. The pencil things can be crossed off, but the permanent marker, that's just a constant."

"Ah like how Mr. Miyagi wrote that one shopping list in permanent marker?"

"Yeah, because we always need more soil. But we don't always need more like invoices and stationary stuff."

"I like the way you think. Yeah, sex is permanent. Always on the to do list. You. Top of my to do list, every single time. No matter the list. Shopping list. Reminder, buy a desk that Johnny would look nice laying on."

"That's not how you should pick out a desk," Johnny murmured feeling his skin burning.

"It'll be a factor," Daniel said grinning. "I mean it's got to be sturdy enough you know?"

"I thought you were sick? Was it all a ploy?"

"Nope, still sick," Daniel said coughing.

" Sure , suspicious timing," Johnny said finishing his coffee. "Well, before you start planning your future, while you're still in phase one get well soon, what do you want to do? Back to bed? Want me to serenade you? Want to play cards? Watch TV? I think we've got a puzzle around here somewhere."

Daniel laughed, coughing, "No, I want to shower. I feel disgusting."

Johnny nodded, picking up Daniel's empty bowl with his own and taking it to the sink. He paused, halfway through rinsing them off and turned to Daniel. "Want company?"

"Always."

Johnny loaded the dishwasher, cleaning up from breakfast then followed Daniel towards the bathroom. He turned on the water, waiting for it to warm up. Arms wrapped around Johnny's waist and a head rested on his back.

"Has this been too much?" Johnny asked. "Do you need to lay down again? Or sit down?"

"No," Daniel said softly. "Just, glad you're here."

"Happy to be here," Johnny said.

"I kind of wish we had a bath."

"Next place," Johnny said patting his arm.

"House."

"Woah, your skipping to a house next? What about the business?"

"Next we live with your mom until the business is great, then we move into a house."

"I feel like maybe there should be a few more apartments in there first huh? Are we not even going to try downsizing first?"

"I've gotten use to a very specific lifestyle," Daniel said. "I can't go backwards."

"Oh really? What's the parts of this lifestyle you can't give up?"

"You," Daniel said. "On our nice bed and our fancy sheets."

"Listen even if we're downgrading apartments we're not selling all our stuff," Johnny said.

"We're not?"

"I mean if we run out of space it goes into storage."

"Storage costs money."

"Mom's got storage and Jimmy's been adamant we use one of the rooms at his place still."

"That feels bad though. Just hold our stuff for an unspecified amount of time."

"What I've realized from you being sick," Johnny said carefully tugging at his shirt.

Daniel let go, letting him take it of. Johnny set it in the laundry basket they'd moved into the bathroom.

"Our friends, our family, want to help us with the easiest things. You know those cartoons that make a big deal about being nice to people and how it creates community or whatever? And then that community shows up when you need it without you asking?"

Daniel nodded.

"That's our friends and family. We show up for them and we, or well I, don't really give them many opportunities to return the favor you know? To express that love with action. So it's like they're itching to be helpful over a cold. Because, they got our backs," Johnny put his hand on Daniel's shoulder. "We're not alone. You are not alone. I used that when it was something big and the way they came together was amazing, and it's like they're antsy that there's no big issue. So we gotta let them do their thing. We gotta ask for help."

Daniel sighed. "But it's so dumb,"

"It's not. It's not dumb at all. It's a dream. And if it pans out great, if not, well we tried."

Daniel nodded and Johnny put the rest of his clothes in the basket before stepping into the shower. It felt nice, the perfect warmth, almost scalding. He listened as Daniel's clothes went into the basket and as he took a couple wet sounding foot steps into the water.

"You sure you're okay with this?" Johnny asked turning.

Daniel was hugging himself, but also chewing on his lip, eyes clearly having been on Johnny's ass. He shouldn't have even been surprised any more.

He reached out and pulled Daniel in, into the warmth of the shower and Daniel plastered himself close, hugging Johnny. Johnny could work with this. Plus, and he'd never tell Daniel, this felt safer than letting Daniel shower on his own. At least hanging on like a little koala bear was better then the worry Johnny would've felt if he'd been in there on his own, worrying he'd overdone it and fainted and knocked himself out.

He liked it. Liked Daniel leaning against him, wanting to be close to him. He liked helping him and he liked the comfort of it all. He grabbed Daniel's shampoo and went to work carefully massaging it into Daniel's damp hair.

Daniel murmured something into Johnny's chest and Johnny stopped moving his hands.

"Huh?"

"You're going to put me right back to sleep," Daniel murmured, looking up at him.

"That's not a bad thing," Johnny said.

"I don't want to waste all day sleeping."

"It's what you're supposed to do when you're sick."

"But I'm home, you're home, we've decided we've got nowhere else we need to go or want to be," Daniel said shifting his stance a little, sliding his leg pointedly between Johnny's.

"Daniel," Johnny said trying to muster some sort of admonishment, trying to sound disapproving but it came off more embarrassing.

Still. No excuse. Daniel was sick.

Daniel glanced up at him, pouting, eyes in that big doe eyed look that made Johnny cave nearly every time he used them on him.

"What?" Johnny asked.

"It's unfair."

"What's unfair?"

His only weapon was to play dumb. Eventually Daniel's brain and exhaustion would kick in and he'd realize what a bad idea it was.

Right?

He would realize it was a terrible idea to get either of them riled up.

What if Daniel fainted? Again.

This was a bad idea. He'd messed up. He'd forgotten something. Daniel liked making his point. Daniel liked explaining himself. He liked it a little too much. Johnny realized his folly when Daniel ran his hand down Johnny’s chest and between his legs.

"You're here. I want to touch, everything."

"We agreed the shower was an awful place to do this."

"Not the time I tried to pick you up again ," Daniel complained.

"If that will get through to you then yes, yes the time you tried to pick me up."

Daniel pouted looking away from Johnny, "I know better. I know not to attempt it in the shower."

"Are you sure?"

"But I can still touch you, that's not dangerous."

"But your sick."

Daniel laughed. "I don't think just moving my arm a bit is going to exhaust me." Then he looked thoughtfully up at Johnny a grin spreading across his face. "I mean if I do get tired then you can just do it yourself and I'll watch."

He was a monster. An insatiable monster. But his hand felt good. Shit. He was supposed to be doing something else. He was supposed to be, he looked at his hands, still entangled in Daniel's hair, still sudsy. Idiot. They were both damn idiots. Daniel was going to get soap in his eyes and it'd serve him right. Damn it.

"Stop," Johnny said.

Daniel's hand stilled. He looked up at Johnny brow furrowed. And Johnny knew why. He was clearly interested in Daniel's hand.

"Your hair," Johnny said.

Daniel stared at him and Johnny gently pushed him back, coaxing his head back under the stream of water.

Focus. Focus. Don't do something stupid. Lots of stupid decisions were made in this shower. Don't add to them. He should've known. Daniel had like Pavlovian responses to certain spaces. The shower was one of them. Their cars was another. The way Daniel always wanted to jump his bones in either the Ford or the Avanti made almost any trip hard.

He ran his fingers through Daniel's hair, rinsing out the soap until he was sure there was none left. He was so stiff. Willing himself not to move, barely trusting himself to breathe until it was done.

That would've been awful. Terrible. He relaxed. Daniel laughed, smiling up at him. Then he he started coughing but he was still smiling.

"What?"

"Your such a sap."

"Huh?"

"I love you."

Johnny smiled kissing the top of his head. "I love you too."

"Can I go back to what I was doing?" Daniel asked.

"Yes," Johnny said. "Please."

Daniel pressed his forehead against Johnny's chest, looking down at what he was doing. Maybe he had his own Pavlovian responses. Maybe he thought he was sturdy and strong but he was like Achilles. One super easy kind of stupid weakness. And he didn't know what it was exactly, he didn't know where it was. But Daniel did. And Daniel was very good at just knocking the breath out of him.

Johnny moved his hands, reaching for Daniel. They needed to move. To another state. Where there wasn't a water issue. Or they needed a tub. Though- No. They'd just dirty the water. There was no winning. Or maybe, maybe there was. Maybe it was a win no matter what. Because it was Daniel.

He'd think about it later. About the water problem. When he could think and when he didn't have to steady himself with his hand on the tile because Daniel looked so damn focused, focused on him and he didn't want to have his knees buckle and send them tumbling because Daniel managed to always make him weak in the knees.

That was probably karma.

Chapter End Notes

The Avanti used in the film was a prototype. Avanti didn't attempt to create a convertible to sell to the public until 1984, among which would have been Johnny's Avanti. All of the cars Avanti produced that year had to be recalled because the paint refused to adhere to the body of the car and the company went bankrupt. It wasn't until a few years later when they came back under new management that convertibles were actually sold. (And they eventually went bankrupt again and again). So I went with the prototype from the film rather than the harsh reality that sometime around the end of the 1984 tournament Johnny's car's beautiful red crumbled to dust. This took a lot of research and if anyone is curious I've got like so many different things on it, so maybe I'll make a tumblr post eventually or something.

100F is 37.78 C
98.5F is 36.94C

The quote "In a distant and second-hand set of dimensions, in an astral plane that was never meant to fly, the curling star-mists waver and part..." is from the first book in the Discworld series by Terry Pratchett. "The Color of Magic" came out in 1983

Built on the Ashes

Chapter Notes

Part of this chapter is Johnny's POV, part is Daniel's

See the end of the chapter for more notes

"It's okay," Chozen said as Johnny stood on the corner of Lankershim and Magnolia not moving despite saying he was going to go in.

He'd thought it'd be easy. But his palms were clammy and he felt sick. The outside was completely different. He could already tell it was different. That Chozen had put so much effort in. Just like everyone had said.

"You don't have to go in," Chozen said by his side, wearing his gi.

His eyes were on Johnny, concerned.

He felt like Oreo, the rabbit, an escape artist that everyone knew would bolt if given the chance.

He took a deep breath. He wasn't Oreo. No one needed to bribe him with snacks to stay.

He was past that.

He was no longer going to bound over and past people, out of their grip when they just wanted him to stay, unaware that he was welcome and cared for and loved.

He was working on it.

He was waking up Daniel when he woke up if he was going out of sight, telling him where he was going. He was calling his mom more often over little things, over nothing. Just to talk.

One step forward.

He'd face it.

He could do that.

He put his hand on the door and then looked down at the handle. It'd been swapped out. He paused staring at it. He wouldn't have noticed but it felt different. Every small detail had been thought out hadn't it?

If he'd noticed, would Daniel?

If he'd done it he wouldn't have bothered to swap out the door handle. He wouldn't have thought about it.

He pushed the door open. There was a wooden sound, wooden chimes just like the shop.

Everything was different even though the space was the same. It was like when he'd taken the neighbor kid home when they'd lived at the apartment and they'd invited him in for a cup of coffee. It was the same layout as his and Daniel's place but it'd been so vastly different.

It was Cobra Kai but it wasn't.

It wasn't the same place he'd stopped outside to watch, where he gained the courage to go inside and pay for lessons. Taking himself because Sid wouldn't and his mother was too busy with all the stuff Sid wanted her to do.

He remembered feeling adult all of a sudden, taking himself to classes to learn something, delivering checks to Kreese, standing tall in his gi amongst all the older kids, watching them spar.

It'd been magic, because Kreese could make him like that. He could learn how to be strong and powerful and stop people from hurting him. He wouldn't cry any more, he'd transform into something, someone else, and someone would look at him with pride and shower him in praise.

There were pictures on the walls.

Copies of the ones from Okinawa, of Miyagi Shimpo with a plaque on it, a long line of sensei's all the way to Sato and Mr. Miyagi. And then Chozen.

It was darker, the walls weren't white anymore but blue.

Johnny toed out of his shoes, setting them carefully on the shoe rack.

How many times had they, in a rush, just left their shoes in a pile at the door? How many times had the end of the lesson led to him, bruised and sore, slowly trying to find his shoes amongst the pile?

This was smarter, easier.

A section for kids and adults, different heights.

There was a spot for them to hang up their coats, umbrellas sitting in a bin just in case. Not that it rained much in LA. But the thought was shocking.

The mats were different as he stepped into the room. The feel was different, and not just because it'd been so long, Chozen had swapped them out. The scrolls were on the walls from the dojo, there were weapons on the walls but done so securely that a kid or stranger couldn't just grab them off the wall.

Mr. Miyagi had shown Johnny how to set that up, what felt like ages ago when they rebuilt in Okinawa after the storm.

On one wall was a painted bonsai. He walked over to it, hearing Chozen follow. It was his bonsai. No matter how he looked at it.

"That's my bonsai," Johnny said turning to Chozen.

Chozen nodded, putting his hand on the wall next to the mural.

"Cobra Kai was yours. The root of it, but you gave it to me to take and change and make into something new. The bonsai is Mr. Miyagi's logo, made by Mrs. Miyagi. Same, but different. You changed, the logo changed, the building changed. I hope you don't mind. I wanted to keep a reminder of you here, because I wouldn't be here if not for you. You brought change out in me, you're something that's growing and flourishing despite the past. Something I hope for myself."

"And the fish?" Johnny asked softly.

"Miyagi sensei's favorites. I wanted to bring him here too, a part of him anyway," Chozen said.

There were mirrors on one of the walls and posters on another.

He remembered Chozen asking how he felt about his picture being in the dojo and he said he didn't care.

Daniel had said the same.

There was a photo of him and the guys from when they'd joined Cobra Kai. The gi didn't have the snake logo on the front so you had no way of telling. It'd been clipped so it was just them. Not the other kids.

They looked happy. It felt like a life time ago. They were photos from his tournaments, from Daniel's tournaments. A photo of the two of them facing off. Johnny in his Cobra Kai black, the tournament gi he wore that he remembered being so proud to receive, so honored. And the gi Daniel had been unsure how to put on, struggling in the locker room.

He wished he'd helped him. That would've been good sportsmanship. Instead they'd been mean about it. He regretted that. The memory tasted sour on his tongue and burned, like so much of those six months did where he'd been a bully, been mean, taken out all his frustration and anger on Daniel.

But Daniel shone in the picture. Wearing white, preparing that crane kick, despite his injury. It was so quintessentially Daniel. He didn't give up, he didn't back down, he got back up and he faced whatever he didn't want to do or didn't want to face. He was a badass.

There was a photo of Chozen and Sato standing out front on opening day. Photos of their old dojo with their old students in Okinawa. Photos of Daniel and Mr. Miyagi. Photos of Chozen and Miyagi sensei. And then there was a photo of Kumiko. Next to it was a plaque.

Dance classes offered as intensive camps during winter.

There was a poster from Kumiko's show on the wall. Posters for the All Valley and other tournaments. Posters from Okinawa.

"Do you want to see the rest?" Chozen asked.

Johnny nodded following him to the back office. How many times had he stood in that room, head held high, shoulders squared as cigar smoke curled around him while Kreese spoke in a way that led Johnny to believe he cared?

There were no army photos on the wall. No accolades from Kreese's time in military service. Instead there was a bookcase full of books on technique and history. Books on Okinawa and LA, books on art, and fiction.

Johnny studied the shelves, carefully grabbing one and seeing diagrams of how to use the weapons on the walls out front.

"Everyone learns differently," Chozen said.

There was a closet that was open, hanging on the hooks was a familiar leather jacket, traditional clothing, a couple gi's. A package sat on a shelf of colorful belts and white gi's stacked by size.

The desk was different, nicer then Kreese's had been. There was a filing cabinet and photos on his desk. Chozen was smiling at the camera standing with Ali, Jessica and Kumiko, he stood in the middle and they were all in close, dressed up and smiling, arms around him. Another photo with the guys. Chozen was frowning but it didn't reach his eyes. There were postcards from South Korea, Tokyo and Ohio. One that Johnny had sent from Newark. A pair of Shiisa sat on the bookshelf.

"How are classes going?"

"We've got a decent group. We started with military since that's the contract. Uncle is opening up a location in Reseda next. I think he wants to be closer to the shop. I guess the students we have talked and the feedback was they mostly want their kids in classes. But the kids are doing okay. Balance is awful. Keep falling over. They get mad about it. Had to do a whole long week of meditation and breathing just to better direct anger. I recognize it now though. I know the signs and how to divert it. I didn't know that before," Chozen said picking up one of the shiisa. "Kids started a few weeks ago. Never really taught kids before. They're...kind of cute. Loud, full of energy but they're learning. I didn't think I'd be so grateful to Yuna. Yuna and her gang."

Johnny laughed softly. "She's a good kid. What'd she teach you?"

"How to handle a large group of children that hate me."

"I don't think Yuna hates you."

"She just likes to make my life difficult," Chozen said with a sigh putting the shiisa down.

He frowned, thinking then turned to Johnny.

"I did some remodeling."

"You did?"

"There was a space for an apartment. It's done. I moved in."

"Why didn't you say so? We should've thrown you a housewarming."

Chozen smiled softly. "I didn't want you to feel obligated to come here."

"Did Sato and them at least throw you a housewarming party?"

"Yes, they did. You wanna see?" Chozen asked.

"Yeah, I never saw it before," Johnny said.

"I was thinking...do you miss it?" Chozen asked following Johnny out of the office towards the door, turning off lights and locking up as they went.

"What do you mean?"

"Karate....Dutch and Tommy mentioned you...used to practice at Mr. Miyagi's. But after the last tournament, after Daniel defeated, I don't even remember the guys name, but...now that Yukie-san and Uncle live with Mr. Miyagi, after we all moved in… you lost that space. Is it okay?"

Johnny put his shoes back on taking one more look at the dojo.

Did he miss it?

Did he miss Kreese ruffling his hair and telling him he'd done a great job? It wasn't common but he thought it had to be how it'd felt a father had to be like. That warm hand guiding him through life. Stern but caring, not mean or cruel like Sid. Dispensing kindness sparingly.

He'd found friends within those walls. He'd learned how to fight, an offense with no defense except more offense. He gained confidence and stopped running. It might have come crashing down around him. He might've gotten hurt more than a regular dojo would've allowed. He definitely overdid it.

But he had enjoyed learning karate with his friends. He'd enjoyed going out with them afterwards, like an eternal summer vacation just for them.

He missed it. He missed the excitement that led him to race his bike to class, to seeing his friends who smiled at him, calling out his name. No one else had done that. Excitedly waited for him. Looked forward to seeing him. Or it hadn't felt like it.

He'd grown so much with them under Kreese's guidance. Even if it'd been hell, even bruised, he'd held on tight just to hear those voices call out his name, for those arms to wrap around him to talk about nothing and to feel like he belonged.

It was like the place was full of ghosts, ghosts of his past, of himself.

He stepped out and sighed. He had liked doing karate, karate with Daniel had been...fun. He liked practicing with Mr. Miyagi. He liked learning defense and new things. He liked sparring with Dutch while he did his taekwondo.

He liked learning and he missed it.

He missed getting on the mat and going through the motions. He liked the way Daniel got all fired up about it, determined to win against him, the way he threw his all into it when he was having fun. He liked going through the motions.

"Yeah, I guess I do," Johnny said following Chozen into an apartment.

He wasn't sure what he expected, taking off his shoes at the entrance.

It was plain.

Plainer than Johnny expected.

There was a bonsai Johnny remembered Mr. Miyagi giving Chozen one of the times he came to the shop with a Help not feel alone . Which had left Chozen so speechless that he stood rooted in the spot holding it. Johnny hadn't understood it in the moment, but now it made sense.

There was a couch, a small table with two chairs that looked like they folded next to a kitchen and a few doors that were shut.

"It's not much," Chozen said.

"You've been busy," Johnny said. There was a familiar owl figurine sitting on the counter. "Did my mom come here?"

"Yeah, she helped me pick out some stuff. She gave me that. Do you want some tea or something? I also have sake," Chozen said going to the kitchen.

"Tea please."

There was a painting of a man on a boat on the wall.

"This is nice?"

"You think so?" Chozen asked.

"Yeah, what's it of? Is it from Okinawa?"

"Kind of."

"Kind of?" Johnny asked turning.

Chozen had set a tea pot on the stove.

"It's Miyagi sensei."

"Did you paint it?"

Chozen looked up startled. "What?"

Johnny turned back to the painting. "The style is similar to the bonsai mural in the dojo. I know you painted that one. This is your work. It's beautiful Chozen. He'd love it I'm sure."

Johnny glanced back, Chozen's face was a little flushed. Surprised, embarrassed.

"You do have a talent for art. You should enjoy it more, indulge in your hobbies."

"Thank you," Chozen said removing a tin from the cabinet and setting it down on the counter, measuring out tea leaves. "I miss him."

"I bet," Johnny said walking to the kitchen space. "I'm sorry for your loss Chozen and I'm sorry we probably didn't help with your mourning process."

"You...weren't at fault. I...was very mad."

"It's a part of grief."

Chozen nodded. "Still, I regret hurting you."

"I'm tougher than I look."

Chozen laughed.

"No. You look tough but are soft on the inside. Not a bad thing. But you..."

Chozen looked away thoughtfully.

"Bare great pain with no complaint yet feel and carry every strike. You need gentler care. A softer world. Kindness."

Johnny frowned, unsure of how to respond.

"I learn a lot from you. That toughest shells hide great pain. I learn I hide myself and my own pain. And...it's not good. Festered. Like a rotten wound. Miyagi sensei passing, caused it to rupture. So much anger. Uncle forgave me, Mr. Miyagi forgave me, the people around me understood when I didn't. Daniel maybe did not trust me or maybe will never fully forgive me, but I accept. I accept his feelings of distrust and now I focus on forgiving myself. Teaching kids is helping."

The kettle whistled and Chozen took it off the stove preparing the tea and pushing a cup towards Johnny.

"Which is why I think you should join me."

"Join you?"

"You still haven't forgiven yourself, despite Daniel forgiving you. You are holding onto yourself so tightly. Same as when you take every blow with no complaint. Yet you remember every blow. You also remember every hit you gave. It's good for practice, to learn and grow as a fighter for tournaments, but bad for self when you replay over and over again in head. You are stuck on that ride with horses."

"Carousel?"

"That one. You are trapped atop a horse remembering everything. Growing yes with care. But still stuck. I know. It's hard. In dojo you see past even though I took away every thing that was. There was some good there, but it sits wrongly with you now, right?"

"Yeah," Johnny said looking down at his cup of tea. "I met the guys there and for a while, Kreese was nice."

"The world's not black and white, not good and evil. There is bad, and there are bad people and there is good and there are good people. But the majority of the world is neither, or rather, a combination of both. We are gray. Maybe if Daniel never came to LA you never lose final match, Kreese never turn on you. But then you never think about how he taught, or the unnecessary pain in your learning.

“If Daniel never came to Okinawa maybe Yuna-san not live today. I not make fool of myself, but Yuna-san would be gone, shortly after Miyagi-sensei. It is too much for small village. If there isn’t Daniel then maybe neither of us grow or change. Neither of us have to face ourselves and take a closer look. If no Daniel, then we wouldn't meet. Yukie-san, Mr. Miyagi, and Sato never reunited. As painful as growing is, reflecting, I'm grateful for it. Grateful to Daniel, grateful to Mr. Miyagi, and grateful to you.

“One day I think you will get up off the carousel and walk where you want to go. One day you’ll forgive yourself. It will take time. But I think, teaching helps. Working with students helps you re-see yourself. You see what they do, how they learn and you see yourself. They are themselves, of course, but sometimes you see parts of them that remind you of yourself. Like a mirror. And when you watch them grow, and learn and become their own maybe, you too will see you can grow and be free too," Chozen said hand gently resting atop Johnny's. "Think about it. Dojo always open for you. If you want to practice, if you want to spar, if you want to just come to be, or if you want to put on a gi and be called sensei. I'd be honored to have you teach with me."

Sensei? Him? Johnny wanted to laugh. It was a joke right? But Chozen's face was serious. He meant it.

"Let me think about it," Johnny said taking a sip of his tea.

"Of course, take your time. It's a big responsibility and takes a lot of energy, but you would be great at it. You're good with kids."

Chozen very slowly pulled his hand away, like he didn't want to and turned pulling something off the fridge, out from under a novelty Hollywood magnet. He turned back.

"This is for you."

Johnny took it carefully.

"For you and Daniel, letter from Yuna and other kids."

"Thank you," Johnny said.

"I translated it," Chozen said. "Why it's open."

"Well it says it was sent to you, so of course it's open," Johnny said carefully pulling out the letter.

There were little doodles, Daniel would love those. They still had several from the last letters. Chozen had carefully translated the letters in pencil next to the dark inky scrawl.

Johnny smiled. "Thanks Chozen."

"You're welcome Johnny."

They sat for a bit longer drinking tea in comfortable silence.

They put their stuff at Jimmy's. Furniture they'd bought, things that wouldn't fit, things Daniel knew they'd need eventually or he wasn't ready to part with. He felt like he'd lost. Like there was this stingy burn of defeat as he packed up their apartment.

He was trying to keep upbeat. Johnny was going to live with his mom. That room she'd done up with him in mind, full of clothes and books and things, with a spa style bathroom and a beautiful garden. He was going to live there. And it was good. It was good for Johnny to go home and get a second chance at living with family.

Daniel just felt a little bruised. Like he'd banged into something walking too fast and misjudging how close he was. It ate away at him, worrying that he was imposing on their second chance. Johnny moving back home was a delight for Laura. But Daniel wondered if maybe he should live with his mom. But he didn't want to give up everything.

He didn't want to give up waking up next to Johnny, feeling his heart beating steadily. He liked waking up first and watching Johnny sleep peacefully by his side, curled up and content. He liked living in those small moments where nothing seemed a rush or a hurry and the world could consist of just the two of them.

And yeah, maybe he didn't want to have to figure out how to get away with having sex in his mother's apartment. Laura already had filled the bathroom with condoms, making it easy to just grab something to try and see if Johnny liked it. And maybe he wanted a turn at having sex with Johnny in Johnny's bed, since they'd had sex in Daniel’s bed several times. Many times. And he wanted to do it in Johnny's room.

It wasn't the same. But it was nice. And there was a tub and Daniel liked the idea of joining Johnny in the bath after long days. Though it was probably too small of a bath, the kind where their limbs would get all tangled up and getting out would be a puzzle. But he still liked it.

It took a while to settle in. Not nearly as long as he feared but it was a big adjustment. Not having to go to his apprenticeship, just focusing on school. The sudden burst of free time was overwhelming. So he started scrapbooking. He'd gone through their trips. Outings with the guys, senior year stuff, the New York field trip, prom and graduation all went into one and that was done.

Okinawa was also done. Now he was switching back and forth between two scrapbooks. One from their autumn trip to Seoul and Tokyo and the other their summer road trip to Ohio.

They were vastly different. The summer road trip had been long . He and Johnny had left after work and Daniel had had to fight with his ex-boss to get the time off. Had to bribe coworkers at the garage with souvenirs to cover for him while he was gone.

The original plan was Las Vegas but the hotels were too expensive and half the ones he'd tried to call had turned him down because he wasn't 21 yet. So they'd gone camping a couple times along the way. First at Lake Mead, Nevada.

Daniel had decided if he wasn't willing to spend a ton on fancy hotels then at the very least they'd stay at some parks and enjoy the scenery. He also wanted a repeat of their first camping trip, to have sex under the stars and in their tent.

He wanted to see if they could both fit in the same sleeping bag, if it'd be possible to have sex in one.

Challenges. He just wanted some silly challenges.

Daniel had stared at the Avanti the morning they left and then at the Ford. He wasn't sure which one to pick. He wasn't sure which one Johnny would pick. He loved the Avanti, but the Ford....well the Ford was his baby. He knew the Ford. He could drive the Ford and trusted it would get him where he needed to go easily. The Avanti was an unknown. He'd driven it once. And while it purred he didn't know if he trusted it on the long open road. Plus Johnny was less likely to give up control in the Avanti. And they had to share this fair and square. Otherwise they'd be miserable.

He put his things in the Ford.

He'd treat it like dibs. First one down, first one got to pick the car. Hell, he'd drive over to the elevator. He quickly dug the keys out of his pocket and hurried to the Ford. He knew Johnny loved the Avanti, loved driving, but the Avanti would be fine for...a few weeks sitting in the garage.

The Ford was a beauty, it'd handle like a dream, it begged for the open road. Plus they'd never lose it in a parking lot. The top could go down so really it was like taking the Avanti. Truly.

Daniel turned down the radio and danced his fingers across the steering wheel pulling away from his parking spot. He went over his mental checklist as he checked the mirrors. Bags with clothes for driving, comfortable shoes for driving, clothes including nice clothes if they went dancing in his suitcase. Camping gear. The tent, the one sleeping bag and blankets so he could say Oops only packed one we'll have to share, but blankets in case it was truly miserable.

He had no clue what Johnny had packed. He'd tried to tell him they should share a suitcase, that there was plenty of room in Daniel's suitcase for Johnny's things too. One suitcase would make getting in and out of the motels and hotels so much faster. Less to lug around and keep track of when they stayed at the parks. Plus it wasn't like their clothes were strangers, co-mingling together on their little dates in the washer and dryer. But Johnny had his own suitcase.

Daniel had been about to explain that his parents had this big old suitcase that they just threw all their stuff in together. Ma's stuff and his dad's stuff in one big suitcase. He liked that.

But he'd stopped before he explained, before he pointed out how much space there was in his own suitcase for them to share when he saw Johnny dig out his suitcase from the closet. The one that his mom had gotten him. How different it was from Daniel's.

It made him remember that little short story from English class. What was it? Baby shoes for sale never worn or something like that?

Johnny went on trips sure. Over night trips or short ones to the mountains with the guys, he had a gym bag that he kept well stocked for sleeping on the beach or overnight escapes wherever they may lead.

He packed so carefully, so thoughtfully that Daniel left him to it. To go remind Louie to behave while staying with Ma.

Johnny's first trip. One he chose that was long and he finally got to see more outside of California. Not some emergency trip to Okinawa where he just grabbed that gym bag out of the back of the car and left in his graduation suit having not slept. An actual trip.

The excitement was palpable and so sweet that Daniel had just told Louie he got something in his eye and told him to pack up his own things before Ma got there because whatever was left behind was stuck in that apartment until they got back.

Daniel's suitcase was old, beaten up but it worked, it got him through a lot. Most importantly the trip from Newark to LA. And Johnny's was in pristine condition. He'd mentioned it when they'd moved into the apartment. His mom got it for him when he was little, after she'd married Sid. Thought it was cute to get a matching one with hers so that on trips it'd be easy to find their stuff. Sid already had his own, of course.

And it went unsaid that those trips never happened and that that suitcase just ended up, unused in the back of his closet for a long time. Until...well their trip to Ohio.

How many more little things were going to pop up like that? Little firsts that Daniel took for granted that Johnny never got to have? It was bittersweet. He loved that these firsts were with him, that he got to add them to the list, like the guitar. Slowly fulfilling promises that had been broken so long ago, piecing them back together.

It was a good trip. But he remembered sitting in the Ford, idling, waiting for Johnny to get off the elevator.

“Hey handsome need a ride?”

The way Johnny pulled his suitcase, getting familiar with it. He wondered why Johnny hadn’t broken it out for Newark. The icy sidewalks? The snow? It didn’t matter but he liked the way Johnny had walked up to him leaning against the window of the Ford.

“That depends, where you headin’?”

“Buckeye state. Ohio.”

Johnny had stepped back thoughtful. Like he was contemplating whether that way matched with his plans or not.

“Can we stop in Chicago along the way?”

“Chicago?” Daniel asked with a groan. Like that was the worst question he’d ever been given. He sighed, leaning towards Johnny, looking him up and down and clicked his tongue. “For a babe like you? I suppose I could stop in Chicago.”

Johnny had smiled, leaned closer. “I’ll make it worth your while.”

He’d leaned in, kissing him and then pulled away right when Daniel thought it was getting good. When he thought maybe they could do something quick and fun before they left. But then Johnny was putting his suitcase in the trunk and then joining him in the passenger seat.

“Are we listening to Springsteen the entire way?” Johnny asked.

“You can change it when you drive,” Daniel said.

He'd packed books from the library, guides on places. He was ready with fun facts like Okinawa. Weird little tidbits for their trip. Lake Mead was the first national recreation area in the USA and home to several endangered species including a frog that was believed to only exist there.

Daniel had hoped to see it and they did spend a lot of time near the water looking, getting soaked through, laughing like little boys as they tried to catch frogs and fell in the mud. Johnny kissing him against the bank, hands all over him. They had sex in the grass which tickled Daniel’s skin.

But it’d been nice to just let go, to let Johnny take over, to feel him everywhere, to watch those muscles work, glistening from being in the river.

He did however, get a ton of bug bites. Which Johnny apologized for, digging out a first aid kit and applying cream to Daniel’s back. Daniel had just teased him about it.

“You take me to the nicest places Johnny Lawrence.”

“What even bit you?”

“The only thing that should be biting me is you.”

“So you want me to go try and find a whole bunch of bugs and murder them for biting you?”

“No, I’m sure they weren’t expecting to find us blocking their path or interrupting their day.”

“I offered to go back and get a blanket or something.”

“I know.”

“And the spot you originally picked was overgrown with poison ivy.”

“Is that what that fancy footwork was?” Daniel asked with a laugh.

He remembered going to lay down and Johnny pulling him back to him, spinning like he suddenly wanted to dance. Like he wasn’t done playing.

“Itchy either way,” Daniel said with a sigh.

He’d rolled onto his stomach after his shower and Johnny had covered him in medicine. It was nice. His hands had the right amount of callouses that it felt good. It’d all felt good and he’d wanted to just bask in the moment, despite the bugs that’d bit him, enjoying their time together.

The sunset had been gorgeous and Daniel had gotten a good picture of Johnny looking at it, fresh from a park shower after they'd had dinner. Mr. Miyagi had sent them with onigiri which they'd eaten for dinner and Daniel had wondered if any moment could be so perfect.

After Lake Mead Daniel had tried to drive. But Johnny was stubborn that they share. Possibly still feeling guilty over all the bug bites that Daniel reminded him wasn’t his fault. It was a nearly 9 hour drive from Lake Mead to their next camping spot in the Black Canyon of Gunnison National Park. And Daniel spent a good chunk of it trying to rile Johnny up, flat out talking dirty and palming at him while he drove, offering to duck down and take care of what was bothering him.

Johnny relented only because they ended up on a long stretch of road where no one was around. And when they got to their camp ground and set up the tent Johnny had pulled Daniel into the tent and returned the favor.

He'd picked a remote campsite with that in mind and Johnny had pointed out the juniper trees and pinyon pines along they way. They didn't see much but it was beautiful. Not just the view of the park but Johnny sleeping naked beside him, hair mussed up from writhing under him. They both had fit in the sleeping bag and Johnny hadn't complained about how close Daniel was, that unlike in bed he couldn't escape.

He had good pictures of the both of them at the parks, around the campsites. He'd asked countless hikers to take pictures of them at all the popular spots and they'd turned out well.

They then moved onto civilization, which was needed since their last campsite hadn't had showers. A motel in Denver with kitschy decor five hours later found them showering together because why not?

"Are all we going to do on this trip is have sex?" Johnny had asked after they'd broke into a fit of laughter because the bed squeaked something awful but it was kind of fun.

"You said you'd make going to Chicago worth my while," Daniel had said rolling off of him and pulling Johnny close.

It was what Daniel had had in mind. To do the great American pastime of driving across the country on a road trip and to have sex along the way. Mostly because Louie was still stubbornly there. Refusing to talk, going to the dojo and helping out with Mr. Miyagi's shop but not calling home and avoiding talking about home with Daniel. He needed to get it out of his system, celebrate the freedom from responsibility.

But they'd actually had a decent drive time so there was time to do things. They went to the Denver Art Museum enjoying views of the Rocky Mountains in the distance. They walked around downtown, they had Bison steak at a fancy looking restaurant for dinner that someone at the museum recommended and Daniel stocked up on souvenirs for his coworkers.

Daniel drove after that, seven hours from Denver to Lincoln Nebraska, guiding a half asleep Johnny to the passenger seat of the Ford, managing to get a good picture of him sleeping around six am as the sun was rising.

He hadn't told Johnny why they were leaving at the crack of dawn, but he did rouse Johnny in time to eat breakfast at a road side dinner and watch him try to wake up over his cup of coffee and pancakes. It was adorable and Daniel hadn't shown Johnny that picture yet.

The goal had been to get to the hotel, check-in and then go to the Sunken Gardens. A non-rushed enjoyment, unlike the museum that they'd sped-walked through the day before.

Daniel wanted Johnny to point out flowers and tell Daniel what they were. He wanted to enjoy the fresh air and a nice walk. And it'd been lovely. Johnny had been delighted and watching him look at flowers and to walk along the ponds and look at the waterfalls made it worth it.

There were a few tulips leftover from spring still in bloom and Daniel felt all the stress just sort of melt away. He didn't have to worry about classes or his apprenticeship. Everything with LA was miles away, states away. It was just him and Johnny on a road trip. Just the two of them falling into bed. No Louie. No guys. Nothing.

And it'd been wonderful. Wonderful to have sex in new places and laugh over the different sounds old mattress springs made or weird decor choices. It was nice to be able to just drive off the road and go visit something they saw a big billboard for. To do all the road trip touristy things they wanted.

The drive to Chicago they split. Daniel started, letting Johnny sleep. They flirted when Johnny woke up, and it took very little hinting to get the favor from before returned once they hit open and empty road. Daniel had to grip the steering wheel super tight to remain focused and to keep his eyes open and on the road because he wanted to look down, he wanted to see Johnny leaning over his lap, blonde head bobbing. It really was a dumb idea and unsafe but it'd been a fun thing to mark off his list. Car blow jobs while driving, done, and hopefully that desire was done and gone.

He hoped.

He wasn’t sure.

Because when he had glancing down at Johnny at work in his lap…it did a lot for him. Maybe parked.

Parked was safer for next time.

Johnny was adamant about driving the rest of the way to O’hare, getting out to get the guys while Daniel took over and waited from the driver’s seat mentally preparing himself for the end of their sex filled trip. It wouldn’t be over over , they still had rooms to themselves, but the alone was over. He thought he got why couples did trips away, why honeymoons were a thing.

But it was good to see the guys. To have them in the Ford and wonder for a moment if he'd ever had them in his car before. Another first.

They'd booked a hotel downtown and Daniel had parked in the garage before they'd headed off to get pizza. Bobby had brought snacks, Jimmy talked about his classes and Jenny, Tommy asked them about the drive and it'd just been nice. Nice to see them.

The pizza had been ridiculous. An actual pie rather than a pizza. And it took forever, a good 40 minutes or longer before it came out to their table. A monstrosity Daniel had said. Too thick. No one needed a pizza like that. But he had enjoyed it.

Pizza pie was more of what it was, the dumb deep dish. And it'd been nice to eat it with the guys, catching up. They walked around the parks and downtown, the guys dragging them to the Magnificent Mile for shopping that was out of Daniel's price range.

Chicago made Daniel a little homesick. He missed Jersey while he was there, the hustle and bustle, the sounds of the trains. LA didn't have trains in the same way, not the same level of public transportation. There was something comforting about the sound of it in the distance, the sounds of a normal city.

They walked down to the lakefront at the end of the night, watching summer fireworks before walking back to the hotel for the night. He had good pictures of all of them, together leaning against statues, eating pizza, walking through the parks in front of random weird art.

Johnny had made the trip worth his while. After they'd gotten to their room, having wished the guys a good night. Johnny had whispered in his ear, if he had any requests, hands on Daniel as soon as they'd locked the door.

They'd said goodnight to the guys around ten, and he was pretty sure they were stilling going at it at midnight. The lighting in the room had been great. Great for watching Johnny, for touching Johnny's golden hair in the light, for watching him take off his clothes while Daniel got comfortable on the bed. Seeing where old love bites were still bruising on his skin. Watching the way he sunk down, taking Daniel inside, like his legs somehow weren't tired from being in a car and all the walking. Like he still had energy to ride Daniel's dick.

He remembered laughing, Johnny surprised, stilling.

"I'm wondering if it's like dessert. Sometimes people are full but still have room for dessert. I'm exhausted, I'm sure you're exhausted, but I still have energy for this, for sex with you."

"Until we both pass out," Johnny said with a laugh.

The image was funny, falling asleep mid-coitus. Daniel knew he'd fallen asleep before it got that far. Johnny had too, like the time he fell asleep, or started to during their phone call. But this was different. The idea of falling asleep inside of Johnny seemed different.

And then he wanted to try it. Accidental. On purpose. Save some time in the morning.

It'd been a bit of a conversation, to explain it, to see if Johnny was down for it. A confused, "So you want to go to sleep hard?"

Not quite. But eventually they figured it out. Johnny said he'd try it. Try sleeping with Daniel inside, that he was okay if whoever woke up first started moving to wake the other up.

There were parts of it Daniel couldn't see himself doing a lot. He moved around in his sleep, even if it was mostly in Johnny's space, it still limited him in how he could move. And Johnny normally moved. He liked falling asleep with Johnny curled up as a little spoon in his arms and then find that through the night he'd moved to wrap his arms around him as well. Or the couple of times Johnny had moved onto his back and Daniel woke up with his head on top of Johnny's pecs, enjoying the view, and the arms around him.

Daniel needed freedom of movement so he could roll around like a chinchilla taking a dirt bath while he slept.

But waking up inside Johnny was nice. Moving slowly, carefully waking him up by thrusting his hips and hearing the soft gasp Johnny made. The moans he made when he woke up. How he bucked his hips between Daniel's hand that was stroking him and Daniel's cock was a great way to start a morning. Listening to the way Johnny moaned his name, voice raspy with sleep but needy.

It hadn't lasted long but it'd been nice. And maybe a bit overdone when Johnny seemed to struggle to get comfortable in the car. Daniel drove carefully, hand on Johnny's leg trying to be as soothing as possible, apologetic and a little teasing when the guys ran off to get snacks at the gas station.

"Could rub something on it for you."

“I think that’s what the issue is.”

“Not my dick, I mean like a cream or medicine or something.”

Johnny had turned so red. But it wasn’t a no so Daniel kept an eye out. Popping into a pharmacy when he saw one.

The final leg of their trip was to Ohio State University. The plan was to surprise Jessica outside of her final class for the semester. Johnny wanted to pick up flowers. Jimmy had asked why he didn't just buy them in Chicago while they had the time.

“They'll die before we get there,” Johnny had said.

Though Daniel wondered if he was also just too tired to focus. Half asleep the way he normally was after a good fuck. But he was right. Five hours was a long time for flowers to sit in a warm car in the summer while they passed long stretches of fields that were nothing but corn and soybeans. Over and over again. Tall corn, short soybean.

It was so boring. Johnny slept for long stretches of it.

The guys had plenty to talk about, but the scenery was only interesting when it broke into farmland with animals. Cows, sheep, a random alpaca or horses they could spot from the road. By the time they got to Ohio Daniel had stored a days worth of complaints about how boring it was to get there and why was the landscape so boring? It was green though, lush, with big open skies of blue and the air was cleaner, less smog filled. So Daniel prepared to grumble a little less then he'd planned.

Mostly they'd been excited to see Jessica. And the scream she let out when she saw them outside her class was worth it. It'd have been better only if Dutch was there. It was an ache that came and went, felt stronger in moments where he would've been there, should've been there.

Daniel hadn't meant to cry but he had and then Jessica started crying and they had to explain to a concerned professor that everything was in fact all right and not in fact terrible and no one was hurt. Just that they'd missed each other greatly and they missed Dutch too.

It ached a bit as he put the photos in his scrapbook. All the group photos where Dutch should've been there. Should've been there to giggle at the almost weed like design on the football helmets that Jessica showed them, gone up with them in the bell tower to look at campus and have Jessica show them where all her classes were and to listen to all her stories.

He should've gone swimming with them in the lakes or groaned with them when she excitedly asked if they were up for some rock climbing, yet begrudgingly got up at the crack of dawn with them to go. Or been there when the RA's looked confused at all the boys in her room and then told her that she was responsible for them, too exhausted to care since it was the end of term and her roommate had already moved out.

Going dancing with her at some end of year school event where the stars were just so damn bright out in the middle of nowhere, or falling asleep like Daniel had listening to some concert outside on the green with his head in Johnny's lap.

They'd stayed for a few days before trekking back, a different route with different memories and a promise that Jessica would join them on their trip to Seoul and Tokyo. Preparing to figure out a good overlap in everyone's fall breaks in September.

The photos from that scrapbook was more intense. Sleepy photos the guys had sent of them, Daniel and Johnny leaning against one another at the gate fast asleep at 5am, falling asleep again somewhere over North Pacific Ocean. Daniel's mouth was open, presumably snoring and drooling and he'd complained about but Johnny told him it had to go in the scrapbook because it was adorable and he just decided he'd quickly skip that page every time it showed up.

The thirteen hour flight to Incheon was exhausting. Johnny read a lot. The guys played games, chatting with Jessica who sat nearby with Ali. Ali who had joined them last minute via Tommy's invite not necessarily to see Dutch, but to see Kumiko and Jessica. The two girls sharing rooms and chatting the entire way, thick as thieves. Daniel wondered when that friendship had flourished, how much they kept in touch.

Dutch was waiting for them at the airport. His natural hair color completely grown out. All the bleach blonde gone. Daniel thought he'd run and hug him, the way the guys had done once to him and Johnny. But Jessica beat him to it. Taking off in a sprint, at a higher speed then Daniel expected, with more force than expected and Daniel watched the smile fade for Dutch's face and his eyes widen in horror, shifting his stance to catch her before she bowled him over. Which left him exposed when the other ex-cobras took off after her, the floodgates opened and for the second time they collapsed into a tearful reunion.

You did this to yourself . Ali had said standing off to the side, amused but not joining in the hugs and tears. As the least excited Ali ended up being camera person.

And from their adventures Daniel had managed to get some good pictures of Ali and Jessica in colorful hanbok walking through the palaces, of all of them at N Seoul Tower, having traditional tea, barbecuing pork belly on grills, eating ice noodle soups, Dutch laughing when the guys were determined that they could handle the spicy versions of what they ate leading into him having to order more water for their table.

Hanging out at convenience stores and playing drinking games that Dutch taught them. Photos of them walking through yellow ginko tree lined streets and groves, trying all sorts of street food. Pictures of Daniel holding Johnny's hand, taking a bite of whatever snack he had with a mischievous grin. Trying on clothes, testing out new fashions, eating so much food. Every meal was a feast.

One day into their trip Dutch left them to enjoy some performances downtown only to return with Chozen in tow. Daniel had been stunned to see him, he knew they'd meet him in Tokyo in a few days since that had been part of the plan. That Chozen would be with Sato and Mr. Miyagi and Yukie to see Kumiko's performance. But Jessica, Ali, Tommy and Dutch seemed delighted to see him, dragging him along on their trips and Daniel begrudgingly added those photos to the pages of his scrapbook.

Chozen and Jessica standing with their jeans rolled up in the mudflats at Incheon catching tiny little crabs that sent Ali screaming and hiding behind Tommy and the guys. Chozen hiking behind them on the mountain paths. There were so many that Jessica practically ran up, leaving them in the dust. Photos of Dutch sweaty and smiling after one of his taekwondo practices, pleased they'd been there to cheer him on. Going out afterwards together for fried chicken and beer with his classmates.

They even flew out to Jeju. Daniel had pictures of them picking hallabong, a citrus fruit, standing next to volcanic statues, jumping out of tea fields and hiking up the volcanic mountain, and playing at the beach. There were so many memories packed into that week leading up to their trip to Tokyo.

And Tokyo... Kumiko had hugged him so hard that he thought she was going to break his spine. Somehow she'd managed to lift him up off the ground in a little twirl that made his face and ears burn when they arrived at New Tokyo International Airport. But thankfully she wasn't the only one who got that treatment. Chozen also ended up picked up with a bright red face as she teased him in Okinawan. Johnny got revenge for them, scooping her up instead and beating her in her attempt of sneak attack hugs.

“You've gotten so strong, is the dance troupe also for body builders?”

“No! But I've been helping with carrying things around the set because we're short staffed. Don't worry I'll put all of you to work too!”

It'd been so nice. They'd arrived before Mr. Miyagi, Sato and Yukie. They'd gone up to Mt. Fuji, an exhausting day of over 6 hours of hiking to break out over the clouds and into the cold but the view had been spectacular. And the photos they took were stunning. Though they had to collapse at a restaurant at the base camp for several hours to get their feet under them again. Except Kumiko and Jessica who had treated the whole thing like a walk in the park and were catching up happily over coffee while they laid around trying to regain their energy.

It was so nice to have new views outside their windows, to try new foods. They signed up for cooking classes and Daniel got one of his favorite photos from that class, Johnny wearing a cute pink apron, focused on what he was making with flour on his face. He also loved the photos of Johnny dressed up in yukatas and nemaki's and the girls got him into one colorful kimono.

Chozen had froze in the spot and looked faint, which Daniel understood. It'd been fun to dress up and go to the shrines and temples, to walk around together. Johnny was adamant they got plenty of pictures of Daniel too, dressed in a nice red which did look good in the photo Johnny took of him walking through the park with all the red maple trees or eating candied fruits. There were too many good photos from the days they dressed up.

And even one bad one that he didn't put in the scrapbook, but that was hiding with all his other photos, one where he'd gotten impatient when they got back to their room, trying to help Johnny out of all his layers, wanting to touch his skin, to feel him, and he'd landed on their bed in such a beautiful way, not exposed fully but like a pin up model. Since his traditional bag was tied around his wrist, something Kumiko had been insistent on, accessories, it had been automatic. A beautiful photo of Johnny looking up at him in such a sexy way that it got his heart pounding just thinking about it.

They'd gotten to stay at an onsen, and that had been dangerous. Chilling in warm water with their friends had been fine, it'd been fun, but it was too tempting to tease Johnny, too difficult to keep his hands to himself that he had to make someone sit between them.

He didn't know how Chozen handled it. Though to be fair he sat on the other end of the water like they were all hanging out in a jacuzzi or something in the states, like it was fine. Like knowing the guy he had a crush on was naked five feet away wasn't even tempting. It made Daniel wonder if he was an uncontrollable pervert.

Though to be fair, Daniel didn't know what he would've done if Chozen had misbehaved. It would've been bad. But the guys did tease Daniel a couple times for staring too long. And they didn't stop teasing him about it the whole trip. Not until Mr. Miyagi, Sato and Yukie arrived.

Dutch was so happy to see them and he had good photos of Dutch and Mr. Miyagi talking, walking together through a park. Of him laughing with Sato and listening to Yukie. They had a million questions for him. How is Korea? How is training? Looking healthy and strong. And he'd beamed.

For a long time Daniel had realized, a bit with Johnny's help that Mr. Miyagi was a father figure for him. Not just a dear friend, practically best friend, but an adopted father. And the cobras were adopted brothers. Friendships so close they became family he chose. Just like Johnny had those bonds. But it was nice to see that those bonds crossed over.

That Dutch, who lived alone most of the time and rarely saw his parents received part of that relationship he was looking for elsewhere, from his sanbonim who was tough but clearly cared a lot in a way so vastly different then Kreese it was shocking, to watching Yukie point out clothes that would look good on him, or Sato laughing with him, or Dutch listening to Mr. Miyagi.

Daniel had known when he arrived in LA that he was lonely. He just kept pushing it down. But sitting in their special reserved seats, dressed in suits and the girls in pretty dresses to watch Kumiko perform, with a beautiful bouquet at the ready for the end, Daniel realized he wasn't the only one who'd felt so alone. Not just him, not just Mr. Miyagi, but all of them. And they were lucky to be there together.

All the treasured memories that he was finishing up in his scrap book. Photos of them with Kumiko after the performance, Yukie, Sato, Chozen, and Mr. Miyagi looking so proud. With just the girls, which had been silly and with the guys all nicely dressed in their suits. So proud of her that as soon as she said she was free to go they carried her out like a bunch of dumb frat boys, but like a queen. And it'd been invigorating, being with all of them in Tokyo. An autumn together.

Laura sat down next to him picking up the road trip one, flipping through it with a warm smile, manicured nails going through the pages.

"These are nice Daniel, you've put a lot of time and effort into them."

"It seemed like a good idea, a good way to reminiscence."

"It is. And it's nice to see so many good photos of him. Happy and smiling, on adventures outside of California. These make me happy," Laura said flipping through and then leaning over to see what Daniel was working on.

"Yeah, they make me happy too."

"Have you heard from your cousin yet?"

"Not yet."

"And classes?"

"All caught up with my papers and homework."

She smiled at him, ruffling his hair. "You know you look much better, healthier now. I wonder what did it? Probably moving in with me huh? I'm like the cool mother-in-law you want to live with," she said with a teasing smile.

Johnny had said something similar a couple mornings ago. How he looked less stressed, happier, curled up warmly by Johnny's side in his bed. He didn't like that they didn't have their own place, it felt weird moving back in with family or Mr. Miyagi, but it was new to live with Laura.

She got up early and worked in her garden and went for runs around the neighborhood with her own Walkman, and then made breakfast. Intense breakfast, that Daniel had a feeling was specifically for Johnny. One of those things she was making up for out of lost time and guilt. Big breakfasts of too much food, packed lunches, dinner, snacks. Movie nights curled up on the couch.

Johnny had fought back a little, arguing that it was too much, and the compromise was the two of them would cook. And it was sweet to watch them interact, figuring out recipes and working together, teasing and gentle bickering. How it always should have been. And it was relaxing. A feeling of a warm home full of love. And Daniel liked pressing in close to Johnny in his bed, touching him in slow ways, kissing his skin and watching him try to be quiet, not silent, just quieter then they were in their own apartment and own space.

And it was a relief not to be working at the apprenticeship. To not be balancing so many things that he'd felt like he was drowning. Adding more and more pressure to himself that as soon as he'd stopped it felt like he was floating. But Johnny held his hand, not letting him float off until the ground became stable underneath him again.

He was able to visit Johnny and Mr. Miyagi at the shop more, he was able to drive down to UCLA to study with the guys, he was able to take his time and focus on his studies and get to know his classmates. He got to relax a little and hadn't realized how badly he'd needed that. To have nice lazy mornings with Johnny, to enjoy long calls with his family and friends again. Though he did pay for them, embarrassed with how bad the phone bill was.

Sometimes for family calls he'd run over to his ma's and that was less stressful. And it'd be nice to have her talk to them and then he'd talk to them and he'd catch up on everything without racking up Laura's bill quite so badly.

And that was nice too. Visiting his mom. Having meals with her and hanging out with her and catching up. Not living with her still but still close enough for a frequent visits. And she came over frequently, brought over dinners that Laura was delighted about.

He'd been worried her feelings would get hurt, staying with Laura instead of her. But she'd smiled at him and kissed his cheek.

“They never got that time huh? I get it. You want to live together and give him that time to spend with her. Don't you worry, I'll be right here, closer than we were when you had that apartment and I'll see you more too."

They never had what Daniel and his ma had, and he'd nearly cried when she'd understood, her own eyes tear filled. Rubbing his back. It felt like they'd gotten cheated. Tricked out of a normal life, of all that time and bonding they should've had. So he went to his Ma's place a couple times a week, to eat dinner and give them space, more time to just live together like they once should've.

And he caught up with Louie. He'd been there through the summer, a pest going to the dojo and following Chozen around like a lost dog, following Daniel around and Johnny. And then while they were gone in the autumn, somewhere between Seoul and Tokyo he went home. Just a little note left behind given to him by his mom.

"Thanks for everything Cuz, needed it. Time to grow up and stop running."

Johnny had been worried but when they got through to Louie's home, he was there, asking about the trip, as if nothing had every happened, as if that had been the plan all along. Daniel had been pissed. Months of Louie not calling home, of worrying them, and then he ran home as soon as they were gone? Johnny had taken the phone from him, answering Louie's questions while Daniel fumed.

It had taken a lot of grumpy dinners with his mom to remember that Louie was a teen. That he was young, that he was going through a lot, and that it wasn't easy.

"Maybe he just needed to get away from it all for a bit," Johnny had said one night while Daniel had been ranting about it again, after another call with Louie that got nowhere.

Daniel had flopped onto the bed looking at him. "What do you mean?"

"All of it hasn't been easy right? His dad being sick? Family talking about it. You know Louie best, you never pushed it right? To talk about his dad being sick. So if he wanted to escape from all of that, to have a vacation from reality, logically you'd be where he'd go."

Daniel had mulled that over, assumed Johnny was right. But he still wasn't happy about it. He was determined that the next time Louie came back to LA and tried to live with him Louie would be put to work. Either at the shop or if Daniel had the dealership open there.

He'd work until Daniel felt better. Which might be forever.

Johnny said it was because he cared, because he was worried. Daniel said it was because he was pissed, but he thought Johnny was probably right on some level.

"Abuela gave me a recipe to test out, you up for being a taste tester later this week? Apparently she's quizzing me on my cooking skills next month," Laura said passing Daniel a glass of lemonade.

"What's next month?"

"There's a festival and I offered to help her at her booth, but in order to be allowed I have to show I can cook some of her recipes. She made it seem like it was a very tough test, but it's really an honor. I don't have any family recipes to cook and the fact she's just letting me have some, letting me learn her recipes? I nearly cried in her restaurant," Laura said. "So I gotta perfect these and the Browns are out of town for the week so I'm starting with you guys and Lucille."

"Ma will love it," Daniel said.

"I hope so, she's a great cook it's kind of intimidating."

They sat together in comfortable silence, Laura flipping through magazines, occasionally watching him place photos, making his way through their journeys, reliving them and remembering all their adventures until Johnny came home.

Daniel cooked dinner while they chatted, having picked up ingredients from the store.

Laura had only recently relented on the your a guest you shouldn't have to cook rule. When Daniel very pointedly said family is different .

The face she'd made when he said that warmed his heart. Stunned and pleased with tears in her eyes. Family. When your family is small, when it's just you tightly holding on to one hand, surviving, it's hard to look beyond and to see the other people around you who are family. And even though Laura was strong, she was still figuring it out. Still learning where her support system was and what her support system was versus what Johnny's was, not realizing that her care towards Daniel and the cobras flowed back to her.

It was nice to cook for her. He liked how excited she got over what he made. Johnny always complimented him but it was like once Laura enjoyed it she managed to pull more words out of Johnny, and it was like being bathed in a warm wave of compliments.

Chicken Parmesan was easy and he'd gotten all the ingredients earlier. Johnny had given him a warm embrace, a soft whisper of Anything I can do to help?

Daniel let him set the table, kissing his cheek.

Daniel listened to Laura's day, shared his own and then it was Johnny's turn. Stories about the shop, about Mr. Miyagi, how many times Chozen came by, his upcoming plans with the kids he babysat or other volunteer stuff.

"The kids are moving," Johnny said mostly to his plate.

He'd looked a little bummed but Daniel had figured if he didn't come clean early he'd get it out of him later, before bed. Possibly slipping in the shower with him and physically cornering him until he caved. Though it never got that bad. He was more forthcoming then he once was.

"The one's you babysit? Where to? The Hills? Malibu?"

"Texas."

That was far. Too far to continue babysitting.

Daniel didn't really get it. There was always more kids that needed to be babysat. Maybe he was burnt out babysitting since he already drew the short end of the stick babysitting baby cousins all the time back in Newark. Not to mention Louie.

But Johnny cared, a lot about these kids, and he was good with them.

"Sorry about that honey," Laura said. "I'm sure it'll be good for them. The air will be cleaner huh?"

"Yeah," Johnny said. "They were the last of Mr. Miyagi's lessons that still needed me."

Ah. More things coming to an end. Maybe when dinner was over, after they watched TV with Laura, or a movie or something Daniel would pull Johnny aside and tell him how much Daniel needed him. How much he'd always need him. And then they could make love, through tears or something.

"What about the animal sanctuary?"

"College kids, high schoolers and scouts took over and that hasn't let up," Johnny said.

"It might be a good time to relax," Laura said gently, hand reaching out to Johnny's arm.

Daniel agreed. If Johnny relaxed they could relax together, spend more time together. They could have even more sex. So much sex that they forgot where one body ended and the other began. Just a tangle of limbs in ecstasy.

"A while ago I went to the dojo."

"You did?" Daniel said surprised, nearly dropping his fork.

"Chozen invited me."

Damn it. He shouldn't have included Chozen's photos in the scrapbooks. Any invitation always seemed to tempt fate. At this point Daniel was going to have just yell back off he's mine every time he saw Chozen.

"Was it okay? Are you okay?" Laura asked gently.

"Yeah, he changed everything. Like even things I hadn't thought of. Like door knobs and lighting. Fixtures and stuff. It's a completely different place. But...he offered something that never crossed my mind."

Daniel chewed his lip stabbing a little too hard at his chicken, cursing Chozen. If he'd made a move, if he'd tried to talk Johnny into something… his brain was going wild.

Apparently Chozen liked to draw, liked to paint, what if he knew Johnny's schedule was freeing up? What if he was offering to paint Johnny? Sketch him? But naked? Or in pin up style?

Even mad, Daniel wanted it. Like some dumb college dorm, like he'd seen when he'd visited the guys or Jessica, he wanted a pin up poster of Johnny on his wall. A calendar of Johnny. Like he'd wanted long ago watching Johnny work at Mr. Miyagi's place.

But the idea that Chozen might reposition Johnny for a better pose, hands on him. Daniel didn't like it.

Daniel was going to give Chozen a piece of his mind.

Shit, he wasn't paying attention.

What had Johnny said?

"...sensei."

"Sensei?" Daniel said with a frown.

"Yeah, uh...co-sensei. He said he could use the help with the kids and if I want to, since he hasn't taught kids it might be good. And I thought, well originally I thought no because me ? A sensei? No one should trust me with that power, I mean what if...what if I'm like Kreese? What if even though I've worked so hard to unlearn all the bad stuff he taught me I repeat it? What if the venom is still there and I spread it to this new group? But Mr. Miyagi well he keeps talking to me about it, about how it's not still there. That teachers are still learning too, at least at first and I'll figure out my own way if that's what I want to do. He said I could be a good one. And well I've been thinking I might...I think I want to do it."

"Teach karate?" Daniel said softly.

"Not full time. I mean just a few classes here and there, mostly the kids. And I'd never be doing it alone, I'd be with Chozen. So it'd be safe."

He seriously thought Daniel's question was related to whether he should be allowed to teach kids? A protest that he shouldn't? It wasn't that, it was more concern. How did he word it properly? Not to scare off this tentative step into trying to figure out what he liked to do? Steps Johnny hadn't taken yet.

"Johnny, are you going to be okay being in that dojo? I'm not worried about you and kids, you're great with kids, I mean we've got all the loving art from Yuna to prove it. And artwork from the kids you babysit. And I bet you'll be a great teacher. My question was more a concern for your mental wellbeing. That...I mean... I haven't been in that dojo yet and I was only in there for a few months. You were in there for years . I want to make sure you'll be okay."

"I think so. At the very least I want to try," Johnny said.

Daniel nodded reaching out and squeezing Johnny's hand. Johnny as a sensei. While he worried it still weirdly fit. He could see Johnny working with kids, teaching them karate and moves. After all he taught Daniel a lot, and Daniel was a great student...to anyone but Johnny. With Johnny he wanted to see how far he could push it, how much distraction he could cause before he could get what he wanted. But sensei Lawrence might get to wear a sensei gi.

Maybe...Maybe Daniel would go watch.

Could you go watch a class?

Surely Daniel could right?

It'd be nice to watch Johnny work out. Maybe Daniel could get an iced coffee or something, maybe ice cream and could sit off to the side and just watch. The way he bounced on his feet, the way he moved so fluidly. The question he supposed then was, could Daniel handle being back in there? After the last time? Being in the dojo at night by himself with Silver had been creepy enough. But the last time he'd been there Kreese had tried to kill Johnny and he'd been determined that if Kreese moved Daniel would be the one to crush Kreese's windpipe.

Would he feel the same cold shaky rage and terror he'd felt then? Would his heart freak out in his chest or would he freeze in fear? Would the promise of seeing Johnny work out, hair all floppy over his hachimaki, arms exposed because the teacher's gi's never seemed to have sleeves so he could see the muscles in Johnny's arms when he moved, or his chest, his pecs exposed from the cut of the gi, probably totally unaware too.

Okay, maybe Johnny shouldn't do it, maybe the gi would be too obscene. Maybe too revealing. Daniel hadn't been able to handle people flirting with Johnny at the shop. What would he do if some military dude or older student flirted with Johnny at the dojo, or heck ogled him in his gi?

He had been wanting to see if his jealous streak had chilled out. Maybe this would be a good test? Maybe Johnny would be fine, because Chozen would for sure as hell defend Johnny's honor.

But-

Daniel wanted to be that person.

Johnny was talking to his mother and his eyes flicked to Daniel, met his gaze for a couple seconds then quickly looked away, the slightest blush on his face.

Oh shit, was he that easy to read? Well surely to Johnny he was, but he thought he'd mastered his expressions lately. Could Johnny tell? That in his head he was putting his hands on the sides of a sensei gi and pushing it open so he could touch Johnny's chest, so his chest was exposed while he kissed Johnny, while Johnny moaned, grinding against Daniel's leg.

Maybe they could spar and Daniel would fight real hard to pin him down and ask what his reward was for winning. Because while sparring had led touching in the past, rubbing against one another, mouths on the other, he wanted to do more. Not that that wasn't pleasant or fun. He enjoyed all of that.

But sometimes Johnny teased that he could still take Daniel with his hands tied behind his back. And Daniel wanted to do that. Want to spar, win, and see if Johnny could in fact take him with his hands tied behind his back, pinned to a mat.

Though they probably had different ideas about that conversation. Daniel meant Johnny taking his dick. But he wasn't sure if that'd be messed up. If he could handle being in that dojo, if Johnny could handle being in that dojo. If...what had it been? The smell of alcohol? No. Smoke. Cigar smoke, had sent Johnny into the corner of the shower at Mr. Miyagi's, rubbing his skin raw trying to get rid of the smell, the feeling of Kreese's arm around his neck.

It would have to wait. A daydream, a hot sexy daydream.

Right. Focus.

Laura had said something and was looking at him.

"Sorry?" Daniel said.

Laura smiled. "I was just saying that this is really good and I'm starting to get spoiled by all the cooking you and Lucille do."

"I'm the one getting spoiled," Daniel said smiling warmly.

"Ah, Johnny you should see the scrapbooks Daniel's been working on. He finished your road trip one and is mostly through your trip to South Korea and Japan."

"Really?" Johnny asked.

"Yeah, I'll show you after dinner."

It was nice, sitting with the two of them. To see how far they'd come, how far they've healed. Remnants of Sid were mostly all gone. The woman Daniel first met was a stranger compared to the woman sitting before him. And the way she interacted with Johnny was so easy, so carefree and happy. She was still her. She'd always be her. But it was like someone had taken all this weight from her shoulders.

They cleaned up after dinner, Johnny washing the dishes, Laura drying and putting them away. Daniel cleaned up his scrap-booking things, setting aside what still needed to be done, more adventures at temples, tea ceremony photos that Johnny had hated but suffered through, stuff they did because Kumiko recommended it or Sato, Yukie and Mr. Miyagi were adamant about it.

They watched some TV with Laura then she headed off to bed with kiss on top of the head for the both of them.

"How was school?" Johnny asked folding the blanket they'd been using and putting it back on the back of the couch.

"Good. Surprisingly easier."

"Did you get to talk to Louie?"

His birthday was coming up and they were trying to figure out what to do. How to celebrate.

"Not yet. I'm going over to Ma's tomorrow and figure we'll call together. Hey, when are you going to talk to Chozen about being a sensei?" Daniel asked gathering up the scrapbooks and putting them safely on one of the bookshelves for later.

"You're okay about that?" Johnny asked hand hovering over the light switch.

"Mixed feelings," Daniel said, kissing his cheek and walking past to Johnny's room. "But they're for selfish reasons."

"Selfish reasons? How?" Johnny asked flipping the light and following him.

Daniel kept walking past the door, past their bed towards the bathroom. He plugged the tub and started filling it up with water, looking over the bath salts and oils.

"I'm jealous of the time Chozen will get to spend with you, a side of you he'll get to see but I won't, not as much anyway, of you sparring with other people. I'm working on it. Or trying. I think...honestly-"

Daniel found a mix he liked and poured it in watching the water get a little shinier, a little cloudier. He looked at Johnny and put his hand on Johnny's chest.

"You will be a good sensei. Better then Kreese. I think it'd be good for you too, possibly...healing?"

Johnny took his hand gently, lifting it to his lips.

"You'll be okay?"

"Yeah, I mean I might still show up and watch, watch you teach and train and practice and maybe it won't be a nice good pure thing," Daniel said unbuttoning his flannel.

"What does that mean?"

"You probably won't want me there."

"Why wouldn't I want you there?"

"Because all I would want is for everyone else to leave and to spar with you one on one, until I pinned you down and we had sex on the mats."

"Is that what you were thinking about at dinner?" Johnny asked.

Daniel stepped back with a grin, testing the water with his hand, stripping and getting in with a pleased sigh, leaning back, head against the tile. He opened one eye and looked at Johnny, face pink, thinking probably the same dirty day dream Daniel had had earlier.

Daniel tapped at the water.

"You going to join me? I'll wash your hair. And back. Or are you just going to stand there and watch me?"

Johnny blinked then started taking off his clothes and Daniel leaned his arm against the edge of the tub, following every inch of exposed skin that appeared. He seemed a little lost for a moment, looking at the bath, at Daniel.

Daniel patted the water again. He'd get a nice view no matter what Johnny did but he also just wanted to hug him, to feel that warm weight against his skin.

Johnny stepped in carefully, sinking down in the warm water, back to Daniel.

"Is this okay?" he asked, before leaning forward and turning off the water.

"Yeah," Daniel said reaching out and pulling Johnny back to him, hugging him tightly. "How was your day? And I don't mean tell me about Mr. Miyagi or customers or how much the shop made. I mean, you, how was your day?"

Johnny was quiet, settling, relaxing against him.

"Better now."

"How so?"

Johnny's hand came to Daniel's knee, the one that'd been injured what felt like so long ago, gently rubbing a circle against it with his thumb. "I like coming home," he twisted his head back to look at Daniel. "Because you're here."

"Cheesy," Daniel said grinning and kissing him.

"You love cheese. Mac and cheese is your favorite."

" Your my favorite," Daniel said.

"Cheesy."

"It's true!"

"So was mine! I like spending the day in the shop, I like seeing Chozen and Sato and Yukie. I miss seeing Dutch and I miss breaks where the guys come up. I like being surrounded by little tiny happy looking trees or helping Mr. Miyagi heal sick ones. But my favorite part of every day is to do absolutely nothing with you. Waking up next to you in bed with no rush because Mr. Miyagi likes opening the shop after fishing and you no longer are running to get hours in before classes. Because you moved your classes to afternoons so you could sleep in with me."

"And have sex."

"Well I like our slow mornings, and I like that at the end of the day I'm excited to go home."

"You really like it here huh?"

"I mean it's nice, but it's you. I'm excited to get home to you. Wherever that is. To listen to whatever you want to talk about, whether it's something important or nothing. I like listening to the frustrated way you try and explain school stuff until it clicks and then the excited way you run off to jot something down. I like eating with you and the way you twirl your pasta in an efficient matter except when it always fails at least once and you get so mad when it happens that you slice it all up into tiny tiny pieces and just stab at it with your fork. I like that you've been reading through the newspapers and magazines and picking fun foods for us to cook together on the weekends and I like hearing about each one you want to try. Or the restaurants that have opened you want to check out for our date night. I like just sitting in front of the TV watching stuff and holding your hand, even when it gets sweaty."

"It's because it's LA! It's too hot here, everything is sweaty and gross."

"Just sitting here, best part of my day," Johnny said resting his head against Daniel's chest, having sunk down enough in the water to do so.

Daniel leaned forward pressing a kiss to the top of his head.

"Mine too," he said softly.

He liked those boring quiet moments with Johnny. His classmates complained about being bored, wanting to go on adventures and about life being so dull. They wanted to go to the bars. But Daniel had had enough adventures for a life time.

The adventures he wanted now were easy ones. To see his friends wherever they may be, to drive around in the Avanti or the Ford with no real goal, to have dinners with his Ma, to kiss Johnny in the mornings and the evenings and randomly throughout the day. He wanted to bump elbows while they were folding laundry together, and then to keep doing it on purpose until they collapsed, play fighting and making out on the bed, ruining whatever effort they'd started and having to begin again.

He liked just sitting there in warm water, holding Johnny and feeling the thrum of his heart beneath the palm of his hand, the gentle rise and fall of his chest as he breathed.

But the water would get cold and their fingers would get prune-y. So he tapped Johnny's chest before getting the shampoo and washing Johnny's hair. It was quiet in the bathroom and it was peaceful. Johnny's hair was soft under his fingers and he had moved to an angle so he could see his face, eyes shut and relaxed. He was enjoying it. Enjoying Daniel massaging his scalp.

How many times had they bathed and showered together and how often had Johnny turned absolutely blissed boneless in his arms? It wasn't enough. It felt like a dessert when he was craving something sweet, or water when he was thirsty after working out on a hot day.

After everything Johnny had been through, after everything they both had been through, to be able to just hold Johnny close and watch him relax, close his eyes and not strategize about their next move, or worry about how best to help Daniel or even before that, just unable to relax because of Sid or Kreese...for him to be so secure in Daniel's arms sometimes brought tears to his eyes. To be told he was home and understand what Johnny meant because he felt it too.

Johnny would be okay as a sensei. He'd be safe. He'd be good at it. And Daniel knew he'd come home asap, because he was home. Just like Daniel every time he went out with his classmates. How he'd leave early because he wanted to be home, wherever Johnny was.

Let them try to have their adventures.

His adventures were over, he'd earned rest, even if that rest was watching his lover's peaceful and relaxed face while he washed and rinsed his hair. While he conditioned it, rinsed it, while they talked quietly about nothing of any importance but important to them because it was between the two of them. Washing and scrubbing Johnny's back and then moving on, washing every inch because Johnny was relaxed.

Well… until he wasn't.

Johnny's blue eyes met his as Daniel pressed fingers gently against him, rubbing.

"Haven't cleaned here yet," Daniel said. "Can I?"

"I should've known it was a trap."

"A trap? What ever could you possibly mean?"

"I was actually falling asleep. Few more minutes and I'd have been out."

"Is that a no?" Daniel asked.

"It’s not a no," Johnny said, shifting so his legs were spread.

Daniel pressed a kiss into his shoulder, hugging him close, an excuse really to just hold onto a handful of Johnny's right pec as he pushed his fingers inside.

Johnny's breath caught, Daniel could feel his heart racing and he kissed more skin as he worked, slowly opening Johnny up, whispering softly to him, enjoying the sounds Johnny made, this version of him only Daniel ever saw.

And that tasted sweeter than any dessert he could order or conceive of. He loved every second of every moment. He'd thought he'd be like his classmates, dreaming of big things. Adventures and big moments. He thought he wanted attention, wanted to stand center stage. And he'd gotten that, a taste of it, but the spotlight burned and it refused to leave him alone until Johnny took a bat to it and broke the lights.

There were moments where he still wanted the light on him, but they were smaller moments. Mostly he just wanted Johnny's attention, wanted all of his focus. Bobby had told him it was probably because he was an only child. Not all that great at sharing.

And he was working on it. But sometimes, when he got stressed during finals, but more frequently, before he quit his job, he worried that Johnny would just leave. That someone else would whisk him away. Someone bigger or stronger, or worse, Chozen. But every time he had that nightmare Johnny was around somewhere. If not in their bed then on the couch or making something awful that his half groggy brain concocted. Like frying up spam for a sandwich that sounded remarkably good at 1am.

It wasn't actually awful. It was a go to response. Daniel was starting to understand his own ones. Like trying to take care of everything himself. Not asking for help. Not communicating when he was worried things were falling a part.

Johnny's go to had been to run, to make himself cheap comfort meals that his mom probably had made when they had nothing. Vienna sausages fried on a slice of cheap white bread. Things they always had in the cupboard like it needed to be there in case of an emergency. Something Daniel had found in the back of Laura's cabinets. Spam, Vienna sausages, powdered milk. Just in case items. Just in case the rug got pulled out from under them there was still that thing.

Even though the fridge and freezer were full. Abuela's tamales, fish from Mr. Miyagi, cookies freshly baked from the Browns in the cookie jar. Things Johnny could heat up and eat at midnight, but it was like he was saving that love for later, savoring it, and eating the stuff that was cheap and he'd had as a child first.

The most creative was probably peanut butter sandwiches that Johnny fried. Daniel did like those. And he always woke up, nightmare or no, when he smelled those, hugging Johnny's back and asking him to make him one too.

No matter how bad things were for him and Ma, food hadn't been a concern. They were close enough to family that they'd just eat with them through the leaner times. But Johnny always made him a plate, always split whatever midnight concoction he made with Daniel, like he knew eventually Daniel would come find him. And maybe that's what he should've seen. Instead of waking up in a panic in a bed by himself. Was that Johnny was just beyond the door, waiting to be found, with food at three am ready if he wanted, to sit with him, groggy on the couch, heavy with sleep and eat whatever it was he'd made, wrinkling his nose at canned meats or drippy pre-packaged deli meat.

But it was fine, because even when the world seemed too quiet, too big or too small, when the world seemed dark and unforgiving and lonely, when nightmares held a tight clawed hand on his heart, making it beat panicked poisoned thoughts into his mind, someone was there by his side. Daniel had Johnny and Johnny had Daniel. And now, now when that happened Johnny woke Daniel up.

A soft, “Hey I'm going to go make a spam sandwich you want one?”

His voice was usually tight, his eyes wide awake for the ungodly hour, his hair was mussed and his body too warm and Daniel would mumble some random affirmation and roll out of bed, following Johnny to eat whatever he got, before falling asleep curled up with him on the couch, always on top of him, weighing him down into the cushions until the sun rose and dawn broke and all the ghosts disappeared.

Johnny was moaning, pressing back against his hands, asking for more, saying Daniel's name in a way that sent a shiver down his spine. Daniel looked around, trying to figure out his logistics.

"Can you push yourself up on your knees?" Daniel asked sliding his fingers out.

Johnny blinked, looked around a little dazed, a pouty frown on his face before moving forward, on his hands and knees. "Like this?"

Daniel stared longer than he probably should've reaching out and squeezing Johnny's ass.

"Daniel?"

"Yeah," Daniel managed, pushing his fingers back inside and watching, enraptured at how easily they went in, Johnny's moans going straight to his dick.

" Daniel ," Johnny's voice was a little more needy, a little admonishing, a hurry up hidden in his own name.

Daniel looked around, soap wasn't really the best and if he could just reach, yup, there was the lube. He pushed himself up carefully. His knee was going to bother him later, but he didn't care, Johnny was waiting and ready and there was an expanse of his back to kiss as he slid in. Kissing the back of his neck, his shoulders, watching him move and shift to accommodate, to adjust.

Daniel was busy enjoying every little thing, the way Johnny pressed back against him, moving with him, the sounds he made, of the water shifting around them, the way his skin felt.

They were a team. And while Daniel had been on teams before, was on a soccer team now, there was something different about a two person team with a back up.

Daniel knew Johnny had his back, and he was trying to make sure Johnny knew Daniel had his. But he supposed, maybe he knew that Johnny knew on some level. If he didn't he wouldn't be there, he would be on his knees letting Daniel thrust into him in a bath tub, or make love to them enough times in their bed that Daniel almost lost track, almost .

Daniel's biggest adventure, when his classmates asked, was coming home to Johnny, was finishing his scrapbook and making dinner. It was going grocery shopping and trying to figure out recipes he wanted to try. It was making Johnny moan under him and come in the bath, cleaning up and then going for another round in bed before Johnny managed to put pajamas on. It was kissing his nose and his forehead and his cheeks and everywhere he could reach while Johnny was looking up at him. It was holding his hand, fingers interlaced, palms pressed together as he rocked deeper with Johnny's legs wrapped around him, the soft parts of his thighs pressing into Daniel's hips, holding on tight. Like he didn't want it to end either, like he needed Daniel just as much, wanted him just as much, liked having him deep inside.

It'd be okay. Johnny as a sensei. Maybe other guys would hit on him. Maybe military dudes or hell even Chozen would. But he'd come home to Daniel every night. Because this was theirs. This bond, this relationship. And maybe Daniel still didn't like the idea of people hitting on Johnny but maybe he could understand. After all he got it. Johnny was gorgeous. But they'd never see him like this, loving everything Daniel did, hungry for kisses, and the way Daniel moved, a symphony of their own creation, guided both along the beats to a perfect crescendo.

Chapter End Notes

Bison Burger
Chicago Deep Dish Pizza
Hanbok
Korean barbecue
ice noodles spicy version
Korean fried chicken
Chicken Parmesan

Pomp and Circumstance

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Johnny put on his suit, the one Daniel seemed to like the best, agonizing over which tie went with it and dumb little accessories like tie clips and cuff links. He'd styled his hair, a little, though it'd taken hours to get it the way he wanted and he wasn't sure it'd stay that way. He'd polished his dress shoes and now had to go get the bouquet he'd ordered from the florist.

He might've over done it again. Just a bit. He knew it was going to be a big one. But it was a big day. He checked over his mental check list. He had the good camera his mom had bought him for his last birthday that Daniel had immediately teased Johnny with, asking if he'd put that cheerleading uniform back on so he could add to some calendar he was making in his head. They'd found a dark room that could be rented, Daniel reassuring him that he knew how to do it because of the photography class he'd taken and really it was good practice for the class, but he'd never share these photos and it was only then that Johnny agreed.

Johnny had plenty of film. Fresh film. Film he could actually drop off to get someone else to develop without embarrassing himself when he went to go pick it up.

Bobby had made a cake and he'd bring that. Lucille was taking care of dinner. He had the tickets that were his gift in his breast pocket. He had his keys. He'd had his morning coffee already and breakfast, a little lonely because Daniel had already left. But it was nice, to be in their own space again. Apartment number 2, because Daniel was adamant that it was okay. Had some surprise he was going to tell Johnny that night. Though when, Johnny didn't know because the party was at Lucille's and it was going to be busy.

He looked at the clock, time to go.

Things were going to change again. But it'd bee nice and peaceful and quiet for a while and Johnny loved it. He loved sitting in their apartment, having moved to West Hollywood just to try it for a bit and how easy it was to hold hands at the restaurants and at the bars. The way no one batted an eye when they kissed, or danced together.

Did he catch more people eyeing Daniel then usual? Sort of. Less girls, but still some girls, but way more guys, but then they'd see Johnny and they'd back off. Half the time. The other half of the time they seemed to study Johnny and then Daniel like they viewed it as a challenge.

Together it was to grab a drink after work and sit and listen to bands play, holding hands and talking about their day, or dancing. Lost in a crowd of people who didn't care and didn't mind that they were there, because they were welcome and the same. It was easier than getting a list from Dutch or Jimmy or dancing alone in their apartment. Because Daniel loved to dance. So once a week, at least, they picked a bar and went dancing, slowly getting to know their new neighborhood, getting to know other people who knew more then they did. They attended shows, befriended their neighbors and some nights when they lie in their bed Daniel said maybe he'd start here. In West Hollywood. Maybe he should open his dealership here.

Johnny knew Daniel didn't want to stay. He didn't want to live there, he didn't like the half hour drive on a good day with good traffic to get to the shop or Mr. Miyagi or their moms. But the guys were so damn close. They saw them all the time. Dinners on campus or at their apartment, study dates where they came over and sprawled out on the floor and on the couch and sometimes spent the night. Dancing together at the clubs, saying yes to strangers because why not? There was magic there and it was nice to be close to their friends, it felt more like a college experience, or at least seemed to be for Daniel.

But he liked living near Encino. Johnny was pretty sure that's where Daniel wanted to put down roots. Johnny did too, but he didn't particularly care where. Anywhere was fine. As long as they were together. But Daniel had his sights set high, he had fancy taste even though he scrimped and saved, even though he blanched at the idea of Johnny booking them a night in Bel Air again, or any other fancy place, even though he was still adamant about economy when they flew. It was like he didn't feel like he'd earned it yet. And when Johnny picked up his bouquet, the big maybe too big one with peony's for good fortune and prosperity, irises of wisdom and victory, Alstroemeria for prosperity, Agapanthus and baby's breath for love and tiger lily for pride he did so knowing Daniel might think it was too much.

It was heavy, which was fine. It'd weigh Johnny down, keep him from the emotions he felt, the warmth in his chest as he found his seat next to Lucille who waved and smiled and kissed his cheek, hooking her arm through his with a warm squeeze. He tuned out of a lot of it. Eyes watching for Daniel, following him moving around, his little cap sitting atop his head next to his classmates.

He was proud. So damn proud that tears filled his eyes.

Daniel almost hadn't done this. He hadn't wanted to go to college, even community college. He'd nearly given up every cent he and his mother had saved to follow Mr. Miyagi to Okinawa. He'd then tried to spend every cent he'd made in Okinawa on the shop. And it'd been such a rough first year after high school. Trying to find out what he wanted to do and being attacked every time he turned around.

Johnny ended up handing Lucille the camera, hands too shaky, vision blurred. Daniel's name was called and he listened to Lucille click, listened to the roar of their friends, of the applause and shouts of his name, of his classmates he'd been scared of those first few months as he tried to trust people again, unsure who to trust and how. Seeing his smiling face as he got what was most likely an empty case for his diploma from the college president, shaking his hand in the bright sun.

There had been so many sleepless nights, so much stress as Daniel tried to take on everything all at once and refused to give up until Johnny tried to dig him out of the rubble.

Daniel had a degree.

Lucille sniffed, passing the camera to Laura who laughed taking over.

"Oh you two, I got it, don't worry," Laura said and Johnny heard the snapping of photos, the clicks and whirs as his mother took the photos he'd told himself he would take, so they could get them printed, so he could get a small one that he'd stick in his wallet with the other photos. He'd show them at the bar next time he went, to the bartender who always made him a drink that looked alcoholic but never was which Johnny appreciated just like he appreciated Jimmy's cousin who always watered down his beers.

He'd wanted to get those pictures but at least his mother was, with her steady hands while Lucille held his and they cheered Daniel on, watching him turn and smile, big brown eyes on them. A beautiful smile, a beautiful wave before he continued off the stage and to his seat. Back amongst his classmates, ready to listen to the final speeches, waiting to move the tassel, fiddling with the cords he got for good grades and all the hard work he'd put in.

Even if one day Daniel never did anything with his degree. If he decided he wanted to just grow avocado trees on a farm somewhere in the future Johnny was still proud of him, for completing it. For attempting it. For trying and taking the steps he needed to take after Silver and Cobra Kai had tricked him. Going it alone, even though he hadn't always been alone.

After they moved in with his mom, Johnny started going to campus more, making his way there to have lunch, to grab coffee with him. He joined him at dances and went to the shows the school put on with Daniel, going through the flyers of events he brought home and asking Daniel what ones he wanted to do.

Dates.

Even though Daniel was adamant their dates didn't have to include going to campus or doing college things.

But Johnny gently pushed back, because it was a part of Daniel's life, these were the people he was friends with, this was the school he'd picked to go to and Johnny wanted to be there with him along the way even if he wasn't in the classes. He wanted to hold his hand on campus or cheer him on like he always did for soccer games, or just be a part of the crowd with him. Because that's what Daniel had wanted, what he'd asked for when he was sick.

He just seemed to feel bad about asking for it again, so Johnny went for it. Meeting him at bake sales and buying snacks he took to Mr. Miyagi at the shop and sitting next to him in the stands during sports games, not really caring about the game or who was winning but enjoying being in an energetic crowd with Daniel, holding his hand tight.

He'd never been scared to hold Daniel’s hand, never wanted to stop, but living in West Hollywood sort of soothed the whispers in the back of his mind about it. That maybe Daniel felt nervous or uncomfortable. But Daniel sought out Johnny's hand just as much as Johnny sought out his. Their hands automatically reaching for one another while Daniel talked to his classmates or professors.

That had been kind of fun. The first time it clicked for them. The “Oh my god this is why you never want to stay out and party! This is why you didn't want to go to the singles mixers. You've got a boyfriend! How long have you two been dating?”

And while Johnny had originally thought Daniel wanted to avoid that whole conversation it seemed, more like he wanted to have it so badly and just needed an excuse. And that excuse was Johnny just being here, comfortable and solid at his side. Because Daniel practically glowed. Happy to talk for way too long, longer than comfortable about Johnny, to the point Johnny got embarrassed.

“We met senior year when I moved here. Did not get along but we've been dating for a couple years now, live together even, so yeah that's why I haven't been attending the mixers. He works at the bonsai shop and he's really good with plants. He's a two time All Valley karate champion like me and....”

It never ended. And the fond smiles of his classmates, of his friends when Daniel opened up to them, let them in, trusted them, was precious. And some of the tension in Johnny's chest released. The worry that these people would push him away or be mean just wasn't there. And he felt so lucky, not just for himself, for Daniel too. And then the invites came more and more frequent.

“We're going to this event you should both come.”

He'd definitely showed up on campus to pick Daniel up and waited outside of his class to hear someone call out, “Daniel you should bring Johnny to the party!”

He supposed part of it was if they wanted Daniel to show it'd be easier to invite both of them, more likely it would actually happen rather than Daniel coming home and laying on top of him complaining about the day or hugging him from behind, kissing his neck and being bored.

Though Daniel never stayed bored for long, because boredom was always quickly solved by hands roaming along Johnny's body. A tiny spark that Johnny sometimes instigated, rubbing Daniel's back whenever he laid down on top of him, letting him start to mumble sleepily until his hands went lower and squeezed and Daniel's eyes would turn to him surprised but playful as Johnny grinned at him.

His mom got all the good pictures. Daniel with his classmates, with his professors, with the guys, with Dutch still a little jet lagged but full of playful tugs on the colorful cords Daniel wore teasing the guys if Daniel was smarter than them all.

Photos with Lucille, with Mr. Miyagi standing proudly at his side, with Louie who was visiting and thankfully staying with Nonnia and Nonnio at a hotel.

Photos with Jessica, Kumiko, and Ali. Everyone who'd showed up or flown in to celebrate Daniel. His eyes were glassy and Johnny was standing back, not wanting to tip him over the edge emotionally because he already looked overwhelmed by all the love and care.

And then there was no escape, it was his turn and he went with the flowers first. Daniel took them, studying the flowers for a moment, a soft warm smile on his lips before passing them to his mother with a “hold this for a moment please” and as soon as the flowers left his hands, as soon as the shield was gone Daniel's hands were on Johnny's cheeks cupping his face and pulling him close.

"Are you crying?"

Johnny cleared his throat. "Not right now."

Which was true, he'd managed to stop, hiding somewhat behind his mother as she took photos as he tried to pull himself together.

"Why have you been crying?" Daniel asked, voice soft, searching Johnny's face. "This isn't worth crying over, it's nothing. People graduate every day."

Johnny broke Daniel's grip on his face, easily moving so he pulled Daniel to him, tightly into his arms.

"I don't care about people. I don't care if people graduate every day. You graduated today. And I'm so damn proud of you, okay? Of all the hard work you put in. You graduated and you're going to get a piece of paper and we're going to frame it and stick it up somewhere. You put in the time and the effort and you showed up. You completed something you set out to do and it wasn't easy and I don't care about the rest of them, I care about you. It's not nothing. I'm proud of you, so I'll cry if I feel like it."

Daniel laughed, a little watery and he pulled back, tears in his own eyes.

"I did it," Daniel said softly.

"You did," Johnny said, rubbing away tears. "You kicked ass and now your a badass with a degree."

Daniel laughed kissing Johnny before pressing his head to Johnny's chest, hugging him just as tightly as Johnny was holding him. It took a while to gather themselves again, to wipe away tears and to give

Daniel back his bouquet, for their photos to be taken some more and to head to Lucille's to celebrate.

It was a lot, and Johnny was tired, drained when they got home late that night, carefully putting things away, taking off his suit jacket and feeling the crinkle of the envelope.

Daniel was yawning by his side and Johnny bumped gently into him, a gentle knocking of his shoulder.

"Got you something," he said passing the envelope over.

"What's this?" Daniel asked while Johnny undid Daniel's tie and unbuttoned the top buttons of his shirt, carefully removing cuff links and tie pins and setting those aside.

"Open it and find out," Johnny said kissing the tip of his ear.

Daniel opened the envelope and then stared at the tickets for a bit. Then up at Johnny.

"Did you get me in for Trade days?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah, I called around, explained you're in the field, all up and coming and what not and they let me buy tickets for the more exclusive days that aren't open to the public," Johnny said. "I figure if you want, I could be your plus one. But if you want to take someone else that's fine."

"Who else would I take?" Daniel asked. "This is actually perfect because, uh here."

Daniel dug around in his pockets and handed him a business card.

LaRusso Auto West Hollywood with an address and Daniel's information.

"Did you open a shop?"

"Well soon. I just finished setting everything up. I've hired staff and we're all set up for repairs in the garage. Mr. Miyagi's agreed to let me give away bonsai with every car sold. I thought it might be fun and this will actually be a great thing, to go to the LA Auto show and talk to distributors and car manufacturers and...really there's so much to do, this is going to be perfect," Daniel said kissing him.

"I'm so proud of you."

"You keep saying that," Daniel said with a soft laugh.

"Because it's true."

Daniel smiled carefully putting his bouquet in the vase they'd borrowed from Lucille in the center of their table, flanked on either side by their bonsai. His cap and gown thrown over the back of the couch before heading off to the bedroom, Johnny wondering how much energy he had left. Enough for something he was sure. Just enough he hoped.

(A couple years later)

Daniel leaned against the Ford, arms crossed, waiting. He could've gone inside and waited but he didn't want to park and then hike over. He wanted to go. It was a secret. A good secret. A great secret and he was excited that he was the only one who knew. How many times had he been surprised and yet this time it was his turn to be in on the surprise.

The sound of running feet and he held out his arms, bracing himself as Dutch threw himself at Daniel.

"What the hell?" Daniel asked catching the young man.

"It's a test," Dutch said grinning at him. "You promised you'd be able to pick up Johnny, I'm testing your progress," Dutch said squeezing Daniel's shoulder. "Look at you, I'm not touching the ground."

He pinched Daniel's cheeks, squishing his face.

"It's good to see you, actually see you you know, not just hear your annoying voice over the phone droning on and on and on."

"I hate you," Daniel complained.

"Love you too," Dutch said.

Daniel smiled hugging him. "You reek man, What did you do on the plane? Bathe in booze?"

"Oh yeah, some babo on the flight wouldn't leave the flight attendant alone and I got in the way and ended up drenched in wine. So yeah.

Please add shower to the schedule."

"How long have you just been sitting in wine soaked clothes?"

"Oof uh seven hours? I got used to the smell."

"They did nothing for you?"

"I mean I got a bottle of champagne, but I already kind of had champagne, so actually I brought you all a bunch of nice soju's, and maekgoli. My bag is ninety percent souvenirs."

"We still haven't finished with the stuff you brought last time."

"Well hurry up or else your next place is going to need a booze cellar like Jimmy's place."

"You're heavy man, I'm putting you down."

"No! You're doing so well. Carry me everywhere," Dutch said.

"No. I'm glad you're home. I'm happy to see you, but I still need to feel my arms to drive."

"You're no fun," Dutch complained with a pout sighing and moving to put his feet back on the ground, picking up his bags and putting them in the trunk before getting in the passenger seat.

"How are our boys?" Dutch asked as Daniel drove away from LAX.

"Graduating," Daniel said with a grin.

"Finally."

"I mean it's on time," Daniel said.

"Yeah but you already graduated."

"I went to community college."

"Any changes I should know?"

"Not really. I mean according to Tommy and Jimmy we should expect all the graduated sorority girls to return to cheer on Bobby as he walks. So we've got to be extra loud for Jimmy and Tommy."

"They said that?"

"No, Johnny recommended it. Jimmy's family is throwing a big party afterwards, so we're all going there to celebrate."

"How's he and Jenny?"

"Really good."

"So we should be expecting a wedding?"

Daniel frowned looking at the road. He hadn't thought about that. Those two had barely been dating four years and marriage was the next logical conclusion he supposed. Yet Johnny...

"Yeah, maybe."

"And our golden boy?"

"Turning into an old man at a young age. I found him asleep on the couch like a cat enjoying the sunlight coming in."

Dutch burst out laughing. "Seriously?"

"Yeah. It was cute. And it makes sense we went out with the guys to some end of year campus parties throughout the week and he just passed out."

"What is he already a senior citizen?"

Daniel laughed, "Maybe. But he's good. Still co-teaching with Chozen a couple times a week and working at the shop."

"How's apartment number 3?"

"Good, but I want a house."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah."

"And the dealership?"

"Good. Louie's staying with us again and working at the dealership. I'm also making him go to school. He's pissed"

Dutch laughed.

"Really?"

"Yeah I think he wanted to hang out at the dojo the whole time."

"What, he's got a crush on Chozen or something?"

"Oh god I hope not. His parents wanted him to get a degree, so I had him talk to the guys and he's doing a four year program at UCLA."

"Oh I bet he hates you now."

"Kind of. I told him he couldn't just fuck around this time around and he begrudgingly agreed, we had a long awful conversation about how he can't just leave and avoid things by hiding out here. He's got to call home and he's got to work."

"Did you ever find out why he ran away here and then ran away from you?"

Daniel sighed. "Yeah, Johnny was right. He was having a rough time at home and needed a breather. Apparently it was chaos and he felt in the way and overheard his mom say something about how difficult it was to take care of everything and worry about her kids so he thought it'd be better if he wasn't there. So he came here. Something about how I always make living in LA sound cool and like an adventure. Share in the magic or whatever. I was so confused because it's not magic. I got my ass beaten by a karate gang. But I guess because I'm here and Johnny's here he wasn't scared to be here? I guess he finds Johnny calming or something. I guess his sister was having a rough time and all with their dad and was being like…mean on top of everything. Like the way she was hurting I guess was similar to how Chozen grieved. Lashed out a lot and he just felt like he was in the way. That he wasn't wanted around. So he came and hung out with us and I guess Vanessa apologized, the family was getting counseling and more help to manage everything, I think Nonnia and Nonnio went down to help for a bit, so he went home."

"So he's calling home still. His dad seems to be going through a better patch. Like things are looking up I guess? And now he's here because his family wants him to study out here. College, and as much as he complains he's actually studying. I've come home quite a few times to find him sitting at the dining room table with a big stack of books studying next to Johnny, asking him to read over his papers and reports."

"How domestic."

"Yeah, it's actually quite nice and I think Johnny likes it."

"How's Louie doing at the dealership?"

"He's a fucking nightmare," Daniel said with a groan. "He keeps playing tricks on people. I'm about to murder him if he switches the sugar for the salt at our coffee table again."

"You've been having a lot of salty coffee lately?" Dutch asked with a laugh.

"Too many."

"Is he nicer to Johnny at least?"

"Oh yeah, total respect for Johnny, but it's like all his respect for me has turn to rebellion. The best part of my week is when he's at the dojo studying with Chozen. Then at least he's driving someone else nuts."

"Chozen's also drinking salty coffee?"

"No, more like Louie turns on the LaRusso endless chatter on Chozen and Chozen still hasn't figured out how to combat that."

"Poor guy."

"Poor me!" Daniel said. "But, I haven't told Johnny this...but I've been looking at the cars coming out you know?"

"Yeah."

"And the Avanti isn't old really, it's just he's got a one of a kind unique car and he does all the repairs himself and I worry about it. I'm thinking of getting him a car next year."

"Damn Daniel that's a big gift."

"Yeah....but I want him to have something to drive for when the Avanti eventually has to be set aside you know? That's coming up. Like that damn company has gone bankrupt so many damn times that I don't think they've got the parts. And I mean it's a custom one, so they didn't really even have the parts anyway. I spent like a whole month looking for old Studebaker Lark parts because that's sort of how it was frankensteined together right? But that company was also kaput. To the point I was digging around junkyards to see if I could scrounge up spare parts just in case. So it's time. And he's not going to do it. He's not going to buy himself a car. So I've been circling ones he'd like and I mean I've got all these car magazines lying around all the time and I talk to him about cars all the time so I've been seeing what kind of style he likes and it looks like he's really into the muscle cars coming out so I'm thinking next summer I'll get a few on the lot and get him one."

"It's got to be red. Dude loves his red cars."

"Yeah," Daniel said with a soft smile.

"What about this baby?" Dutch said tapping the dash of the Ford.

"Thankfully Ford probably isn't going anywhere any time soon, unlike Avanti, but this is already a classic and my insurance lady keeps yelling at me about how classics can't be day to day cars if I want to be insured while I drive it. So I already got a new car. Just thought you'd like to get picked up in this one."

"Two new cars huh?"

"Yeah I get now why Mr. Miyagi always drives that damn truck. I love my Ford, but the damn insurance is such a pain. And since we work with insurance when selling cars at the dealership and fixing them up in the garage it's a huge pain to have them be pissy at me specifically."

"Yeah I can see how that'd look bad."

It was not really want Daniel had planned to talk to Dutch about. But it was one of those things that built up that needed to find an outlet of escape and Daniel couldn't stop it on the way to Dutch's mansion, following him in and to his room, sitting on the couch while he showered and changed into something less wine soaked.

"You can stay with us or Ma if you want, Ma said you're more than welcome. I mean you can stay with any of us," Daniel said when Dutch walked past drying his hair.

"I know," Dutch said. "But I want to spend a few days with Mr and Mrs. P." Dutch said. "And I've got to go through my stuff and repack some things for when I go back. Plus my parents said they left a huge stack of documents I gotta sign."

"Seriously?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah I'm a part of the company now even if I spend 90% of my time training in taekwondo."

"Are you in school too?" Daniel asked.

"Soon, but everything is mostly in Korean so it's pretty hard. I'm studying though to take their like version of the SAT's. They only happen once a year and the whole country takes them on the same day, so it’s intense. My sanbonim wants me to go to Yonsei."

"What would you study there?"

"Business," Dutch said with a sigh.

"Can't you study something else if you want?"

"Well I mean I can take cooking classes, but there's not a lot of options at the moment within my language reach. I mean I can hold conversations and travel around super easy, I can hold phone conversations and go to the movies or see performances, but scholarly shit? Not there yet. I'm going to go check on Mr. and Mrs. P, okay? And maybe grab some honey."

Daniel nodded getting up and following Dutch down and out of the mansion and into the conservatory. It was as beautiful as it always was but no peacocks came strutting out no matter how many times Dutch called. Daniel frowned as he held jars that Dutch filled with honey, bees buzzing around, complaining about his peacocks. And then Daniel spotted Mrs. P watching them through the undergrowth.

"There," Daniel said.

Dutch turned slowly and Mrs. P stared.

"Hey, come say hi huh?" Dutch said.

Mrs. P turned her head away from him and disappeared into the foliage.

"Oh they're pissed at me for not being around," Dutch said with a sigh rubbing a hand through his hair. "That's why they're not coming out huh? Well good thing I know they can be bribed."

He wandered over to the gardeners corner, looking around the shelves and pulling out a jar. He shook the jar and nothing happened. He opened the jar and two peacocks jumped out of the bushes and ran straight for Dutch making more noise and commotion then Daniel had ever heard.

Dutch laughed as they flapped their wings and fanned out their tails chirping and squawking at him.

"See, pretend as much as you want that you're mad at me for being gone, but really, you will roll over for any treat," Dutch said setting the treats out and gently running his fingers over their feathers. Beaks started pecking at him but Dutch grinned, like it tickled, like it was their version of kisses and not actual pecking.

"Yeah I'm home for a bit, missed you both too. I'll see you again tonight so don't hide from me okay?"

"Alright," Dutch said looking at Daniel. "Shall we go scare Johnny?"

"Scare?" Daniel asked with a laugh digging his keys out of his pocket.

"Well I want to surprise him, maybe jump up behind Johnny or something and see how he reacts."

"Once upon a time you'd have gotten socked in the face. Now?"

"Well I figure the person whose mostly surprising him is you. I'm curious if he can tell."

"Oh he can tell," Daniel said. "How about we grab lunch and go to the shop?"

"Perfect."

Dutch sneaking up on Johnny, hands covering his eyes was anticlimactic.

"Dutch?"

"How the hell did you know?" Dutch complained, hugging Johnny and complaining into his shoulder.

"You're the only one who wears that aftershave," Johnny said.

"What?"

Daniel burst out laughing, "If we hadn't gone home for you to shower he might not have been able to tell."

Dutch groaned, smacking Johnny's back. "It's unfair, totally unfair, it was suppose to be a surprise, you were supposed to think I was Daniel or guess and get it wrong a bunch and then when you saw it was me, shriek and say ‘oh my god Dutch you're here? You're finally back? I've missed you so much my heart has ached every moment since we last parted’."

"That's what you want?" Johnny asked with a laugh.

"I wanted something. More than Dutch?" Dutch said with a pout.

"Well whatever you do don't try that on Chozen, you'll end up on the floor."

"Well now I have to try that on Chozen," Dutch said standing up and grinning.

"I said don't."

"It won't hurt, I'll be fine. When's he normally get here?"

"Well that's his car. At least let him put the drinks down before you try to scare him," Johnny said with a sigh.

Daniel sat down next to Johnny, taking his hand and lacing their fingers, kissing his cheek. The chimes clattered as Chozen opened the door, calling out a greeting and setting the drinks down.

Dutch moved quickly hands reaching out to cover his eyes for the surprise but then Chozen caught his hands, twisted to throw Dutch to the ground, eyes widening as he saw who it was.

"Oh shit!" Chozen said, twisting and catching Dutch before he crashed into the ground.

"Why the hell did you sneak up on me?" Chozen asked. "I could've hurt you!"

Dutch grinned up at him, "Eh, you caught me, no harm no foul."

"You could've gotten badly hurt!" Chozen said.

"He looks pissed," Daniel said with a soft laugh.

"For Dutch's safety," Johnny said quietly.

"Shut up peanut gallery," Dutch said. "You at least missed me right? Unlike these heartless bastards right?"

"Hey! That's not what I meant," Johnny said. "I did miss you,"

Chozen frowned looking down at Dutch. He stood carefully, helping Dutch to his feet, righting him, letting go, turning around and leaving the shop.

Daniel burst out laughing, the sound echoing the shop.

"Hey!" Dutch said, "What the fuck? What did I do? Where's Mr. Miyagi? At least he'll be happy to see me."

"Oh come on Dutch I'm happy to see you," Johnny said. "I did miss you, but we also just saw you like 2 months ago."

"Just saw me he says, as if the ocean between us is mere puddles in a rainstorm. Mr. Miyagi! I missed you! Where are you sir?"

"He's in the back," Johnny said with a sigh.

"Well I'm going where I'm appreciated," Dutch said sticking his tongue out as he passed.

Johnny sighed leaning his head on Daniel's shoulder.

"You okay?" Daniel asked looking at the bonsai on the desk.

"Yeah. I know he's just playing, but still, I am happy to see him."

Daniel picked up a pair of bonsai sheers and made a few adjustments before leaning over and kissing Johnny. "He knows that, you know? That you love him just as much as he loves you. And he's happy to be here. He just wants all that pomp and circumstance."

"Isn't that the song they play at graduation?" Johnny asked with a soft chuckle.

"It is!" Daniel said. "Good catch."

"It's a bad joke."

"Yes but it caught your attention and that's all I wanted it for."

"Your baiting me with bad jokes? To what end?"

"To cheer you up. Your tears are cute and I enjoy teasing you but I don't want you to be actually broken hearted because Dutch is home but teasing you too. Cry on me when we get home, but cry because you want me so badly that you can't think of anything else. Cry tears of joy because I'm giving you what you want but you still want more and don't know how to ask. Cry as you cling to me and beg for more."

"I can't take you anywhere," Johnny whispered, face burning bright red.

"Welcome to confused but horny, it nixes out the blues just a little bit," Daniel said with a grin working on the bonsai.

"What do you mean?" Johnny asked.

"I find it helps anyway," Daniel said. "When I get overwhelmed or upset or bothered by something I change my focus to you. At first it was How would Johnny handle this situation but then I'd start thinking about you a little differently and before long I was just super horny and confused and would go find you and it didn't necessarily fix things but I felt better for the moment and then well sometimes after we had sex I'd feel much better and had worked through it."

"I don't think everyone works that way, but that explains some things. You've accidentally conditioned yourself that sex solves problems, I can't believe it. Isn't the whole point that sex doesn't solve people's problems?" Johnny asked, arm wrapping around Daniel's waist watching him trim the bonsai.

"People yeah but me, solves a lot of my issues. Because why be upset about my grades in school because I've got you under me begging me for attention? Why worry about sales or signing up a new manufacturer for the dealership when your on your knees sucking me off? Why stress about anything when I've already won at life because you kiss me so greedily and grind just enough to drive me wild when we go out dancing at the club that I know when we get home you will taste oh so sweet once I get my mouth on you? And sing so beautifully when I play with you?"

"You're weird but I love you," Johnny said face bright red and burying it against Daniel's neck.

"I love you too," Daniel said.

"AHA! SEE MR. MIYAGI WAS HAPPY TO SEE ME!" Dutch said running back out. "Unlike you who had no response and Chozen who fucking ran away from me! At least Daniel was there to pick me up or else I might feel like no one cared."

"Johnny would've picked you up but you wanted to surprise him," Daniel said. "Stop teasing him, you know he loves you."

Dutch sighed falling dramatically into a stool nearby. "It's just bothering me okay?"

"Chozens back," Johnny said.

"Huh?" Dutch said turning.

Chozen pushed the door open and walked over setting a cup in front of Dutch.

"What's this?" Dutch asked taking it carefully in his hands.

"I got everyone else drinks, but I didn't know you were here. Johnny said you like gas station coffee with three Irish creamers and a hot chocolate packet the best, so I went and got it. Welcome back," Chozen said.

Dutch looked at the cup of coffee in his hands and then back up at Chozen. He set it down carefully on the table and then threw himself at Chozen who caught him with a slight stumble.

"What the hell? Stop doing that!" Chozen said.

"No fucking way, you keep catching me man, I'm going to keep doing it."

"So I should drop you? Logically that means if I want you to stop I shouldn't catch you."

"But you wouldn't, because you missed me."

"Just because I missed you doesn't mean-"

"You care!" Dutch said. "And you know what Chozen, I'm happy to see you too. Missed you as well."

The look on Chozen's face was delightful. A look of horror, of realization, that he was in over his head, regret, and a little bit of acceptance.

"Is this how you greet people now?" Daniel asked with a laugh. " A running jump?"

"Yeah, It's fun," Dutch said, having still not let go of Chozen. "Johnny I expect you to catch me later."

"I will," Johnny said.

It was kind of nice sitting in the stands, not having any focus on him, holding Johnny's hand. They took photos of the graduation. Johnny using the camera his mom gave him that Daniel used more. For their road trips, for their vacations.

The flowers Johnny had gotten had taken most of the morning to get together. Specific and unique for each guy. School colors mixed in with their favorites and meanings that Daniel enjoyed trying to parse out with the well worn language of flowers guide.

Johnny looked nice in his suit and Daniel may have spent most of the speeches wondering how the buttons would sound if he ripped Johnny's shirt off the first chance he got. Maybe grab him and run to that school library on campus where people, rumor had it, went to have sex.

Johnny could lean against the stacks and hold on to the shelves, shirt open with buttons lost somewhere under the stacks, quietly moaning as Daniel whispered dirty things to him and took his time. Touching him and enjoying a new space since Johnny seemed too reticent to have sex at any of the libraries where he knew the librarians. Like he didn't want to get caught by them but was still interested, somewhat, doing it in a library.

Maybe after they saw the guys they could sneak off. They'd walk across the stage, get their empty diploma holder, shake hands with random people they'd probably never met while in school but were important on some level and then they'd move back to their seats, move the tassels to the other side, cheer, throw their caps and then after it was over they'd take photos, give the guys their bouquets and Daniel would drag Johnny off into the crowd to the library and make him moan into the books until he was begging Daniel for it. And Daniel would give it to him. Everything he had.

He liked that.

Waiting was awful. Now that he had a plan. But he was proud of the guys, he did like trying to out cheer the sorority girls who'd showed up for Bobby. He liked the surprised look Jenny got on her face when there were more cheers for her then she expected. He liked that Dutch talked Chozen into cheering too. Louder than he'd heard Chozen before. Watching the guys find them and grin, waving.

He liked taking photos of Johnny and the guys after. The way they reacted to Dutch being there, like they were pleasantly surprised. The way they hugged each other all so tight.

"You know you've gotten pretty good with a camera."

Daniel glanced over at Tommy's aunt.

"Oh, yeah, it's pretty fun."

"You took the photos from those road trips you all did to Ohio right? And Japan and Korea?"

"Not all of them but yeah."

"They're good. If you ever get bored, we can always use help on photoshoots. You still have my business card?"

"I do," Daniel said with a soft smile.

She nodded, patting his shoulder and then turning to Tommy holding out her arms. Tommy's uncle was smiling but his eyes were full of tears and he was saying something that made Tommy nod rubbing at his eyes.

Daniel took pictures for them. Watching as the guys were pulled into that photo, the way they hugged Tommy tight.

He knew that feeling. Where the big moments happened and you took a moment to realize who should've been there. It'd happened at their high school graduation too. That wall of grief that Daniel hadn't thought of that snuck up on him. The similar look on Tommy's face as his aunt cupped his face telling him how proud they'd be of him.

It wasn't something they'd talked about. Not frequently. But it was understood. Daniel understood. He started to put the camera down, to reach out, surprised to find Chozen had beaten him to it. Saying something softly, Tommy nodding.

He'd be okay. It'd hurt, it'd change by the day, but he wasn't alone and he seemed to realize that. To know that. And heck if Chozen even knew that Tommy needed careful handling then everything was fine.

"Hey, how about we get out of here for a bit?" Daniel whispered to Johnny while the guys were taking pictures with their families.

Pictures with them had been taken, group photos had been taken, flowers had been given out. Now the library was singing to Daniel. Begging him to take Johnny there. Johnny glanced at him, studied him for a moment and then nodded.

"Okay," Johnny said.

Daniel grinned. Johnny was going to love this. Sex surrounded by nerdy books. Bobby had said it was around the corner. Towards the back. In a section students didn't go too frequently and the books didn't get checked out too much so the librarians never had a reason to go back there.

It was a nice walk across the campus away from the crowd and through the library and voilà. There it was.

Daniel turned towards Johnny prepared to start phase one of his plan, but Johnny was taking off his suit jacket and hanging it up on the edge of the stack before kissing Daniel. It wasn't the plan but it was fine. Johnny already understood the point. Maybe Bobby had told him about the spot? That saved time.

Daniel ran his hands down Johnny's back, along the silky dress shirt following it to where it was tucked into his dress pants and sliding his hands down and in. Grabbing. Johnny's hands went straight for his belt, for the zipper and buttons, reaching for him as well.

They were on the same page.

Perfect. Absolutely perfect.

Daniel knew that Johnny would be into it, into having sex at a library, out and— wait a second. Where was he going?

Johnny had sunk to his knees and Daniel gripped the shelf tightly as Johnny took him in his mouth. Fuck.

He'd planned everything. All his daydreams had been with Johnny holding on to the shelves until his knuckles were white, trying not to be too loud. He hadn't planned for that to be his own problem. He hadn't even thought of Johnny on his knees sucking him off. It was too hot.

He had to cover his mouth, hope that he wasn't making too much noise as Johnny bobbed his head and moved his tongue and Daniel tried to focus on him, on the feeling, on enjoying it.

Sometimes when he came home from soccer practice Johnny was curled up on the couch reading and he looked so cute and happy that Daniel wanted to do it right then and there, uncurl him and have some fun, see if he could keep reading, teach Daniel something new. His favorite nerd.

"Johnny," Daniel whispered, he didn't want to come yet. He wanted to keep going. He wanted to hold Johnny close. To be buried deep inside. Though going the slow teasing route he planned wouldn't be possible. Not unless he got real balanced real fast. "Can I stick it in."

Johnny pulled away coughing and laughing.

"What?" Daniel asked.

"Technically what I'm doing— isn't it already in?" Johnny asked grinning up at him.

"From this position all I can do is grab your head and I don't want to do that. I wanna hold you at the same time," Daniel said with a frown resting his head on the shelf, breathing purposefully looking down at Johnny who was touching him without any purpose which was even more frustrating.

A lazy way of moving his hand. The whispering was difficult. Trying to stay quiet was difficult, especially with Johnny studying him and then looking down at his dick with way too much focus. Like he was debating something.

He shifted, searching through his pockets and handing Daniel a condom. Daniel stared at it pushing back from the stacks a little. Then looking at Johnny as he stood up, looking around, making a decision, taking off his clothes.

"Johnny?"

"This is what you had in mind right?"

Not exactly. Somehow it was better. He wanted a picture, but that'd be too loud wouldn't it? In the quiet library.

Johnny carefully setting all his things aside. This was braver, bolder than Daniel had expected and he felt it in his throat, like it was suddenly hard to swallow because there was skin to look at everywhere.

"How?" Daniel asked, pressing in close, hugging Johnny, his hands running over Johnny's skin, carefully turning him to face the stacks.

"This morning you said 'the guys are graduating, you have no librarians at their library, no love for it. Let's have sex there'."

Had he?

He remembered day dreaming about it as the days led up to graduation. Actually every time he came to campus he thought about how Johnny probably wouldn't do it ever at any of his libraries, but this one was out of his scope. And the guys were leaving, so...oh god he had talked about it that morning, half asleep while cuddling close to Johnny. No wonder Johnny had been on the same page. He'd been blatant.

Johnny was pink, the back of his neck was red, embarrassed, blushing, but not hiding.

Daniel kissed his neck, kissing soft warm skin, as he worked his fingers in with the lube he'd put in his pocket. He'd put several little packets in his pocket. Lube and condoms, but he went with Johnny's, the one Johnny had handed him. Johnny who knew exactly what he wanted but teased him anyway. It warmed his heart, watching him grip the spaces at the end of the shelves. A soft gasp here and there.

"Ready?"

Johnny nodded and Daniel kissed his shoulder, pushing in. It made him think of what could've been. Being in a quiet library. If they'd gone to college together then they could've found time to meet in random places. They could've had lunch together on the green. Daniel would've always known where to find him. In the library with a stack of books, studying hard. And Daniel could've been on one of the teams. They could've studied together again, and Daniel could've tried to secretly jerk him off under the table when he got bored.

It was probably good that they hadn't gone to school together. Daniel wouldn't have made many friends. He'd have run away to find Johnny. To talk to him about everything, about nothing, to kiss him until he was breathless and rock into him until his breathing became uneven until they both saw stars in every darkened semi private corner on campus.

They didn't get caught which was probably a dangerous high and made Daniel wonder what else they could get away with but Johnny walked with a purpose back towards the graduation, like he wasn't going to be deterred. Purposefully walking. Daniel grinned wrapping an arm around his waist, bumping his hip against Johnny's.

"You okay? You're overcompensating as you're walking. That's not your normal gait."

Johnny stiffened. "And whose fault is that?"

"You're the one who gave me a condom."

"Like you didn't have any," Johnny said hand going into his back pockets, searching Daniel's pockets. "I bet you have plenty, somewhere."

"Not there, but I don't mind you looking. Keep going you might find a treat somewhere."

"You sound like a perverted old man."

"I will be a perverted old man one day, but only to you," Daniel said. "Try again, I'll give you a treat if you guess the right pocket."

"How many pockets do you have?" Johnny asked.

"Nine."

"Those odds are awful."

"But a treat is a treat."

"What kind of treat?" Johnny asked.

"A good one."

Johnny studied him thoughtfully, giving his ass a squeeze from the pocket he was currently in. "Well maybe it's a treat anyway."

"And you say I'm the perverted old man."

"You're a bad influence. No one is going to want to visit us when we're old."

"That's fine, as long as you're there that's all I need," Daniel said with a grin watching as Johnny blushed.

He took his hand out of Daniel's back pocket, studying him thoughtfully which was delightful. Daniel loved having those blue eyes on him, focused on him. Even if it was a dumb game. Johnny's hand went to his hip, sliding into his front pocket.

Daniel laughed in delight.

"You going for your own treat? You already had it in you mouth and ass, you want it again?"

"You said I could look in your pockets," Johnny said, his ears were red, but his fingers were still searching under pretense, touching and teasing.

"I'll give you hint. Condoms don't do well in tight spaces like wallets and pockets. I mean inside, yes, but storage, it causes friction," Daniel said.

"I know that," Johnny said.

"So you're picking pockets where you know it's least likely to be on purpose huh?" Daniel asked with a grin.

"Well you have kept them there before."

"Yeah, for short periods. I knew we'd have to sit for hours for the graduation so I didn't put them there."

Johnny pulled away, the warmth, the pressure and weight of his hand leaving and a slight disappointment remaining.

"You can try again," Daniel said.

"Will I still get a treat?" Johnny asked leaning in close, lips brushing Daniel's.

His heart was pounding, he wanted to grab Johnny and go somewhere else. He wanted to find the nearest darkroom and develop the picture he took. He wanted to find a dark corner and go for another round. And Johnny, he was smiling, like he knew, like he knew from Daniel's face that he was driving him wild.

"I thought you were sated," Johnny said. "You seemed like it anyway."

"I can go again."

Johnny sighed, like it couldn't be helped, like he was about to break terrible news. He kissed Daniel.

"I don't think we can hide away much longer."

He was right and Daniel hated it. Time. He wanted more time. For it to be as slow as his childhood summers. At the start, with everything thick and slow and sweet. But he was right. They had to return to the graduation. To cheer on the guys. To have dinner. It wasn't their day. Instead it was like he'd taken a little pressure off his own shoulders.

He pressed his forehead into Johnny's shoulder.

"I want to go somewhere else with you."

"A trip? Where do you want to go?"

"Nowhere. I just want to see you naked in the sunlight again. You didn't have to take off all your clothes, but that was hot."

Johnny laughed softly. "I didn't want to get them dirty or rip them."

"I wanted to."

"What get my clothes dirty?"

"No, rip them. I wanted buttons to get lost everywhere."

"That again?"

"It's satisfying."

"What the sound?"

"The way the fabric gives and you always make this sound when I do it that I like and then I get to see your skin, I don't know it's like ripping open a present."

"Well...later," Johnny said kissing him gently on the temple. "Now we owe the guys some of our attention huh?"

"Yeah," Daniel said with a pout.

"Why are you frowning? What did we do on your graduation?"

"Partied and then had sex all night long."

"Yeah and apparently graduations now get you going too. We're going to have to avoid them from now on," Johnny said pulling away and walking towards the festivities.

"Hey, it's not the graduation. It was the chance to do it in a library," Daniel said following after him.

"Sure," Johnny said like he didn't believe him.

"It's not the graduation, it's you, it's the library it's that I thought it'd turn you on and I was right wasn't I?" Daniel asked.

Johnny looked away, paused at the edge of the festivities, Daniel could see their friends.

"I didn't dislike it," Johnny said.

Daniel smiled. He could work with this. He kissed Johnny, leaned in close and whispered in his ear. "If you can figure out which pocket then I'll take you to a bookstore and buy you books, as many as you want. That'll be your treat." Before pulling away and waving towards the guys.

He glanced back seeing Johnny processing, shocked, flustered, a bit of that spark of competition, determination.

He grinned.

Johnny was going to be hands on and it was going to be great. Daniel couldn't wait. He'd tease him. He'd buy him books no matter what. But the more chances he took the less he'd buy.

That'd be the game.

He was excited. Excited to take Johnny to a bookstore and see his face. They'd gone to the library, he went to the library all the time, but he never seemed to buy himself books. Like he just couldn't get over it, like it was a luxury he wouldn't buy himself. So Daniel was going to do it.

"Hey!" Jimmy said arm wrapping around Daniel's shoulders. "I've got a question for you."

"Congratulations again," Daniel said. with a smile.

"It's step one," Jimmy said with a sigh leaning his head against Daniel's in an exhausted manner. "I've got to get my P.H.D. I got to pass all my tests, it sucks. But step one done. And actually there's a step two that's kind of a surprise. Um so this is a secret," he lowered his voice and whispered, hand cupped around Daniel's ear. "I've decided that after the LSAT, when Jenny and I pass, I'm going to ask her to marry me."

"What?" Daniel asked more out of shock then a need for clarification.

"Yeah. I mean it's not right now, but I wanted to let you know, because if she says yes I want to take Johnny away for a weekend."

"What for?" Daniel asked.

"I'm going to ask him to be my best man. I figured we'd go and I'd ask him then. You going to be okay without him for a weekend...in like maybe October of next year?"

"Yeah. I mean we're not glued to the hip," Daniel said.

"You say that and yet..." Jimmy said with a grin hugging Daniel. "Man I'm so fucking excited."

Married.

Jimmy was getting married?

Daniel smiled, hugging him back but when Jimmy left his side it settled a little weird in his stomach. Like a block of ice.

Jimmy was the first to get married and Johnny was going to be the best man?

Jimmy was talking to Johnny animated and Johnny was nodding and smiling. A secret surprise. Johnny would go on a trip, a fun trip with his friend and not know until they go there.

It was sweet. Even if it was nearly a year off. Even if there was a chance for a no.

But it felt...a bit like how one his aunts complained when she got drunk about how much it'd sucked to be the eldest sister and her little sisters getting married first. You're happy for them but then it casts a big shadow on your own life. Like Johnny and Daniel had been together longer...but they couldn't.

Could they?

He tried to push it from his mind. He was happy for Jenny, for Jimmy, for the guys. But it was like a dark weight, an anchor he hadn't noticed keeping him from keeping up with them.

They'd marry. They'd have kids. They'd buy a house and get a picket fence. And...

Johnny hugged him from behind, palm pressing to Daniel's chest, slipping beneath his jacket. There was a slight sound as Johnny's hand went in the hidden pocket inside of his suit jacket.

"Will you really buy me books?" Johnny asked.

"That could just be candy," Daniel said looking back at him.

"I know what a condom feels like," Johnny said with a laugh. “Besides when have you carried candy in your pockets?”

"I might one day. But yeah I'll buy you books," Daniel said. "Let's go later okay?"

"Okay," Johnny said smiling warmly kissing his cheek.

Daniel congratulated the guys, enjoyed the warmth and familiarity of being with his friends, of their dinner, of spending time together, of watching them cry and hug Dutch who laughed and grinned but Daniel caught the tears in his own eyes. Of watching Bobby's little siblings, no longer quite so little, run around enjoying the party, of the food everyone made, of meeting extended family members who smiled and welcomed Daniel like an old friend, an old family member they hadn't seen in a long long time. Part of everything, someone they knew from stories.

And Jenny. Jenny hugged him warmly, was just as welcoming, just as happy to see him. And he couldn't imagine her saying no. He couldn't be mad at her or at Jimmy. That life was unfair. That the world wasn't as nice as this little bubble they were in. Because she welcomed him, loved him, just as much, saving him the last piece of cake, whispering to him little secrets and jokes like they were the oldest of friends.

He was happy. Happy to be there amongst them all. Happy to watch his friends succeed, to move forward in life. Knowing they had worked so hard. Laughing when the girls showed up, in small groups to congratulate Bobby, who turned red because he kept getting kissed with his parents nearby. A mess of different colored lipsticks.

A tidal wave of love.

It was nice to float along in it all. With Johnny nearby smiling and talking and holding his hand.

In the morning Daniel asked Johnny for directions to a good bookstore, didn't matter if it was close or not, as they sat together having brunch at a diner they liked. Like his mother Johnny liked to share breakfast. Something fun that was sweet and something savory. A nice mix with a coffee full of cream and sugar.

It was fun to drive him to the bookstore, listening to him give directions. He watched Johnny move towards the store then stop and pause and look back. Like he wasn't sure. Like he didn't know what to do. Like whatever it was that stopped him from buying books settled like a weight on his shoulders again.

How many books did Johnny actually own?

Ten? Maybe.

If he didn't count the ones his mom filled the shelves with at her place in Johnny's room. It was too few for a bookworm. And they were all well loved and well worn. Like the language of flowers book.

"I insist," Daniel said kissing Johnny's ear. "I'll carry them."

Johnny still didn't move.

Daniel pushed him gently towards the store. "At least show me around huh? Since we're here?"

That got him moving and they went in. It smelled like books, new ones that hadn’t been cracked open yet. Fresh ink from the printers.

Johnny showed him the books on cars, on business, on karate and then like he was drawn by something he wandered off, curiously through the stacks, taking a look.

Daniel had prepared himself mentally for a marathon. Like going shopping with his family back in Newark. Exhausting and boring. But watching Johnny move through the stacks, focused, brought back the image of him naked, trying to be quiet, holding on tight to the bookshelves.

And whenever he managed to shake off that memory Johnny just seemed...peaceful.

Happy. Pulling books from the shelves reading the backs and putting them back.

Wait. Why was he putting them all back?

Daniel covered Johnny's hand with his over a book he was putting back.

"Do you not like this one?"

Johnny looked at him. "It's not that I don't like it. But owning it.... I don't know."

"It's okay," Daniel said moving closer, stepping into Johnny's space. Close enough to smell his aftershave. The detergent they used, the cologne Johnny liked. and to feel the warmth of him through his clothes. "I didn't give you a limit. Try me. You don't have to be picky."

"What if I hate it?"

"That's fine," Daniel said moving his fingers to slip them between Johnny's, pressing his finger tips against Johnny's palm. "Grab the books you want to try."

Johnny nodded, pulling the book from the shelf again.

"I'll hold it," Daniel said taking it from him. "Give them all to me. I'll follow you around and carry them. Like a cute school date. Let me carry your books for you Johnny."

"What will you get out of this?" Johnny asked.

He didn't seem mad, or upset, just curious and Daniel smiled. "I get to watch you and fall deeper in love, and by following along behind you I can enjoy the view."

Johnny blushed lightly leaning forward to kiss him. "I love you too."

Daniel grinned. "I know now. Go forth and pick more books."

Johnny nodded and moved through the bookshelves through the sections studying books, reading the backs. He still put some back but he also added books to Daniel's arms. A wide array. Classics, fiction, poetry, books on plants and flowers, design, cookbooks, science fiction, fantasy, romance, a little bit of everything. And then he turned and looked at Daniel and the stack of books in his arms and seemed stunned.

"That's too many," Johnny said rushing back to him. "I'm sorry I wasn't paying attention, I'll put some back."

Daniel turned, twisting out of his way, hugging the stack. "Nope, I'm carrying these and I'm buying them."

"But Daniel, books are expensive."

"Is that it?" Daniel asked looking back at him.

"Huh?"

"Is that why you never buy books?"

"It's a luxury and-"

"You yourself said that we can afford a few luxuries."

"Yeah, but-"

"No buts. You like flowers, flowers don't last forever Johnny, their beauty is fleeting and yet you buy me flowers all the time. Those are a luxury, but a luxury we both love. Books bring you joy and you should enjoy a luxury every once in a while. You should enjoy things you like. And these books are new. You never get new books for yourself. To keep. You borrow books from the library because, what, you can't spend the money on yourself? That's okay. Then I will. We'll do this every once in a while, we'll come here if you want and you can look around for new treasures, so find some more Tesoro."

Johnny flushed red and Daniel grinned. He'd never called Johnny a nickname. But it fit. Johnny was his treasure. And Johnny had spent enough winters with his family, enough time to know what it meant. And it settled like it was easy. Perfect.

Daniel smiled following him through the store as Johnny got more books. "If it's too heavy," Johnny said softly, ears burning still. "We can let them hold it at the front desk."

"Not yet," Daniel said with a smile.

If it did, he'd take it to the front, but he liked it. It was a fun way to test his strength. How many books did Johnny weigh? When would he be strong enough to carry him too?

He had a goal. He was working on it and he'd gotten better. He could pick up Dutch. And soon, soon he'd sweep Johnny, his tesoro, off his feet.

He liked the idea of it, the taste of it on his tongue. Daniel turned to look at the shelves. There was a section they hadn't gone down. There was a book his older cousins used to giggle about. He wanted it.

"Johnny, I'm going to pick up a book too. For us."

"Which one?" Johnny asked following him.

"I'm not sure yet, but I think you can help me pick one. Since my hands are full."

Johnny nodded, following him down to the aisle then turning bright red.

"You want one of these?"

"Yeah, there's supposed to be pictures right? Which one looks like something we can do?"

"You want a sex guide?"

"Yeah. Why not?"

Johnny picked up one, flipping it open and held it out to Daniel who studied the positions. It was a man and a woman, some of it was doable but some wasn't. He shook his head, that one wasn't it. Johnny grabbed another, slowly turning redder.

Daniel went with the fifth one and Johnny added to the pile. Enough positions and information about sex and health and lasting longer that seemed applicable for anyone that would sate his curiosity at least for the moment. There was even a section on different cultural practices he was curious about. He'd add to the jar.

They left with four bags of books. Johnny insisted on helping him carry them to the car and Daniel relented because it was too awkward holding all the weight by the handles of the bags that cut and dug into his palms. He couldn't evenly distribute it anymore.

"Thank you," Johnny said when they put the last of them into the trunk, kissing him ever so sweetly.

"We'll build a library," Daniel said with a warm smile. "Slowly."

Johnny smiled and Daniel couldn't wait. Couldn't wait to see Johnny go through his books like a kid at Christmas when they got home, flipping through the pages excitedly and knowing that was because of him.

Chapter End Notes

"In 1984, West Hollywood became one of the first pro-gay municipality regions in the country, with traditions and their recognition of acceptance recognized by locals and visitors. In 1985, West Hollywood was the first city to create a same-gender domestic partnership registration for its residents, as well as to offer same-gender domestic partner benefits for city employees." (Wikipedia)

I wanted them to live in a LGBTQ+ friendly neighborhood for a bit at least and it seemed perfect since one of the locations for LaRusso Auto from Cobra Kai is West Hollywood. It's also closer to UCLA campus then Reseda so I thought it'd be nice for them to hang out with the guys more frequently.

Daniel essentially graduated early because he worked so hard with honors. You get cords in the USA if you're on the Dean's list and your GPA is high enough. Aka he did well.

The Trade Days tickets is also part of LA's auto show, so essentially a convention for Daniel to go and learn about cars and new cars that's been happening for a long time in LA and a chance to meet and interact with people similar. Another conference but car geared and specific.

Asterisk

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Jimmy had invited Johnny out on his own and wouldn't say where they were going. He'd showed up, asked Johnny to pack and apologized to Daniel, thanked him again, before shoving Johnny and his bag out the door and into his car.

A surprise. A good surprise he said.

They drove north, listening to rock music along the way while Johnny tried to solve the mystery set out before him. Where were they going?

They were taking the I-5. That meant Santa Clarita, except...they passed Santa Clarita and only stopped for snacks at a gas station and to get coffee.

They kept going north. Staying on the I-5. Maybe Bakersfield?

No. They didn't turn off. Which meant they weren't going to Fresno either unless Jimmy was taking a different route.

"Just enjoy the ride," Jimmy told him with a smile. "Relax, eat your corn nuts and chill."

Johnny sighed eating his corn nuts and watching the road. Maybe San Jose or San Francisco, or Sacramento but why?

Johnny studied Jimmy wracking his brain. He should've had some guesses and he felt awful not knowing. He'd been in his own little world for so long, focusing on Daniel and helping Mr. Miyagi with the shop. Focused on helping Louie Jr. and Chozen, on Dutch being gone and trying to keep up with everyone overseas that he'd neglected his friends at home.

"I'm sorry," Johnny said.

"Huh? For what?"

"Not keeping in touch."

"We've kept in touch. We eat dinner together like every other week man."

"But we still don't see each other as much as we used to."

"True," Jimmy said. "But that happens. We were all at UCLA while you were in Reseda. When you guys lived in West Hollywood for a couple of years that was easier. But we didn't all go to the same school. If we did… college isn't the same man. Bobby, Tommy and I saw each other for lunch and for dinner but we didn't have the same classes much after we finished the gen ed ones. The campus is too big to run into each other between them. We made it work, just like you make it work. Plus, when you're in a relationship, that person you want to spend a lot of time with becomes the focus of your time. Right?"

"Yeah."

"I mean it helps that we all know and get along with Daniel but like you guys have an apartment and full time jobs and are like adult adults with lives and responsibilities and what not you couldn't like run down to UCLA and go on a drinking binges with us, or like come to a kegger all the time. It's not the same. But I think it's okay because we know that if we need you you're there. And if you need us, you know we're there, right? Even if we don't talk every day or every week or every month, we know that we're there for each other when it's important."

"Is that what this is?" Johnny asked.

Jimmy looked at him startled and then broke out into a grin. "I'm not going to tell you. You gotta wait, because I have this whole plan and I'm not going to ruin it but letting you try and solve this mystery early. Patience."

Johnny nodded watching the scenery pass, marking off places and possibilities as they traveled asking Jimmy about school, about his cousin, about the family business. Even though he'd known for a long time that Jimmy didn't want to take over he knew it was still important to Jimmy that despite all the pressure his family heaped onto him that he still cared and loved them, he just wanted to be free, and that it was easier now to talk about them with that approved distance. Jimmy talked about the weird laws he was learning about, local and across the country and international.

"In Arcadia peacocks are considered citizens you know? So like if Dutch took Mr. and Mrs. P out that way they'd have the right away when it came to traffic," Jimmy said with a laugh. "Or there's this town where you have to own two cows in order to be allowed to wear cowboy boots. I always thought the fashion police were fake. There's also one in Arizona where you can't let your donkey sleep in your bathtub, why that's a thing I don't know but I bet it's a funny story. There's also a couple countries where you can't fly a kite."

Oakland.

They were going to Oakland.

They'd made the turn off onto the exit and it was starting to get dark as Jimmy pulled up at a hotel.

A nice hotel.

Their room was too nice.

A suite with extra rooms that Johnny carefully set his bag in before walking towards the balcony and looking out taking in the view.

He turned towards Jimmy and raised and eyebrow.

Jimmy just smiled. "Let's grab dinner and then get some sleep. I'm exhausted."

"I would've driven."

"Yeah, I know," Jimmy said with a grin heading back to the door.

Johnny followed him through the hallways and to the elevator down and back to the street.

"Not to make you homesick for Daniel but I figured we'd eat Cioppino tonight and try the crab tomorrow."

"Cioppino?" Johnny asked.

"It's an Italian fish stew. And the crab is currently in season, it's Dungeness crab."

"What do you want?" Johnny asked suspiciously.

Jimmy laughed throwing an arm around him. "Nothing much I hope. But patience still."

The food was good. He wondered how much Italian food he hadn't had. He wondered if Daniel would've liked it, if he'd ever had it. What other Italian foods could they try together?

Jimmy was talking about LSAT, about what a pain it was to have to take a big test in order to get into another school. But he and Jenny were doing it together and it was nice. But he bet Johnny understood that. Understood how nice it was to just spend time with the person you love.

They walked around after dinner, heading back to the hotel and Johnny stared at the phone.

He wanted to call Daniel.

Was it too late?

Fuck it.

He was going to call.

If Daniel was asleep maybe he'd stay asleep and Johnny would just leave him a message.

It rang once.

"Hello?"

"Daniel-"

"Tesoro."

Johnny felt his face burn. He wasn't sure when Daniel decided on keeping that pet name, but it was embarrassing. He didn't dislike it but it made his heart pound every time. It reminded him of every time Daniel gently held him and whispered sweet nothings about how much he meant, how he wasn't just his winnings or his failures but a person that Daniel treasured.

He couldn't get used to it.

"We're uh, in Oakland, We had Cioppino for dinner," Johnny said quietly.

How did people normally check in?

He felt awkward like he was reporting his day, talking to some sort of digital diary. But it was Daniel. And the guys always did it.

Every night they spent away from home they called home to their families and Johnny never had. And then he was always home so he hadn't really needed to. When they'd traveled he'd sent postcards to his mom instead. But Daniel talked about how he worried that Johnny would run away on him, just silently leave and never tell him, disappear and not come home. Which didn't even cross his mind. He was so happy where he was with Daniel in their apartment, whichever apartment they were in, at the shop, with his friends and family, getting tacos at Abuela's, all of it.

"Was it good?" Daniel's voice sounded a little breathy.

Had he run to catch the phone?

"Yeah."

Johnny didn't know what else to say. How he felt.

"I just wanted to hear your voice," Johnny said. "I think we're going to bed soon, might just watch TV. No clue what we're doing tomorrow. Jimmy refuses to tell me."

He felt nervous. At least a little but it was nice, hearing Daniel's voice. Knowing he was there.

"How was your day?"

He heard Daniel laugh, listened to him talk about his day and settled in on the bed, listening. It was like when Daniel went on his trip, how far away he'd gone and then they'd talked so much, so frequently and Johnny had loved it. If he closed his eyes it was like Daniel was there with him, holding his hand and it was lovely. It was perfect, and when he said good night some of the tightness in his chest was gone. He focused on that warmth while Jimmy called Jenny and he took a shower and went to bed.

In the morning Jimmy woke him up, drumming on his chest in a playful way and grinning.

"Let's get breakfast and walk around a bit."

"Okay," Johnny said getting up and dressed.

They got waffles and Jimmy talked and Johnny listened and it was nice.

Jimmy was right. When was the last time he'd hung out with the guys one on one?

He'd done it all the time when he was younger, wanting to make sure he didn't fade away in the first group of friends he had, working on making sure all his bonds were strong so he wouldn't get left behind like he assumed would inevitably happen.

"I'm happy for you man," Jimmy said sipping on his coffee.

"Yeah?"

"I mean I've never seen you call someone before like that you know? And then I realized how fucked up that is that like maybe the last time I saw that was maybe Ali and it wasn't even the same. Ali was more...I don't know you liked her and all but you didn't...she wasn't family," Jimmy said.

Johnny looked at his waffles, the corned beef and hash to the side with the sunny side egg.

Family.

A person to call and let them know you got somewhere safely. A person to call and say good night to and talk about nothing and everything. Even if Johnny couldn't think of anything to say or didn't have much to say Daniel always had enough for both of them. Like he was overflowing in it.

It wasn't like the first couple of times he'd called Ali and wrote down a list of topics, things to talk about to seem interesting.

He wasn't trying to impress Daniel anymore.

Or he was, but not in basic things.

It was...nice. He wasn't on all the time, on display, on center stage, in the lime light trying to prove himself.

Instead....he just ‘was’ and he could impress Daniel with dumb shit like flicking the bottle cap off the old fashioned sodas they had and the root beer his mom brought over and trying to teach Daniel how to do it.

Daniel hadn't mastered it yet but he was trying.

Or just doing push ups while they were watching TV and jerking his head to tell Daniel go ahead, get on and feeling his comforting weight on his back. Or making dinner and fixing things around the apartment.

"I like calling him."

"Yeah?"

"What about Jenny?"

"I like calling her too," Jimmy said with a smile.

He wasn't going to say anything was he?

Whatever the purpose of their trip was, Johnny was just going to have to be patient. It was a little frustrating. But he could be wait.

They walked around for a bit more and then as the afternoon wore on Johnny found himself in the midst of a big crowd.

Jimmy's arm hooked through his pulling him along up towards security guards who smiled at him and gave him passes on lanyards.

"Here you go Johnny. Ready?"

"For anything I suppose," Johnny said putting the lanyard around his neck and following Jimmy through the door.

Backstage passes.

"Can I ask where we are?" Johnny asked.

"Oakland Coliseum," Jimmy said and Johnny followed him past all the busy people getting ready. "I got us a good spot to see it."

"To see what?"

"Day on the Green." Jimmy said.

Day on the Green. Oakland Coliseum.

"Baseball game?"

Jimmy laughed, tugging on Johnny's arm and pulling him closer, arm around his shoulder. "Nah man. Cooler than that. Because okay, you know I was nervous before when I asked her but shit I'm nervous asking you too."

Johnny stared at Jimmy, he was smiling, excited, but still nervous.

"You need a kidney?" Johnny asked.

"What? No! Oh shit, those are the lights that tell us it's starting soon. Come on lets go to our spot," Jimmy said pulling Johnny along and into the front row.

A few chords played and Johnny turned his gaze to the stage then back at Jimmy.

"Wait. What?"

"Day on the Green," Jimmy said with a smile. "Lots of rock bands."

"Okay, hurry up, what do you want?" Johnny asked turning to Jimmy as he began feeling the music reverberate in his bones and lungs.

"I asked Jenny to marry me."

"And?"

"She said yes!"

"Congratulations. Now why the hell am I here?" Johnny asked.

"Listen to the music. Enjoy it. I'll tell you when it's quieter."

Johnny frowned but as the music drowned out any other conversation he turned back to it. Back to the stage, listening to the sound, the songs.

When had he last gone to a concert? With Ali? Oh that was so fucking long ago now. Everything felt so long ago.

Jimmy was getting married.

It felt overwhelming. Everything was overwhelming. The music, life, how much time had passed.

Jenny was a nice girl and Jimmy was happy.

So fucking happy.

Jimmy, by his side singing along with the music, totally out of key but happy anyway and Johnny felt tears prick his eyes.

He missed his friends.

Those paths they were on, were branching further away. Not terribly. But Dutch was in Korea and the guys had graduated and moved on and Jimmy was going to walk down the aisle and have pretty flowers and get a house, and he'd be a lawyer and he'd have a bunch of kids and kids took up so much time.

When would Johnny see him again?

He blinked back tears and sang along, grinning so hard his face hurt because Jimmy wanted this to be something. What Johnny didn't know, but something and he'd ensure whatever it was would happen.

Jimmy deserved that much.

And Johnny…he'd rebalance eventually.

He'd figure it out. Because like Daniel had said at the lake house, they were in each others lives for life, even if they didn't see each other often. Not every day like they had in high school.

There was a drunken buzz in Johnny's limbs from dancing and standing for so long in one area, as they meandered their way back to the restaurant Jimmy had booked for dinner. Somewhere to try the local Dungeness crab.

Johnny set down his things, t-shirts Jimmy got him, that matched ones Jimmy got himself. Soft band t-shirts. They sat inside because it was cooler then it was down in the Valley and Johnny waited, trying the crab dishes Jimmy ordered, risotto and a mac and cheese that made him homesick for Daniel.

"Okay," Jimmy said after a while. "I prepared a speech."

"A speech," Johnny repeated studying Jimmy.

Was he...breaking up with him?

No, that didn't make any sense.

Friends broke up but not...Jenny wasn't that type of girl. And Johnny couldn't think of anything he'd done that'd make her tell Jimmy that they couldn't be friends any more.

Jimmy took a deep breath and then smiled.

"I brought you here to ask you a favor, but first I want to explain why I'm asking the favor. Why you. I want you to know you're not the only one I'm roping into this. I'm going to make Dutch pitch in too. Drag him back from Korea and put on a suit too. But there's only one position that's really got the biggest to-do. Right so. Johnny, will you be my best man at my wedding? I'm going to ask the guys to be groomsman but I want you to be my best man. And yeah I thought I'd get that confused look.

“Johnny you realize that I'm getting married because of you? Like not because of you because of you, but because when we were studying karate together and I was all confused and didn't know what I wanted to do and I thought I was fucking drowning under the pressure of family business and trade and shit I didn't care about, you kept me afloat. You took me to bookstores and you brought books for me to borrow about anything and everything I expressed even the littlest amount of interest in.

“You went with me to tour places and learn what they did with their lives. What went into a firehouse or found out what a marine biologist did. I mean I'd be fucking miserable if it wasn't for you. I'd have done business school and international business and I'd be bored out of my mind. Law...law is better for me. And because of you I met Jenny. I mean the circumstances are total shit. Sid was a total shit show and he deserves to be rotting in hell but we won and I got to try being a lawyer, I got to see what went into it all first hand and I met Jenny. And I got the courage to spend more time with her, to hang out with her and we started dating and you know she likes you.

“You made her feel welcome. Chatting with her when she was by herself at my families party at my place because my parents needed to talk to me. She knows I love you and the guys and Daniel and she loves you all too. All of you dorks. Like I do. You've had my back all these years and I just...I mean maybe weddings aren't your thing, but I'd appreciate it if you'd have my back again, when I marry her."

The tears Johnny had fought off earlier came swarming back and he rubbed at his face.

"Johnny? You okay?" Jimmy asked softly, moving his chair closer and hugging him.

"I thought you were going to break up with me."

"Why on earth-nah dude you're stuck with me," Jimmy said holding him close. "I want you to be there. For every dumb moment you can make it to. I expect if we have kids you to be on diaper patrol. I mean I trust you before like Dutch. You and Bobby are first up to bat with kids. Because you both actually have experience. You all get to be uncles when that happens. She wants a few. But that's a few years off. First I want you to help make sure I get down that aisle you know? Best man's the leader of the pack so it can't be anyone but you. I mean if you'll do it."

"Yeah," Johnny said softly. "I'll make sure it goes well."

"You will? There's so much we've got to do. Weddings are such a pain. It's a huge task."

"I know," Johnny said softly. He'd have to find his binder. "I'll help you find everything."

Jimmy slid to his side of the booth, hugged him close rubbing his back letting out a sigh of relief. "Oh thank god. I don't know why I was so fucking nervous about it. But I was. Almost as nervous as when I popped the question after we got our LSAT results back."

"Before we head back tomorrow," Johnny said.

"What do you want to do? We can do anything you want."

"I want to get some more of this mac and cheese to take home to Daniel," Johnny said pointing to the dish. It'd been good. Daniel would like it.

Jimmy burst out laughing. "Of course. We'll get some to go. Daniel knows by the way. I told him my plans when we graduated. But the guys don't know yet. So give me like a week or two to let them all know."

"Where are you taking them?" Johnny asked as Jimmy reached for his food.

"Nowhere. Just taking them out to dinner."

"No concerts?"

"Nope this was just for you and I."

Johnny smiled softly at his food, listening to Jimmy talk fondly about

Jenny. About the plans they had so far, what they needed help with, what they were struggling with. And Johnny tried to think of where he'd put that binder. The one he once put together for Sid, with a different wedding in mind. One where all the stuff in it had been a huge waste of time. But maybe he could repurpose it, use it for something new, to make Jimmy happy.

Johnny was drunk. He hadn't meant to but there were so many things to cheer.

Jimmy was getting married!

Jimmy had passed the bar! He'd gotten a good job that he seemed excited about.

Dutch was home!

They kept cheering and Johnny kept downing shots that burned his throat and made his eyes sting.

He'd planned the night.

He should've known that he'd end up a mess. But he was still trying to focus.

He was still in charge.

They were in Las Vegas because that's what Jimmy wanted. He wanted to see the shows and so they'd seen the shows. They'd eaten at the fancy buffets and made small bets at poker tables.

He'd made them leave their wallets behind, giving everyone a set amount of money to use. That way none of them would bet away their pants because they were so damn drunk.

It wasn't that he didn't trust the guys. He trusted his guys. But there were other people he was in charge of.

Jimmy's classmates and friends from law school, from other schools, his cousins, Jenny's brothers. Random childhood friends. And Johnny had to keep them all under control.

Thankfully the guys and Daniel helped keep everyone together, herding their group along.

He was grateful he wasn't alone with all these people he didn't know particularly well. He supposed he could rely on Jimmy's cousins, that they could hold their liquor, but they should have fun. Not pay attention to the fact one of the law bros kept flirting with the waitress who clearly wasn't interested and having to distract him every time she came over so she could work and he'd miss her.

The magic kit Daniel had got him last winter was surprisingly handy at distracting drunk lawyers. He hadn't caught on yet, it was still working, but it was exhausting.

And he and Daniel had such a extravagant room that Johnny half expected a lecture on "special occasions" but it never came. And now he was drunk. His skin buzzing and warm and he felt a little cloudy.

He'd coordinated the party with the maid of honor. To make sure there wasn't an overlap between groups. They'd gone to Mexico. He was pretty sure they'd seen a drag show in LA before they'd flown out to drink and enjoy time on a beach. They'd left a couple days earlier than the guys had.

That had also sounded like fun. He hadn't been to a drag show since they'd lived in West Hollywood. He missed the atmosphere there. Seeing all the other people like him, like Daniel. Just out and about living their lives.

But Jimmy hadn't been to Vegas, wanted a guys trip to Vegas.

So there they were.

Johnny kept looking at the 24 hour wedding spots.

He kept watching drunk couples getting hitched. Eloping. And he felt like a moth to a flame.

He wanted to poke around, to look in.

He cheered again, another toast, another clink of shot glasses.

To Jenny!

To Jimmy!

To a long life of matrimony!

To kids and a house with a picket fence!

And Johnny felt a little queasy.

He hugged his friends.

Good strong hugs.

The kinds the kids always told him they liked.

He missed those kids.

But they were happy where they were.

Sent him postcards and letters from Texas.

He figured it'd stop eventually.

They didn't need him anymore.

His friends were growing up.

They were living a life he'd wanted.

He loved them. He loved them very much.

"We love you too man," Tommy said.

"You going to be able to get to your room okay?" Bobby asked.

Johnny nodded standing, stumbling a little and heading out to the strip.

Daniel had left to call his mom, had bowed out early, which was fine.

Totally fine.

Johnny understood.

Besides, it was nice to just be them. The five of them as the others had dispersed to play games or go to the stripper shows that Jimmy was adamant he didn't want to see.

The five of them cheering to memories of times on motorcycles and dumb Halloween costumes and all their adventures.

But he missed Daniel.

He wanted... He wanted a lot.

Too much.

He kept eying a chapel.

He was by himself.

He could just go look.

Curious.

It hadn't been on the main strip.

Where had it been?

He wandered a little.

Las Vegas was so busy on the strip.

Loud, crowded, bright.

But ah, there it was.

He took a deep breath.

He'd just go in and look.

The door was open.

When had he last been in a church? His mothers wedding? One of the weddings Sid made him attend in itchy suits?

No.

Bobby had had a thing at a church recently.

He'd gone to that.

He sat down in one of the pews.

There was a couple, giggling, unable to keep their hands off one another talking with a priest. He was smiling as well.

Johnny sat and watched.

One couple.

Two couples.

Five.

It never ended.

Men and women coming in, leaving hitched.

Eloping.

Some with friends, some just the two of them.

A few asked him to be a witness. He signed when they asked, because he was there.

"You in town for a wedding?" The officiant asked during a lull.

"Bachelors party."

"Ah, You thinking of getting married?"

Johnny blinked out of the fog of booze. "Uh yeah."

"When?"

"I don't know. I don't think I can."

"Anyone can get married. You can just bring her here if you want. Could be married tonight."

"You said anyone," Johnny said leaning back from where he'd been leaning forward, arms folded over the row in front of him looking at the flowers and turned to the priest. "But you also said her. Which means I can't. Not here anyway."

"We've been helping young couples get married since the forties. Without having to wait, especially in times of war, we've always been a refuge. Of course you can get married here."

"Can I marry a man?" Johnny asked.

"Oh," the priest said.

"Yeah," Johnny said trying his best not to let all of his unhappiness show. That everyone, anyone, had an asterisk, and it excluded him and Daniel.

"How long have you been together?"

"We've known each other since senior year of high school. We've been by each others side since January 1985," Johnny said.

They hadn't started dating yet, but they'd been next to one another for so long. What felt like so long.

The man next to him sighed. "That's a long time."

"Yeah."

"And you love him?"

"Very much."

"I wish I could marry you. I could do the ceremony but you wouldn't get the paperwork. You would get the rights that that entails."

"I know," Johnny said softly, head bowed looking at his hands.

That was the thing he was worried about. He'd heard so many horror stories from their friends when they lived in West Hollywood. Being barred from the side of a loved one in emergencies.

"Sometimes," the preacher said softly. "The people who come here have just met. They're gambling and I wish them all the best. I decided to do this because my parents hadn't been able to marry wherever they wanted until 1967. I wanted to make sure that anyone could and they were the first couple I married. Cried through the whole thing. I thought everyone's view was too narrow, but my own view is still too narrow."

Johnny nodded around the lump in his throat.

"I hope you get to marry him."

"Me too," Johnny whispered.

"Johnny!"

He looked up at the guys.

"What are you doing here? Why are you crying?"

"Am I?"

"Bachelor party?" the preacher asked.

"Yeah."

"Who am I congratulating?"

"Uh me," Jimmy said.

Arms wrapped around Johnny in a hug.

"Why are you here?" Johnny asked looking up at Tommy as the guys sat down around him in the pews.

"You think, after being your friend since before high school we can't tell, even plastered drunk, that you're putting on airs that you're okay?" Tommy asked.

"Plus you went the wrong way. The hotel was the other way. And there's no way even drunk you would walk in the opposite way of where Daniel is even if you're drunk. You're directions aren't that shit," Dutch said.

"So why are you at a chapel huh? By yourself?" Bobby asked, reaching out from the pew in front of Johnny and tucking hair behind his ear.

"There's all these signs saying 'anyone' can get married in Nevada. I wanted to check."

"I'm sorry Johnny," Jimmy said reaching out and taking his hand and giving it a squeeze. "Is that something you want?"

"I..." Johnny frowned.

This was Jimmy's time, not time for them to worry about him.

Jimmy shook his hand.

"Hey! None of that. My bachelors party has been a blast. You managed to let the bozo's from work get their debauchery in without me having to deal with it or interact with it. You found me slots where I could play and wouldn't waste a ton of money but would get the most fun for my drunk ass. You ordered me the dumbest most ridiculous drink I've ever seen which is saying something since I've bought your ass that dumb pink Cadillac monstrosity in the mountains more times then I'd like to think about or count. I've had a great time. You've done a great job. So tell us okay?"

"Yeah we've been on this ride since you told us you liked Daniel. We've got stakes in the game okay?" Tommy said.

"Isn't it skin?" Bobby asked.

"Skin in the game?"

"Yeah."

"Wouldn't stakes be more like gambling?"

"Yeah but skin means you're own body is on the line too. You get that?"

"Yeah, weird. Anyway. We spent forever trying to help you get a date with Daniel. If you want to marry him...why the hell didn't you say so?"

"Why wouldn't I want to marry him?"

"I don't know? Not everyone wants marriage man. Some people just want to chill."

"And your mom went through a messy divorce," Bobby said gently.

"I love Daniel."

"Yeah I know. So you want to marry him?"

Johnny ducked his head, face burning. "Yeah."

"What a reaction!" Dutch said with a laugh. "Dude, how long have you wanted to marry him?"

"A long time."

"Yeah?"

"I mean I thought you did, but you've got it bad if you're checking out chapels in Las Vegas to see if you could elope. Would you have eloped?"

"No," Johnny said softly. "Mom and Lucille wouldn't like that."

"What about us?" Tommy complained.

"You're here," Johnny said.

"Ah so automatic invite," Bobby said with a nod. "Makes sense."

"We better have an automatic invite," Dutch said.

"We could still do a ceremony," Bobby said.

"Not the same," Johnny said.

"Well no, but-"

"You don't get the same legal protections," the preacher said.

"Yeah," Jimmy said softly.

"When it's possible," the preacher said. "You come back here and I'll marry you and your guy."

"No way man," Bobby said. "That's my job."

The preacher looked at Bobby surprised.

"Ah, father meet father," Dutch said with a laugh.

The preacher smiled patting Johnny's shoulder. "I'm glad, relieved that you've got good friends who want to be there. Looks like all you need is the green light to go. I hope it comes soon. You guys enjoy the chapel. My next couple should be arriving soon. Father," he said nodding to Bobby.

Bobby nodded then smacked Dutch's arm. "No one calls me that you bastard."

"I can't believe you're cursing in a chapel."

"I can't believe you made an old preacher think I'm like his contemporary."

"Aren't you?"

"I don't have my own place yet dude. I'm still working on it."

"Well hurry up will you? Because I'm not going to stop calling you that."

"Hey Johnny let's go back to the hotel huh?" Tommy asked giving his shoulders a gentle squeeze. "Bet you miss Daniel."

"Yeah," Johnny said.

He wanted to run his hands through Daniels hair. He waned to pull Daniel to him, close to him, to see that look Daniel gave him sometimes. He wanted to kiss his jaw, his cheek, his palm, whatever skin Daniel would let close to his lips.

He got up, feeling a little wobbly. He'd forgotten he was drunk and leaned against the guys. He told them about all the weddings he'd watched. All the couples. All the papers he'd signed as a witness.

They got to the elevator and he pushed the button towards their rooms playing with the key he'd been given. He wanted to feel Daniel against him. He wanted to listen to him talk, to babble as he sucked on him.

The doors opened and Johnny stepped out into the hall staring at the numbers on the wall. He'd probably had too much to drink.

What if Daniel turned him down?

What if Daniel said no?

He'd say no.

Or would've.

In high school.

When they started dating if Daniel came onto him drunkenly.

But he wanted it.

He also wanted to talk to Daniel.

He felt like he had a lot to say.

But also nothing.

He just wanted to see him.

The guys walked him to his room.

"You'll be okay for brunch right?" Bobby asked.

"Yes. We'll see you there," Johnny said remembering his duties. "You will be there," he said pointing at Jimmy who laughed.

"Yeah of course man."

Brunch was special.

Brunch was with his parents and grandparents.

Whole family was coming in in secret that night, probably already in their rooms in a different hotel.

They'd rented a whole fancy room with a nice view of the strip.

Champagne with pieces of gold in it.

A place Jimmy's parents said had good quality food and drink.

And then they were going to go out.

There was a secret meeting spot, if it worked out both parties would meet at sunset in a surprise in a field of flowers.

He was coordinating it with the maid of honor.

His only real issue was to talk the guys out of their retiree looks they were sporting.

Like a bunch of dads. Matching Hawaiian shirts, shorts, visors and neon bags at their waists. When in Rome they'd said with a laugh, picking out the ugliest sunglasses Johnny was surprised were even made.

So everyone knows we're in the same group.

They'd said with a laugh, Jimmy delighted by it. And Johnny had caught them getting lost with the crowds of retirees at least ten times.

Like nope, wrong group bud, you're not over 60 yet.

Daniel knew. Maybe he could help. Help them be less fashion disasters.

There was a photographer meeting them there.

Pre-wedding party photos. It was going to be beautiful.

He hoped anyway.

He tried to unlock the door, the lock clicked. He pushed the door open.

Daniel was sitting on the big couch in a robe and tilted his head back looking at Johnny.

"Hey! How was drinks?"

"Was a lot," Johnny said shutting the door, wishing the guys a good night as they popped their heads in, waved, saying good night to Daniel, setting the bolt and dropping his keys on the table when the door shut, carefully trying to get out of his shoes. Struggling and frowning looking down at his feet.

It should've been easy. He'd been taking off his own shoes most of his life.

His brows furrowed.

He stumbled forward and landed into the solid warmth of Daniel.

Daniel laughed warmly, a fond sound emanating from his chest.

It was a delightful surprise to have him there, so close.

Johnny cupped the sides of Daniels' face.

"I love you."

"I love you too."

"You're beautiful."

"Thank you."

"I missed you."

"Yeah? In the last couple of hours?"

"A lot."

"I missed you too."

Johnny wrapped his arms around Daniel's waist pulling him close. He wasn't wearing anything under the robe.

He pressed his lips to Daniel's shoulder.

"I'm so lucky."

"How so?" Daniel asked.

"You the prettiest, nicest, kindest guy I think I've ever met. Didn't have to like me. Didn't have to talk to me. But you did. You did, and you love me," Johnny buried his face against Daniel's neck. His eyes were wet.

He sniffed.

"Hey now, what's wrong?" Daniel asked his hand on Johnny's head, fingers in his hair.

It was soothing.

Had he ever told Daniel that he liked that? That he liked a lot of what Daniel did?

He should.

"I love you."

"Why don't you come in and get comfortable hmm?" Daniel asked pulling back, just a little and kissing him.

Johnny nodded shifting his weight so they fell back onto the bed.

"Do we have an alarm for tomorrow?" Johnny asked looking up at Daniel from where he rested his chin on Daniel's sternum.

"Yup. And the front desk is going to call," Daniel said.

Johnny moved, down just a little, resting his head on Daniel's stomach. He smelled like a different soap. The stuff from the hotel.

He pushed the robe open a little and kissed the tan skin there.

"How'd you like your first trip to Vegas?" Johnny asked, touching the skin next to him. Daniel's side, his hip. Lazy touches, except he was so focused on it, on the feel of his skin.

"Yeah," Daniel said. "Slots were fun, and a few of the games. I talked with a bunch of people."

"Ah, I did see you with the retirees. Befriending elderly people again?"

"Again?" Daniel asked with a laugh.

It was weird to feel it from this position.

Johnny turned his head.

Leg.

Right there was Daniel's leg.

Daniel always touched his leg. Always. He ran his fingers down and back up.

"Like at the lodge. You've got nice legs."

"Thanks," Daniel said with a soft laugh again.

There were parts of his skin, the inner thigh that was so soft. He wanted to kiss it. He was going to.

He shifted, moving carefully so he wouldn't accidentally hurt Daniel, not elbow him somewhere or put too much weight where it'd hurt and he pressed his lips to Daniel's inner thigh.

Daniel stopped talking and Johnny flicked his gaze towards him. He was giving him that look. The one that made his stomach warm, molten.

He flicked his tongue out running it along Daniel's thigh.

"It might not be good," Johnny said looking up at Daniel since had his full attention. "I'm pretty sure I'm still drunk. But-" he carefully moved the rest of the robe aside. "I want to put that in my mouth, can I?"

"Seriously Johnny?"

"All I could think of, most of the walk home," Johnny said. "If it's bad, if I don't hear you or something, just kick me okay?"

"I'm not going to kick you," Daniel said. "Were you seriously thinking about giving me head the whole walk to me? Also am I home? Because we're in a hotel?"

Johnny blinked confused, up from where he was rubbing a circle against Daniel's thigh, inching closer.

"Home, yeah, you're home," he said pressing a kiss to Daniel's lower stomach. "And yes, wanted to listen to you talk about your day or whatever while I had you in my mouth."

"Damn."

"Oh hello," Johnny said.

"Are you talking to my dick?"

"Well it's up," Johnny said resting his head on Daniel's hip looking at it. "You wanna be in my mouth don't you? It's warmer there."

"Drunk you is dangerous," Daniel murmured.

"Dangerous? I'm just saying hello. Usually I don't get to be this close. I mean sometimes. But usually you're already inside of me. So I'm just enjoying the moment. The view? The view of you. I like the view of you. You're my favorite view. And it's your fault I can't stop thinking about it."

"My fault," Daniel asked amused from where he was propped up on his elbows looking at him, smiling.

"You ordered a blow job shot."

"And that wormed into your head huh?"

"I didn't realize it was a shot at first." Johnny said face a little pink.

"So you thought I was asking a stranger for a blow job?" Daniel asked with a laugh. "It's a lower alcoholic content creamy drink and I don't know, it felt fitting for a bachelor party."

"Yeah," Johnny said gaze sliding back to Daniel's dick.

It was very hard. He wanted to put it in his mouth, to feel the weight of it, to taste it.

Fingers were under his chin and drew his attention back up to Daniel.

"You know you're the only one who sucks my dick right? I don't go asking strangers to touch me. I can't say you're the only one who ever jerks me off, but that's because I do that too," Daniel said with a soft laugh, "But I'm not flexible enough to give myself a blow job."

"Have you tried?"

"Once, hurt myself and didn't even get close," Daniel said with a laugh.

"Can I?"

"I can't say no," Daniel said. "I mean it'd be like shooting myself in the foot at this point. If you want to, go for it. Shit. Don't choke yourself will you? Damn Johnny. You feel good. Next time I'll make you one at home. We'll do blow job shots at home. I just drank it. But you're-ah-supposed to drink it with your hands behind your back. Like I could drink it from your lap. Or try. Ohh— or the bachelorette party was telling me about body shots. Let's do that. You can lay on the table again and I'll do body shots off you."

Johnny glanced up at him. That might be nice. He reached up and gently touched Daniel's stomach.

"Yeah shot goes there. What you want to do a shot off me?"

Johnny nodded.

"Fuck, yeah okay," Daniel said softly, shifting his hips a little, knee bending so he could press his foot into the bed.

All his leg muscles were tense. He must not be doing as terribly as he figured.

"You said you were lucky. I'm the damn lucky one. I was just chilling here, ready for an-ah- early night, and you were out there, thinking about me. Out there being in charge of festivities and you just wanted to be here."

Johnny felt a hand in his hair, that soothing way Daniel always touched his hair.

"Jimmy's college friends, the lawyer guys, all invited me when I left you guys, to go and watch the strippers with them," Daniel said with a laugh. "I thought about it, for a moment, because I've never been. But I didn't think it'd be fun. Not for me. More drinks and well, not you-ah. I mean I can just look at you, in you suit, trying to herd the retiree wannabes around. Watching everyone looking at you because you look so damn good in that suit. You stand out. And now you're here. Damn. Oh. Johnny move," Daniel said pushing his head away but Johnny held on.

He'd wanted a taste. He was going to get his taste.

He got it.

"Shit, Johnny spit that out. Let me get the trash can. Or...or a napkin. Tissues?" Daniel asked moving, twisting to get the box of tissues next to the bed and pulling a few sitting up and he paused.

"Damn," Daniel said softly, staring at him for a moment, like he got stuck, then he shook his head and gently wiped off Johnny's face.

"Okay, spit it out. Here."

"Spit out what?"

"You didn't swallow it did you?"

"Yeah."

"Johnny."

"You're liked it. You think it's hot," Johnny said with a grin, poking Daniel's dick that was showing renewed interest.

"So, I also thought you in a tiny skirt is hot. Or watching you on the beach, or just driving, you can't base everything on what makes my dick hard."

"Are you saying you have bad taste?"

"Oh hell no. I've got the best taste. I picked you. I'm just saying....everything you do can get that result."

"So swallowing didn't do it?"

Daniel was flushed, he wrapped his arms around Johnny and pulled him back onto the bed with him with a hug, pressing a kiss to his neck. "I mean yeah, but so was seeing you with it on your face, on your suit. I don't know, it's all hot okay?"

Johnny nodded. "So you don't want me to do something about that?"

"Just let me breathe okay? It'll go away."

"Did I not do a good enough job?"

"You did a good job. It was great."

"Do I need to give you more blow jobs?" Johnny asked, pushing himself up a little and looking down at Daniel. "Is it just so rare that it's like a treat? I don't mind. Should I come to the dealership? Could do that in your office. Oh, you seem to like that idea," Johnny said looking down where his thigh was pressed between Daniel's legs.

"You know, I think I'm bad. But drunk you, drunk you has terribly wonderful terrible ideas."

"Is it terrible? Does it hurt? I'll go put it in my mouth again," Johnny said kissing Daniel's neck before sinking back down.

Or trying.

He struggled to move.

He looked at Daniel who was holding him close.

When did he get so strong?

"I love you, but I'm okay. You're drunk and as hot as it is to have you after my dick all night. It's that snake eating it's own tail."

"Ouroboros?"

"Yup."

Johnny tilted his head thoughtfully. "So, you don't want another blow job?"

"Right."

"Do you want to do it?"

Daniel stared at him and kissed Johnny's nose. "I want you to take a shower, brush your teeth and then come cuddle with me. I want cuddles."

"Who are you?"

"Great question,"

"Are you going to take a shower with me?"

"No."

"Are you going to watch me shower?"

"No."

"You'll be here?"

"Yup. Waiting to cuddle. And only cuddle."

"Are you going to jerk off by yourself?"

"I mean... I haven't decided. Might watch some TV," Daniel said.

"We've...well you, have got a lot to do tomorrow and it'd be good if you got some sleep."

"Okay," Johnny said pulling away, carefully rolling off of Daniel and pushing himself up, wobbling a little and heading towards the bathroom.

He stripped, he showered, he brushed his teeth and he put on the robe, too tired, too lazy and not really functioning enough to put on clothes and headed back out to the main room, towards the bed.

Daniel was under the covers watching TV.

"You all squeaky clean?"

"They had mouth wash."

"Fancy."

"Can cuddles include a few kisses?" Johnny asked lifting the covers and wrapping his arms around Daniel.

He was so warm and solid.

"I can't say no to kisses," Daniel said turning his head, cupping the side of Johnny's face and kissing him. "I'm still very very deep in kissing debt."

Johnny grinned, pressing his face against Daniel, breathing him in.

"Is the show good?"

"It's a rerun, so it's fine," Daniel said. "Ready to sleep?"

Johnny nodded kissing Daniel's shoulder as it passed over him to switch off the light, waiting for Daniel to adjust the way he slept, arms wrapping around Johnny, like he wanted to keep him safe, and the safest spot was in his arms. All night long.

"I love you."

"I love you too tesoro." Daniel said softly, pressing a warm kiss to temple.

Johnny had mispoken earlier when he said he'd walked home. But it was an accidental mispoken truth. He'd meant the hotel. But it'd also been the truth. This, was his home. This spot in Daniel's arms, nestled in close enough to hear his heart beat and to feel his warmth to soft tickle of his breath. A place he treasured, a place where he was treasured.

Johnny woke up with a headache. He buried his head in a pillow to stop the sun from getting at him. Something cool gently tapped his hand.

He peered around and up at Daniel who was moving to sit on the edge of the bed next to him.

"Morning Sleeping Beauty, how are you feeling?" Daniel asked.

"Awful," Johnny said.

"Well I come with gifts of water and asprin," Daniel said opening his palm and holding the medicine out towards him.

Johnny sat up and took it from him and a swig of water while Daniel smoothed his hair with a fond smile on his face, kissing his forehead. "You going to be okay? Need some more back up today?"

"Let me see how I feel after I get dressed," Johnny said resting his head on Daniel's shoulder.

His head felt so heavy.

"Well you were kind to yourself. You already hung up your outfit for today in the closet." Daniel said. "I thought it was kind of silly how you set everything up in advance. I mean I'm still just digging out of my suitcase but now I get it."

Johnny looked up at Daniel then glanced at the clock. "Did you want to do it this morning?"

Daniel smiled warmly kissing his cheek. "Tesoro you look positively miserable. No. But, when you're feeling better and less hungover, yes. I don't want to be the reason the best man couldn't get the groom to the secret wildflower meeting spot. Jimmy and Jenny would kill me," Daniel said.

"Sorry, that's only once then this trip," Johnny said.

"Well I mean there's still a chance tonight," Daniel said kissing his ear. "But if it doesn't happen I will live."

"Will you?"

"Hey, I'm maturing thank you very much. We've been here 3 nights and night one had all the guys in here in our bed and I didn't try to murder them."

"So mature. You've grown so much."

"You're teasing, but I know that you've put a ton of work into this. And maybe I spent all the allotted money you gave me at the poker table learning how to play and then buying a deck of cards specifically so I could play strip poker with you. But I mean if we gotta play that at home, so be it. I don't mind winning all of your clothes at home or at a hotel."

"Strip poker huh?"

"Yup. All our clothes on the line."

"What happens when you loose the last of your clothes?"

"Sex."

"Your rule or the rule of the game?"

"My rule. For when you and I play."

Johnny laughed softly kissing Daniel. "I'm looking forward to it."

He stood up carefully and made his way to the closet getting dressed for the day. He cleaned up a bit and then turned back to Daniel who was sitting on the bed watching TV on his stomach, dressed.

"Ready for surprise brunch?"

"Day of surprises, totally ready. Got the camera and everything."

Johnny smiled holding out his hand and Daniel turned off the TV and took it.

"You know you're also my tesoro, right?" Johnny said.

Daniel grinned leaning up to kiss him. "I know. But you gotta pick a different nickname."

"LaRusso?" Johnny said with a teasing smile.

"Hell no," Daniel said pushing the door open and walking, holding his hand.

"Honey."

"I'm as sweet as, but no," Daniel said pushing the button for the elevator.

Johnny laughed softly. "Sweetie? Babe? Sweetheart? Princess? Love? Darling? Old Man?"

Daniel walked into the elevator and shook his head with a laugh. "None of them are as good as you clenching around me and just saying my name as you beg me for more. Or when you hold onto me real tight and cry out my name when you come."

Johnny felt his face burn and Daniel grinned kissing his cheek.

"Pervy old man is what I should've gone with," Johnny said quietly.

"Your favorite pervy old man," Daniel said with a smile. "But that cannot be the nickname."

Johnny nodded, breathing and feeling the warmth on his face and ears fade as the doors opened. The guys didn't look great. But Jimmy's friends from work looked worse and that was better at least.

"So are we having brunch here?" Jimmy asked with a yawn.

"Nope," Johnny said. "Follow me."

It was hot outside on the strip and bright. The guys winced and complained but followed him, and Daniel, walking hand in hand to the brunch spot. Up the elevator to the beautiful view where Jimmy's family was waiting.

Jimmy froze at the entrance, staring at his parents, his grandparents, his aunts and uncles who Johnny had made sure had confetti to throw at him and they did, with a little pop.

Frozen in the spot, shocked, stunned.

Dutch gave him a gentle push forward and it didn't propel him forward, instead it broke a dam and Jimmy started crying.

"If this is his response to a surprise of his family then...will he be okay?" Daniel asked Johnny softly as he took some pictures.

“Yeah, he will.”

Brunch was as ridiculous, as Johnny had expected. Great food, great drink, a beautiful view, all just for them for the hour.

He watched Jimmy chatting with his family, happy to see them. A different man then the boy who snuck into his bedroom to drink and cry because he was being crushed under his family’s expectations. His relationships with them had healed. Blossomed into something new. And it made Johnny happy.

Jimmy was going to be okay.

He didn't need Johnny to wipe away his tears anymore.

His family could do that, Jenny could do that.

And that was the next surprise as he loaded them up into a couple vans they rented.

Dutch driving him and the guys to Red Rock Canyon.

He had a compass and everything.

Scavenger hunt.

"Alright Jimmy, got a game for you. There's a surprise, you gotta follow this map, these instructions and here's a compass," Johnny said passing the items over.

"You're not going to be my guide?"

"Nope, you've got this, we're just going to follow you."

"But you know where I need to go?"

"Yeah, but I'm the only one and I'm not telling."

Jimmy frowned looking at the map and Johnny threw an arm over his shoulder leaning over to point at the map. "I will tell you where we are at least."

"Oh thank god," Jimmy said relaxing against him.

"We're right here," Johnny said poking the map. "Now that's it. Lead on, you can do it."

Johnny ruffled Jimmy's hair, not enough to mess it up, but enough to be friendly and encouraging.

It felt...weird. Like he was giving Jimmy a map out of his life. Directions to a new world, a new adventure. Like Jimmy didn't need him any more. But he'd still be there, behind him if he ever needed him.

He wondered if that was like a best man's duties. Make sure your buddy gets to that next chapter safely so they don't need you anymore.

Or was that more of a parents feelings?

A big brothers? Yet he was the youngest.

"Hey," Daniel said softly, taking his hand. "You're not saying goodbye. It's a new chapter. And you're going to be in it."

Johnny watched the guys, Bobby, Dutch and Tommy surrounded Jimmy, teasing him about his sense of direction, laughing and pouring over the map with him.

"You also don't have to hang back. You can be up there with them you know?" Daniel said squeezing his hand.

"I don't want to give anything away," Johnny said softly. "I don't want to ruin the surprise. They're too smart, all together. They know me too well. One of them will catch on and then it's game over. Besides," Johnny lifted Daniel's hand to his lips and kissed the back of it. "I like being by your side."

"You flirt! Me? What do you want from me? A date? Is this you buttering me up for a date? I'll have you know I'm very happily taken."

"By who? I'll fight 'em."

Daniel laughed, it echoed warmly along the trail. "Well he's tall and handsome and blonde. Pretty blue eyes that he stubbornly won't protect. Where the hell are your sunglasses? Mr. I'm squinting because it's too bright out?"

"Listen I don't want to ruin it because of the sun."

"I should've made you put sunblock on."

"I did."

"Did you put on the 50 spf?"

"I don't remember. I just grabbed what I found and put it on."

"You're going to be a lobster."

"We didn't pack the 50?"

"I packed 30. For me. I mean you might be fine. But your skin's more sensitive then mine."

"Tan is in fashion."

"Yeah, tan. Not tomato red. I tan, you burn."

"Maybe 30 will be fine."

"Yeah, as soon as we're done with what we're doing I'm making you a hat out of that map.

"With a brim or a little hat they sell at fast food restaurants that provides no shade? Because if you can origami a hat with a brim I will be super impressed."

"Fine you're right, I only know the kind that also doubles as a boat. But there's no shade out here. Why here? Why couldn't you have picked a forest?"

"I didn't pick it. Jimmy wanted to come to Vegas. I just found something pretty nearby."

"Uh huh, can you please think of places with shade? You're squinting and miserable."

"What? Should I just close my eyes and let you lead me around?"

"Maybe," Daniel said. "Maybe that's a good idea. And then I'll swipe a hat off some tourist."

"We're tourists."

"No, we're definitely not tourists."

"Don't you become a tourist anytime you leave where you live?"

"So wait, am I tourist if I go back to Newark?"

"I mean you don't live there any more so maybe?"

"How can I be a tourist if I know all the cool spots to get lox?"

"I've officially spent too much time with you to know exactly what you mean and where you mean."

"Nah, you've spent too much time with me when you can understand Louie's dad when he's drunk."

"Yeah, that one shocked me too."

"Stop distracting me. You're going to fry. And then I'm going to spend tonight slathering you up in aloe vera. And then neither of us are going to be able to sleep because you won't be able to get comfortable and I can't sleep if I can't feel you nearby and I can't touch you if your sunburned everywhere."

"I'm not walking around the desert naked. Like I'm wearing a shirt and pants. I can't get burned through my clothes can I?"

"I hope not."

"I'm pretty sure I can't or else everyone would always be sunburnned."

"Except me."

"Why? Because the sun loves you and doesn't hate you?"

"Yeah, my Italian ancestors made sure we all got kisses from the sun. I don't know what your ancestors did but it must've been bad to get so much hate from the sun."

"Thanks. I got it," Johnny said with a sigh. "Maybe I should just pick you up and hold you over my head as shade. You can make out with the sun from up in the air."

"Don't you dare."

"We're almost there. We'll get the photos and then you and I can bolt. Okay?" Johnny whispered.

"I'm gonna run, and you better keep up."

"Of course I can keep up."

"Last one back to the van, loses."

"You're on."

They walked into the spot, coming in from the opposite direction was another group. Jenny, her head bowed over her map. Her maid of honor nodding at Johnny. Johnny sighed.

They were all idiots. All of the guys were crowded around the map, not paying a lick of attention. Johnny reached for the map, pulling it from Jimmy's hands.

"Go man."

"Go?" Jimmy said but then he saw her and he ran.

She'd caught his eye and laughed and ran meeting in the middle amongst blooming desert sage.

The guys whirled on them arms wrapping around Johnny and Daniel.

"You scheming bastard."

"That's the most romantic thing I've seen."

"I can't believe you two kept this a secret."

"I had nothing to do with it," Daniel said with a laugh. "I just kept all of Johnny's secrets."

"Maid of honor helped me plan this one," Johnny said with a smile.

“Sorry, we made a bet,” Daniel said squirming out of their reach.

“A bet?” Dutch asked grabbing him and pulling him back.

“First one back to the van won.”

“So you two were going to set up arguably the cutest little thing and then bolt?”

“Your plan better have been not to bone in my van,” Dutch said with a frown messing up Daniel’s hair.

“The plan was to get Johnny and his sensitive skin out of the dessert and into some shade.”

“I’m convinced I put the SPF 50 on and Daniel is adamant he only packed one, his, which is like 35 or something.”

“Dude, I’ve got my, what did you call it? Dad retiree vacation hat right here, hold on,” Bobby said digging around in the bag he’d brought with him and pulling out a wide brimmed floppy hat with a cord. He plopped it on Johnny’s head and pulled the string so it’d stay snug. “There. Problem solved.”

“Why aren’t you wearing it?” Johnny asked.

“I’m not about to bolt. You need it more, plus I forgot till right now that I packed all this shit. Oh hey my sunglasses!”

Johnny frowned as Bobby put on ridiculous highlighter pink glasses.

“The goal was not to ruin photos.”

“Jimmy will have fun with silly photos. We don’t have to be serious all the time. I mean the photos they got earlier were great, now come on you two, time to join in.”

When the photos were done they trudged back to the car together. Only when the parking lot came into view did the guys take off.

“Wait! Why are you running?” Jimmy called.

“To beat Johnny and Daniel to the van!” Dutch called back.

“They made a bet,” Tommy added.

Johnny met Daniel’s gaze, saw the look in his eyes and ran. Taking off, weaving between other visitors coming and going from the parking lot, his borrowed hat flopping in the wind. He could hear the guys laughing. But, they hadn’t taken enough of a head start. And they should’ve known better.

Johnny smacked his hand on the hot side of Dutch’s van and turned grinning as Bobby barreled in next to him. Then Tommy and Dutch and Daniel who knocked into him with enough force to knock the air from his lungs, not reach for the van but for him.

“How?” Bobby complained.

“Yeah we were ahead of you,” Dutch said.

“Still the fastest,” Johnny said with a grin looking at Daniel who kissed him.

“Hurry up and get in the van so the sun will stop trying to fry you,” Daniel said.

“What do I win?” Johnny asked.

“Bragging rights?” Tommy asked.

“We already know I’m the fastest though,” Johnny said with a frown climbing into the van.

“I think we’re technically all in the clear,” Dutch said. “It was a bet between Johnny and Daniel. We just decided to play along too.”

Johnny turned to Daniel.

“I’ll make you something,” Daniel said.

Johnny sat back thoughtfully. Everything Daniel made was amazing. Random things he wanted to try making that he saw in cookbooks, on TV or in magazines. Family recipes and just things he’d picked up in Jersey.

Johnny tried to think of every meal he’d had. What his favorite thing was. Then something settled. He turned to Daniel.

“You haven’t ever made it, so you can veto it. I only had it once, but I loved it-“

“Dude just say what it is,” Tommy said.

“Seven Veils Cake,” Johnny said.

“Oh! I remember you mentioning that,” Bobby said. “Honestly want to try that too. Who made it?”

“My mom did,” Daniel said looking thoughtful and chewing on his thumb nail, brows furrowed.

“I can help,” Johnny said quickly. “It’s seven layers so I expect it’s time intensive and a pain. But the first dinner I had at your place, we had that.”

“I can’t believe you remember that,” Dutch said with a laugh.

“I’ll get the recipe from Ma and we can try,” Daniel said with a smile taking Johnny's hand in his.

"Yeah?"

"So when are we coming over to eat this cake?" Tommy asked.

"You gotta do it before I go back to Korea," Dutch said.

"Who invited you all?" Daniel asked with a frown.

"We've all got a copy of your keys, so we invited ourselves," Bobby said with a laugh.

Daniel sighed leaning his head against Johnny's shoulder.

"Then you all better bring dinner."

"Deal," Tommy said.

"We'll let Jimmy know."

"Jimmy might be on a honeymoon by the time we do this."

"Well then freeze him a slice or something," Dutch said.

"Our freezer is full enough as is. There's not room for a slice of a seven layer cake in there. You snooze you loose," Daniel said.

"We can just make it again," Johnny said.

"You like that cake a lot huh?" Daniel asked.

"Yeah. And it has good memories," Johnny said, running his thumb over the back of Daniel's hand, over his knuckles.

Chapter End Notes

-In their hotel room Johnny beelined towards the bathroom to check the sunblock. "Look I knew it said 50 spf. See, it's the right one," Johnny said holding up the container he'd used earlier. -

The weird laws are all real.

Cioppino
Dungeness crab risotto
Dungeness crab mac and cheese

Blow job shot

End of an Era

"Tell me as soon as he gets here okay?" Daniel said to Louie who nodded but grumbled to himself all the complaints he always had.

The auto shop was doing well. They'd created a good spot in the community, people liked the bonsai Daniel gave out with care instructions and Mr. Miyagi's business card. They'd like the performance he'd done at the All Valley fest with Miyagi-do. Johnny had wheeled out a bunch of ice for part of the performance and Daniel had chopped through them. It'd drummed up business for both LaRusso auto and Miyagi-do.

Mr. Miyagi's booth where he talked about bonsai and sold a few did well and Louie had been surprisingly helpful running between all three booths and taking care of them or helping watch the booth while someone ran off to do something else. He'd given out his business card to so many people that he'd run out.

And business was booming. He could hire more people, lower his prices like he wanted, make sure that they were giving people the best deal in town not just on cars but on everything, repairs, rentals, literally everything.

He smiled looking at his desk calendar. He'd have to put it away soon. Johnny would get embarrassed if he saw that Daniel had in fact made his own pinup calendar, but instead of hot firemen or women sitting on cars it was Johnny. Every month, another beautiful picture of his boyfriend.

Though, the more Daniel turned that phrase over in his mind the more it didn't feel right.

Boyfriend felt too weak.

He wanted a better term a bigger term. Lover was too...little and too much. Their relationship wasn't just physical even though physical was nice.

It was more.

What he wanted was what Jimmy was getting. But who knew if Johnny wanted that, if Johnny would be okay for that. And if so, if he was interested...how? How did he pull it off?

Daniel thought it over in his mind again and again. Maybe he'd talk to Jimmy and ask what he thought, as a legal guy, a guy in the midst of the process of getting married.

West Hollywood had ideas, things in place, but they'd moved out of West Hollywood to be closer to their family, closer to Mr. Miyagi and now Daniel didn't know.

Did those protections expand to the rest of LA? To the rest of California?

Maybe not.

It didn't matter. It was Johnny's birthday. Daniel was excited. Excited to give Johnny something good. He'd already given him a guitar, a magic kit, a surfboard, a lot of little things that he'd read about in the magazine's Johnny had been in that he liked. And his rewards had been good. Listening to Johnny play guitar, picking up these skills he'd let go of. But this was even bigger.

Maybe it was as ridiculous, but if there was any benefit of his job, other than gifting his Ma get a new car as an grand opening gift, it was this.

"Daniel, he's here," Louie said poking his head into Daniel's office.

Daniel nodded closing the calendar and quickly putting it in a desk drawer.

Johnny probably knew it existed, Daniel was pretty sure he'd mentioned wanting to make a calendar of Johnny for work, playing it off as how business people in offices always had photos on their desks but Daniel wanted to go above and beyond that. He wanted a calendar.

But Johnny still probably would get overwhelmed if he saw the actual calendar, saw the photos Daniel had picked, the photos he'd helped take on the beach, the photo from Japan of Johnny's kimono all in disarray, in that cheerleader uniform, and maybe too many tasteful almost nudes that Daniel was way too happy to develop in the rental dark room like an obsessed creep.

Thankfully when you rented a dark room no one else went in there out of fear of destroying the photos.

He'd added some normal ones too, they weren't all....almost erotic.

Like one of Johnny working on the Avanti in a dress shirt after a fancy party they went to, sleeves rolled up and focused, jacket thrown over his shoulder. A few modeling photos from Okinawa that he liked the best.

It was art.

Or at least that was his excuse.

And he kept it locked up in his desk if anyone came by for a meeting or when he left to go home. So no one but him ever saw it. It was like his treat to get through the day.

He stood up as Johnny popped in. He was dressed nicely from brunch with Laura, a short break in best man duties, a day off.

"Hey you wanted me to meet you here?"

"Yeah I wanted to show you something," Daniel said reaching out and taking Johnny's hand, walking him through the dealership saying hello to customers.

It was nice, the atmosphere in the dealership and in the showrooms. He got more customers then he thought he would, mostly because the bar was so damn low. It made him mad sometimes the stories the staff told him, of customer's horror stories they came and shared.

There were so many of them who got the rug pulled out from under them, tricked into awful add-ons and unseen fees hidden in the pages and pages of documentation. Which was something he'd worked on, making that dumb stack of papers legible and understandable. He'd actually hired Jimmy to sit down and help him translate legal jargon into something basic and understandable.

The point of it all was that it worked. He had customers who, shocked at how nice the shopping experience was told their friends, and they told their friends and the welcoming atmosphere stayed and grew and it just seemed like such common sense that Daniel didn't understand other dealerships and other shops.

His next goal was a house. But he was saving for that. Slowly. It'd take time. Especially when the gift he was giving wasn't particularly cheap.

They were walking through the lot, chatting about how Johnny's brunch with his mom went, about all the stuff he was doing with Jenny and Jimmy when Daniel spotted it.

"What do you think?" Daniel asked, motioning towards the red car.

"Wow, you got these in now?" Johnny asked, running his fingers gently across the hood.

Daniel had been watching Johnny like a hawk, as he flipped through the car magazine's Daniel brought home. As he showed him the upcoming models and it was without a doubt this was the one Johnny seemed to like the best.

"Want to take it for a spin?" Daniel asked holding out the keys.

Johnny was looking inside the car, through the windows and then slowly turned to Daniel.

"Seriously?"

"Yeah, I'll go with you, it's good to do test rides with people every once in a while. Plus then I can think of new things to tell Louie he needs to work on."

"Aren't you a little hard on him?"

"Well I want him to succeed."

"Yeah," Johnny said reaching for the keys.

"I want a kiss first," Daniel said moving them out of reach.

Johnny kissed him before taking the keys and heading to the driver's side.

"So what do you know about it?" Daniel asked getting into the passenger side as Johnny started the car and made his way out of the lot.

"It has rear wheel drive with a v8 engine, 205 horsepower," Johnny said listing off things and Daniel smiled.

He looked happy, test driving a new car.

The Avanti was...going to have to be retired. He hated it. He loved that car, but the fact of the matter was Johnny needed something new, something reliable, something he could love just as much and they could get a house with a nice garage and the Avanti and the Ford could live there. Side by side in their retirement, well loved and cared for while Johnny and Daniel drove things that were safer, more modern and easy for Daniel to get the parts to repair.

"Hey, let's go to that car hop," Daniel said motioning to the road that would take them there.

It'd been a while, they went a fairly often, but it'd been so long since that first time they'd gone in the Avanti. Daniel had been so sure that Johnny was kidnapping him and his mom and was so mad about Johnny babying him and his knee. He'd been so sure that Johnny was just being kind because he felt guilty, being his friend to clear his conscious that Daniel had gotten the messiest thing on the menu. On purpose.

They went a couple times a year, sometimes more. Sometimes in the Ford, sometimes the Avanti. Sometimes in Daniel's new car.

Johnny turned off and parked and the ladies skated up then one leaned down.

"Johnny! Daniel! I didn't recognize you this isn't the Avanti. Whose car is it?"

"I'm test driving-"

"It's Johnny's," Daniel said with a smile.

Johnny turned so suddenly to look at him wide eyed and speechless.

"It's mine?" Johnny said so softly.

"I'll get your usual and be back later," the lady said smiling at Daniel and squeezing Johnny's arm gently before skating off.

"I mean the 1991 Pontiac Firebird comes in 8 different colors and this is the sedan trim, there's also a convertible, you can have your pick. But I know you like red and this is...well you seemed to like this one the best. So it's yours if you want it, my birthday gift to you."

"This is too much Daniel," Johnny said looking at the steering wheel underneath his fingers.

"Too much is 19 bouquets."

Johnny laughed softly sniffing.

"Speaking of which I can't believe you didn't even notice," Daniel said leaning back and grabbing a bouquet of red roses and handing them to Johnny. "I know they're cheesy but I liked the red, more red anyway."

"I thought it was just like a new thing you were trying out," Johnny said taking the bouquet and rubbing at his eyes.

"What that we put bouquet in the backseat of every car?"

"I didn't see them I smelled them. I thought you were trying a new new car smell," Johnny said with a laugh.

"Ah, well you did say there's only like three florists you like with roses that smell like roses and that all the grocery store's roses don't smell."

"It's because they're shipped from overseas where they're refrigerated and by the time they get here the smell is gone, that with the way they've been grown so they last longer to make the journey and a dash of chemicals means no scent," Johnny said.

Daniel leaned over, gently turning Johnny towards him, kissing him. "And these roses?"

"More locally sourced and a different strain," Johnny said.

"So you like it and the car?"

Johnny turned back to look at the dashboard, running his hand along it for a moment, over the console.

"It's because of the Avanti huh?"

"It's running on parts they don't make anymore. I worry, you know? What happens if you get into an accident or if something happens while you're out? The safety features just aren't up to the current industry standards. It's why I've swapped out the Ford too," Daniel said quietly. "No strings either, for this. The title will be in your name so it's yours. Just like the Avanti. I'm just footing the bill. Which isn't that bad, honestly," Daniel moved over pressing his forehead against Johnny's, hand on the back of his neck, watching those baby blues fill up with tears.

"But a car-"

"You always tell me we should celebrate every little thing. Look a cute dog, or saw something cool on the way to work. Not just the big moments and I pushed back on that. Not because I don't want to but because you already give me so much. But this, a birthday, is a perfect excuse to finally return the favor."

"You already made a big deal out of all my birthdays."

"Yeah and you flew me home and took me to Atlantic city for my 21st."

"Your mom said that was how you wanted to spend your 21st when you were little. You had been wanting to go to the casino there and getting super boozy stuff at one of the clubs your parents used to go to."

"See!" Daniel said. "A car is nothing."

"It's not nothing," Johnny said softly. "Thank you Daniel."

"Do you want this one or a different one? Want other features?"

"No, this one is perfect."

Daniel smiled, taking Johnny's hand in his, chatting until their food came and right before they left an older woman skated out.

"Hey hon, happy to have you both here today. You know, I marked it on the calendar when your mom used to bring you."

"You did?"

Daniel smiled watching the faint blush spread on Johnny's cheeks.

"He was the cutest little thing. Though I bet you were too Daniel. Your mom promised to bring photos next time."

"Next time?"

"Well your moms come sometimes," she said with a grin. "And Lucille promised to bring some family scrapbook."

Daniel felt his heart sink. He couldn't believe his mother. Couldn't believe she was using the scrapbook against him in such a way.

"Well for old times sake," she said leaning down and passing Johnny a vanilla ice cream cone. "Happy birthday Johnny."

“Thank you,” Johnny said staring at the ice cream in awe as the woman skated away.

“She remembered huh?” Daniel asked.

“She did,” Johnny said.

“Well you want me to hold that while you drive?” Daniel asked. “We still have paperwork to sign.”

“Oh, right, do you have meetings? Have I kept you out too long?” Johnny asked glancing at the watch on his wrist.

“No, no rush. But I do want to sign this over to you, I want you to have it fully and completely today. And I was planning to make dinner, if you want. Or we could go out, if there’s somewhere you wanted to eat. Louie’s staying with Ma tonight.”

“Then, let’s go home,” Johnny said passing Daniel the ice cream cone, turning on the car again and leaning over, for one long slow lick of the ice cream, meeting Daniel’s eye with a grin before turning making his way back to West Hollywood and back to the dealership. Leaning over for a lick just often enough to make Daniel want to put off signing the papers and tell Johnny to drive them home. It could all wait. But he…he could not.

“That was cruel,” Daniel complained when Johnny parked at the dealership. Ice cream had melted on his fingers and Johnny had just finished licking each one clean.

“How so?” Johnny asked, “Oh, right,” and he leaned over kissing him, warm and sweet and tasting like ice cream.

“Not what I meant,” Daniel said gripping Johnny’s nice shirt in his hands when he started to pull away.

“I think it’d be a bad idea to have sex in your dealership parking lot in a car that technically we don’t own yet, when there’s customers still milling about…and your staff.”

Daniel sighed, letting go of Johnny, as a “Hey cuz! Hey Johnny! How was the drive?” floated in through the open window.

“Hey Louie.”

“Ah man, didn’t bring me anything? You guys totally had lunch without me. Unfair. Even when I went to all the hard work of getting and bringing all the documents and our fancy LaRusso Auto pens out to you so you can go home."

"How about I take you next time," Johnny said carefully gathering up the stack of paper and the pens, passing them to Daniel to organize.

"Heck yeah, can I drive?"

"No."

Daniel smiled as he signed the papers, as Johnny filled out his information and signed.

Giving Ma a new car had been almost as sweet. One of the first things he did was helping her trade in the old '69 Chevelle Concours Wagon for something she wouldn't have to push. The thought that she drove that thing, by herself back to Newark while he was in Okinawa made him sick to his stomach.

It wasn't safe. But now he knew she was, like he knew Johnny now had better air bags and better safety features just in case some asshole tried to pick a fight. And they'd upgrade again in the future. It'd be easy.

This was maybe the best part about owning the dealership. He wasn't sure what else there was too it. It felt weird, having reached his goals earlier than planned and being there.

Now what? Kept bouncing around in his head and he kept pushing it aside. Because Johnny had bet on him and inklings of doubt left him full of guilt.

Johnny drove home after Louie took the papers back, after insurance was called and dealt with, the one thing they had to get out of the car to do. Which gave Daniel time to grab his stuff from the office. And once at home they tackled the Avanti, the same way they had for the Ford.

Everything that was in it came out and was sorted. To be kept, to be thrown away, moved to the Firebird.

Johnny took good care of his car and it wasn't that dirty. But they still broke out the car soap and the wax and in a section of the apartment garage the owner said was okay for washing cars they went to work.

Maybe they should've changed first. But Daniel liked watching Johnny roll up his sleeves and dive right in, and maybe he liked purposefully missing the car with the hose and hitting Johnny and hearing the surprised sound he made.

Maybe he liked hiding on the other side of the Avanti when Johnny retaliated hearing their laughter and shouts echo. He liked seeing Johnny's shirt cling to him. He liked watching Johnny brush water from his face, that look he got in his eyes, a spark of challenge, of play. Daniel would reap what he'd sown and he couldn't wait.

"Will you tell me what you want?" Daniel asked.

He sat back and looked down at Johnny and Johnny looked up at him, trying to figure out what he was asking.

"What I want?"

Easy. To spend time with Daniel. He wanted them to go on trips together. He wanted to move somewhere with a garden. He wanted-

"How do you like it?" Daniel asked hand on his knee, gently rubbing a circle on the side of his knee, pressing carefully.

"How-" Johnny frowned.

"You always let me do what I want, you rarely....tell me what you want ...tonight I won't do anything until you tell me."

Oh. Oh.

Johnny flushed bright red.

"What do you enjoy Johnny? Do you like being on your back? Do you want your hips off the bed? Do you want your legs up high on my shoulders? Or around my hips? Do you want me to hold them apart? Or do you want to be on your knees? Does it hurt to be on your knees or do you prefer it? I don't mind the view at first but I miss your face, though I like kissing your back. Do you want to be on your side? The way, sometimes we have sex in the morning? Or do you want me to hold one of your legs up, to give a different angle? Or do you want me on my back while you chase your own pleasure? The view of that is quite nice. Or do you miss it like when we'd rub against one another trying to be quiet at Mr. Miyagi's?"

Daniel gently reached out, cupping the side of Johnny's face.

"Do you want me to hold you down? Do you want me to tie you up? Do you want me to be gentler? Rougher?"

"I-I like what we do," Johnny said.

Daniel sighed laying down next to him. "Today, I want to know what you like best. Maybe I jumped too far ahead," Daniel said leaning in close. "How about kissing? Do you have any feedback there? Do you like this?" Daniel asked kissing him. He pulled back and Johnny frowned. "Or do you prefer more tongue?" Daniel asked leaning back in for an open mouth kiss.

His tongue brushing against Johnny's. Like the previous kiss it was too short. Frustratingly short.

"I like longer kisses then that," Johnny said when Daniel pulled away, studying him.

Daniel laughed. "Okay, I can do that."

Daniel wanted feedback. He wanted to know what Johnny liked. Wanted Johnny to talk about that. And it made sense. Johnny sort of just went with the flow. Did what Daniel wanted to do. But.

Why the hell was it so embarrassing? Why did what he want get stuck in his throat? Daniel talked about what he wanted all the time. He was clear. And he'd been asking Johnny to speak up more. And...he had. He'd said no to things that he might not have once upon a time. Things that might've been uncomfortable due to a surface level. On the hood of a hot car or on a cold table. They'd had...phone sex where he thought he'd been a little clearer. But Daniel hadn’t been looking at him then.

Daniel wanted details. He wanted to know more. And Johnny understood that. But what did he like? No. What did he like best? What did he want to try?

He was supposed to say something, but it was hard to focus because he just wanted to enjoy how close Daniel was and the taste of him. But of course Daniel hadn't lost his train of thought. Not this time, not when he had a point and a specific plan, and he pulled away again.

"Better?"

"Yeah," Johnny said, voice coming out heavy. "Let's try it."

"Try what?"

"The handcuffs you bought."

Daniel looked at him in surprise.

"Really?"

"Yeah. I'll try it."

"And if it's too much?"

"I'll tell you to stop."

"Okay. I'll ask too. And if you don't respond I'll let you go."

"Okay."

Daniel got up off the bed going through his drawer trying to find them. He'd bought those so long ago. Johnny had remembered seeing them go in a drawer, and then a box, then another box. Daniel had got them but never asked to use them.

"You know," Daniel said turning back, "I know you avoided the question."

Best. What do you like best?

"I like being able to see you," Johnny said.

"Yeah?" Daniel asked

Daniel leaned down to kiss him again hands finding his, fingers tracing his skin and then in those quick movements Daniel used sometimes, like hopping up from the sand, or knocking his legs out from under him so he'd fall onto the bed Daniel moved his hands above his head and put more weight into keeping them there, pinning him with a click.

It was new.

Johnny tested it. Just one wrist. In case of panic. But otherwise it was fine. He couldn't go anywhere easily. He studied Daniel who was looking at him, eyes dark, pupils blown.

"That okay? We'll start with one hand."

"Yeah."

"Too tight?"

"No."

"What do you want me to do next?"

"Sex."

"Well I figured that. But smaller steps."

Johnny frowned looking at Daniel, thinking, trying to figure out how to get past the lump in his throat, past whatever always blocked him.

"I like when you kiss my neck."

"You're so red," Daniel said softly moving towards Johnny's neck.

"Softer kisses or harder kisses?" Daniel asked. "Teeth?"

"Daniel, I like the way you do it. I like the way you do everything. If I don't like it I'll tell you okay? Like I have in the past. And...and I'll let you know if I need more of something. But if we have to stop every five seconds..."

"Okay," Daniel said pressing his lips to Johnny's neck. Soft kisses and then gently bites, tugs on his skin.

Daniel shifted his weight moving his hands so they ran along Johnny's sides and down his hip before hooking under his leg and hooking it over Daniel's own waist. Daniel looked around, reached for lube and tried to twist off the cap.

"Need some help?" Johnny asked.

"Bend this knee and move it a bit to the side will you?" Daniel said nudging the leg not wrapped around his hip.

Johnny shifted, making more space for Daniel.

"I've got a hand if you need one," Johnny said reaching out.

“It’s just a little stuck. I put the lid on wrong last time,” Daniel said, biting his lower lip as he tried again.

“Maybe next time we open the containers before you handcuff one of my arms to the bedpost?” Johnny recommended feeling some of the tension in his chest in his limbs dissipate.

Watching Daniel struggle, tongue sticking out a little focused, trying to open a bottle was adorable and endearing.

“Hey, I just want to give you what you want for your birthday. I’m trying to be romantic and this is not cooperating.”

“Maybe it’s a sign,” Johnny said.

“I refuse. Not when you’re already naked and can’t go anywhere,” Daniel said. “I will go get olive oil from the kitchen before I let it come to that.”

“The fancy olive oil only used for special occasions that your family sent from Italy? It’s that dire?” Johnny said.

“I’d use that for you in a heartbeat,” Daniel said, “If this won’t open I’ll break open the fancy stuff.”

“Don’t we have like 20 bottles of lube around somewhere?” Johnny asked.

Daniel sighed leaning forward and kissing him on the nose. “We do. I just didn’t want to have to go get it. But I also want to have sex tonight, and clearly that’s not going to happen if I keep fighting with this one bottle.”

“Want me to try?” Johnny asked.

“No,” Daniel said. “With the current luck you’d somehow dump it over your head or strain something. Just stay there looking pretty, I’ll be back.”

Daniel gently put his leg back down patting his thigh and then slid off the bed looking around trying to remember where the nearest box that had lube in it was.

“Are we…out?” Johnny called after a bit, after Daniel had thrown Johnny’s summer robe on to go look around.

The idea that they were out was hilarious. After so long of Daniel just storing lube and condoms in boxes and little containers everywhere to be out….after living with his mom where they made a hefty dent in what she automatically put in his bathroom…after all the shopping they did. It seemed impossible.

Johnny rolled onto his side, pushing open his bed side table drawer. He had a few containers that he set aside, just in case. And they were…right.

Daniel had worn his stupidly short shorts and had been working on his car, long legs sticking out of the hood when Johnny had gotten home and Johnny had asked if Daniel needed help with something specific.

It'd been bad. Embarrassingly cheesy. Horrifically awful flirting but since it'd been a while Johnny had used more then normal just to be careful, to not hurt him. And Daniel had wanted to go again. And they'd used up the rest of the bottle.

Why hadn't he bought another one?

Because there were always like 50 hidden ones somewhere in the nearest vicinity. Like somehow he knew the most pervy easter bunny on the planet.

He sighed pressing his cheek against his forearm.

"You look so lonely," Daniel said. "I take it you missed me."

"Of course," Johnny said carefully sitting up. "You look good in my robe."

"Do I?" Daniel asked giving a spin.

Johnny smiled. "Yes. So what did you find?"

"Well…I got complacent. I realized we ran out of yours last week when you were more then generous. And that that stuck bottle is my last one."

"So you're going to uncuff me and we're going to go shopping?" Johnny asked.

"Ah, no. No for your birthday we're going to break open the fancy olive oil from Italy."

"You can't."

“The fun part,” Daniel said plopping down next to him and holding out the bottle. “Is that it comes with this fancy little spout.”

Johnny frowned, curling his legs towards himself. “If you do what I think you’re insinuating, we can never ever use that olive oil for anything ever again.”

“I know. It’s so tempting,” Daniel said with a sigh. “But I also don’t want it to hurt you….so not this time.”

“You think it’d hurt?”

“Well it’s metal. So not this time. But I think I’ll reuse this container for lube later. After we finish the oil.”

“Lube is going on our shopping list.”

“Yeah. I mean I go through and throw it out if it expires. I just didn’t realize so much of it was gone after my last run through. I wasn’t expecting what we threw out from the Avanti this afternoon to have been the end of it. That the last one we had would be stuck.”

Daniel set the jar down and took off the summer robe, carefully repositioning himself, gently pulling Johnny towards him.

“Sorry for making you wait.”

“I’m okay.”

“How’s the arm? The wrist?”

“Fine.”

“Let me see if I remember the information I got,” Daniel said leaning down and kissing him.

Johnny had asked for a billion kisses at one point. And he had, lost track of how many they’d had. He just knew that they were nowhere near a million.

What were his favorite kisses?

The first one they had where Daniel had been drunk and surprised him in the closet at Jimmy’s.

Not because it was good, oh it’d been awful. A taste of stale beer and pizza in a humid closet was not a great combo. But he liked how honest it had been. He hadn't realized it at the time, too shocked but Daniel had gone for everything he wanted. Everything he always went for in that moment. He touched Johnny, skipping to what? Second base in their first kiss?

Drunken kisses from Daniel weren't perfect but they were fun. Because Daniel was immensely confident even when he missed. Even if he had had so many drinks he was kissing the side of Johnny's mouth.

He liked the ticklish kisses Daniel sometimes went for when he was in a playful mood, like a bird pecking away, or just amused by the sound until Johnny had curled up in a ball to avoid the onslaught, usually laughing.

He liked when Daniel was working at home, going through paperwork or checking over the books for the shop and kissing the top of his head. He liked putting his hands on Daniel's shoulders and the way he looked up at Johnny, tired but always taking it as time to stop. Leaving himself open for attack.

He liked kissing Daniel's forehead, his nose, listening to Daniel laugh and say "Okay okay, I'm coming." And kissing him under his jaw and along his neck where his shoulder and neck met and how he shrugged like the suddenness of it tickled.

He liked when they play fought. Rolling around over something and how Johny went for any exposed skin he could find, kissing Daniel's soft belly and the way his body would tense up because it was ticklish, kissing his sides, his hips. Nonsense games with no rules except unsaid ones where Johnny felt like he won when Daniel was breathless under him and Johnny got to kiss him as much as he wanted. He won, even if he lost.

He liked the kisses that were greetings. Good morning kisses before words could be formed. Sleepy good night kisses. Welcome home kisses and have a good day kisses. Or see you later kisses.

But this type of kiss, slow, languid, sweet as molasses, unhurried and warm were his favorite. The kind where time felt slower. Responsibilities, stress it didn't matter. His focus just became on kissing Daniel.

Daniel pulled away gently taking Johnny's free hand in his, lacing their fingers and pressed a finger against him that was cool and slick feeling from the oil.

"Ready?" Daniel asked.

Johnny nodded, bracing himself, digging on heel into the bed as he felt the intrusion. Quickly distracted by Daniel kissing him working love bites onto his neck that were enough.

Normally Daniel's hands were on him. On his chest, his hips, his thighs, his dick, touching, rubbing and squeezing. But like this, holding his hand, there was just the press of Daniel's body against his, the intrusion of fingers as one became two became three, and Daniel's mouth on his. It was an absence but also anchoring. There was nowhere to go, nowhere he needed to be, except right there, right where Daniel wanted him was where he wanted to be.

He did want to touch him, wanted to run his hands down Daniel's back, touch wherever he could reach, kiss him everywhere he could.

"I think it'll be okay now," Daniel said, shifting his weight slightly, removing his fingers and guiding his dick slowly inside.

Why did everything still get stuck in his throat? Not the moans, though maybe those still go trapped a little.

Was he scared that if he told Daniel he liked it, enjoyed it as much as he did that Daniel would stop? That he'd leave?

No.

He wouldn't.

Because Daniel had seen him at his worst. Had withstood Johnny being a shit to him and still had heard his apology and then came looking. Looked closer at him, inspecting all the little cracks and holes in his armor and the walls he'd put up and decided, this mess of a man, I'll take him. And he clearly liked this, pinning Johnny to the bed and Johnny...felt safe.

Daniel always made him feel safe and wanted, even when he felt awful.

Daniel found little ways to cheer him up, making him a cup of tea in his favorite mug or just kissing his ear. Or adding to Johnny's library because he saw a book he thought Johnny would like. Or making his favorite food.

Hell, giving him a Firebird because the Avanti needed to be retired and Johnny couldn't bring himself to do it. He liked looking at the car magazines Daniel brought home but never made any move to change it, because it was his car.

Daniel...Daniel wanted to know. Because he sometimes needed reassurance too. The way Johnny did. He had his own spirals, and who knew what set this one off.

A magazine at the doctors that said something dumb like Is your partner faking it? That created a seed of doubt that sprouted.

Or maybe he'd been talking to Ali again and started worrying about Ali's relationship with Johnny versus their own. Because that one cropped up from time to time no matter how many times Johnny squashed it. Thankfully less frequently as the years went on.

Or maybe someone at work had just gotten broken up with or a divorce and in the midst of an argument learned that their sex life had been bad and hadn't realized and it had settled like a burr in his brain.

But the difference was Daniel paid a ton of attention to Johnny. He was gentle, patient, caring and loving when Johnny didn't feel like he deserved it. And when he needed it the most.

"Daniel, I love you."

"I love you too."

"I like this."

"Yeah?"

"I feel safe."

"You do?"

"Yeah. I..mm..like...ah," Johnny gasped.

Daniel's hand had moved to his dick and he lost the thread of thought he had, arching into Daniel's hand.

"What do you like?" Daniel asked kissing his neck.

"This," Johnny managed.

"Me too," Daniel said.

There was more he wanted to say but couldn't. More that got stuck in his throat. But it was okay. He could take his time. He'd figure it out. One day. For now though, Johnny wanted to touch him. Wanted to wrap his limbs around Daniel and hold him close.

He hooked his other leg around Daniel's waist, shifting himself slightly and gasping as he felt Daniel deeper, listening to him curse, not an angry curse but one of surprise and pleasure.

"Are you sure about the shower?" Daniel asked voice thick.

"Huh?"

"The wall, you said it went deeper. Did you like that?'

"Yeah," Johnny said. "Yeah but, shower...ah... death?"

"So a wall."

"Okay," Johnny said. "But...uh..only ..."

"Don't hurt myself?" Daniel asked.

Johnny nodded kissing the skin closet to him.

He was done trying to focus. Daniel wasn't going to let him.

Which was fine. It was kind of nice not to think and just to feel. Because he was somewhere where that was okay. To just move to meet Daniel wherever he could because he wanted to feel more.

He'd spent a long time pushing down his feelings, trying to sort them into boxes because Kreese wouldn't teach him if he cried and Sid never wanted to hear him be it laughter or tears or anything. So whenever anything got too much he exploded. Which Daniel had witnessed first hand. And now, now that feeling didn't exist any more. Not to the same extent.

He got overwhelmed but when he felt like crying he cried, when he got upset, he found ways to deal with it that he felt better about.

Breathing, gardening, working out, spending time with Daniel or on his own, reading. It all helped. And maybe it'd take forever to figure it out, to re-sort and unpack all those feelings he'd pushed down over and over and over again. And it was okay. He wasn't going anywhere. He was right where he wanted to be.

When Daniel let go of his hand and uncuffed Johnny's other wrist when it was over his arms felt like they were floating and he sat for a bit, curled up with Daniel as he felt his arms come back to normal while Daniel rubbed them, trying to help get the blood flowing a little bit better again.

"So?"

"So?"

"Did you like that?" Daniel asked softly.

"Yes."

"Then next time we can try both your hands."

"Not every time," Johnny said.

"You let me know and I'll be prepared," Daniel said.

"Did you enjoy it?" Johnny asked wiggling his fingers and rolling his wrists.

"I did. A lot. I don't know, I kind of like pinning you down or handcuffing you to the bed. Reminds me of sparring and it's comforting knowing I've got you and you're not going anywhere. I mean I know you're not going anywhere. You wake me up now when you can't sleep, but I guess I also found this hot? I'm glad I didn't get the uncool handcuffs."

"There's uncool handcuffs?"

"I mean do you want pink fluffy ones? Those are the other ones I usually see."

"No thank you."

"I didn't think so," Daniel said with a laugh. "And I'm glad you're up for trying a wall again. But we'll find a way to be careful about your back and so that you feel comfortable and less freaked out about my knee."

"It's not just your knee," Johnny said softly. "I don't want you to fall at all. Or hurt yourself."

"We're a long ways off from that I hope."

"Injuring yourself during sex? I don't know, didn't you read those articles about people who get stuff stuck or like a concussion?"

"What articles are you reading?"

"It's in one of the magazines...I can't remember which one."

"There's what? A dear editor please help section for ‘help I grievously hurt myself during sex, what do you recommend for next time’?"

"I think it was a collection of stories of how people hurt themselves from sex. Like leg cramps."

"That doesn't sound nearly as grievous."

"But still-"

"I know," Daniel said kissing Johnny's temple. "I'll be careful. If you get too heavy then I'll just lie down and you can do all the work."

"I do like it you know?"

"Hmm?"

"Having sex with you," Johnny said gently lacing their fingers. "However we do it. I like trying new things with you. I'm not going anywhere and if I'm unsatisfied I'll let you know. So don't worry about it okay? Which I know does absolutely nothing to alleviate your worry when it crops up. But let me know if you're not....satisfied too. Okay?"

"I could do more."

"More?"

"Have more sex."

"What?"

"I'm satisfied but I'm also letting you know that while we're young, maybe we should do it as much as possible before those ads on TV are directed at us."

"What ads?"

"The ones about not being able to do it."

"That's what you've been worried about?"

"I mean it just got me thinking, okay? One day we might get there. One day my dick might not get hard for one reason or another. So I want to make sure I know everything you like so you can still get off if my guy fails in the heat of the moment."

Johnny laughed maybe too hard for Daniel's serious tone.

"That doesn't just happen when you're old. It can happen any time for any reason."

"I know but right now that's not a problem."

"Getting boners every time you turn around huh?"

"I blame you."

"Me? Why? What am I doing?"

"Existing."

"And that makes you hard?"

"Yes."

"How does that make sense?"

"I don't know. Love? Lust? A brutal combo? Luck?"

"Luck?"

"Yeah. I've got you in my bed."

"Our bed."

"Even better. What? I don't cause you unfortunate incidents?" Daniel asked with a faux pout.

"I think I'm just better at hiding it."

"Seriously?"

"Yeah."

"Then how often?"

"How often what?"

"How often do you randomly get horny about me?"

"More often then I'd like to admit."

"See? So we should be having more sex."

"How much more do you want to have?"

"Four times a day at least."

"We don't have enough time for that."

"Can we both quit our jobs and do nothing but have sex?"

"How are we going to explain that to anyone?"

"We've joined a cult."

"What cult is just never ending sex?"

"Aren't all cults weird sex things?"

"Pretty sure they're not."

"What's that Greek god of parties and sex?"

"Dionysus?"

"Yeah that one. Could we swing that?"

"I doubt it."

Daniel sighed pressing his cheek against Johnny's shoulder.

"To be fair, I think I just miss you a lot during the day. Sex is guaranteed just us time."

"Let's try for date nights then," Johnny said.

"Yeah?"

"Yup. We can swap planning them. Twice a week?"

"Like go out and do stuff date nights?"

"We kind of do that already but we both got busy and now it includes family and friends, and I've been helping with the wedding, so yeah, date nights."

"I like that."

"We'll dust off the date jar."

"Oh I've got stuff to add to that."

"Have you just been adding to the sex jar?"

"No."

"Really?"

"Fine, yes. But I've missed you so like I'll sit at work and be bored in meetings and my brain thinks of you and then it's a hop skip and jump before my libido takes over."

"Go get the date jar and let's add to it," Johnny said.

Daniel nodded and Johnny leaned over to grab his pen and paper. What would be fun? Roller rink? Going back up into the mountains just the two of them, they could go snowboarding and skiing, maybe just ride around on the snowmobiles again, movies, mall.

Daniel liked dressing Johnny up. It might be fun to pick an outfit out for the other. Johnny hadn't done that for him yet. It might be fun to go shopping and buy Daniel a nice outfit.

Daniel returned hoping onto the bed again next to him, stealing a piece of paper from Johnny's notebook, quickly scribbling his own ideas to add to the jar that sat between them.

The Dandelion and the Rose

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"To the happy couple," Johnny said holding up his glass.

He hadn't slept much. But, the flower arrangements were perfect, the lights, the design, the seating, the food.

The wedding had been perfect.

Jimmy looked so happy sitting next to Jenny.

And Johnny was happy for them.

He was.

He really was.

Except.

He pushed that down. That bubbling darkness that wanted to spread through his veins.

He drank, he walked around, he checked on the cake, he checked on the musicians, he made the announcements for their first dance, he watched them dance. Spinning across the floor in one another's arms. Years together tied up so neatly in a nice bow.

He cheered and drank shots whenever anyone gave him one. Which was frequent, as a pseudo host of the event.

Best man.

He wanted to laugh at the title.

It sat awkwardly on his head.

The best man should've known more stories about Jenny and Jimmy's relationship. Best man didn't feel right.

Bobby, Bobby felt like best man material.

Any of the cobras but him.

He leaned against Dutch who patted his chest fondly, murmuring in his ear drunkenly that this was great.

"Who'd have expected Jimmy to be the first of us to get married huh?"

Johnny nodded.

That was the thorn sticking into his skin. The one he kept brushing against and trying to ignore. To forget it was there.

He wanted to focus on them, on their happiness. On who they were, their future.

He wanted to focus on it in a positive light. Not the bitterness that kept swelling up. A small toxic jealously that he'd staved off since Jimmy had told him at the rock concert. Since they'd found him at the chapel in Vegas.

It'd been such a long engagement.

Something they'd had a choice in.

Something they got to choose.

Just like their cakes, their outfits, the location and the food.

Daniel was sitting with his mom and Mr. Miyagi.

His mother, sitting under those lights looked so similar and yet so different from her own wedding that his heart-ached.

He pushed it away. As he had throughout the entire process. All along the way. From the moment he'd dug out his binder from where he'd hidden it away, rechecking out all the wedding stuff at the library that he'd checked out ages ago with a different wedding in mind. Stuff leftover from that scrapped wedding plan.

Bobby had brought a date who was very sweet and made him laugh and it made Johnny's heart hurt. Another spark of jealousy.

He'd probably be next.

The next wedding would probably be Bobby, then maybe Tommy, maybe Dutch and Johnny would help plan wedding after wedding.

Maybe Kumiko would get married soon.

Or Jessica.

Maybe Chozen or Louie.

He'd check on flowers, he'd order cake tastings, guide his friends through the steps, the ones he'd walked with his mother all those years ago, holding her hand as she smiled, stunned that she'd get her dream fairy tale wedding.

That… that was what it always felt like. A fairy tale. A dream come true. The way Sid had knelt down in front of him and smiled, the way he'd ruffled his hair and said they'd have fun together, plan the wedding as a family.

The strange way it had felt to hold both their hands and sit between them as they tried different flavors of cake.

The way Sid listened to him. Laughing and saying, "This kid knows what he likes."

And Johnny had been so full of hope.

He'd gone to help his mom try on dresses, sitting while the shop ladies cooed over how she looked, her eyes however on him asking what he thought as he drank sparkling juice and she had champagne.

She'd looked beautiful in all of them, but only one of them brought excitement to her eyes.

And he realized she couldn't tell.

That the staff couldn't tell.

That they didn't know her well enough to see that she was shining.

That she didn't trust her own instincts well enough to know.

That she was glowing with happiness in it. So full of hope and dreams.

Weddings were...dreams. Two different stories carefully put together, tied in such a way that the story could continue on together. To say in front of friends and family, acquaintances and people of some level of importance that this person is the person I pick. They've got my back and I've got theirs. They're my favorite, out of the billions of people on this earth. This is the one I choose. I love them and they love me.

He'd gotten a nice suit and he got to help pick out the flowers in his mothers bouquet, all full of love and hope and he got to pick out the ones he wore on his chest.

It was exactly like a fairy tale.

His mother got to get a dress and they wouldn't even let her look at the price tag.

Because Sid had already given them the card.

It was already paid for.

No one mentioned it to her.

But years later, when looking at wedding dresses trying to figure out how much they cost to try and give Sid an estimate for his own wedding, he saw how exorbitant the price was. And it still had to be tailored. That was an additional fee.

Out of curiosity he'd just gone to a regular store and found a nice white dress that was cheaper and was shocked at the difference. For a moment he'd thought that maybe he was just that out of touch with clothing.

But no, wedding dresses were expensive.

He got a quote.

He went looking at rings, figured out how much they cost, how much it cost to inscribe them.

Sid had told him to come back with an estimate. And he remembered standing in Sid’s office with his findings. It would be expensive.

Cakes weren't expensive, but wedding cakes were.

The flower arrangements, the place to host it.

He had spent months doing all that work and he had put together the binder. Like the one he'd made with his mom when planning her wedding with Sid.

It was more like a scrapbook and he'd worked very hard on it.

Nervous because this was his shot at freedom.

All held down in scrap booking stickers and glossy magazine cut outs.

The only scrapbook he'd ever made because he'd thought Ali would like it. She liked that sort of thing.

Sid had flipped through it silently so vastly different then when he'd looked through the one his mother and he had brought. He'd laughed then and smiled at that one. Delighted by every page, it was easy, it was doable, had Johnny helped? How sweet.

Now when he heard that in his head, it was different.

He'd thought it was genuine the first time. That Sid was happy Johnny was there, happy he was participating so heavily a part of the planning, happy to have him help eat cake and taste the foods they were going to offer, asking the chef what things were because he didn't know. He'd never had a chance to try at least half the food they'd offered. He'd never had it.

But now when he looked on the memory he was pretty sure there was a hint there. A slight sneer. A little clue that if he'd been wiser he would've caught. If they hadn't been fooled so easily by a wolf in sheep's clothing then maybe they would've run.

But they also might not have. He didn't know how bad things were exactly.

But when it was his turn, when everything relied on Sid's desire to get rid of him, to tie himself to the Mills, to rub elbows with people who'd come to celebrate a couple they didn't know or care about, he was so nervous he thought he'd be sick. But he stood tall, he stood still, the way he did when Kreese was stalking through the dojo barking orders, lecturing. The way he knew not to flinch.

"So, this number, that's about how much it's going to cost to get rid of you, huh?"

It wasn't an actually question. Sid didn't want to hear him respond. He'd learned that lesson a long time ago. He just waited.

"Ali Mills is well worth this much. I'll give you a card, but I want receipts. For everything. Start with a ring. Buy the ring and you've got until graduation to ask her. I want you out of this house by the time you turn 18, understand?"

"Yes sir."

Sid slid the binder hard across his desk.

Johnny caught it.

He wasn't supposed to catch it.

He wasn’t supposed to save it.

But he had, it was his ticket, his well thought out plan.

And his mother had worked on it with him. Had sat with him talking about things Ali liked, helping him pick out table cloths and napkins and silverware.

The plan was buy the ring, ask Ali to marry him, go over the binder with her, get married after graduation, move out and he'd be somewhere out of Sid's clutches but able to keep his mother in his life.

He went to every jeweler he could find, being very picky.

The first key to his escape.

The first key to his future lay in a ring in the hopes that the girl he offered it to would say yes and unknowingly save him.

He found one he liked.

He saw it and thought no one could say no to that one.

And then the funeral had happened.

And then Sid had lost it.

And he hadn't made it to her birthday.

And the ring became a weight. He'd tried to win her back. Desperate. Desperate to hold onto that dream. That fairy tale. Just like his mother had had. But she moved on and Johnny had to make alternative plans.

He slept on the beach more.

He drove around more.

He went camping.

He thought about running away.

But it was unfair.

Everything was so unfair and he took it out on Daniel. Daniel who didn't know that he'd stepped unknowingly so close to the switch that had shut off his future. That he'd accidentally turned off all the lights on Johnny.

He wanted that normalcy, what he'd expected, dreamed, hoped for, everything he'd been working towards.

Freedom.

And just like that it was gone.

But then, when the dust settled he realized maybe it would've been hell. He'd have been indebted to Sid from the first step into his future.

He wouldn't be free.

Sid could use it as leverage.

And Ali wouldn't have been happy. She'd liked Johnny but she didn't know him. And he realized he didn't know her. He hadn't let her in.

If he had then maybe things would’ve gone differently. Maybe he wouldn’t have snapped so hard when it ended.

He had envisioned them in some small house outside of the Hills, unsure of what he'd do while she went to school. And that was part of the danger.

She'd have resented that. She'd grown up and he hadn't.

She'd had ambitions and they were so high that she needed help reaching them but she didn't need his help.

He'd put too much pressure on their relationship. Pressure he hadn't told her. And now he wasn't surprised it'd crumbled apart.

They'd had fun.

They'd had something kind of sweet.

But it wasn't meant to last.

Daniel got up and walked to him, carefully taking the glass he was holding from his hands and setting it down. It'd get lost and taken away by a server, he'd never finish that drink.

As soon as it left his hands it was gone.

"Can we dance? Or you still busy?" Daniel asked.

Johnny went through his checklist. The dances had been announced, all the important ones, he'd given his speech. He'd taken all the photos he was supposed to.

He was free until it was time for them to go. Until the party was over. Until someone needed him. Then he had to help with clean up, make sure the guys got to the hotel okay, that Jimmy and Jenny got to where they needed to go.

He could dance.

"Yeah," Johnny said stepping towards Daniel, maybe misjudging it and getting a little too close.

Daniel grinned at him. "Hoo boy, you are drunk. Who did this to you? You sure dancing won't make you sick?"

"I'll be fine," Johnny said.

"I'm going to take your word on that," Daniel said taking his hands and leading him to the dance floor.

He couldn't imagine now doing this with Ali. It was all he'd dreamed of for almost a full year. Maybe almost 2. Ever since Sid had told him he'd done well to get a date with Ali and started paying for his dates.

Sid had actually talked to him when he dated Ali. He hadn't ignored him as much as he had before. It wasn’t just anger and violence but sometimes something civil if you squinted.

Daniel had turned out the lights, but had illuminated a new doorway, a new path he hadn't ever seen, that he hadn't know existed.

And this, this was nice, this was easy. To dance with Daniel felt like second nature. He knew Daniel so well, knew how to read him, even drunk, he was so easy to follow.

He was in good hands.

Great hands.

Beautiful lovely talented hands.

He loved those hands.

Daniel was looking at him and smiling, laughing softly. "Good to know Johnny. I was worried. You've been tense all night."

"I have?"

He'd hoped he wasn't that easy to read.

"Not noticeable except to people who really know you, I asked Dutch and he just said weddings are a lot of work and then gave me a shot."

"There's a lot for a best man to do."

"I've been listening to all your phone calls and saw your planning and the pile of books you checked out from the library. But it's not that. You've been uncomfortable since Jimmy asked you to be his best man. So what's eating you?"

Did he say it? It sounded so damn childish.

"I'm jealous. I'm trying not to be."

"Jealous? Of who?"

"Them."

"Jimmy and Jenny?"

"Yeah. I'm happy for them but I'm jealous."

Someone was waving to him and he sighed, he kissed Daniel's cheek.

"I gotta go, sorry."

It was a lot. He was taking pictures, answering questions, and before he knew it it was over.

He'd seen Daniel such a frustratingly short time.

Daniel had brought him food, cornering him and asking him if he'd eaten and when he'd said no, a little woozy but full of booze, Daniel had made him eat, not letting him leave his corner.

He wasn't sure if Daniel had had a good time.

He'd probably should've spent more time with him. He waved off Jenny and Jimmy, the last to leave and then turned back to the empty hall.

Staff were cleaning and he helped fold chairs and carry them to the back, he helped sweep up confetti and colorful streamers.

He made sure, with a checklist he'd made before he'd had all the alcohol he'd been given, that everything was done.

He drank one more shot with the staff before heading to his own room.

Jimmy was married.

He felt tears prick his eyes. He was very happy for Jimmy. He'd graduated, again, was starting at a firm and now was married, he was heading off to Spain for the honeymoon.

Johnny leaned against the walls of the elevator.

It was another goodbye. Not a full one. But Jimmy would probably start a family. He'd be busy.

Johnny would have conversations with small children screaming for attention in the background.

Jimmy had finally found himself. He'd found who he wanted to be after so long of knowing that he didn't want to do the one thing expected of him and he was doing well and Johnny was so damn proud.

So damn proud of that man who'd hugged him tight before getting in that car.

He'd probably do that three more times. Possibly more.

Life was changing.

It always was.

Though it felt like he hadn’t. Like he was stuck.

He walked down the hall a little wobbly towards his room, counting the numbers as he went.

Jimmy's cousins room, his parents, his own mothers room, Lucille's, Mr. Miyagi's, the guys, one, two, three.

He turned.

That was him.

He unlocked the door.

Daniel was sitting on the couch watching TV. He had some cake he'd snagged from the wedding, still wearing his suit but the shoes were off, sitting shiny near the door.

"Hey, they're on their way to Spain?"

"Yeah," Johnny said carefully getting out of his shoes, stumbling a little and then heading towards the bed, flopping onto it with a sigh.

"You okay?" Daniel asked, leaning over him from the side of the bed.

Johnny pulled him down into a kiss.

He tasted like cake. Sweet, incredibly sweet.

Daniel pulled back a little looking down at him.

Did he know how pretty he was?

How absolutely stunning?

How his big brown eyes were so captivating?

He could just get lost in Daniel's eyes.

Some people liked being in the spotlight, he liked being in Daniel's view, liked being the center of his attention.

Maybe it was childish.

Maybe it was silly.

But he liked it.

Felt seen.

But not in a bad way.

A good way.

A way that made his skin tingle, like how your hair stands on end. But in a good way.

Other people got that right? A good spine tingle?

Oh and his mouth.

His mouth was wonderful.

Full of so many words.

Johnny liked words.

He loved words.

It was like a waterfall of words.

Very comforting.

And!

And his mouth tasted like cake.

And it felt nice on his mouth.

Good kisses.

Daniel was smiling down at him.

Was he talking?

Someone was talking.

Oh.

It was him.

Daniel tucked Johnny's hair behind his ear and Johnny leaned into the touch.

"How much did you drink?" Daniel asked.

Johnny frowned.

He held up his hand.

They had champagne at the start.

And then there was wine with the bridesmaids.

Maybe four shots?

No five.

Jimmy's parents wanted to drink with him.

Then the wedding toast.

Then one more shot with the staff.

He held up both hands.

"Have you eaten anything?"

"You fed me."

"I did, but was that it?"

"Busy, so very busy."

"The food was good tesoro you should've eaten more of it," Daniel said carefully moving to lay down next to him on his side, head in his hand. "You know, I don't think I've ever seen you this drunk before. Vegas was close but you'd were more sobered then this."

"No?" Johnny tried to remember.

He closed his eyes because their room was too bright.

"Sid said You will be just like your dad, a deadbeat, drunk. You will die in a ditch, drunk. I don't know my dad. But I know I don't want to be anything Sid wants me to be. Thinks I'll be. It's very easy to just drown myself. I...I could've....I think I would've. Stopped trying to swim. I don't want to drown. Want to remember, errything," Johnny opened his eyes looking at Daniel. "You. Wanna remember you. And friends. Want to remember good thing and be happy. But..." he brought his hand down on his own chest harder than he meant and it made a loud thump. "Failed."

"What do you mean? What did you fail at? The wedding was lovely and you worked very hard."

"Jealous. Shouldn't be jealous. Should be happy. Jimmy's married. Jimmy finally decided who he is, who he wants to be. I'm very proud of him," Johnny said with a sniff rubbing at his face.

He really was proud of Jimmy. So damn proud. How many times had he listened to Jimmy cry about how his parents wanted him to do something he didn't want to do? How he didn't know how to not be miserable his whole life? Jimmy cried, so so much. Until he figured it out. Until he found his own path.

"Jealous? You mentioned that earlier, who are you jealous of?" Daniel asked hand on his torso, under the jacket.

Not grabbing, not reaching, not squeezing, just a gentle stroke over his shirt.

"I'm going to do this three more times. Three more times at least. Probably more. Like Kumiko. Or- or Jessica. Your family's big. We might have weddings to go to there. What am I going to do if I feel this awful at each one? I should be happy for them but I'm not as happy as I should be."

Daniel leaned in over him, close.

"Johnny, what's wrong? What do you want?"

"I shouldn't want to. I mean look how it worked out with Sid? Sid was nice once. Can you believe that? When my mom got married he was like a prince in a fairy tale, coming in to whisk her away. To save us. And he was nice to me. Or I thought he was. It took me a long time to realize it wasn't me. That the guy I met at first and up until the honeymoon he took Mom on was fake. A mirage. And the real man was the awful person I lived with after.

“He gave me a card you know? Told me go buy a ring. Marry Ali. He'd pay for it all. And I thought I'd escape. Be free. That was my future. That's all I planned. Can you believe that? The guys planned college, they planned all this stuff and I planned just marrying Ali. I planned so much of it too. Because Sid wanted to see how much it'd cost to get rid of me. So I'd already done most of the ground work. It's how I knew to do this," Johnny said waving at the air.

"I already had looked at hair styles and make up, already found the best of everything. Where's the best place to get married. Where's the best food. Where's the best spots for photo shoots. Best tailor for the suits and dresses. How much it costs for the suits and the dresses. I'd already picked out flowers and bouquets and— and these," Johnny said pulling the boutonnière carefully from his suit and holding it up.

"I'd already bought the ring you know? To ask. Took months to find it.

And then everything fell apart. And it's for the best, and I shouldn't want something that's burned me twice. Twice. You'd think I'd learn my lessons. But I want it to work once. A fairy tale that has a happy ending. Though why it's always a wedding I don't know. But I want one. Even if I don't deserve one."

"Hey now, that's not true," Daniel said hand on his face, thumb brushing through tears.

Daniel's voice was so soft, his eyes so gentle, he was partially laying on top of Johnny. He took the boutonnière from Johnny, twirling it between his fingers.

Such nice fingers.

Talented.

"You deserve to be happy Johnny. Does it have to be official official?"

"Hmm?" Johnny said looking up from Daniel's fingers back up to those beautiful eyes.

"Does the marriage you want have to be official? Like with government documents. Or can it just be the party and the ceremony?"

"The official stuff means not being left out," Johnny said softly.

"Left out?"

"If you get hurt...I can't be there."

"What do you mean you can't be there?"

"They don't let people come in unless they're family."

"So you're worried I'll get hurt?"

"Or I will. I'd want you with me," Johnny said softly. "I mean right now...all I've got who can do that is mom. I want you."

Daniel smiled softly at him.

"Me huh? Not thinking about Ali with all of this wedding stuff?"

"I am," Johnny said. "It would've been easy. But it would've been bad. She didn't know that I'd put all that pressure on our relationship. I didn't tell her. I didn't tell her she was my escape plan."

"You still have an escape plan?"

"No. I don't want to escape anywhere. Well except maybe out of these pants and this jacket. They're too warm. I used to dream about going somewhere else. Then I met Ali and thought my escape could be a person. Then that fell through. And then-"

Daniel had moved off of him so he sat up taking off his jacket, he was too hot.

Everything was too hot.

He struggled with his tie.

It'd been easy that morning.

Daniel leaned forward and carefully undid it.

Johnny wanted to kiss his fingers.

He did.

"Because of Mr. Miyagi, because of you, I saw my life a little better. I saw who was there, who had my back, I was able to not just survive. Because that's all I was doing. I was able to slow down and be and I wanted to stay. I kept having nightmares though."

Daniel carefully freed his hands and took Johnny's tie off, set it aside and carefully set about unbuttoning everything.

"Sid would have had the servants kick me out, earlier. I figured he'd cut me off once I turned 18. That he'd try to find a way to get rid of me. Because he'd said he wanted me gone. Married off before then. I had so many nightmares that he'd throw out all my stuff or put me on a plane or drive me out into the desert. I couldn't sleep. I was so worried I'd wake up somewhere far away unable to find my way back. And I wanted to come back. I wanted to be with you, with my friends, near Mom."

Daniel pulled back and Johnny wiggled out of his dress clothes, his shirt, his pants letting them fall onto the floor.

"You want something to eat? Want some cake?"

Cake.

Right.

Johnny leaned over kissing him.

Daniel smiled and shook his head. "That was not an answer."

"You taste like cake."

"I'll be right back," Daniel said slipping off the bed and getting the cake and a bottle of water.

Johnny watched him.

He looked good in his suit shirt and slacks.

The tailor had done a good job.

Daniel at some point had unbuttoned his cuffs and rolled them up and his forearms looked golden in the dim light.

"I love you."

"I love you too," Daniel said sitting next to him. Handing him the cake and the bottle of water. "Normally I'd throw that to you but I don't think you can catch much right now."

"Everything about you is stunning. I want to look at you and also it hurts to look at you."

"It hurts huh?"

"Blindingly beautiful," Johnny said taking a bite of the cake.

It was good.

Jimmy and Jenny had good taste.

He wondered if it as easy to come to an agreement about cake.

"What kind of cake do you like?"

"Coconut and caramel."

Johnny nodded thoughtfully, coconut caramel sounded good.

He took another bite.

Daniel opened up the water and passed it to him.

Johnny took a drink. Then looked back down at the cake. "This is your cake though."

"I had cake. I brought it because I wasn't sure if you'd gotten any."

Johnny stared at him, vision blurring.

"Thank you," Johnny said setting it down and hugging him tight. "That was so sweet. You're so sweet. I'm so lucky."

Daniel hugged him back just as tightly and it was nice, so nice to be pressed in so close to Daniel.

He was still wearing his suit and he looked so good in it.

He looked good in everything.

In nothing.

He was beautiful.

Stunning.

And he gave such good hugs.

He had such a great mind and a keen eye.

He noticed things Johnny didn't think anyone else would notice.

He thought of things he didn't think other people thought.

Johnny hadn't had any of the cake and he thought that was fine.

But Daniel had saved him some.

Kept it safe in their room, waiting for him.

He didn't want to let go.

He wanted to keep Daniel in his arms.

He wanted to feel his skin against his.

Because it always felt nice.

Daniel was always soft, felt nice under his finger tips.

His hair was always soft.

He smelled nice.

How did you tell someone that you loved them so much in a moment that it hurt your heart?

Because he did.

So much that he couldn't see straight.

"I love you too," Daniel said softly, his hand was in Johnny's hair and his breath was warm against his neck.

He pressed a kiss there.

Johnny picked up his cake and took another bite.

"What kind of cake do you like?" Daniel asked, arms hooking around him as they moved curling up together against the headboard legs intertwined.

"Almost all cakes. I only ever got cake on my birthday...or Moms after she married Sid. She never got a cake for herself when I was little. Not that I could remember. She got me cupcakes.

“I figured it out once, she'd ask the bakeries if they had any cupcakes they'd sell by themselves, because usually they do the sets? The dozens or half dozens. I'd be at the bakery with her looking at everything but I never asked for anything because I didn't think we'd get anything. I just liked looking. They were pretty. And they'd seem to realize that she couldn't afford the packs. I don't know if she told them. She might've. But she'd always manage to afford one. They were different every year.

“She always told them I wasn't picky. And it was true. I didn't get anything like that otherwise. So she'd get me a cupcake and we'd celebrate in our apartment or on the beach at night. We had one candle we stuck in it that got smaller and smaller over the years and she had match books she got for free from the restaurant she worked at.

“Sid though, thought I was spoiled and made a joke of it. Had the staff make me a princess cake every year. I'm sick of those."

"A princess cake? What's that?"

"It's a Prinsesstårta, a Swedish cake. It's sponge cake, with cream and raspberry jam covered in whipped cream and a green marzipan. I didn't like the jam. But Mom liked them and Sid always liked his joke and people like to eat it when they came for my birthday parties. It was for other people not me. So anything except that."

"You deserve cakes you like," Daniel said softly.

"You like coconut and caramel. Like the girl scout cookies?"

Daniel laughed softly. "Those have chocolate."

"Oh, they do don't they?"

"I do like those though."

Johnny ate another bite of the cake. "This is good cake."

"It is."

"They're going to freeze it now."

"The cake?"

"Yeah, it was taken away and wrapped up and it'll live in a freezer until their anniversary."

"Huh. Won't it get freezer burn?"

"Not if it's done properly."

"Why do they do it?"

"Luck," Johnny said around another bite. "People saved it to eat it after they had a kid. I asked the Browns. You freeze it. Until everything hardens. Then you take it out. Wrap it with uh that sticky plastic stuff."

"Saran wrap?"

"Yeah, that. And then after that's super tight. You do it again with foil. At least three times."

"That seems excessive."

"Not done."

"You're kidding."

"No," Johnny said shaking his head. "Then an air tight container. And you put it somewhere to hibernate for a year."

"Damn."

"All of it, is a lot of work. Even planning."

"This planning you did, was it your dream version? Everything you want?"

"No," Johnny said around a mouthful of cake. "It was everything I knew Sid or Ali would want."

"That's a lot of work for something not for you."

"It was for me though."

"How so?"

"For my freedom."

"You're free now. Right?"

"Yes. But it's sweet right? To say to everyone you know," Johnny said turning to look in those gorgeous brown eyes. "I'm all in, I love you more than anyone else. I bet on us. I bet on our future. To be happy. To be a team. We have each other's back. And I want you all to know that and we welcome you to be a part of our lives. To celebrate love."

Daniel's face was a little pink, a little red. Like his lips.

Johnny kissed him.

He liked kissing him.

"Why do you have a drunk kisses ban? You seem to like it," Daniel asked when he pulled away to drink some of the water.

Johnny stretched, a long slow stretch. It felt better after standing around stiffly, shoulders back all day just in case because of the photographer.

Drunken kisses.

He had pushed Daniel away when he'd been drunk.

He hadn't wanted to.

He took Daniel's hand, interlacing their fingers.

Looking at Daniel's hand, studying it.

He'd said something, what had it been?

He wanted to be remembered.

That's what he always told Ali. And he told Daniel that too.

Hadn't he?

But sitting in that hotel thinking of marriages and something Sid said echoed in his head.

"I don't want to be drunken mistake," Johnny said softly.

That's what Sid had told him one night.

That that was all Johnny was, distilled to the tiniest essence.

Start to end.

Eventually he learned to tune Sid out, to try and not let the barbs stick, embedded in his skin but that was an old one.

One Sid had said with a sneer, so assuredly.

Johnny didn't want his relationships to be that way.

He didn't want someone to pick him because they were drunk. Or like him more because of the alcohol in their system in that moment.

He thought he'd dug it out, but it seemed like it was deeper than he expected.

It'd taken root, and he'd just managed to hurt himself more.

Daniel leaned over him. Gently cupping the side of his face.

"Never," he whispered. "Never a mistake. Not for me."

Johnny reached for him, wanting to pull him into a hug and bury his face in Daniel's shoulder.

But Daniel wasn't budging.

He'd gotten stronger.

It shocked his alcohol addled brain for a moment, the warm tears running down his cheeks as he reached out and gently squeezed Daniel's bicep.

He knew Daniel had been working out.

He'd gotten a gym membership and offered to get one for Johnny too if he wanted.

They'd tried that in West Hollywood and Johnny hadn't been particularly fond of the gym there.

Mostly because people kept coming over to try and correct him. The first ten times was fine, but after that it was just annoying and he'd been on a no gym self ban.

He'd rather go for a run on the beach or work out at home.

But damn.

Daniel was solid.

He was still wearing his suit and surely he was uncomfortable.

Suits were nice, but after a full day in them, after all the dancing and standing around Johnny got itchy.

Claustrophobic.

Just a bit.

Maybe they should arm wrestle. That was how you tested upper arm strength right? Who could pin the other ones hand to the table?

"You're drunk tesoro I'm not going to arm wrestle you."

That was a little disappointing.

Maybe later.

He'd have to remember.

Daniel's boutonnière was pretty.

Johnny had made it himself.

He'd made all of them himself for the guys, for Jimmy, for his own.

It'd saved time and stress of having to collect them and the bouquet from the florist.

But he'd made Daniel's special.

Love.

Cheesy, but every single one, anything related to Daniel he had to add love.

It was impossible not to.

He was lucky. So damn lucky that Daniel picked him.

Liked him.

That he picked Johnny and not Ali.

Daniel was, a beautiful piece of art. But human. Very human.

But in all the best ways.

Like the joy a cat finds in stretching in a sunbeam.

Daniel gave Johnny that feeling.

Daniel leaned down and kissed Johnny's cheeks.

It tickled a little bit.

"I'm glad you picked me too. What flowers would you want at a wedding?" Daniel asked, leaning down, head propped in his hand looking down at Johnny but curled up partially on him, partially beside him.

His other hand rubbing away tears.

That were thankfully finally subsiding.

"Roses."

"Of course."

"Butterfly ranunculus."

"Don't know that one, you'll have to show me."

"Lilac."

"Those smell nice."

"Astilbe, hydrangeia, iris, lavendar."

"Wow, okay. Long list huh?"

Johnny nodded. "I'd need all of them."

"All the flowers? Why?"

"Because they have to make up for the uneven comparison of beauty."

"You lost me."

"They would all pale compared to you. I wouldn't notice even an avalanche of tweedia and zinnia's because my focus would be on you."

"So there's got to be a lot?" Daniel asked, his face was that reddish color again.

Johnny reached up and gently poked his cheek.

Sometimes he just got so lost. But it was fine. Because getting lost with Daniel was an adventure. And those arms had gotten so strong, they'd already been strong. They'd already caught him so many times. So as long as he held on just as tight he couldn't ever really get lost.

"What kind of rings do you like? Gold? Silver? Do you like stones? What kind of rock? Diamonds?"

Johnny frowned wrinkling his nose.

"No to diamonds huh? Hate them that much?"

"Mom had a diamond ring, tried to pawn it off. It was worth nothing."

"Seriously?"

"Yeah," Johnny said. "It's a waste and she ended up cryin' over it for....for... a long time. Think it was her mom's."

"Your grandma?"

"Guess so. The price didn't go up, it went down. I think."

"But they're sparkly," Daniel said.

"And stabby. Have you ever gotten a stone caught on something? Mom ruined a sweater with the engagement ring Sid bought her."

"So no stabby stone," Daniel said with a soft laugh. "No diamonds. Do you like blue?"

"Yeah."

"Green?"

"Yeah."

"Are their colors you don't like?"

"Did you get a class ring?"

"No."

"Ah. The stones were pretty."

"Class rings huh?"

"Should've given you mine," Johnny said. "If we'd been together before graduating, would've given you mind to wear at school."

"Yeah what's it got on it? School name, year, and what?"

"That's it. School crest."

"Our school had a crest?"

"Yeah. And the mascot."

Daniel laughed softly. "You know where that is?"

"No. But if I find it, I'll put it right here," Johnny said tapping Daniel's ring finger. "Or would you hate it? Half your senior year at that school was awful. I hope the other half was fun."

"It was. I don't know, let me see this monstrosity first," Daniel said with a laugh before his features softened and he kissed Johnny's nose. "I love everything you give me though. And I love the sentiment."

Johnny picked up the hand that Daniel wasn't using to prop himself up and carefully pressed his palm against Daniel's.

There were callouses but Daniel took good care of his hands. Had anyway ever since he'd stopped exhausting himself at that awful apprenticeship.

He hated that place. Daniel had always been tired and exhausted and sore. And Johnny wasn't particularly good at massages.

He was trying.

But Daniel didn't melt when he did it.

When Daniel gave Johnny one he forgot how to speak sometimes.

What were his hands good at?

Fighting?

Take away fighting and what was left?

A dandelion seed in the wind?

Dandelions were weeds.

Daniel was like a nice rose.

Pretty, beautiful, fought back when you pushed it.

And Johnny was a dandelion.

A dime a dozen.

Floating around aimlessly.

Looking for somewhere to put down roots.

"Put down roots with me," Daniel said. "I like dandelions they're pretty. They hold a lot of magic in them you know?"

Magic in a dandelion?

Johnny frowned wrinkling his nose.

"How can you love flowers but look down on dandelions?" Daniel asked.

"I like dandelions. They're....useful."

"Useful you say, but not pretty."

"They're pretty."

"And tasty."

Johnny frowned.

"Oh come on, we had that dandelion salad last summer at that fancy vegetarian restaurant. And! Jimmy broke out that dandelion wine for us."

Ah.

He did remember the wine.

He'd only had a sip.

Useful.

Maybe being a dandelion wasn't so bad.

"I mean I wouldn't call you a dandelion myself. But I also haven't picked which flower I really associate with you. Lavender? Because of the cookies maybe. But really tesoro, I want you to roll over."

Roll over?

But then he wouldn't be able to see Daniel's pretty face.

"Yes, on your stomach. I'm not going anywhere."

Johnny sighed and rolled over.

"Are you comfortable."

"We doin' somethin' dirty?"

Daniel laughed. "No."

"You sure?"

"Pretty sure."

Johnny shifted a little to get more comfortable and listened to Daniel moving to sit on his back.

"You're floating off on me a little bit. Which I get. I do that all the time. It's kind of cute to watch you, but—"

Johnny felt hands gently press into his back.

"We're going to start somewhere basic. The wedding was gorgeous. You put a lot of time effort and energy to it and even if you feel bad about it because you already did all this prep before and didn't actually get to go through with it...that's okay.

“Jimmy still had a great time. Like there were no issues. The whole thing ran smoothly under your leadership. Because as much as you step back now and just sort of chill at Mr. Miyagi's shop, you're still a leader and people still follow. And you're good at planning things. And this...was a huge ordeal. So hey, good job. Okay? No. Not even a good job. Great job!"

Johnny felt soft lips on his shoulder and Daniel's hands digging into his back, working on knots.

"You planned the bachelor party which ended in Jimmy so overcome by emotions he started sobbing, twice. But the photos are gorgeous. You made sure everything happened on time when it was meant to. You got more drunk this time then I've ever seen and you still kept things going. Your speech was great, I got all teary eyed when you talked about Jimmy and about love. And I know it's a little weird that it's over. I mean they've gone off on their honeymoon....Where'd you wanna go if you got to go on a honeymoon?"

Daniel's voice had changed a little.

A casual question.

"I... never cared about that part," Johnny said. "I mean I figured I wouldn't get a choice."

"Now though?" Daniel asked.

"Italy."

Daniel laughed softly. "Italy? Why Italy?"

Johnny buried his face in the pillow.

Nonnio and Nonnia talked about Italy all the time.

How much they loved going there.

How much they missed it.

They talked so fondly about the food, about places they'd grown up and loved and wished they'd taken their grandkids to see.

And sometimes Daniel got a wistful look on his face, like he wanted to go.

Like he wanted to see those sights and taste the food and walk the roads his grandparents had.

A connection to his father who'd gotten to go when he was younger and it'd been unspoken that Lucille and Daniel's father had planned to take him one day and then...couldn't.

So there was no other place then Italy.

Though he wasn't sure if it was okay for him to say that.

Maybe Lucille still wanted to take Daniel one day.

Maybe it was selfish, but Johnny thought it could be fun.

He wanted to see Daniel in Italy.

He wanted to be part of that adventure.

Even if it was selfish.

His back felt wet. He heard Daniel sniff. Felt his fingers dig into his skin.

"Okay. I like that plan."

What plan?

Johnny turned his head slightly.

He was tired.

So tired.

He yawned.

Daniel was sitting on his back.

Why?

Should he be doing push ups?

But he was on the bed.

"Don't you dare move, I'm giving you a massage. Stay still. Just relax and enjoy."

"I'm fallin' asleep."

"That's fine. I'll wake you later to brush your teeth."

It was nice.

Daniel's hands were so nice.

Warm.

He was cozy.

He had nothing else to do.

Except make sure he got up before check out time.

All the pressure all the tasks, it was all done.

All that was left was to just relax and enjoy being with Daniel.

He did wish though that they'd gotten to dance more.

Maybe when they got home.

Or maybe before they left.

Chapter End Notes

Prinsesstårta dandelion salad
dandelion wine

Breathe. Focus. Reflect.

"We gotta go now, I'm not going to be late," Johnny called from the door. "I will leave you behind."

He heard Daniel, a squawk from where he was, the sound of him moving. "Hold on, don't you dare!"

"I promised," Johnny said opening the door and leaning against the frame.

He heard Daniel's footsteps. "You really want to wait by yourself when he's late?"

"No, I'd rather not wait by myself. But I will be there on time without having to rush."

"Let's take the Ford."

"You'll let me drive?"

"Why should you drive? It's my car."

"Because I know LA better. I can get us to the airport faster."

"I've been here a decade. I know my way around. Plus I've been to the airport plenty of times."

"Walk and talk," Johnny said tugging on Daniel's shirt, pulling him towards the door, kissing the top of his head and grabbing the keys, locking the door and following Daniel.

"There was when we went to Okinawa, when we got back from Okinawa, seeing Jessica off, seeing Jessica and Kumiko off, seeing Dutch off, seeing our mom's off on that single's trip, when we went to Tokyo and Seoul, picking Dutch up from the airport, picking Jessica up again, picking Kumiko up again. Picking up Nonnio and Nonnia. Really I think we're just a taxi service. They should start paying us."

Johnny laughed. "It's because we're the closest and have the most flexible schedules."

"It's because you always jump to offer."

"Like you'd let anyone else pick him up."

Daniel frowned, turning to Johnny and snatching the keys from his hand and running the rest of the way to the Ford. "That's why I'm driving."

"Hey," Johnny said running after him, but Daniel had surprised him and already slipped into the drivers seat of the Ford. He had his seatbelt buckled and the motor going by the time Johnny opened the passenger side.

"You snooze you loose."

"Says the guy who hits snooze like every five minutes in the morning."

"Mornings suck."

"They don't. Just weekday mornings when you have to drive through to West Hollywood with Louie."

"Very true," Daniel said as he made his way to LAX. "And you, no backseat driving."

"I'm not in the backseat though."

"Semantics," Daniel said hand on Johnny's thigh.

"Is this why you wanted to drive?"

"I would've done this either way."

"So I could've driven."

"You drove him to the airport."

"You jealous?"

Daniel was biting his lip.

"You are!"

"Well you get to see him all the time!"

"I knew it!"

"It's not fair okay? It's not that..." Daniel sighed. "I miss it okay? I'm jealous that you two get to hang out all the time and I'm off selling cars and being under appreciated."

"Glad you at least realized you're under appreciated."

"I do know! I know that being a car salesmen, even the boss is meetings and meetings and more meetings and numbers and stress and no one cares that I instituted free lunch or made sure everyone gets long breaks. Or how much of a pain in the ass insurance is. And I know that it's not like he's not a part of my life but I miss him okay? You...you're perfect."

Johnny scoffed. "I am not perfect."

"You are at the shop in the morning, you're helping out, you're at their place helping with dinner. You're all zen and balanced and I'm fraying. You took all of his lessons and like soaked them up like a sponge and I'm like spinning out of control. I always am."

"Maybe you should take a day off and hang out with him. Go fishing or something," Johnny said covering the hand on his thigh with his own, then prying it off of him and lifting it up to his lips to kiss, holding Daniel's hand in his.

"Hey, I liked where my hand was."

"Yeah, but I don't trust you."

"What? Why not? I'm not going to try anything."

"Sure you're not."

"I'm an adult you know. I know how to behave."

Johnny smiled, Daniel was sitting up straight, shoulders back, head held high, chin out, slightly offended and trying to make a point.

"I know."

"I'm also older than you. You should respect your elders."

"Yeah?"

"With age comes wisdom."

"And what wisdom do you have to impart?"

"You should go to the dentist every six months and should take your car in to be checked out every six months."

"Teeth and oil changes?"

"I'm just getting started."

"Oh, okay, good because I was going to say they sound like a mom reminder."

"Peanut butter stops hiccups."

"That sounds like a science experiment not wisdom."

"Hey."

"Don't go to bed angry."

"Because you can't fall asleep?"

"Because I want kisses before bed."

"Aha I see. When did I go to bed angry?"

"I'm sure plenty those six months you hated me."

"I didn't hate you. I was just mad because my life was a mess and unfairly took it out on you."

"I know," Daniel said winking at him. "I couldn't get out of your head. And I'm glad, because you couldn't stop thinking of me."

"Is that your wisdom?"

"You've put me on the spot. I mean how am I gonna compare? Like we're picking up the master of wisdom."

"You're overthinking it."

"How?"

"Because you're nervous."

"I'm not nervous."

"You are because of Louisa."

"I am not."

"You're worried that Louisa called him and told him you got her and Louie Jr. mixed up."

"I did not!" Daniel squeaked. "Don't you dare tell him."

"And you're jealous of the girl he stayed with."

"I am not!"

"You're worried that he doesn't have enough room in his heart for two students. But, Daniel, you're not his only student."

"Yeah and I already share him with you. I've made peace with that. But a teen girl? How can I compete with that? Louie--dammit, Louisa said he played like fairy godfather and got her ready for prom. He's my fairy godfather."

"You suck at sharing."

"I do not."

"You really do."

"Like what?"

"You literally shoved yourself between Chozen and I when he was talking to me."

"He can't be trusted."

"It's been almost a decade Daniel."

"He can never be trusted."

"You let him babysit our bonsai."

"He can be trusted with bonsai."

"You don't mind him hanging out with the girls or Mr. Miyagi, or the guys."

"That's fine."

Johnny sighed. "Okay, different one. You don't like sharing your Mom with Louie Jr."

"What?!" Daniel asked.

"If she calls and says she went out and took Louie Jr. to get clothes or for dinner or something your voice goes up an octave."

"It does not."

"It totally does. The point is Mr. Miyagi's home is here. Not Boston. He's got enough room in his heart for you and this girl," Johnny said. "So be nice."

"Be nice?! I am nice! I'm always nice! I'm the nicest of nice."

Johnny leaned over kissing his cheek. "I mean don't make him feel bad about leaving. I'm sure he missed you and everyone else a lot."

"Wisdom. Unfair," he said pulling up next to arrivals.

He parked and flicked on the hazards, resting his hand back on Johnny's thigh and leaning over.

"I can share. I want to share my whole life with you."

Johnny looked at him surprised as Daniel kissed him. His hand moved, higher up, towards his inner thigh. Johnny made a sound that made his skin burn when he heard it.

Daniel grinned pulling away.

"Did you not see that Mr. Miyagi is right there?" Johnny asked, voice barely a whisper.

Daniel blinked, patting Johnny's thigh. "Whoops. I'll go help him."

Johnny buried his face in his hands.

"Hey Mr. Miyagi! Welcome back! How was Boston?"

“Daniel-san! Miyagi happy to be home. Bring Daniel-san and Johnny-san souvenir. Beans.”

“Beans?” Daniel asked carrying the suitcase and putting it in the back of the Ford.

“Ah, long time since Miyagi see Ford.”

“Yeah, thought you’d like to be picked up in it, for old times sake. What’s this about Beans?”

“Boston famous beans. Also buy tea,” Miyagi said with a grin. “Yukie and Sato wanted tea.”

“Tea? They know there’s none in the harbor right?” Johnny asked when Mr. Miyagi got in.

“Hai. But fun joke. Amusing. Boston Tea, and we have small party. Tea party.”

“You’re not going to dump it in the pond are you?”

“No no, fish would not like.”

Johnny had told Daniel to take a day off and spend it with Mr. Miyagi. So he’d called in. Said he’d be out. He felt antsy. Like he was playing hooky or something. But he was the boss, so it was fine right? Then why’d he feel so guilty?

Daniel pulled up to Mr. Miyagi's and parked, walking the familiar path to the backyard. Mr. Miyagi was sitting enjoying some tea.

"Hey Mr. Miyagi."

"Ah Daniel-san," Mr. Miyagi said with a smile. "Tea?"

Daniel nodded sitting down beside him and taking the offered tea. He fiddled with the cup in his hands for a moment.

"I'm glad you're back again," Daniel said. "I missed you while you were in Boston."

"Get in trouble?" Mr. Miyagi asked with a laugh. "Who fight now? Car salesmen?"

"I got into an argument with Tom Cole once Mr. Miyagi, I don't get into actual fights with car salesmen. And it was only because he said I was too young to be a car salesmen and no one would buy from a baby and I told him I was over 20 thank you very much and it's not my fault that he already looks like he's got one foot in the grave and that it's probably because he overcharges his customers which is why they all keep hiking out to West Hollywood to me."

Daniel sighed and then set the cup of tea down.

"I thought I'd be happy, that I'd feel something you know? I've got the dealership and it's doing well enough. I was able to buy Johnny a Firebird and give it to him for his birthday. I got Ma a new car like as soon as I opened. And I'm in a good relationship. But I just...it doesn't feel right. I feel like there should be, something bigger. Like that every morning I should be excited to get up and kiss Johnny and go to work and I should be the happiest person on earth but...I'm not. I'm not unhappy I'm just not....that. I don't know what's next."

"Ah," Mr. Miyagi said with a nod. "Has Daniel-san stopped?"

"Stopped? What do you mean?"

"Ever since move to California Daniel-san run up a mountain. The mountain never end. Move, big thing. Take a lot to move especially when no choice. Then tormented by Cobras and always running and fighting. Survival mode. Then train with Miyagi. Going to school, training, preparing for big fight with Cobras, date. And then Daniel-san win and see Johnny-san nearly die. Win is a high, witness attempted murder big blow. And then Johnny-san surprise with apology, get angry, upset, because many things, but one thing, one thing bothered Miyagi, red mark on Johnny-sans neck. Johnny-san disappear and confusing feelings made worse. But then Cobras appear. Confusing. Enemies now trying to be friends. Does Daniel-san trust them? Or is it a trap? Still healing from months of cruelty. But then Cobras there. Johnny-san there and fun and confusing. Even more Daniel-san have crush."

"You knew all the way back then?" Daniel asked whirling on the man blushing a dark red.

"Mmm," Mr. Miyagi said thoughtfully. "Daniel-san look at Johnny-san with very specific look. Also always touch. Always find an excuse to touch. Always stand very close. Like magnet. And Daniel-san always talk about Johnny-san. Even if conversation have nothing to do with Johnny-san, somehow find way to talk about him."

Daniel groaned covering his face with his hands flopping back on the deck. "Then why didn't he notice?!"

"Johnny-san also healing, on different journey. But Daniel-san also not notice how Johnny-san move around Daniel-san, how speak to Miyagi about Daniel-san, everything Johnny-san do not just for...redemption but out of love."

"He talked about me with you?" Daniel asked.

"Both boys only talk about other boy," Mr. Miyagi said with a sigh.

"All conversation about other. Miyagi think war long period of life. But six months of liking but not move, feel even longer."

"Hey," Daniel said with a laugh.

"Ah but Daniel-san so busy trying to make Johnny-san see, of not seeing, of living, finally living and busy. Prom, finals, graduation and then Okinawa. Not have to go, but Miyagi know, even if Miyagi say no, boys would've come after anyway. Miyagi very lucky to have such good..."

Daniel sat up smiling softly. "You're right, if we hadn't gotten on that flight with you I think Johnny would've gotten us tickets to the next one. You're so important to both of us. I meant it you know. What I said at the door of the plane."

"Daniel-san say friend, best friend. But Miyagi feel...sometimes...like Daniel-san is a good son."

Daniel looked at Mr. Miyagi shocked, feeling tears prick at his eyes.

Mr. Miyagi smiled tears in his eyes as well. "Boys care much about Miyagi and Miyagi so grateful. Grateful they came, that they were there. Even though it was hard. Even though terrible final summer vacation. And Daniel-san so stressed, about Miyagi, about Fresno, about Johnny-san, about everything in Okinawa."

Daniel laughed softly, a watery laugh and nodded.

"Then come home. And open shop. Together. Co-owners, but Miyagi feel like father and son business. Very happy, think, if son had survived this would have been dream. Mrs. Miyagi and Miyagi and son. Gave up on dream but Daniel-san, amidst ashes of own home, pick up Miyagi dream, dust off and give back. Bad time for Daniel-san. Only get worse as Cobras, new cobras return with new teacher and torment Daniel-san worse then ever before. Survival again. Only survival. Drowning and doing best to reach surface to catch breath moment after moment. And win. Finally win. And enemies gone, squashed and rather than take break. Rather than find a plateau to breathe and rest Daniel-san focus on next thing. Apartment with Johnny-san, go to school and apprentice and busy busy busy busy. So busy that Daniel-san get sick and Johnny-san have to fight Daniel-san boss."

"Who told you that? He didn't actually fight him!" Daniel said.

"Point is Daniel-san never take break. Never stop to smell the flowers. Always moving. Always heading where think needed. Right? Daniel-san think Johnny-san unable to keep still, but Johnny-san keep still. Johnny-san like sloth that gross moss. But Daniel-san move so much, flitting from one crisis to another, one goal to next, good, but also leave no time to enjoy moments. Daniel-san forget to breathe. Forget balance. Reach goal and wonder, is this it?"

Daniel sat looking at the garden and sighed. He thought he knew. He thought he knew what the problem was but he couldn't admit it to anyone. He didn't want to say it out loud.

"I think Mr. Miyagi I reached my goal and the problem is… I don't think it's what I want to do."

"No?"

"No. I was happiest I think, at the shop with you and Johnny. But I also don't think that's what I want either. I...I don't know what I want."

"Daniel-san, job does not need to be whole life. Does not need to define. Miyagi fisherman. Whole family fisherman. But Miyagi also karate, also bonsai, also handyman. Miyagi friend, Miyagi husband, Miyagi son, Miyagi father. Daniel-san son, boyfriend, friend, car salesman and mechanic, soccer player, graduate, karate champion. Life not mmm what is the saying? All eggs in one basket. Daniel-san not just cars salesmen. Daniel-san not just fight with Tom Cole. Daniel-san contain multitudes, strong roots growing into a strong tree, with branches spreading out into every which way. Daniel-san not want to be car salesmen that okay. Daniel-san not need to live in box."

"But I already left the bonsai shop Mr. Miyagi. And Johnny and I moved in with his mom so I could follow this dream. He bet on me. I don't want to leave another business I started for nothing."

"Not for nothing!" Mr. Miyagi said. "Businesses do well, do okay, and sometimes they fail. But each failure new lesson. Learn from mistakes. Learn from choices. Daniel-san breathe, close eyes, and breathe."

"Now?"

"Hai."

Daniel groaned and closed his eyes and breathed.

"Daniel-san need time, to take time and reflect. Grow. Need to take break. Even if short one. When make choice to become car salesman Daniel-san different person then Daniel-san now. Not know as much as know now. And even if that's not knowing what want at least know what don't want. So take time and breathe and think and live."

"Yes Mr. Miyagi."

Daniel felt a fear grip his chest and he opened his eyes turning to Mr. Miyagi who'd started to get up.

"What if I'm lost?"

"Sometimes being lost is okay. Have to make choice, go back and retrace steps, pick a new path or continue forward. There is no wrong choice, there is no answer to life, no perfect thing, make choice and can change choice later if need. Close eyes, breathe, reflect and think."

Daniel nodded closing his eyes and breathing.

How long had it been that he'd done this?

Just sat somewhere and breathed and existed?

How long had it been since he'd not been rushing somewhere?

Not balancing multiple spinning plates at once?

Trying to carry all his goals at once?

The closest he got was staying with Laura. But that had been short lived because he felt bad and he found a good apartment in West Hollywood and Johnny was happy to move with him, to be closer to the guys.

He worried he'd wasted his and Johnny’s time. But Mr. Miyagi had said he hadn't wasted his time.

He wondered how tightly he'd been holding on, because his shoulders were stiff.

It wasn't easy to sit there, to root himself and breathe.

His mind didn’t sink into that meditative state as easily as it once had.

He kept worrying.

About Louie at the dealership, about Johnny who was co-sensei-ing with Chozen today.

They were going on a field trip with their younger students somewhere. He couldn't remember where.

It sounded different from his field trips with Mr. Miyagi. No fishing boats or oceans or trying to balance on weird things.

Art museums and ballet. Cultured stuff that felt more like sneaky dates then lessons in karate.

Daniel tried so hard not to get jealous. To not let his mind wander to what he would do if he got to go with Johnny to an art museum or ballet, reaching for his hand, touching him in the dark during the show.

Chozen wasn't him. Still didn't mean he didn't trust him.

But he'd also seen them with their students on field trips. The way the kids hung off of both of them, a small mob in constant need of attention. They were so well behaved in the dojo, well trained when asked to line up, to practice drills. But once that was gone….it'd gotten better. They liked listening to what Johnny and Chozen had to say. They liked their field trips. And the parents liked it. And they always sat on opposite ends of the theater with all the kids between them, and the hands that were holding Johnny's were small and sticky.

Daniel had stopped volunteering to go with them because…Chozen didn't have a chance with a small hoard of children around. And Johnny was too professional. Those old babysitter skills and life guard skills kicking in. Watching and ensuring the kids stayed together, no one got lost, no one got hurt. Daniel understood why Chozen had asked for Johnny's help. Why Johnny thrived with the kids. He'd seen it first hand in New York back in high school the way Johnny was in charge of their group and got them there and back safely.

But he wasn't supposed to be thinking about Johnny. Or Chozen. He was supposed to be thinking about himself. About the feeling that he wasn't…happy.

What did he truly want?

He was reaching his goals and then when he got there he was bored.

He'd gone for cars for what felt like a selfless reason and he'd given back to a community that welcomed him and made him feel safe.

But then he moved out of there, he moved again and again and felt like he'd abandoned everyone even though the dealership was still there.

He loved his home.

He loved hearing Johnny's footsteps through the apartment, knowing it was him because he knew the sounds of his gait, of the way he walked, the soft way he moved. Not like a dancer, but someone who was trained to be quiet. A bad thing, a good thing, but he loved it because it was Johnny.

Knowing he was somewhere in their home.

He was there, they were there together. In the kitchen, in the bedroom getting up, dancing with him in the living room, listening to music laughing and singing together.

It was a soothing balm to how he was feeling. Like seeing Johnny working on their balcony growing flowers and plants and excitedly showing Daniel when they were blooming.

He wanted to have more space, more space for Johnny to grow things. To see what he created. He wanted a bigger kitchen that fit all of their friends. And a spot to grill. He wanted a pool that was just theirs.

He wanted a house. He wanted roots.

The dealership took a lot of hours. There was so much damn paperwork. Meetings and long nights and even though he was giving Louie more work and more responsibility he still wasn't getting home as much, as frequently as he'd hoped.

And maybe that's what he wanted.

He wanted people not work.

He wanted a job with more flexibility, more movement, so he could go home and spend time with Johnny or come to Mr. Miyagi's to have dinner and relax and catch up and not think of all the meetings he had coming up and all the marketing he needed to do and the deals with car manufacturers and the cars that came in for repairs and how could he get the price down for people who needed it.

He still wanted that to exist.

He still wanted to leave LaRusso Auto in West Hollywood.

He still wanted the cars to get repaired with the same love and care that he'd been giving it for years.

He wanted to sell cars to people who weren't getting them elsewhere.

He still wanted that to exist he just....wanted to be there less. He didn't want to be in charge of it any more.

He wanted to quit.

His Ma was going to kill him.

Johnny was going to kill him.

But maybe.

He'd already made Louie go to school. Pushed forward not just by Daniel and family but Chozen had also chipped in on that pressure. Something Daniel was surprisingly grateful for. And showed it every White Day by having Chozen over, though the guys came now too. A big yearly event where Chozen's eyes got watery every year when he traded sweets he owed back and got things in return depending on who beat him to it on Valentine's Day.

And now...now Louie would be...maybe he could train Louie to take over.

Maybe he'd be interested?

Oh god.

Louie?

Louie Jr.?

The same kid who coasted by on Daniel's all-valley wins to get girls and get laid in Parsippany. The same kid who ran away from home to hang around with Johnny and Daniel? The same kid who drank all the wine with him as a kid and got so sick? Who stole family cars to come pick them up and drove terribly from Central Park to Newark?

That Louie Jr.?

Maybe though.

He cared.

He worked well with the staff and when he wasn't being a pain in the ass he was a good salesman.

He cared like Daniel did.

They'd gotten drunk in Daniel's office once after Louie had graduated his undergrad and he'd asked Daniel why.

Why a dealership in West Hollywood, why so damn cheap. Why was that the goal? When he could be making more money.

And Daniel had told him about the Chevrolet Chevelle Malibu wagon. The car that his mom had used to drive them to California and how awful it was and Louie laughed remembering it. And then he told Louie about Johnny's car.

Not the Avanti.

Not the Firebird.

The car Laura had still in the back of her garage, that the two of them had lived in.

Sometimes a car was a home.

Sometimes it was all anyone had as a form of shelter.

And Daniel didn't want anyone to lose that if he could help it.

If he could help people get a leg up, back up on their feet he would.

Louie had stared at him so soberly and quiet all of a sudden that Daniel hadn't known if he'd said something weird.

But the way Louie interacted with customers after was different.

More caring, more gentle, helpful and understanding.

More mature.

Shocking.

But it also helped sooth Daniel.

Maybe that was something. Maybe he could talk Louie into graduate school. Maybe he could get Chozen to help on that. And then maybe Louie could take over. It was LaRusso Auto not Daniel LaRusso Auto.

The thought alleviated so much tension in his shoulders he was shocked.

Louie.

Louie Jr.?!

In charge of LaRusso Auto?

Why was that thought calming?

Was he tired of being responsible?

Was he tired of being in charge?

What did he want?

He'd been wanting to marry Johnny.

He wanted a house.

Those were the next thing he wanted.

He hadn't been sure Johnny had wanted it. Worried that maybe he wasn't that kind of guy. That Sid's marriage to Laura had scared him off from it.

But he remembered how Johnny looked at Jimmy's wedding, in his suit, as best man, Daniel unable to take his eyes off of him. Dancing with him after, but how busy he was and the way he drunkenly cried at the hotel after. Falling apart so quickly, so suddenly.

Daniel had wondered if maybe it was something he had wanted. And then Johnny had confirmed it, telling him all these details Daniel had wanted to know. Ideas of where to go and what to do. And rings. The kind of ring Johnny would like.

He'd tried to be as casual as possible when fishing for information. And Johnny was too drunk to notice that he felt a little guilty. But it also felt like casually trying to ask someone what they wanted for their birthday without outright asking.

And rings…

He knew Johnny had talked about his high school ring, but Daniel had seen it and that was a hard no. They were too bulky.

He wanted to get Johnny a ring he'd liked. That fit him. Which meant knowing what was a no and what he liked.

So he didn't feel too guilty.

But how? How did he move forward?

How did they take that supposedly leap if the bridge was out?

If it didn't exist?

Because Johnny had been adamant about it not being just about the wedding, not just about the party and the food and dance, but being legally by one another's side in the bad times.

It all sucked.

They should've gotten married before Jimmy.

Daniel understood why Johnny had fallen apart.

Breathe.

He was happy for Jimmy. But he was upset at the world.

Breathe.

He didn't need a big project. He needed peace and balance. And that was a big project. Set it aside for a moment.

Focus.

Reflect.

Breathe.

After a while, when his heart had calmed Daniel opened his eyes and sighed.

"Daniel-san want to see photos from Boston?"

"Sure Mr. Miyagi," Daniel said.

He looked at the photo of Mr. Miyagi in his suit standing next to Louisa. A picture of Julie and Angel. A picture of Julie and the Buddhist monks they'd visited. Mr. Miyagi and the monks. Photos of Julie getting ready for prom.

"Daniel-san have pictures from while Miyagi gone?"

Daniel pulled out his wallet trying to think of what he'd done while Mr. Miyagi had been gone. Other than embarrass himself around Louisa multiple times.

He hadn't expected her to be there when he'd come by for a visit. Johnny teased him about it after.

But they'd checked-in on her from time to time, to make sure she was okay. Johnny showed her around LA, easily taking over the tour guide roll as he always did.

They had gone to the gardens and he'd taken his camera and he'd gotten a good one of Johnny looking at some flowers. And Louisa had taken a couple of the two of them surrounded by flowers. He pulled that out of his wallet to show Mr. Miyagi.

A business card fell out of his wallet and he stooped to pick it up out of the grass. Tommy's aunts business card.

He held it for a moment, flipping it over thoughtfully.

There was no harm in trying things.

Especially when his biggest goal was out of reach.

He could focus on other things.

Maybe he'd give her a call.

Transplanted

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Johnny held the brochure in his hands and worried it.

He'd been given it while picking up flowers for Yukie's birthday.

The workers at the market invited him. Said he might enjoy it.

It was something he'd forgotten about. Something from his old memories from when he was real little, something he'd dreamed of seeing, before everything fell apart.

He was sitting in the shop waiting for Mr. Miyagi to come in.

He wasn't sure what they were going to do this year.

For the last several years Mr. Miyagi had taken time off around New Years. He had taken Sato and Yukie to go look at the Grand Canyon last year and Johnny had kept the shop open.

And New Years was a busy time for Chozen so he couldn't ask Chozen to watch the shop.

And it wasn't like it was a work opportunity.

Johnny was just going to volunteer.

They'd invited him to help and he...wanted to. More than anything else.

But if he wasn't working then the shop might have to close or Mr. Miyagi might not go wherever he had planned to go with Sato and Yukie.

He knew a cruise was on their list. Something Yukie talked about the last time he'd been over.

The wooden chimes sang and Johnny shoved the brochure in the desk drawer. He wished Mr. Miyagi a good morning, jumping up to help with the supplies he'd brought in. Pots he'd picked up from across the street and some baby trees he'd picked up from somewhere.

It took a while to get all the trees potted in the official pots, sitting and working through the soil so it was the right amount of everything the bonsai needed, moving them over to where Mr. Miyagi sat so he could get to work designing.

A quiet but busy morning.

Only interrupted when Chozen came by with coffee, like always, for a quick chat before he opened the dojo.

Then Sato came to take Mr. Miyagi out for lunch, offering to take Johnny as well but Johnny declined. Daniel had packed him lunch. Had made them both lunch and Johnny ate it and dug out the brochure flipping through it again.

Maybe...maybe he could just rush over after work? It was less than an hour away, and he could work in the evenings? Maybe earlier in the mornings?

"Johnny-san get sick if hold inside," Mr. Miyagi said.

"You're back already?" Johnny looked up from his brochure, crumpling it quickly.

"Hai. Eat nearby."

"Mr. Miyagi, I have...I..."

Mr. Miyagi sat down across from Johnny looking at his lunch.

"Daniel-san make?"

"Yeah."

It was quiet.

Mr. Miyagi was waiting.

He could read Johnny unnervingly well. Paid close attention.

He supposed working together just the two of them for so long did it.

"Here," Johnny said pushing the worn brochure across the table to Mr. Miyagi.

"It's...not a job, it's not really anything useful, and it's not really that close. I mean it is, but it's also not, and it doesn't help anything, and I know you're busy and normally you like to take time off near New Years to go with Sato and Yukie and do things...but I was wondering....I want to help build one."

Mr. Miygi looked at the brochure. "Build one?"

"Before New Years these local colleges all get together and build one. The Polytech colleges? And they said they could use a little extra help when I ran into them at the market."

Mr. Miyagi studied the brochure close. "Miyagi not understand. Build what? Horse?"

"Ah," Johnny said, leaning over the table carefully and pointing.

"Parade float?"

"Yes."

"New Years Parade float?"

"Yes...they're decorated not in paint Mr. Miyagi, all of the color comes from plants."

"These flowers?"

"Yes Mr. Miyagi. Uh so for the weeks leading up to the parade people gather and help the different floats finish their work by adding all the flowers on top."

"Tournament of Roses....not Rose Bowl?"

"Ah, no the football game is later. The parade is in the morning, the football game is in the afternoon. But..."

Mr. Miyagi flipped the brochure over, studying it.

"I used to hear about it a lot, because mom worked at a florist. The big events were this one, Valentines Day, and weddings."

Mr. Miyagi was quiet and Johnny felt his heart pound in his ears.

It'd be okay if Mr. Miyagi said no.

It'd be fine.

He was used to people saying no. Sid always said no or took it back later. And this wasn't important. It was just something he wanted to do. And it felt like he showing weakness, something that could be exploited. But he tried to banish Kreese and Sid's voices from his head, tried to not get his hopes up too high, tried to temper them, he was trying.

"We should close shop for New Years vacation," Mr. Miyagi said.

"Mr. Miyagi, I don't want you to have to close the shop."

"No no, many shops close for holiday with small staff. We open always. Miyagi go Johnny-san here. Johnny-san go Miyagi here. Neither here, friends here. Time to make new tradition. Johnny-san help make floats, Miyagi go watch parade. Pasadena not far. Sounds pretty. Yukie and Sato will like too."

"I won't be doing much," Johnny said quickly.

Just putting flowers on floats. Both Sid and Kreese would make fun of him for it.

"But Johnny-san want right?"

"Yeah."

"Then we come, see all hard work."

Johnny's vision blurred and he blinked, surprised he was crying. He didn't get it. He didn't understand why tears were running down his cheeks.

Mr. Miyagi patted his hand.

"Miyagi thankful for all of Johnny-san's hard work. For friendship. If find things want to try...try. No harm in trying. If like, then every year. Not like, also okay. Miyagi support Johnny-san no matter what."

Johnny rubbed at his eyes. "Thanks Mr. Miyagi."

"Eat lunch, Daniel-san work very hard. Sandwich in hearts."

Johnny laughed softly, it was watery.

Daniel did like the heart shaped cookie cutters he'd gotten and now everything was heart shaped. It was like a Valentine's Day store had taken over every meal he ate now.

He ate his lunch looking at the brochure telling Mr. Miyagi about the designs he'd heard of.

He couldn't wait.

Daniel hadn't noticed at first, too caught up in talking Louie Jr. into taking his work at LaRusso Auto seriously, and his moonlighting with Tommy's aunt.

He knew Johnny was busy. He always was busy. But it was different and he tried to think of what exactly was different.

It wasn't his hair.

He'd gotten that cut, somewhat recently, it was still longer than when they met but less like he was trying to become a golden Rapunzel.

He hadn't changed the products he used.

But that was part of it.

He smelled different.

It wasn't in the morning, it was at night, when Daniel came home from work and Johnny came home from work and he plopped into Johnny's lap to kiss him.

The smell was different.

Usually he smelled like the earth and soil, of Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees.

A familiar scent. But lately he'd begun to smell like something else.

It wasn't the dojo, because that Daniel would've been able to pinpoint that.

It wasn't food or someone else's house.

Flowers.

Johnny smelled like flowers.

Daniel frowned as he drove towards Mr. Miyagi's. They were supposed to go somewhere together today. Mr. Miyagi had requested it. Requested Daniel come drive him because Sato and Yukie were apparently off doing something with Chozen. And Daniel should've been going anyway.

Whatever that had meant.

Maybe it did mean something.

Maybe there was something he was supposed to notice and hadn't. Not yet.

Or maybe Johnny had told him something and he'd forgotten?

Too wrapped up with figuring out when he could do photo shoots in between meetings with manufacturers, his sales team, the mechanics, insurance, and towing companies.

Shit.

He'd missed something important.

It wasn't his birthday or Johnny's.

It wasn't their anniversary, either or any of them.

Daniel teased Johnny on the anniversary of when they first met that he was going to celebrate that every year and they'd already gone to the beach over the summer and stayed at the Tommy's lake house.

It wasn't the anniversary of their first date, which they argued about which one counted.

It was New Year and they'd kissed at midnight but then Johnny had said he had an early morning and went to bed.

Daniel had just assumed he had to be at the shop or do something for Chozen. And that was weird. Every year for New Year since they'd moved in with Mr. Miyagi they'd all gone to a temple to ring in the New Year. They dressed up and Daniel had taken cute photos of them the first year, all stiff but happy wearing traditional clothes.

They had one for every year up in the house. But Mr. Miyagi was waiting on him.

For what?

He was waiting outside.

“Ah, Daniel-san, time to go.”

“Go where?” Daniel asked.

Mr. Miyagi blinked, like he was surprised Daniel didn’t know and then smiled softly.

“Pasadena.”

“Pasadena? You know how to get there Mr. Miyagi?”

“Hai,” he said holding up a map.

“I thought you were celebrating today?” Daniel said following Mr. Miyagi’s directions.

“Went to temple at midnight,” Miyagi said.

“But don’t you guys go on a trip?”

“Hai, this year…Pasadena.”

“Why am I crashing your trip?”

“Not crashing. Just thought…maybe Daniel-san not know.”

Yeah he didn’t know.

He didn’t know anything.

He’d been so focused with everything he was doing that he’d missed something.

And he hated it. He hated it so much.

“Johnny-san good worker,” Mr. Miyagi said.

“Yeah.”

“Work very hard.”

“I know.”

“Just going with flow...maybe too much.”

“You think?”

“Miyagi think Johnny need to relax. Have fun.”

“He has fun. We just got back from the lodge with the guys and his snowboarding was amazing.”

“Good trip?”

“Yeah. Jimmy talked our ear off about his wife and kids. Even though we just saw them.”

“Proud father.”

“Yeah he is. You ever think Mr. Miyagi that…maybe Johnny…maybe I…aren’t where we need to be?”

“What do you mean?”

“I mean you know I don’t like my job any more.”

“Hai.”

“But does Johnny?”

“Miyagi doesn’t know. Can’t tell.”

“I know he wants to get married…but that’s not possible. I’m sure he wants a house. But we’ve been together for so long…shouldn’t we be…further despite everything?”

“Daniel-san want house? Buy house.”

“I also want to ask him to marry me… but I can’t.”

“Start with house. Start looking. Daniel-san need small goals. Like when upset about work decide to start training Louie. Start photography again. Start by taking step. But don’t take on too much. Still trying to figure out balance.”

Daniel laughed softly. “I’m always trying to figure out balance Mr. Miyagi. I feel like I’m always a toy top, spinning around until I get dizzy and fall over, only keeping perfect balance for an hour tops.”

“Daniel-san should call Kumiko-san.”

“Yeah, I probably should. It’s been a while since I’ve caught up with her. I think I had a meeting last time she called and Johnny told me she was on tour.”

“Not to catch up. But to talk balance. Kumiko-san dancer. Dancer spins and spins and spins and learns how to fall safely."

Daniel nodded, turning off onto the exit for Pasadena.

"That's a good idea Mr. Miyagi."

"Daniel-san have time. Friend moving forward with love and family and home and career does not mean Daniel-san behind. Daniel-san focus on Daniel-san. Cheer on friend but not compare."

"Easier said then done. Hey this it? Damn why's there so many people here? It's packed."

"Hai. Parade. Spot to park there," Mr. Miyagi said pointing.

Daniel parked and hopped out.

"So what now?" Daniel said following the shorter man through the crowd.

"Find where Chozen, Yukie and Sato-san have saved us spot. Good spot to watch."

Daniel nodded following along, until they found the three and he took a seat next to Chozen.

He wanted to ask.

What were they doing there?

What was going on?

Why was there another chair next to him?

Who were they waiting on.

What was Johnny up to?

Where was he?

Was he stuck at the shop by himself?

The parade started and colorful floats moved down the street, with moving parts. Dragons whose claws moved and mouths opened, a pirate ship above a bright blue waves. Someone sunk down into the seat next to him with an exhausted sigh and a smell of flowers.

Johnny.

He had pieces of flowers stuck to him and Daniel reached out and took his hand.

“Which one Johnny-san help with?” Sato asked.

“The next one,” Johnny said.

Massive colorful koi fish were jumping from the float.

“You helped with it?” Daniel asked softly.

“With the flowers. All of the color on the floats come from flowers and fruit and plants. No paint. Hundreds and hundred of tiny little flowers. It took a long time and a lot of people,” Johnny said rubbing his thumb along the back of Daniel’s hand.

“It’s beautiful.”

“Yeah, they do this every year and I forgot about it until I was at the market and they asked if I wanted to help.”

“The market?”

“Flower market. I used to go all the time as a kid and have been going somewhat frequently to help a couple vendors move the flowers around. It’s where I get the bouquet that changes out in the vase on the dining room table.”

“I…can’t believe I didn’t notice.”

“Well I didn’t really say anything. I wasn’t sure if I’d like doing this or if it’d go well. It took me like three weeks of worrying over the pamphlet to get up the courage to ask Mr. Miyagi if I could take time off to come do this.”

“Johnny you can take time off!” Daniel said turning to him, holding his hand tight.

“I know. I just…New Years is kind of important to them, so it’d mean we’d have to shut down the shop. And we did today.”

“You gotta rest, you can’t overdo it.”

“Says you. Master of overdoing it.”

Daniel sighed.

Johnny was wearing a t-shirt that said volunteer on it.

He wondered how many of those he had. For how many random little places. But he seemed happy, watching the floats go by.

“Did you have fun?”

“Loads of fun,” Johnny said smiling. “I got to paint with flowers. I’ve wanted to since the florists told me about it as a kid. We were all supposed to come and work on it…before they passed. I think… I want to do this every year.”

“You should. It’s beautiful,” Daniel said lifting his hand and kissing the back of Johnny’s.

He liked the idea of it. A new New Years tradition. New Years Eve with Sato, Chozen, Yukie and Mr. Miyagi dressing up and going to the temples. Kissing Johnny at midnight. Then coming down to watch whatever Johnny had helped design march past on New Year’s Day. Maybe they’d have brunch after and Johnny could talk about it in more detail. What flowers he got to use, which ones were fun to work with, which ones were a pain. Daniel wanted to know which ones were the ones stuck to him that he hadn’t noticed.

He looked so pleased, so happy, covered in flowers and so damn beautiful that Daniel had a hard time looking away to enjoy the parade.

They stood on the steps of a house they'd visited a couple months ago. It felt like ages ago. Some random person Daniel wanted to introduce Johnny to.

He remembered walking around the place, being given a tour by the owners.

It was nice. A nice house.

"So what are we doing here again?" Johnny asked turning towards Daniel.

Daniel moved fast. Johnny wasn't expecting it. He knocked Johnny's legs out from under him.

Sweep the legs.

Why?

Why had he ever taught Daniel that?

It only ever got used against him.

Johnny prepared himself for a fall, even though he knew he shouldn't worry about it, but some habits died hard.

Instead he found himself in Daniel's arms.

"What are you doing? I thought we agreed no karate just out in places? What if I'd grabbed you and sent us both falling? We would've cracked our heads open on that cement there, on the steps. Maybe broken something. Wait a second, Daniel-"

"Don't you dare mention the knee," Daniel said, tone deadly serious but there was joy in his eyes.

"Put me down."

"No."

"I'm too heavy."

"I've been working out, specifically for this. I'm not going to put you down, but you want to know how you can help?"

"How?"

"Hold on to me, you're squirmier than the weights at the gym. I refuse to drop you. Which means if you keep squirming we're both going down."

Johnny sighed wrapping his arms around Daniel's neck and holding still.

"That's because I'm alive."

"Yeah, you're also hotter than the weights. Want to keep talking about this or can I get this ball rolling?"

"What ball? Why are you carrying me? Listen this is someone's home, you can't just carry people into other people's homes."

"There's no one in there," Daniel said pushing the door open.

"Is this something weird from the jar? We agreed to discuss stuff from the jar after the last incident."

Daniel laughed.

"This isn't from the jar. Not really. Not on the list of things to get all riled up about. I love you and I'm so damn excited, but I love that you don't have a clue what's happening. I love that this is a surprise. I love that you're sometimes so dense which makes stuff like this fun. Now please watch your limbs and your pretty head so I don't accidentally bump you into the doorway."

Johnny wondered how long he'd been working on this. He knew from when he'd been trying to see if he could do push ups with someone on his back that it'd taken months. But he'd already had a base to start with.

He studied Daniel's face. He didn't look like he was struggling. He wasn't tense. He wasn't even trying to hide tension.

He was excited, plain and simple.

He was smiling.

Johnny wanted to kiss him. But this...this was dangerous. If Daniel could pick him up now...Daniel wasn't going to stop. He was in for new things.

How hadn't he noticed?

He grabbed Daniel's arms frequently. Saw him all the time.

Sneaky bastard.

He'd known Daniel was working out. Some health kick since Dutch was in town.

He'd just chalked it up to old days, and that they liked hanging out while working out. Not that Daniel had a plan to knock Johnny off his feet.

Literally.

Dutch and Daniel together was dangerous because Dutch had a similar habit of trying to knock Johnny down, wanting to spar. He felt like one of those old tired lions surrounded by a bunch of baby lion cubs that just wanted to rough house all day.

When did he get old?

It was weird being carried.

Daniel seemed sturdy enough.

Not having any issue.

Bobby usually was the best at getting him off his feet, but it was always just a quick lift in a hug.

Not like this.

Not carried like a damn princess.

That's exactly what the kids he used to babysit would tell him if they saw him. That's what they always wanted to do. Play princess and have tea parties and to be carried around or for him to do magic tricks or flips.

Daniel looked at him smiling.

"When was the last time you were held like this?"

"What do you mean?" Johnny asked.

Daniel had to be lying, there had to be someone in this house, or maybe they were house sitting?

"I'll make sure to do this more," Daniel said stepping into the house. "So, Johnny what do you think?"

"You've done a lot of work. Sneaky."

Daniel grinned. "Thank you, but I mean the house, what do you think of it?"

"I told you last time we were here that I like it."

"Yeah? Good."

The sound quality was off.

Johnny looked around.

It was empty.

All the furniture was gone.

"They repainting?"

"I figured we would," Daniel said

"We? Oh, did you offer us to help them paint? Miss Miyagi style teachings?"

"No. Johnny look at me."

Johnny looked at him, their faces were so close.

Daniel's brown eyes were serious.

"Welcome home Johnny."

Johnny stared at him. Stared at him for a long time. Looked at the arms around him, the door they'd walked through. The empty echo-y house.

"What?" Johnny whispered.

"You know all those dinners we've had at people's homes we don't know?"

"Yeah. So you admit you didn't know them huh? I thought so."

Daniel smiled but continued, "And how we did a tour after? And I asked you what you thought about the place?"

"Yeah."

"Those were all houses for sale. I wanted to surprise you," Daniel said.

"That seems like a lot of work," Johnny said tilting his head back and looking at the ceiling.

"Says the man who spent all his money on me, who got me 19 bouquets for my 19th birthday, who created the most intricate plan to get rid of Cobra Kai. The guy who made a homemade piñata for his godkids like what, second birthday? The guy who when he saw a kid crying on a plane started doing magic tricks. A full on show and the whole damn section applauded when you were done. This is nothing. I'm just getting started."

Johnny slowly lowered his gaze looking at Daniel. He'd gotten goosebumps.

"This is...ours?" Johnny asked.

"Yes," Daniel said.

"I think you can set me down now."

"No, I think I'm supposed to keep carrying you around."

"Are you sure? I'm pretty sure people put a person down after the doorway."

"No, I think it's on the bed."

"I don't think that's right. Is there even a bed here?" Johnny asked, feeling his ears burn.

"There's not one yet, which is why I'm just going to have to keep carrying you around," Daniel said, his grip tightening, shifting Johnny in his arms like he was preparing to fight to hold on to Johnny, like Johnny was a cat that wasn't going to let himself be held for longer than five minutes.

But Johnny just stared at the blank walls and the windows trying to digest what he'd been told.

Daniel started walking through the dining room and towards the kitchen.

Now everything made sense.

Why Daniel had asked him what he thought about the tile, holding a glass of wine in his hand as they talked quietly about someone elses' home.

Johnny had assumed he was thinking of their future home.

Not that this would be their home.

He remembered how he'd thought it was a game. Talk honestly about homes, about how he'd redo things, what he'd prefer.

He had had fun with it because Daniel had been judging everything so harshly. Gossiping in what felt like those two old Muppets that were in the balcony and dissed everything.

Mischief.

That's what it felt like.

Every house they visited. For months. And then in the car on the way home Daniel would kiss him before they'd even left.

It was always so intense. Sometimes it led to the seat going back and Johnny recommending they go someplace much more secluded, and Daniel would get the hint, but would still touch him on the ride to wherever he thought was secluded enough. Enough until Johnny couldn't wait, until he was a asking Daniel to hurry up.

It was embarrassing.

But now...now it made sense.

Johnny had thought they were visiting people Daniel needed to get to know for work.

Work dinners. He was used to it. It was old hat, even if he was a little rusty. He'd done it most of his life for Sid.

But really Daniel was imagining them living there. Was trying to see how Johnny looked in the light. He was day dreaming and getting overwhelmed and started to overflow but he didn't say anything because he wanted it to be a surprise. And the best way he handled that was by a ridiculous amount of car sex.

Johnny had just thought he'd gotten a thing for the car. That fancy car he'd gotten himself when he retired the Ford. Some proof that the seats were better. But this explained it.

"Well now I know why you got so damn horny after every house party we've been to for the last like year."

Daniel laughed.

"Do you know how hard it was not to say anything? How many times I caught myself from asking you if you thought you'd like to wake up in this room or that room? If you thought this countertop was at the right height for cooking or sex. If you thought there was enough room in the bathtub for the both of us."

Johnny kissed him.

"Careful or I'll set you on this counter and try and find out if it's the right height. I know you want to see the other rooms."

"I do, but I also kind of wish there was a bed here," Johnny said.

"We will for sure break in the house."

"I don't think that's what people usually have in mind for that."

"Right. So I'll hurry the grand tour. Kitchen."

"Love it."

"Dining room number two."

"Number two?"

"Well that entry room can also be a dining room."

"I see."

"And this is bathroom one, for guests."

"No bath huh?" Johnny said filling his voice with teasing disappointment.

Daniel looked at him, surprised but then his features relaxed, when he saw Johnny's smile.

"Aren't you tired yet?" Johnny asked, playing with the ends of Daniel's hair at the nape of his neck.

"Never."

"Don't be stubborn."

"I gotta show you the best parts, we're going up a floor."

"You're not carrying me up the stairs."

"I'm carrying you through every room of this house and up the stairs and then outside."

Johnny sighed. "I know there's more to down here, but if you insist...then I'll do my best to give you a massage later when all your muscles cramp up."

"They won't cramp up."

"You worked so hard."

"Yes, and I'm expecting a good reward."

"For what?"

"Everything."

Johnny laughed kissing his cheek. "Fine fine, show me what you want to show me."

"Everything," Daniel said. "That's the living room, now up we go."

"So what's up here?"

"Bedrooms. An office. A bathroom."

"Two bathrooms. How luxurious," Johnny said, in faux wonder.

"Ah, no, there's three."

"Three?" Johnny asked feigning ignorance.

He'd wondered why Daniel kept going into peoples bedrooms and poking around their bathrooms.

He'd thought Daniel had been interested in something else, a little naughtier. Now he felt embarrassed that that's where his own mind had went.

"Yes, there's one in our room."

"You hanging in there?"

"Yes, ask me again and I'll pinch you," Daniel threatened. "First room, guest bedroom," Daniel said pausing for a brief second outside the door. "Figure we'll make it nice and we'll stick a good size bed in and the guys can sleep there."

"Not in our bed?" Johnny asked.

Daniel looked at him. "I want there to be space to kick them out of our bed if we want it just us, without them sleeping on the floor or couch. Dutch keeps talking like he's princess and the pea about how much our couch sucks. And that's why I keep waking up to find him in our bed. I told him it was a fold out and he said why bother with that when there's room next to us?"

"They'll appreciate that you thought of them...and might make fun of you."

"Let them. If I have you under me I don't want them in our room. I went through enough of their cockblocking that I'm going to make that room so damn cozy they won't sneak into our bed like naughty children. Anyway, here's the guest bathroom. This one has a bath."

"Nice."

"Then we've got a linen closet. And an office. And voilà, our bedroom."

"What color do you want to paint it?"

"Blue."

"Blue?" Johnny asked.

"A nice sky blue," Daniel said walking past the windows and the closet and the bathroom door. "And there's our bathtub big enough for both of us. Finally."

"The true reason you bought the house," Johnny said.

"Yup, so I can fuck you in that tub as often as I want."

"If I didn't know better I'd think you were serious."

Daniel laughed. "Good thing you know me better. Because you know I want to do it everywhere."

Johnny pressed his face against Daniel's shoulder and neck. As Daniel turned and left the bathroom and their room and headed down the stairs. He looked up again as Daniel stopped, at the sliding door with a frown.

Johnny reached out and pushed it open.

"Thank you."

"Your hands are full."

"They are," Daniel said with a grin stepping outside.

There was a pool and an entertaining space, beyond it was a garden, a bit overgrown, a bit neglected.

There was a bench, the only furniture left from the previous owners and Daniel sat down under one of the big trees.

"So? Do you like it?" Daniel asked softly, wrapping his arms around Johnny's waist, brown eyes searching Johnny's face.

Johnny cupped the sides of Daniel's face kissing him. "I love it."

"Yeah? I want you to be brutally honest okay? On everything. Like you were when we were looking secretly at houses."

"Was I brutally honest?"

"One of the houses we saw you said ‘why do they have so many spiral staircases? Did they really struggle that much with horses? Because that's why we have spiral staircases, so horses wouldn't come in and steal food. I feel like I'm in a Maurits Cornelis Escher painting’."

"Well who needs three spiral stair cases? Can you imagine trying to go up and down all those drunk?"

"Well we tried," Daniel laughed. "I had to go to the library and look up that painter."

"You don't remember him from art class?"

"Not all of us paid attention in art class and spend like half their week hanging out with an artistic sensei."

"You should come with us some time."

"To what?"

"We take the kids to museums. The Getty is nice."

"I know the Getty is nice," Daniel said. "But it's weird being like a third chaperone. I don't like following Chozen's orders. I want to undermine him and I shouldn't do that. It's like a knee jerk reaction. And the only way to distract myself is to flirt with you. I can't do that in front of kids."

"You show such restraint. You deserve a reward," Johnny said pressing soft kisses along Daniel's jaw.

"I do don't I? But I want to know what you think? I thought.... you liked this one, which is why I bought it. You said 'I could see us living somewhere like this'. And that's...that's why I bought it. For you. For us. Because I agreed. I know you've been wanting to put down roots. That you've spent so long standing in poisonous or barren dirt that you haven't really grown. That you...you're like a bonsai."

Johnny blinked staring at Daniel in surprise.

"What do you mean?"

"Listen, I love bonsai. They're so cool. I know you love bonsai. But some trees aren't meant to be kept in small spaces. They're not meant to be forced to be trimmed and tiny and perfect. They should be let to grown and flourish and to just be. And you...You're like a tree that got put in a bonsai pot but you're meant to be like this one," Daniel said pointing to the tree behind him.

"You're meant to grow somewhere nice and to get as tall as you want and not have to keep making yourself small. I mean you've been working on it, taking up more space. But I want to give you that space. Gently replanting you somewhere where you can flourish. This house isn't mine. It's ours. I want you to help me decide what we want to redo, what we want to keep. What color do you want our bedroom to be? I know I said blue. I do like blue. But I want to go to the hardware store and get all those little paint cards and stick them around the house. Or do you want wallpaper? Do we like the light fixtures? Do we like the door knobs and the little handles on all the cabinets and drawers? What about the mailbox?"

"Can we walk through the house together for that?"

Daniel sighed. "Yes, fine. But I still want to carry you through that door as much as possible."

Johnny laughed squeezing one of Daniel's forearms. "So strong. How'd you know you'd be able to handle walking through the whole house?"

Daniel grinned at him kissing his nose. "I practiced."

"Yeah?"

"I picked up the guys and lugged them around."

"All of them?"

"Yes, started with Jimmy, then Tommy, then Bobby, and last I gave Dutch a tour," Daniel said with a grin. "They were a bit bossy about it."

"I could see that. Nothing stops you, huh?" Johnny asked laughing.

"Nothing."

Johnny looked at the garden.

He wondered what plants would look nice.

Which ones were responsible.

Which ones would smell nice and flower beautifully.

He wondered if they should grow their own vegetables or something. If there was enough space, an herb garden might be nice. He could grow basil that Daniel could use in his cooking.

"I love it," Johnny said.

"Really?"

Daniel looked so happy, so relieved, so excited.

Johnny felt tears prick his eyes.

Theirs.

A home for the two of them. Not an apartment, not living with Mr. Miyagi, the guys or their moms.

Their own space and enough of it to grow, whatever that meant for them. To have their friends over. To have their loved ones over. To host events without Daniel grumbling in his ear about privacy and all the things he wanted to do.

He'd never had something like that but it was something he'd always wanted.

Curled up with an old blanket in the back of his mom's car, dreaming of what a house would be like. A space of his own. That he could do whatever he wanted with. Without landlords who could kick him out and upend his life.

He'd dreamed, for a bit, of being good at something, enough so that he could make enough money to buy a house for himself, a home for his mother. And then eventually after living with Sid anywhere but there was good enough.

"You win," Johnny said brushing away tears.

"Win?"

"I can't ever beat this for grand gestures," Johnny said.

He wondered how Daniel felt, yearning for his own place as well, especially after that period after Okinawa when his mother had just left without a clear word of warning.

"It's selfish though," Daniel said pressing his forehead to Johnny's. "I wanted a home too. One with you."

"You want to be a tree too?"

Daniel laughed. "Yeah, I want to no longer be a bonsai with you. I want us to grow old and tall together."

Johnny smiled kissing him. "Me too."

They ended up borrowing Mr. Miyagi's truck and taking it to the hardware store. They'd been there what felt like hundreds of times, needing paint for various projects or picking up things for Mr. Miyagi or the shop or helping with their mom's places.

But now that it was for them it seemed overwhelming. There were too many colors of paint. Just the blue section alone was intense.

"Well," Daniel said clapping his hands together and rubbing them. "What colors should we get? A little bit of everything?"

"Well we know we want to paint the bedroom, and that's a good a spot as any to start," Johnny said wrapping an arm around Daniel's shoulders and leaning against him. "We should definitely paint the ceiling too. What color do you want the ceiling to be?"

"The ceiling?"

"Sometimes I forget that you just painted Mr. Miyagi's fence," Johnny said. "And that you didn't go through months and months of secret training that involved repainting apartments after people moved out."

"That's because I got Miyagi-do emergency life or death training. You got slow zen Miyagi-do healing," Daniel said looking at him.

"There's a difference?"

"Yeah," Daniel said, hooking his arm around to rest on Johnny's shoulder. "You got all the DIY skills. But I for sure can paint a fence."

"Are you saying you expect me to paint the entire house on my own?"

"No way, I'm just going to follow your lead on this one. Until we get to the fence. Or if anything needs sanded. I'm a pro at that. What color is good for a ceiling?"

"Well I already spackled, sanded, removed all the outlet covers and taped up everything, so we got to pick out a ceiling primer and a wall primer and then we need to pick out the actual paint. White for now? Maybe egg shell? There's a whole bunch of white. Off white? We'll need a nap roller for the ceiling. We could borrow one from Mr. Miyagi, same with drop cloth but I feel kind of bad borrowing his stuff...and for a house, we should probably have our own."

Daniel was staring at him.

"What?"

"Mr. Miyagi really did teach you huh? Also why did you already do all that work by yourself? I thought we were doing it together? Let me sand stuff."

"You've had some long nights at the dealership and I know you've been itching to get started. Putting tape up and filling holes takes time and you have to let it set and wait and I thought this way we could jump straight into painting together."

"Johnny, please tell me you haven't done the whole house already. We're trying to do teamwork."

"I know. I just did the bedroom. I thought we'd start there, get it all set up, move into that room and then slowly work our way through the rest of the house together. I mean it's not like we're not still going to have to wait. We'll have to wait for the primer to dry and stuff like that. Plus it'll give us time to decide if we like the outlet covers or want new ones, or if we want to repaint the cabinets before we get the knobs and stuff. Though we could just do all of it at once."

Daniel leaned his head against him and sighed.

"This is a bigger project then I expected."

"It'll take time. I mean we could ask the guys to come help, or we could use it as a lesson for the students, if you want."

"No," Daniel said. "I want to do it ourselves...I just underestimated how long it would take and how busy I am. I want to move in now, but I want to do this right. I want to do all the painting and DIY stuff we can ourselves before we move in and then never get around to doing it. Or you sneakily do it yourself, by yourself."

"I won't if you don't want me to," Johnny said.

"No, I also want you to do what you want to do. How about this, give me a couple weeks and I'll see if I can move some stuff around and help more. And let's look at light fixtures and stuff just to see what they have and grab all the blue and white chips."

"That's a lot of paint chips," Johnny said with a laugh.

"We've got other rooms, we might like a different shade of blue elsewhere."

"Do you want a backsplash in the kitchen?" Johnny asked grabbing a collection of white chips.

"I thought I knew what I needed to know, but you, you know so much more than I do. Please, I beg of you, one room at a time. Teach me about backsplashes when we finally make it to the kitchen," Daniel said grabbing some blue ones.

"How about we go to one of those show rooms and look around and get ideas and I can show you what stuff is," Johnny said.

"That'd be nice. We also, between the two of us and everything that's in storage, we definitely do not have enough furniture, so it'd be nice to look at some. You just lead me around and I'll follow you," Daniel said, grabbing the last of the blue chips.

"Is that just an excuse to stare at my ass?" Johnny asked quietly.

Daniel grinned, giving him a quick peck on the cheek. "Maybe," he said. "Though I never need an excuse."

Daniel was standing in their bedroom on the drop cloth staring at the blue wall with intense focus, trying to discern while it was still wet if he truly liked it.

Johnny had finished his wall and crept towards Daniel with his paint brush. He wasn't paying attention. His guard was down and Johnny was going to act. He drew a stripe on Daniel's cheek.

"Hey!" Daniel said, pushing away, hand raising to his cheek.

Johnny laughed, darting away. They'd decided they wanted to paint more than one room at once. So there was drop cloth everywhere. They'd finished the halls, which were just a basic off white, and were working on the primer in the other rooms of the house.

Still debating on colors.

As expected Daniel was following after.

Johnny braced himself as he reached the living room, turning towards Daniel.

A big open space was much better if he was going to get his comeuppance. And it wouldn't destroy any of the work they'd already done.

Daniel grabbed the brush Johnny held.

"Think you're so sneaky huh?"

"I think you needed a break from staring at the wall and literally watching paint dry," Johnny said, jumping up to avoid Daniel trying to sweep his legs. "Come on now, how often do you think I'll fall for that?"

"You've fallen for that plenty, probably shouldn't have taught it to me."

"You wanted to learn it! I wasn't expecting it to become like the thing you used against me the most."

"You can't just expect to paint my face and escape unscathed, so just hold still will you?"

"You expect me to just hold still? I'm not an idiot," Johnny said dodging out of the way.

"Well you gave up your weapon pretty easily," Daniel said holding up the paint brush and lunging forward.

Johnny moved his head out of the way but felt the cool wet brush of bristles against his neck.

"Well now we're even," Johnny said.

"Oh, we are definitely not even," Daniel said grabbing Johnny shirt. "You said I needed a distraction, I think I've come up with a great distraction thanks to you."

They tussled, Johnny ended up with the paint brush again, getting the tip of Daniel's nose before Daniel snatched it back, getting Johnny's back.

Johnny was glad they went for the cloth drop cloths rather than the plastic as he managed to get Daniel's stomach when he wrested the brush back, pinning Daniel below him, hair a mess, paint in it, random splotches on his face and arms, his torso.

Johnny had managed for the most part to avoid getting hit. Except his neck and back. But Daniel flipped them.

"Was that fast enough for you?" Daniel asked.

Johnny tried pushing himself up but Daniel put a warm hand on his chest and pushed down. "I shall get my revenge, and I will enjoy it."

Daniel hiked up Johnny’s shirt and brushed paint over Johnny's chest.

"The thing I'm learning," Daniel said. "Is that paint requires a couple coats and you have to be specific with the amount of pressure you apply."

He went back over and Johnny shivered at the delicate touch of wet bristles.

"And there's different ways to do it. Like you could do up and down, side to side or v's and w's, that initial coat doesn't seem to matter," Daniel said swirling a tightening spiral on his right pec. "All that does matter is that there's an even coat. And when there's not, it can just be wiped away."

He held the handle of the brush between his teeth and rubbed his thumbs over Johnny's nipples, smudging away at the blue paint several times until pink showed through.

Johnny felt his skin burn and pulse race, squirming underneath Daniel.

"See, wasn't even enough, let me try that again," Daniel said taking the brush from his teeth. "Gotta get the entire thing even, so don't move, or else I'll have to just keep doing it. Though I don't mind, I could do this all day, slow as you like. Though maybe you want to get ready for other things?" Daniel asked moving the paint brush into his other hand and digging into one of his pockets and pulling a smaller container of lube and a condom.

"I shouldn't be surprised," Johnny said reaching for the bottle.

Daniel held up his hands that had paint on them. "Sorry, if you want me to hurry on that front I'm going to need some help. Though I can help a little," Daniel said stick the brush behind his ear, hooking his fingers on Johnny's waistband and pulling until Johnny's legs were free.

Daniel grinned pleased with himself. "I'm getting better at that."

"A little too good," Johnny said, face flushed.

He reached for the condom, but Daniel set it aside pressing the lube back into Johnny hands. "I'll paint, you prep."

Johnny stared at him and then at the bottle in his hand. Daniel moved leaning down to kiss him, rubbing at his nipples, clearing away the rest of the paint.

"If you want I'll give you a little time alone to get started while I go get more paint."

"We're wasting paint on this?" Johnny asked.

"Well I got a new idea I want to test out," Daniel said with a grin. "And I know you get a little shy sometimes. So I'll be right back."

"I don't get shy," Johnny said but Daniel was gone.

He covered his eyes with his forearm and breathing carefully as he listened to Daniel walk back up the stairs towards their room. Had he ever done that while Daniel had been in the room?

On the phone yes, but in the room no.

Usually if they were together Daniel did it.

He opened the bottle, he wondered how many of those already were hidden about the house. Was that what Daniel did? Came over and just made sure there were lubes and condoms everywhere within reach? Never wanting a repeat of Johnny's birthday when they ran out.

Or did he always just carry some in his pockets? Or both? Did he keep some in the inside of his jacket at work?

How did he explain that? Like had it ever fallen out when he'd hung up his jacket and rolled up his dress sleeves to work on a car? Because Johnny had seen him do that a couple times at Mr. Miyagi's.

Jacket folded carefully and set aside, the sure ways he flicked his hands around the sleeves to get the fabric up past his elbows so that it wouldn't get dirty, before leaning over the car to look in and see what was the matter or to run a simple check for Mr. Miyagi.

The view was always amazing. And maybe he spent too long standing in Mr. Miyagi's kitchen drinking iced green tea watching Daniel work. He knew he spent too long stuck in one spot, appreciating, as the ice in his glass melted.

Now he supposed, in his future he might get that view more often, in their own garage or out in the drive. Their secluded drive.

When Johnny had found their first apartment his key focus had been security and safety.

When Daniel had been picking out houses for them to check out, all of them were secluded.

Johnny was pretty sure as he moved his slick fingers that he knew why. After all he could look out the glass sliding doors and see no one. No one could see him.

"Damn," Daniel said voice breathless, surprised.

Johnny looked at him, met his warm brown eyes as Daniel walked towards him, kneeling down gently between Johnny's spread legs. His shirt brushing against Johnny enough for him to reach for himself, for some friction, but Daniel caught his hand and laced their fingers, setting the tray of paint and brush to the side and kissing him slow and languid.

Johnny tried to arch his hips up towards Daniel but he was just out of reach for any good to come of it. He made a frustrated sound into the warm kiss.

"This better not be like that one White Day again," Johnny murmured when Daniel pulled away.

"No, oh, no," Daniel said dipping the brush in paint, brushing it across Johnny's chest again, humming and looking pleased with himself when Johnny moaned and twitched. "Mind helping me with one more project?" Daniel asked looking around.

"What?"

"Where'd the condom go?"

"Probably got under part of the fold of the drop cloth," Johnny said turning his head to the side.

It was like a messy sea, it could be anywhere and he had no patience to look. He turned his gaze back up to Daniel.

"I guess I could just...pull out?" Daniel said thoughtfully with a frown.

"We're going to have to take a shower after this anyway," Johnny said.

Daniel met his gaze, eyes widened a little in surprise. He leaned down. "Are you sure?"

"Yes, just hurry up and tell me why you went to get the paint and fuck me already."

Daniel studied him for a moment, thrown, and Johnny felt his ears burn from the intense way Daniel was looking at him.

"Right," he said, quickly taking off the rest of his clothes. He set his hands, palm down into he paint. "One of the reasons I had you start, and do what you're doing is because paint probably shouldn't go there."

"I figured," Johnny huffed.

It really wasn't a good angle for him to get as much enjoyment out of what he was doing and Daniel was so damn close that if Daniel didn't hurry up he was going to knock him over and do it himself.

"And I'm not going to touch mine because that's probably not a good place to get paint either."

Johnny heaved a tired world weary sigh. "Daniel."

"But I do want to see where all I touch you, while I make love to you," Daniel said. "This blue will do a good job of that I think."

He carefully grabbed a handful of Johnny's thigh. It was just going to make a mess, it was just going to smear.

Daniel's brow furrowed as he focused, trying to line up without using his hands. Johnny pushed himself up, checking his free hand for paint, there was just a bit on the back of his hand from Daniel's thumb. So he carefully reached out, taking a hold of Daniel’s dick and carefully guiding him in.

"Thanks," Daniel said voice heavy, gently grabbing Johnny's hips, pulling him close until he was all the way in. Deeper than Johnny's fingers could reach.

Johnny grabbed the drop cloth in his fists, letting out a heady moan that echoed through the empty house.

Daniel leaned down kissing his exposed throat and jaw.

Not just an empty house. Their empty house.

How long had Johnny been trying to save up for his own place?

His escape money when he'd been younger, before he'd spent it on Daniel? He hadn't spent money on much. Just the Avanti, and his jacket because after moving in with Sid escape was the main thing he thought of the most.

How could he get out?

But now, these walls that echoed with the sounds they were making were their own walls. Not walls they were renting, or walls they were guests in.

Theirs.

Space without nosy neighbors who might overhear.

And Daniel wanted to take it slow, do it all right. Which meant drop cloths and painters tape, screwing and unscrewing light switch covers, long moments contemplating wet blue paint, wondering if it'd stay that color after it dried, if they'd like it in all types of sunlight.

It meant eventually taking a long hard look at the tile in the bathroom and trying to decide if it was what they liked or if it should be changed, finally showing Daniel what a backsplash was and the types available, seeing if they liked their countertops and what sort of furniture they wanted.

It meant deciding who they were and expressing it everywhere. Little bits of themselves in every nook and cranny. It meant going to the garden shop and picking out shrubs and flowers, and house plants. It meant landscaping and designing, deciding what all they could feasibly do themselves and what required help. What needed an experts touch.

Daniel slid out and Johnny prepared a litany of complaints until he was guided over, onto his hands and knees and re-filled, a smoother transition then he expected. Complaints squashed.

There were so many little things they'd need. They'd have to clean the gutters, wash the windows. Did they want to paint the front door? Did they like that door? Was it them? The entrance to their home?

It was deeper somehow, more than it had been and Johnny gripped the drop cloth tightly in his hands. At least the mess was contained. Nothing would get on their hardwood floors.

Not yet. But they'd have to get cleaning supplies. For everything.

Johnny felt Daniel's lips on his back.

Johnny had tried to think if he'd have picked any of the other houses they'd looked at. And the answer was no. They were too grand or too small.

He felt like Goldilocks and had nearly mentioned it to Daniel. That this house was just right, right for them, but he hadn't. He'd thrown his energy into everything there was to do because he got too overwhelmed when he took in the gravity of it all.

Daniel had bought a house, not for just himself, but for both of them.

"What do you think about a mirrored glass floor?" Daniel asked warmly in his ear.

"Huh?"

"I don't mind this position, but I'd rather be able to see you, you know? And if the floor was mirrored, then I'd see everything. You'd see everything. How you look when I'm inside of you like this."

Daniel kissed his burning ear, tongue running along the edge of his ear.

Johnny didn't think he could handle it, seeing himself like that.

He doubted he'd see himself the way Daniel saw him. He wasn't sure he ever would.

"Mirrored floors...nnn...would be a pain to clean."

Daniel laughed softly, breath tickling the back of his neck. "And the girls would probably hate me for it."

Johnny laughed.

He could see that.

Daniel getting into trouble for putting in mirrored floors, a misunderstanding of why, and having to explain. One of his terrible ideas coming back to bite him.

The thought made him giddy, so utterly ridiculous. But at least they were learning. Daniel was starting to see his bad horny fueled ideas and second guess them, to realize logic and reason and how poorly thought out they were some times.

It'd just taken....how many years?

Though Johnny had had bad ones too. Sex in the lake by the lake house hadn't been a good idea. It'd been hard to keep a hold of Daniel and to be careful of the water. The ground was too slippery. And they'd ended up doing it on the shore, half in the water with Daniel's legs around Johnny's waist and when it was over…Daniel had been stuck. The mud wouldn't let him go and he'd laughed so much while Johnny tried to dig him out. Laughing about the shower, about how this time he would never live this one down.

Or in the woods either time. He couldn't believe he'd forgotten until the second time Daniel had ended up covered in bug bites and Johnny had covered him in cream.

"Maybe I'll get a big mirror for our bedroom."

"Not our ceiling?" Johnny teased.

"No, secret mirror. Or else the guys will make fun of us."

"They don't need any help."

"Not my fault my lover's the hottest person I've ever met. "

"You'll have to look in the mirror...when you get one you like. I'll introduce you."

Daniel laughed warmly kissing his shoulder. "Cheesy."

"True."

Johnny couldn't wait for the home their house would become. For the plants to grow and thrive and scent the air. For the kitchen to be in use, baking and cooking and making coffee. To have their friends and family over, to barbecue outside or float around in the pool. Or to make love in their bed so many times that they lost count.

To wake up in one another's arms in the soft morning light, limbs all tangled up but comfortable feeling the other breathing and their steady heartbeat and knowing they weren't alone, that they were home. In all ways.

“You sure it’s okay?” Daniel asked holding him in a tight way, his voice the way Johnny knew, could tell what it meant.

“Yeah,” Johnny said.

Daniel had let him…that time at the lake house. Had said it was fine. Liked it, even. And Johnny was curious.

"Pleased with your work?" Johnny asked when he caught his breath after.

He didn't know how much paint was on him, but he was sure there was plenty. He looked at his arm, holding it in front of himself looking at the blue hand print on it.

How many hand prints and finger prints were on him now?

He had to admit he was curious.

He'd take a look in the bathroom mirror before washing it off.

He looked at Daniel who was quiet, eyes dark and focused, not roaming his skin like he expected but focused on a spot between his legs.

"We going to take that shower?" Johnny asked pushing gently at Daniel's hip with his heel. Trying to get him to come back from whatever, presumably dirty, train he was on.

Daniel blinked hand catching Johnny's ankle. "Sorry, just enjoying the moment."

"Yeah, we can do that in the bathroom. I will leave you behind," Johnny said pushing himself up and kissing Daniel's cheek. "Here I thought you wanted to clean up together, but you know, it's fine. I'll shower by myself. Might be safer that way."

Daniel's brain must've still been shorted out because Johnny got up, headed towards the nearest bathroom with a shower and Daniel stayed, rooted in the spot. As soon as he was out of sight it seemed to snap whatever was going on in Daniel’s head.

"Johnny! Wait up! Where are you going?"

"Shower!" Johnny called back.

"No no no no, wait, I didn't look."

Johnny pushed the door open to the bathroom with a laugh. "What do you mean you didn't look? Weren't you staring the entire time?"

"Not at the paint though! Don't wash it off yet, please just wait a moment."

Johnny heard Daniel getting up, the sound of him running.

"Which way did you go?"

"Don't run. You'll trip on the damn tarp."

"Well where the hell are you?"

"Bathroom. You know I don't think I've ever blown your mind before. That good huh?" Johnny asked, laughing, leaning against the doorway, waiting, feeling messy, sticky everywhere, in new places. It wasn't terrible. Just new.

Daniel stopped at the end of the hall and Johnny was thoroughly tempted to step back into the bathroom and shut the door on him. But instead he watched Daniel walk towards him. Eyes darting over him, taking in the hand prints, fingerprints, all of the mess.

"Probably should've grabbed our clothes." Johnny said thoughtfully.

"At least we brought our gym bags in here. You know, I think maybe someone knew this was going to get messy," Daniel said, accusatory.

"There is no ways I would've known this was going to happen," Johnny said stepping back into the well lit bathroom. "But painting is messy and I don't want to get paint on my Firebird's seats. It was a gift you know?"

Daniel laughed stepping into the bathroom and shutting the door behind him.

"You know there's no one else here, you technically don't have to do that."

"We could be the last people on the planet and I'd still shut that door because as soon as I didn't someone would wander in. That just happens to be our luck," Daniel said.

"That's kind of sad."

"That our luck is such shit?"

"No thinking that no one else survived."

"Yeah, okay, big bummer, forget that hypothetical. Everyone went on some vacation and we stayed home because we had work or something. Still would shut the door because even though they say they all left one of them would forget something and come here."

"That ones better," Johnny said. "So, is it just a big 'ol smear of blue?"

He wanted to look, but he also was waiting to see Daniel's reaction to his handy work. To the literal hand prints he'd left on Johnny's skin. He watched Daniel get close, walking around him, circling.

"Well?"

“It’s all very satisfying. I like it,” Daniel said walking to the sink and washing paint off his hands. Scrubbing away blue.

“I’m going to take a shower then,” Johnny said.

“You don’t want to look?” Daniel asked, quickly drying his hands off.

Johnny had planned just a quick look but Daniel was looking at him expectantly. Johnny looking in the mirror, it’d smudged a bit. From movement, from sweat, from where skin had rubbed against skin. But there were other spots that were perfect imprints of blue. Of where Daniel had touched him, held him.

Maybe getting the house ready to move into would take even longer than they expected if they kept getting distracted. If they kept reaching for one another, touching, trying new things, falling into one another again and again. Just a mess.

Johnny kissed Daniel in the shower, as warm fingers pushed back inside and Johnny wondered if getting clean really just led to getting dirty again, and if once it started it’d never end. And if that was the case, did he really care?

Chapter End Notes

The New Years Rose Parade
How to paint a room

Wildflowers and Alpine Lakes

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Johnny checked that they had everything. Looking over all the gear and pushed the boat out onto the lake.

Mr. Miyagi was wearing his fishing hat and vest. The cooler was full of food Yukie had made and drinks Sato had bought. It was a bit early for sake but Sato insisted. Tradition after all.

Johnny liked going fishing with Mr. Miyagi. It was calm and peaceful.

Chozen once asked why he liked going when he spent all week with Mr. Miyagi in the shop. Louie had asked something similar during one of the breaks in his lessons.

Fishing was like a father son thing. And while Johnny thought Daniel got that spot first, before him, fishing wasn't something Daniel particularly enjoyed. And Daniel had a lot of responsibilities.

He was training Louie in business, putting the guy through grad school, helping Tommy's aunt, and still doing all the LaRusso family responsibilities. Which meant lots and lots of phone calls and time with his mom.

And sure Johnny was busy too but, maybe on some level, he'd never had the same stable start. He'd never trade his time with his mother for anything but Daniel had grown up with two parents who loved him.

Not a father who walked out before he could remember him leaving only Coors Banquets cans and a few odds and ends to remember him by.

Not Sid who had pretend to want him and then didn't.

And when he'd gotten Mr. Miyagi as a sensei, before he even realized he was seeking out a father figure…before Mr. Miyagi, Johnny had ended up with Kreese.

Johnny stepped into the boat, sinking down on the bench opposite of Mr. Miyagi. At the shop they were usually too busy, too focused.

Here or at Mr. Miyagi's house it was calmer.

Well it had been.

Before.

Back when he'd still been in high school and came over to paint the fences and fix the roof.

He missed that time. But he was happy for Mr. Miyagi. Happy that Mr. Miyagi wasn't alone any more. That he had Yukie and Sato. That Chozen visited frequently from his apartment near the main dojo.

So this time had become their time. Without Sato and without Yukie, without Daniel or customers. And Johnny savored it. And felt guilty about it.

He wasn't sure if Daniel got the same amount of time to himself. If or when Daniel and Mr. Miyagi spent time together.

He knew they must. But he wasn't sure if it was the same or even close to the same.

Even if they did nothing but sit on Mr. Miyagi's boat and fish silently side by side for hours it was enough. It was soothing. Soothing when he started to worry that he was going about life all the wrong way. Worried about what he wanted to do or who he was.

It all seemed to melt away because, like he'd realized that first day when he went to apologize to Mr. Miyagi and thank him, he felt safe. There was no need to jump, no need to act, he could just be.

"How new house?" Mr. Miyagi asked after casting off.

"I think we're almost settled in. We moved the furniture in over the weekend from Jimmy's and Mom's. And we ordered the furniture we were missing."

Mr. Miyagi hummed.

He'd wait.

Patiently like he always did when fishing. And Johnny could take his time opening up. Figuring out what he wanted to say and how much he wanted to say.

"It feels weird," Johnny said after a while watching his line, feeling the movement, the bob of the boat. “It feels like too much.”

Mr. Miyagi waited. He didn’t ask what felt like too much. Which was good. His mom would’ve asked. And that’s why Johnny hadn’t said it to her. Because he hadn’t figured it out yet.

He felt…overwhelmed.

“Daniel bought me a guitar. And a magic kit. A drum kit. A surfboard. A new car. So many books. A house,” Johnny said.

There was more. He knew there were things he was missing.

“If we’re keeping score, which I know we shouldn’t…I paid for his doctor’s trip to get his knee checked out, and for Okinawa…and a bunch of surprise trips. Our first apartment…he’s surpassed me with the house. It’s not like I don’t have money. I do. Is he telling me how much he loves me with stuff? Meaningful stuff but expensive stuff? The magic kit wasn’t expensive. But it was sweet. And my godchildren like it. I suppose I did the same with his birthday…I told him to celebrate everything. Every little thing. But I feel like…”

Johnny trailed off watching the sun sparkle on the water, trying to find the right words to say. It felt bad talking about Daniel to Mr. Miyagi. Daniel was more important to him. But…he was the easiest to talk to. Mr. Miyagi knew Daniel the best and had the best advice.

“I haven’t done anything to deserve it.”

“Love not earned by action or because of deserved. Love flow freely. Not kept track or even. No score in love. Not competition. Johnny-san…not good at receiving gifts or accepting help. Getting better,” Mr. Miyagi said with a soft smile. “But until forgive self, let self just live, will continue to be uncomfortable. Daniel-san see something or know something and because of love think of Johnny-san. Right? Johnny-san once play guitar, Daniel-san know and go get. Daniel-san want home, know Johnny-san does too, buys home for both. Sometime people like to give. Daniel-san type of person. Johnny-san happy because of Daniel-san, then find joy, happiness in it. Not need a return or balance of books. Because love is not money. Partnership. Not a transaction.”

Johnny watched the water for a bit, felt the breeze in his hair. There was something else that tumbled around in his head. Something he’d wanted to ask for ages, but it always got stuck in his throat.

He hadn't realized it until the second time he'd gone to Newark. Until he'd talked to Nonnio. And now it wouldn't leave. A thought that bobbed to the surface a lot.

But he never got the nerve to ask. He always swallowed it back down. Over and over again. But maybe this time. He'd try.

"Mr. Miyagi…how do I do it?"

"Do what?"

Johnny swallowed hard looking at the water of the lake.

"Forgive... myself?" he said softly voice barely a whisper.

Miyagi stare at water for a while. Contemplating the question, watching the water, the small waves that moved their boat along.

"Need to interrupt self. Already made amends, already focus emotions, learn from mistakes, been kind. Now need to stop spinning in circle. When mind replay mistake over and over and over, stop spinning and move forward. Decide what want."

That again.

What did he want?

"What if I don't know what I want?"

"Maybe…go for a walk. Maybe lots of walks."

It was worth a shot.

They had lunch, broke into the bento boxes Yukie had made and the conversation lulled into companionable silence while they watched the water. Then it fell into comfortable updates. How Louie was doing at the dojo, slowly working his way up the belt rankings, how Chozen was balancing multiple dojos with his uncle.

How Johnny was helping. How he liked it.

He liked teaching kids. It was amazing to watch them gain confidence in themselves and have fun and it reminded him of what he'd wanted out of karate, out of Cobra Kai in the first place. And he was glad they'd been able to fix it. To not leave a void in the Valley when Cobra Kai was defeated, that Sato and Chozen seemed to be thriving.

“Yukie-san take a few lessons,” Mr. Miyagi said with a soft smile.

“Really?”

“Hai. Sato-san and Miyagi teach kata at dojo to Yukie-san. Seem… happy.”

Johnny smiled. They all seemed happy, happier together. Making up for all that time lost. Maybe he’d figure out how to do that too.

Johnny was going camping.

Not with the guys, not with his mom, not with Daniel.

Just him and nature.

He was going to go hiking.

Daniel had a sales meeting with a car company out of town for the week and Mr. Miyagi and Chozen said they had everything covered.

So he was going to try it. Over a week in the woods, by himself.

He’d mapped out his route and approximate time it’d take him to walk where he was going, from starting point to end point.

Bobby would drive him to the starting point since it was a long drive and Daniel had to leave early in the morning and Johnny didn’t want to leave his Firebird at the starting point for over a week. Even if the route was a circle.

“Are you sure about this?” Bobby asked when he picked him up at dawn, yawning.

“Yeah, I think so,” Johnny said putting his heavy bag in the backseat and sitting down next to Bobby, putting on his seatbelt and shutting the door.

“Why couldn’t you have just hiked around here?”

“I want to see something new.”

“You’re not getting bored are you?” Bobby asked passing him a coffee.

“Bored about what?”

“I don’t know. Domestic life? Owning a house, Daniel, the shop.”

“Never.”

Bobby studied him when they stopped at a light.

“So this is generic finding oneself type of thing?”

“I…guess so.”

“And everything with Daniel is good?”

“Yes.”

“The romantic stuff, the living together, the…sex? Everything is fulfilling?”

Johnny coughed on his coffee.

“Listen do you know how many couples I council? It’s shocking how much couple counseling I do. And after a lot of polite toeing around it’s nearly always sex or just shit they refuse to talk about.”

“I’m sorry?”

“I’m starting to wonder if women ever orgasm in married relationships,” Bobby said with a sigh. “Like it’s the same conversation almost every damn time.”

“I’m not a woman in a married relationship,” Johnny said.

“Yeah, but like, are you both—“

“Bobby!”

“Apparently it also gets boring.”

“How would you know Mr. Popular?”

“I’ve toned it down thank you very much. So… is it…okay?”

Johnny glanced out the window as they made their way onto the I-5 North. Since they weren’t going to see each other for a while they’d spent maybe too much time the day before cuddling in front of the TV barely watching the drama they'd planned to watch and making out instead.

And then they'd had dinner and it'd been nice, comfortable. And then Daniel had been naked when he'd gotten out of the shower and had said something about wanting to feel Johnny while on his trip since it was going to be a long one and this time Johnny wouldn't be home to call. And Johnny had watched Daniel get comfortable, on his back looking up at Johnny, moaning on his fingers, Johnny's dick. Talking dirty about wanting to feel Johnny all week.

And Johnny was happy to oblige, to do what Daniel asked, to enjoy the warmth around him. They'd both definitely…orgasmed.

"We're good."

"And the house?"

"Beautiful."

"It's not too much to take care of is it?"

"I love it."

"I mean of course you'd love it, it's a beautiful house. I just mean, you guys are re-doing a lot. Last I heard any way."

"You talked to Daniel?"

"Yeah. He said you've repainted all the rooms, put up a backsplash in the kitchen, re-tiled the bathroom and are in the midst of landscaping the garden."

"I also hooked up the TV's."

"TV's? Plural?"

"Yeah."

"Why plural?"

"I got a tiny one and put it in the kitchen for when we cook."

"So what you're going to follow some PBS cooking show?"

"I was thinking about it."

“Who are you?”

“Thanks a lot.”

“It just sounds like you’re doing a lot. What’s Daniel doing?”

“He’s helping.”

“Are you okay? Is this whole trip just a cry for help?”

“Not in that way,” Johnny said. “I’m not hurt… I’m not really… hurting. I’m just trying to…find myself I guess.”

“You’ve got a nice job with a boss you like, you live in a beautiful house that you’re remodeling, you’ve got a cool car and you’re in a committed relationship. What more could you want?”

“That’s what I want to find out.”

Bobby sighed turning and heading off onto CA-14. “I just…it sucks okay? I get it.”

“What sucks.”

“Being a star and then getting stuck in cement.”

“You feel like a star that got stuck in the mud?”

“Yeah…I mean I started Cobra Kai before you. I was the top of the class and then you came in and caught Kreese’s eye. And Jimmy’s married and has kids already…and you’ve got a house and a long term partner. And I’ve got…a practice.”

“You can get married.”

Bobby sighed. “Yeah. I know. And I know it’s not healthy to compare where I am in life to where others are. I mean hell Dutch has been in Korea for ages now. Do you get his postcards? He’s in some fancy business school out there now and he’s been traveling during his vacation periods and I don’t know…maybe I should’ve taken a gap year or something. My point is…I get it.”

“You know Daniel did that early on.”

“Did what?”

“Compared us.”

“You and me?”

“No, me and him. Mr. Miyagi took us to the beach and told us to work on balance. So we stood out in the waves and the goal was not to get knocked over. And I don’t know, I think I had a crush on him and just was ignoring it. Like I hadn’t realized it yet. But he was standing in the water doing his hardest to stay upright and he was so pissed because the waves were knocking him over and I thought, truly thought he was going to start berating the ocean and it was funny. I mean I could see it you know? Daniel, all fired up and pissed off and arguing with the ocean and yelling at it for hours.

“It was…adorable. And he went under and he popped up all mad. And I thought yeah I could see why Ali went for him. I mean sure he was small, even soaking wet but he pushed his hair out of his face and I don’t know the sun hit him right and he was beautiful. But he got pissed. Like he saw me smiling and before I knew it I was on back in the sand and he was so sure I was making fun of him and pissed that I hadn’t fallen over because this was his thing. This was Mr. Miyagi’s training.

“And I just…I don’t know, my heart had been all warm in my chest and my stomach had been weird and I’d been shoved in the car way too close to him.”

“Is this when he scratched up your thigh?”

“Yeah that was later. And all of a sudden all that warmth turned to ash and I realized this wasn’t easy. Like nothing I did wouldn’t be perceived as a threat. Daniel might never like me. But I listened to him and realized he was comparing us. And it wasn’t fair. He didn’t spend his childhood bathing in the ocean, he hadn’t gone surfing, or spent a summer as a life guard, or sleeping on the beach when things got bad at home.

“The ocean was more of my home then Sid’s mansion. He thought he had home field advantage and I had to remind him he’d only been training for six months. I…lived on the Californian beaches for most of my life. I’d been training with Cobra Kai for years. The comparison was…bad.

“But it’s hard. It’s hard not to compare. And yeah, I’m kind of jealous that Jimmy’s married. He can be married. But I was also jealous that all of you know what you wanted to do. Dutch wanted to go to Korea. You all wanted to go to UCLA. You know who you are. And I…I’ve been running away. Every once in a while I stop and I look a little deeper and I puzzle over the pieces of who I am and try and figure it out. And I'm better than I was at 17, but I'm not there yet."

Johnny took a sip of his coffee watching through the window. "And I'm working on it. But—" he turned towards Bobby. "I'm so fucking proud of all of you."

"So you're going to go out into the woods and figure out who you are?"

"Well the woods and mountains and around the lake."

"You going to be okay?"

"Yeah. You've got my route."

"I've got it. And I know around what time to pick you up. Though I'm not looking forward to it. You're going to reek," Bobby said taking the exit to US 395. "That, Johnny is true love. And I hope you appreciate it. You're going to be out in the wilderness hiking around and absolutely disgusting when I come pick you up."

Johnny laughed. "It's going to be bad. Thanks."

"You owe me. What I haven't decided, but just know that you owe me."

"I owe you for getting up at the crack of dawn and driving me out."

"Yeah well, I'd rather make sure you get there safely. How's Miyagi-do?"

"Good. Louie's made it to a blue belt."

"Is that why he's more annoying?"

Johnny laughed. "What'd he do to you?"

"Well he must've heard Dutch calling me father or something and now every time someone offers me a drink he steps in and says 'oh no, he's a religious figure, you can't, it's really rude.' I want to strangle him. And I guess he got Chozen to believe it, so now Chozen also takes my alcohol away."

Johnny laughed. "Oh poor you."

“You laugh, but we run in the same circles. And I swear Louie’s trying to cockblock me too. Every time I talk to a girl he comes up and pats me on the shoulder and calls me ‘holy father’.”

“And the girls just run away?”

“So fast. I’ve tried to explain to him that I’m not that type of religious figure but he like wanders off every single time, head held high like he helped me and is all proud. College has not made him less annoying. I don’t know how you lived with him for so long.”

“He’s not bad.”

“No. He’s not bad, he’s just stopping me from enjoying life.”

“Aren’t you supposed to lead by example?”

“Yeah, but I should also be able to enjoy my life.”

“Isn’t forgiveness a big thing?”

Bobby sighed. “Yeah. It is. Which is why I haven’t head-butted him.”

“How’s Tommy doing?”

“Good. He says holding an office keeps him busier than he ever expected. But having someone like myself come by frequently looks good for his image. So we have lunch like once a week. His desk is intense. It’s drowning in paperwork.”

“He’s not overdoing it is he?”

“Nah, he’s got a goal and he’s going for it. Pretty proud of him actually. His campaigns are going well. He’ll be at the lake house next month for a mini vacation, so we’ll all see him then.”

“I send flowers a lot. But he’s been so busy I haven’t had a chance to see him. I mean we’re kind of stuck in phone tag at the moment.”

“Yeah that happens. For a while I was just conversing with him via my answering machine and his answering machine,” Bobby said with a laugh.

“How are your siblings?”

“Annoying. Can you believe they’re in high school? It makes me feel so old.”

“They can drive now right?”

“Yeah. Hate that. Time’s weird,” Bobby said with a sigh. “They’re driving, going on dates, I don’t know how Jimmy’s going to handle it.”

“I don’t know how I’m going to handle it,” Johnny said.

“Do you have everything you’ll need? You’re planning to be gone for ten days.”

“Yeah, the trail can be about three weeks but I thought that might be too long.”

“I don’t think Daniel could handle three weeks without you.”

“I don’t think I could handle three weeks without him,” Johnny said. “A couple weeks was bad enough the last time he had to go one one of these. I think it’ll do me some good to be…moving while he’s gone. You know?”

“But you’ve got stuff for the mountains and the cold stuff and a tent and you’ll be able to carry it?” Bobby asked as he parked. “Welcome to Lake Tahoe.”

“Yeah. Thank you Bobby.”

“You… be careful out there okay? If you’re not at the meeting point in ten days I’m sending a search party in after you. Got it?”

“Yeah I understand,” Johnny said hopping out and grabbing his bag.

He settled the bag over his shoulders and headed towards the entrance to the trail.

Ten days of just him.

He’d dreamed of it most of his youth. Disappearing into nature and living off the land.

However that’d been an escape, a run away back up plan for when things fell a part. But when Mr. Miyagi had told him to take a walk the idea had floated up.

He’d take a camera and he’d go hiking while Daniel was out of town.

He was starting at Big Meadow and would hopefully see something beautiful while he was out in the wild. Wildflowers and alpine lakes.

He'd packed sandwiches and fishing gear.

He had all his permits.

He was ready.

Or, he thought he was ready. As ready as he'd ever planned, more so actually. He'd checked out tons of books from the library. Daniel had taken him to a bookstore again and he'd gotten a couple of maps and guides on hiking.

He felt…spoiled.

Undeservedly so.

He'd told Daniel in Okinawa he didn't need anything. That Daniel returning his feelings was enough to make him happy. But maybe the gifts were for him but weren't 100% for him.

Daniel was thriving. He was doing well with his businesses. He got money from Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees as co-owner. LaRusso Auto was doing well. He'd bought his mother a new car again.

He was putting Louie Jr. through a bachelors and masters program.

He flew his grandparents out a couple times a year.

Johnny hadn't had much, but he had time. He wondered if the time he spent helping was similar. A similar way to show love and care. Daniel was delighted every time Johnny brought him a bouquet, every time he made dinner, every time he stopped by the dealership for lunch or coffee. And it made Daniel happy to give Johnny things.

He'd made that clear. So why was he uncomfortable?

He prodded the feeling carefully.

It connected.

He didn't feel like he deserved it. Because it had felt like he had to work for everything. Every crumb of affection from Kreese, to be seen by his classmates, to get things he wanted from Sid.

It was weird to get things just because someone loved him and thought of him. His mother hadn't been able to afford doing that. Everything was a necessity, or small. And now…now he didn't know how to deal with it.

He thought he needed to do all the work. He needed to give and give and give until there was nothing left and then dredge up some final piece of himself to give. It was a little root of Cobra Kai, leftover from trying to please Kreese. Working himself to the bone for scraps of compliments.

To be given all the things that had been taken away was overwhelming. To be gifted things just felt so undeserved and he didn't know how to handle it.

How did he keep accepting things from Daniel without breaking into tears every single time? Or was that fine? Daniel seemed fine with cupping his face and brushing away tears and whispering soft warm things to him.

Maybe it was healing. Healing to pick up a guitar again, to drive the Firebird. He just was tense…waiting for the other shoe to drop, to learn what was wanted from him in exchange.

And that was Sid. Sid giving him something in exchange for a task, for an event to show up to be the dutiful son dancing with someone, making him look good. Or to have it taken away when the mood suited him.

But Daniel wasn't Kreese or Sid. And Johnny knew that. But the wiring was still there. All the protected defenses. They didn't go up all the time. They weren't set off as much any more. He didn't get tense when Daniel asked to drive, or offered to work on the Avanti or Firebird.

He trusted Daniel and let him drive off with his car. Usually it came back so polished and pretty that it hurt to look at.

It'd taken a while, but he'd worked with Daniel on so many cars when he was setting up the mechanical side of LaRusso Auto that he knew Daniel knew his way around a car, and cared an awful lot from the way he interacted with his customers.

He didn't get nervous as much when he sparred with Daniel when he came to the dojo. He'd always been scared for Daniel's knee. But years of watching Daniel run in his intramural soccer games had assured him that Daniel's knee was fine, unless it was raining. Then sometimes it bothered him. But not enough to hinder him in any way.

He'd started weaning himself off of showing up with gifts. The first time Nonnia and Nonno came to visit he'd gone to pick them up in the Avanti with a bouquet for each of them. Now he just went to pick them up.

He still gave gifts, but it was more of souvenirs when he traveled and less of a 'I'm sorry for existing I hope this makes up for it'. Which he realized it'd become.

He hadn't taken flowers or wine to Lucille in ages. Instead he just asked while he was at the store if she needed anything and if she was out of milk or something he'd pick it up with their groceries and take it over. Same with Abuela. He went by with groceries at least once week for her. Which was a task he'd left for Chozen while he was hiking the Tahoe Rim.

That was more out of love though. Care and concern. When he visited Dutch in Korea he brought deodorant and snacks he missed from the states. He took his godchildren gifts when he saw something he thought they'd like. He made sure when he went grocery shopping to get the snacks Daniel liked.

Johnny stopped when he saw wildflowers.

There'd been a few along the way but now there was a meadow of them. Violets and shootings stars. It was around where he'd planned to have his lunch.

Ten days.

By himself.

And it was so quiet that his heartbeat and his breath and the sound of his foot steps were thunderous.

He wondered if he'd be able to handle it. He hadn't gone that long without talking to Daniel in years. He wondered if maybe he should've stayed home. Then he would've at least heard Daniel's voice over the phone.

He wasn't ready for that. To sleep in a tent by himself without hearing Daniel on the phone or feeling the warmth of him by his side. He wasn't even sure if he'd sleep that well.

But he also felt like he had to do it.

He had to be out in the woods.

He had to take the time to… be by himself.

He was just nervous about what he'd uncover.

What if he still…hated himself?

What if he couldn't stand who he was and that silence became overpowering?

What if that was why he always got so busy because any time by himself and he'd just…sink to rock bottom?

His food was good.

He'd made a salad for the start of his journey.

He also had onigiri that Yukie had made him and tamales from Abuela.

The flowers in the meadow bowed in the breeze and the air filled with the smell of wildflowers and it was beautiful.

He wished Daniel was there to see them.

Eventually he got up and kept going. Slowly making his way around the rim.

He pitched a tent at night, at the campsite he'd planned, marking his way along his map, occasionally using the compass Tommy had given him to make sure he was going the right way and he stared up at the stars, listening to the sounds of nature.

He'd taken pictures along the way and now lay in his sleeping bag with a battery powered book light that Daniel had given him, reading one of the books he'd gotten the last time they'd gone together to the bookstore.

It was…peaceful and lonely.

If Daniel was there he'd have wiggled his way into the same sleeping bag with Johnny until there was no space. And Johnny would've complain but he'd sleep like a rock.

He was sleeping impossibly better, he assumed, because of Daniel.

He'd been a light sleeper most of his life.

In the car it was so he could wake his mom if someone came snooping around so she could pretend they were just parking momentarily in a spot.

At Sid's it was to get out of the way and make his way onto the roof if he was pissed early in the morning or before going to bed.

And then he'd gone to Okinawa and kept missing all the bad stuff, and then he got hurt, and then there'd been Silver breaking in. There'd been nightmares about Sid and Kreese. About himself, waking up with blood on his own hands only to actually wake up and there'd be nothing.

And then sometimes he just wasn't able to sleep.

His body seemed to just boot him awake sometimes like an old school farmer and he'd be awake and couldn't sleep again. So he'd make things from when he was little. Fried baloney sandwiches, vienna sausages, spam, instant food, corned beef and hash with an egg.

He hadn't ever wanted to wake Daniel, but then Daniel had gotten nervous. So he'd started to.

He'd roll over and tell him "Gonna make a snack." And Daniel would mumble something sleepily and a moment later would follow him into the kitchen and lean his head into Johnny's back, with is arms around his waist, continuing to sleep but also awake.

And then they'd eat and curl up on the couch because it was cooler and Johnny would fall asleep there, with Daniel fast asleep on top of him.

It didn't make sense. But it helped.

The weight, Daniel's heartbeat and breath and warmth all helped. And he'd be out till morning.

It wasn't all the time.

He slept better more frequently now. In their house, in their bed, with Daniel plastered to him no matter how he rolled away from him through the night. Johnny was pretty sure, but hadn't tested it, that if he got too hot and decided to sleep on the floor Daniel would roll off right on top of him.

There were other hikers along the way, hikers who coalesced for a brief time from the PCT. They talked to him, about where they were from, why they were doing it, about everything and he saw pictures of their kids, friends, family and pets.

He got to show off the photos in his wallet. Photos of Daniel, of him and the guys, his mom, Mr. Miyagi, his students.

It helped pass the time. Because all he did was think and think and think.

He breathed, he did kata in the misty mornings, he took photos, he ate, he read.

Daniel had the better photos.

He'd taken up scrapbooking at some point and Johnny loved them. He'd never had memories so neatly organized like they were treasured. It was something Daniel did to unwind, something he did with his mom. And sometimes when Johnny felt overwhelmed or bad he'd sit in the living room and go through them.

He loved watching Daniel work on them, head bent over a book with little pieces of colorful paper around him and photos. He always got copies. So many copies.

The staff at the photo development drive-thru knew them by sight at this point.

Photos went to Nonnia and Nonnio, to their moms, and for them into the scrapbooks. The finished products were always lovely. And Daniel always seemed unsure passing them over to Johnny when he was done and sitting next to him, explaining what he did and when Johnny told him how much he loved every single one of them, with so much sincerity Daniel looked so happy. Just like he did whenever he came home and found Johnny going through them again. Curling up next to him on the couch to reminiscence with him.

About halfway through his hike he realized he was near a trail head again. The trail got noisy with people. Students on a field trip. He passed them while they had an early lunch. And then they passed him when he stopped for his lunch.

It reminded him of when they'd taken the dojo out camping. It was a tradition now, a sort of new tradition for the younger kids because a mom had apparently asked Sato about it and Sato thought it was a wonderful idea. It'd been a little weird at first.

Jimmy had helped them over the phone draft up permission slips and waivers and then Johnny had gone to the park early with Chozen and Louie Jr. and waited for kids to be dropped off.

It had been so nerve wracking the first year. He hadn't felt old enough to be in charge of kids over night in a forest. He wasn't some summer camp counselor. He wasn't trained. He wasn't old enough for parents to just pass their kids off to.

But Chozen and Sato had been adamant and reminded him again and again that he was good with kids, that he was trained in CPR and first aid, that he would be fine.

And he was. It'd been great.

Once a year for a weekend in the summer they went.

But this year the kids had been cranky. Upset about something and there'd been a fight or the start of one and they'd had to separate them. Divide them up.

It'd been bad.

It'd taken a while, Chozen had stuck with most of them at camp and Johnny had taken the angriest one for a walk.

The kid had been sullen, kicking at the path, hands shoved in pockets, following Johnny.

Johnny tried to think of what Mr. Miyagi would do. Tried to think of all the times he'd seen Mr. Miyagi very easily and very succinctly redirect anger into something calm and useful. But it seemed…weird to do it himself. So they walked and walked and walked.

And then they came up to the view Johnny had gone towards, a beautiful spot, high up, right at sunset. And the kid had stopped and looked and then sunk down on a rock and Johnny had sat down nearby.

He didn't know what to say or what to do.

He wasn't Mr. Miyagi.

He didn't have good advice or a calming presence.

He was a mess himself.

“I fucked up.”

Johnny didn’t move, didn’t say a word. He felt like when he sat on the boat with Mr. Miyagi.

If he moved, if he made a noise the kid would clam up. And then this trip, a trip the kids enjoyed, would end with unhappy campers. But he frowned a little at the language.

“Right, sorry sensei.”

Sensei was a title he still didn’t like the weight of. Mr. Miyagi never asked to be called sensei which meant the only sensei he knew…his sensei…had been Kreese. And putting himself anywhere near that man stung. But there was no other thing to call him. It was weird to call Chozen sensei and not him. And the kids did it automatically. He was getting used to it, in increments. Slowly. Even though it felt awkward.

“But I did. And now they all hate me.”

“They’re not dead,” Johnny said.

“Well… no.”

“Then you can apologize.”

“What if they don’t…accept it?”

“Action. Show them your sorry. If it’s something you can fix, fix it. If it’s something you can work on in yourself then work on it. Do something. Don’t just stew in it. If they don’t accept it, then find ground where you can at least be cordial. Even if that means giving them space and time.”

His mind kept circling back to that conversation as he hiked.

Towards that camping trip and his conversation with Mr. Miyagi.

He kept thinking of the last time he’d been in Okinawa, for a festival and another modeling campaign. Daniel had taken so many pictures, chatting with the photography team, the magazines. He hadn’t thought it’d be fun, but it was.

He’d never have thought that that Fotorama that Daniel had gotten for his birthday would become such a loved hobby. That Daniel would get more use out of Johnny’s camera he got from his mom then Johnny himself. And he got so many good photos of him and the kids from Tomi village, they taught him a new dance and new songs on the sanshin.

He thought a lot about everything. About dumb stuff like what sort of plant he wanted to add to the garden, about different meals he wanted to make when he got back.

He wanted to cook in their kitchen with Daniel, let his arm run along his waist as he moved around him to see what he was working on. He wanted to press a kiss into the side of his neck and hug him close, breathing in his aftershave.

He thought about the shop more than he expected to. He thought about the dojo and the Firebird sitting in the garage at home next to the Avanti and the Ford and Daniel's fancy shiny luxury car.

He was tired.

His feet hurt.

He was exhausted, when he laid down to sleep sometimes it still felt like he was stumbling forward.

Onward and onward and onward.

What was the point?

Why had he decided sleeping on the ground in a tent for ten days was a good idea?

And why'd he give himself only ten days?

He couldn't stop and take a break.

He had to keep going. Or else Bobby would freak out.

He passed out as soon as he crawled into his tent.

He slept until the tent got warm and the sunlight made it impossible to keep sleeping.

He made himself breakfast then packed up and moved on.

A circle.

Why on Earth had he picked a trail that was a circle?

Because it'd be pretty?

Because there were wildflowers and a lake and mountains?

Because he wanted to hike through the snow?

What was wrong with him?

He could've been in bed.

He could've been sleeping at his nice beautiful house and getting up early to go for a swim in the pool, he could've made coffee and sat in the garden watching flowers bloom.

He could've heard Daniel's voice every day.

But no.

He thought why not do something he wanted to do?

Why not see how he fared living off the land, off of everything he could carry on his back, why not see if he could rely on himself?

But hell he'd learned he could rely on others…right?

Right?

Maybe high school him could've done it. Picked a trail and lived out in the wilderness for months at a time until he found some small town he liked where no one knew him or cared about karate or the valley.

But he liked home. He liked his pillow and the giant whale shark plush that kept him company whenever Daniel was out of town. That he sometimes hugged to his chest while Daniel held him.

He liked watering his bonsai and Daniel's bonsai and moving them to get better sunlight.

He liked playing guitar, practicing the sanshin, the drums.

He liked washing and waxing the cars, even the Avanti and Ford that were no longer driven as much.

He missed home.

He missed Daniel.

He missed eating real food.

He was tired of oatmeal.

The difference wasn't that he'd gotten older. Not just. The difference was that that plan, it'd been a necessity. A just in case panic button or escape hatch. And he didn't need it.

Camping was more enjoyable when he wasn't alone. He liked camping with the guys, with Daniel who always liked to remind him of their first camping trip and reminisce. He liked camping with Daniel. Surprising him with a basket of food he made.

With students he got to get to know a bit better than he did during class. It was more bonding then usual and he got to know them beyond just students.

People.

And it was weird to recognize himself in them. He understood their frustrations, knew how to guide them along. He was worried he was going to screw up, but then he'd see them get frustrated or mad and he'd understand.

He watched that last batch a couple weeks ago, the way they worked together and healed their riff and the way the kid who'd talked to him had trailed behind.

"It was too easy."

He knew that feeling. He knew what wasn't being said. An accepted apology for fucking up and how it'd healed like there wasn't any cracks.

"They've forgiven you. You can't beat yourself up forever. Just try not to do it again and make your amends and then…forgive yourself."

Forgive yourself.

It sounded so damn easy to say to a kid. And the kid had nodded. But that was what Johnny was doing wasn't it?

Even after all this time.

He couldn't accept Daniel's gifts without feeling uncomfortable because he felt like he hadn't earned them.

That he was unworthy of the love he received, especially on such a large scale. But to Daniel…it was just like buying groceries for Abuela. He wanted the same thing Johnny wanted.

Johnny wanted Daniel to be happy and safe with him. And Daniel just wanted Johnny to feel the same, loved and supported. But Johnny was acting like he and love were oil and water. They didn't mix. And all the kindness he was shown always shocked and surprised him. Even though…it shouldn't.

He'd been so mad at himself and felt like he'd deserved everything. Like maybe people had seen how awful he was and that's why Sid and Kreese had treated him the way they had.

That that was why it'd taken him so long to make friends. But that wasn't it.

He hadn't…deserved that. No one deserved that.

And Daniel hadn't deserved the way he'd been treated. And he'd forgiven Johnny and the guys. He'd worked through it and now…now he showered Johnny with love every chance he got.

He missed it.

He missed being with Daniel.

He missed his beautiful big brown eyes and his smile and his laugh and his soft hair and his warm hands.

He missed how solid he was, how real.

He missed listening to him talk.

It was too quiet by himself out in the woods.

Daniel always had stories to tell and Johnny didn't care if he'd heard them a thousand times.

He just liked hearing Daniel talk, liked hearing what he thought.

He was worried going out into the woods might remind him that he hated himself.

But…he didn't. Not any more.

He just had to let go.

He was holding onto the past so tightly that his hands were stiff.

When was the last time he'd slept on alert?

The first apartment?

That had been years ago.

Daniel really could take care of himself and didn't need Johnny to wake up and defend him.

Hell if someone broke into their house Daniel would be after them before Johnny even fully woke up.

He was comfortable.

It was because he'd taken that hand outstretched out to him. He'd taken it and that hand hadn't let go. And eventually his walls went down and it was safe. The ground beneath his feet was sturdy. Even when it wasn't. Even when he was on that balance wheel in Mr. Miyagi's garden, Daniel was on the other side helping him keep balance. And if he fell in, if he slipped and lost his foot, Daniel was always there to hold that hand out towards him again and again, to help him up, make sure he was okay and try again.

And when things were bad for Daniel he was there to do the same.

He'd made another best friend.

He had five best friends and he'd never expected to be so lucky that he got to live with one of them, and love them and be loved in return. And they had his back, just like he had theirs. No matter what path they chose or what path he picked.

And that was a different question.

Now that he was done spinning in circles, rooted in the spot and just spinning like a top, what did he want to do?

What had he enjoyed?

He liked modeling for Daniel.

But he still didn't want to do that full time.

It was just a fun hobby and if he was honest. Some of the fun photos… he never wanted anyone else to see. They were just for him and

Daniel. And money wasn't an issue.

He could be a trophy husband if he wanted, something he'd nearly accepted being a long long time ago. Even if he couldn't get the document this time round to make it official.

But he knew he'd get bored. Sitting around at home was boring. Even if he spent most of the day reading or playing music or gardening.

He needed to move.

He'd enjoyed working on the floats for the rose parade.

That'd been a tradition he'd enjoyed every year for a while.

He liked going to the market and making bouquets to take home to Daniel or to send to loved ones.

He missed flowers.

He missed the florist shop he grew up in. Even if it'd been for such a short time.

Oh what a dumbass he was.

What a fucking idiot.

He liked working with Mr. Miyagi not just because it was Mr. Miyagi but because it was plants. Because it reminded him of the florist shop. He knew how to run one, they'd taught him, he'd memorized that flower book, he spent all his free time drawn over and over and over again to the flower market.

He wanted to be florist.

He'd spent so long refusing to look forward because he hadn't forgiven himself that he'd missed the most obvious thing.

He'd spent most of his childhood daydreaming about flowers, drawing different ones to give to the florists, hell he gave Ali the most ridiculous bouquets he could think of because he knew she wouldn't care but they were fun and daring and it'd been the highlight of his year was coming up with ridiculously expensive Valentines Day bouquets with the local florist.

And Sid hadn't cared because he liked that the price meant it was good. Even if it was possibly the ugliest design Johnny had ever seen.

He'd always gone to see the florist after and they'd laughed about the design or talked about how it would've actually been better if they'd done xyz. Because really Ali had just enjoyed the spectacle. She'd enjoyed being given a large bouquet that was heavy and bright. What it translated to didn't matter.

With Daniel he'd put so much care into it. Every leaf had a meaning, every shock of color and flower spoke volumes. Because Johnny hadn't been able to articulate it.

With Ali it'd seemed simple but with Daniel he hid behind his flowers and Daniel would open up the book on the language of flowers and pour over it like Johnny had given him a mystery to solve and then he'd find Johnny and whisper everything back to him.

All the I love you's, all the beauty and warm wishes.

And it was an overwhelming crash of waves. But he'd been heard. His feelings went through and were met and returned in a way that had never happened before.

His feet felt like lead, his muscles sore as he hiked for days on end until the final day.

He got up early, ate the last of his oatmeal, took down his tent and gathered all of his things from camp and walked fast.

He didn't care if he had to sit in the parking lot and wait for hours for Bobby.

He wanted to get home as soon as possible.

He wanted to take a hot shower.

He wanted to be home, with Daniel and to sleep all tangled up in their bed.

He would've run.

He would've left his stuff behind and bolted the last stretch of the hike, but he'd packed his Walkman, his camera that Daniel loved, he had a few library books, things Daniel had given him, and he wasn't about to litter and get banned from the park and trail. Plus he felt so light he feared he might float off.

He forced himself to slow down once he started getting close. There was no point running like he was being chased by something into a parking lot and scaring students or people out for a day hike. Especially if Bobby wasn't there.

He adjusted the straps of his bag. He'd stop by and chat with the rangers for a bit while he waited.

The wooden building was open and he stepped inside walking past brochures looked around, chatted for a short period, signed their book and got a little patch.

He stared at it as he walked back out to the parking lot.

165 miles

He'd hiked through the Sierra mountains, he'd slept in the desolation wilderness. He'd taken so many pictures that he'd used up all the film he'd brought. And now he was exhausted. Maybe he'd sleep for a week. And he'd wake up feeling better.

"Hey! Where do you think you're going?"

Johnny turned, he'd been walking towards a bench to sit and wait. But there in a rumpled suit was Daniel.

Johnny turned around so fast he nearly fell over from the weight of his bag.

"You know Bobby warned me you might look liked you'd spent a week rolling around in the dirt. Glad he said he brought towels. You're like that Peanuts character that leaves dust around everywhere they move."

"Can I pick you up?"

"Not a hello? Fine yes, to be fair I'm disgusting too. I got up at like dawn to drive."

Johnny lifted him up, he probably should've taken his backpack off first, probably should've done a lot of things, but instead he just looked up at Daniel and smiled.

"I missed you," Johnny said.

"Got lonely on the trail huh? Is that why your hands went straight for my ass?" Daniel asked with a soft laugh. "I missed you too. So did you have fun? See anything cool?"

“I took a lot of pictures.”

“We’ll go get them developed. How much of them are just pretty flowers?”

“Some. You’ll be proud of me though. I asked strangers to take photos of me.”

“Hell yeah.”

“I thought it’d be nice, I was thinking of you and the scrapbooks and a scrapbook of just flowers sounded…well I’d like it, but I wanted proof that I’d been there you know? So I just…asked people and they were more than happy to take my photo. No clue how they’ll turn out but surely one of them will be nice.”

“Oh hell Johnny you reek,” Bobby said walking over from one of the vending machines with some drinks. “You’re both so gross. Why am I even here?”

“Because I drove through the night to get to you to come with and because Johnny’s been hiking for days and you don’t want us to die if either of us try to drive because you love us?” Daniel said.

“Yeah yeah. It’s always love. Johnny take that bag off before you fall over like a damn turtle and can’t get back up again.”

“I don’t want to.”

“What do you mean you don’t want to? Is the damn thing fused to your back?”

“No, because I’d have to put Daniel down.”

“Yeah, that’s how that’d have to work. Give him a kiss and put the poor guy down.”

Johnny gave Daniel a squeeze watching him squirm, then laugh. Grinning up at Daniel as he leanned down and kissed him, cupping the side of Johnny’s face, fingers rubbing the beard that’d grown on the trail.

“Aw come on, really, this is ridiculous. Johnny I thought you’d be exhausted, but you’re like Frenching. Come on get to the car before both of you pass out. Idiots. You’re both idiots. Daniel for driving through the night and showing up at my doorsteps scaring the shit out of me right as I was leaving, asking if he'd made it in time to come with, looking all wild eyed and shit because he hadn't slept and had pounded more coffee then anyone should. And Johnny, you're fucking covered in dirt and dust and you both smell. I thought you know, it'll be fine they'll pass out in the back seat and sleep the rest of the way home. But nah, you two are still like teenagers and it's going to feel like I'm escorting horny prom night teenagers home. Can you two like keep it, I don't know, PG on the way home?"

Johnny set Daniel back down gently.

"You're the best Bobby."

"You mean I'm all you've got," Bobby said motioning them towards his car. "Jimmy and Tommy are too busy, Dutch is still in Korea. Daniel would flip if Chozen picked you up. Johnny refuses to get in the car if Louie's driving. Mr. Miyagi's running the shop. Really your only options were me or your mom."

Johnny unclipped his bag and set it in the trunk. "Do you have some towels? I'll sit on those."

"I do. Daniel reminded me, it was what he carried out of his car. And I told my siblings if they cleaned my car after this trip the could keep all the change they found and if they did a good job I'd drive them somewhere. You'd be surprised how easily motivated they are by car change. And not being driven by our parents."

"Don't they get like a fancy allowance?" Daniel asked opening the back door and holding it open for Johnny.

Johnny felt a warm hand on top of his head, ensuring he didn't bump it as he climbed in.

"Oh you gotta work for that at the Brown house. You either have to debate Mom and Dad and present why you need it and have a good excuse for not working at the shop. Or you've got to work at the shop," Bobby said as they got in, starting the car while Daniel and Johnny buckled their seatbelts and pulling out of the lot. "Johnny say happy trails to the trail, tonight you sleep in a real bed. No more wild wilderness man for you. If Daniel lets you in the house. Seriously what did you do to yourself?"

"It's dust from the trail."

"I wouldn't be surprised if Daniel doesn't just hose you down before you're allowed inside to shower."

"We were thinking of making a pool house with a shower in it," Daniel said thoughtfully. He kept reaching out and touching Johnny's face, running his fingers over his jaw, feeling the beard that'd been so itchy at first. "That way if we got muddy or something we could clean off instead of tracking it in the house."

"And progress on that? Johnny where do you want to eat man? It's at least a six hour drive back."

"I had oatmeal."

"You both look grimy and miserable. How about I stop by at one of those trucker rest stops? We can get you both touristy t-shirts and shorts and flip flops and you can rent the showers and then we'll continue the rest of the way home?"

"What will you do?"

"I don't know, maybe I'll buy a donuts or something. You want a donut? Or hey, they got those giant slushees. Maybe I'll get one of those. Think about what you want to eat while you're in there."

"That'd be nice," Johnny said.

Daniel held his hand. Which was also nice. He was so stunned Daniel was there.

The person he'd wanted to see the most, that he almost wanted to skip the shower, skip the meal and just go home, to be home with Daniel.

But they stopped.

He showered and put on neon clothes, a bright pink shirt and neon yellow pants while Daniel got stuck with the opposite, a neon yellow shirt and pink shorts and flip flops covered in palm trees.

"Ah you two look perfect, you're just missing the sunglasses and these."

Johnny frowned at the bucket hat set on his head, price tag already removed.

"I thought, at one point you were adamant that I was a fashion disaster and that you were a fashion guru and this is what you came up with?" Johnny asked.

Bobby grinned motioning towards them with his slushee. “I work with what I’ve got.”

“I swear I see a regular t-shirt over there.”

“I think he had a different reason for this,” Daniel said squinting at his shirt. “You’re hard to look at, I’m hard to look at. Maybe he thinks we’ll keep our hands to ourselves like this.”

“Next time you spend the night and need to borrow something to wear, this is what you’re wearing,” Johnny said following them back out to the car.

“Complain all you want, it’s clean.”

“Yeah, thanks Bobby.”

Part way through the journey, through explaining his trip Daniel started to yawn and Johnny patted his lap. “Go ahead and nap, I’ll wake you when we stop for lunch.”

Daniel adjusted his seat belt and laid his head in Johnny’s lap. Johnny played with his hair, watching him fall asleep.

“So how was it?” Bobby asked.

“It was pretty,” Johnny said. “I mean it’s not done yet, I had to hitchhike for part of it because they’re not set to finish it until the new millennia.”

“You hitchhiked?”

“Yeah had to a couple of times. They didn’t complain as much about how I smelled.”

“You really wanted to sit back there with Daniel for over six hours in dirt and sweat?”

“No. Its not like I didn’t try to bathe. I went for swims when I could.”

“Know where you want to eat?”

“Anywhere as long as I can get something not from a can or oatmeal.”

“How about a burger?”

“Sounds divine.”

“I try,” Bobby said with a grin. “You find yourself in there? On that trail? Find some enlightenment or something?”

“Yeah. I think so. Maybe a bit of something you’d preach in your sermons.”

“And what would that be?”

“Forgiveness,” Johnny said ever so softly, but he caught the look of Bobby in the rear view mirror, the warm smile on his face and knew he’d heard. And he looked down at Daniel, curled up asleep in his lap, snoring gently and ran the back of his finger along his cheek feeling better, lighter than he had in a long time.

Chapter End Notes

165 miles is 265.5 km
Tahoe Rim Trail

Per Cent'anni, For a Hundred Years

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Tommy called him at the office.

Jimmy called as he was digging around in his desk.

He bumped his head against it before finding what he was looking for and answered the phone.

It was essentially the same conversation.

He wondered if he'd get two more, but he doubted it.

He wouldn’t be there for it anyway.

He hurried out of his office, throwing on his jacket.

"Sheila, I'm going to be out the rest of the day, could you hold my...well everything?"

"Of course Mr. LaRusso."

Daniel rushed out to his car, missing the Ford desperately, wishing he'd driven it to work or had thought to. But he hadn’t known when they’d call.

How long had it been since he’d last driven the Ford?

Things were different. Like the photography equipment in the backseat.

Working two jobs, one somewhat a secret was exhausting. But he wasn’t the only one wearing multiple hats.

He stopped in front of Miyagi-do, the original one that Chozen had built on the ashes of Cobra Kai, parking and hurrying through the doors, running sweaty hands over his jacket.

"Yo Cuz, isn't it a work day?" Louie asked.

Maybe the weirdest part was that Louie hadn't ever really gone home. He’d gone home to graduate high school and to spend time with his family. But then he'd come back.

He had moved out. And then Daniel had put him through college and a masters program, worked him hard at the dealership.

He could run the place now. But he still liked going to the dojo. He always took his lunch break and worked out for a bit before coming back. Said it helped him refocus.

Daniel toed out of his shoes, past photographs that he knew Louie persistently requested stay up. Photos of Louie's first tournament, smiling proudly with his third place trophy while Chozen stood stony faced beside him. Probably cursing his luck that Louie decided to learn karate and that Chozen couldn't turn away students.

No escape from LaRusso's.

It brought Daniel a little bit of joy.

Evil joy.

That Louie had moved into an apartment near the dojo.

That he was constantly keeping someone elses' hands full.

Officially he said it was because he wanted to go to the dojo before and after work to practice.

Unofficially he seemed to look up to Chozen and liked spending time with him.

Not that Chozen had gotten that memo and just seemed confused about having a tall broad shouldered LaRusso following him around like a puppy wanting to help him with stuff.

True evil joy came from how it seemed to drive Chozen up the wall and tested his new leaf with a sledge hammer.

Sometimes, especially at the start, Daniel got great joy out of seeing Chozen's eye twitch.

A friendship born from White Day that Daniel took pleasure from. It was his fault and his sweet revenge.

"What do you want?" Chozen asked, arms crossed as Daniel stopped to look at the blonde in the photo.

"Is he in?"

"My co-sensei is not here at the moment," Chozen said, a little smugly.

He liked saying that. Co-sensei. It wasn't even like they were always working together. It wasn't like he stayed late nights all the time. He just...helped out sometimes. With the kid classes.

"Why are you here?" Chozen repeated while Daniel tried to think of where else to go.

Daniel thought, why not? And dug out the box from his pocket to show Chozen.

"No," Chozen said.

"It's not for you," Daniel said looking at it again, wondering if maybe he'd picked the wrong one.

But he couldn't have. He'd gotten so much feedback.

It was perfect.

Chozen was just being...Chozen.

There were dance trophies mixed in with the karate trophies and photos of Kumiko and her students sharing the same space with the Miyagi-do students.

It was always fun when she was in town. They danced the nights away and the kids, the Miyagi-do students learned to love dancing with her. They picked up new ways to be light on their feet and to move.

Daniel thought Chozen would've hated that. That it'd be another delicious piece of karma. But Chozen didn't mind. Or at least didn't seem to.

He was fairly certain Chozen helped out with the dance competitions sometimes, drove dance kids to their performances, helped pick up costumes, did their make up. At least that's what Louie said. But Louie said a lot of things.

He heard her soft feet on the mat.

"Want some tea?" Kumiko asked.

"No, if he's not here I gotta go look elsewhere."

"Everything okay?" she asked concerned.

Chozen muttered something in Okinawan and she gasped hands flying to her mouth and then grinning quickly motioning for him to leave, to hurry.

"See you at Mr. Miyagi's?" Daniel asked shoving his feet back into his shoes and returning to the door.

"Of course."

"Sensei thought it was for him," Louie said with a laugh.

"Did you switch which one you like nii-san?" Kumiko asked with a laugh.

"Quiet, both of you. You're giving me a headache."

Kumiko was only in town part of the year. Her lessons were only for the season. She traveled the rest of it, dancing on the stages herself. Performing everywhere.

Daniel had been to twenty performances and teased her, asking when his punch card would earn him a free pass to some nice ballet performance.

He kept requesting the Nutcracker and she kept laughing saying one day, one day.

He drove down to Reseda, trying to keep an eye out for the red car.

He was looking for a red Firebird, well loved and even more lovingly maintained.

He saw it parked and hurried into the shop pushing open the door and hearing the clatter of the wooden chimes and of the gentle sound of the glass furin dancing on the wind.

The scent of flowers and dirt was overwhelming.

It was a slow day, no customers. The blonde at the front desk was surrounded by flowers and his head was in his hand as he read a book, sitting with all his florist tools, lost in the pages of his book.

Daniel had memorized what he was going to say if he was at the dojo.

It’d been different if he’d been at the shop.

He'd practiced it to himself in his office so many times his staff repeated it back to him in playful jokes.

He knocked gently on the counter.

"Could I get a bouquet of daisies (loyal love), arum (ardor), arbutus (Thee Only Do I Love), red camellia (You're a Flame in My Heart), pink camilla (Longing for You), flax (Domestic Symbol), holly (Domestic Happiness), Jonquil (love Me; Affection Returned; Desire; Desire for Affection Returned), Honeysuckle (Devoted love; Fidelity), orange blossom (Innocence; Eternal Love; Marriage and Fruitfulness), peony (Gay Life; Happy Marriage), phlox (Our souls united/ Our hearts are united.), Austrian rose (Thou art all that is lovely), white rose (I'm worthy of you), mossy rosebuds (Confessions of Love), and do you have any ivy (marriage) and four leaf clovers (be mine)?"

"That's the...weirdest boquet I've ever heard of," Johnny said looking up from his book.

"Also, I'm supposed to have a tree to pick up."

Johnny's brow furrowed and he looked around before picking up a small bonsai off the back of the shelf, looking at the tags and seeing the one with Daniel's name on it.

"What kind of tree is it?" Daniel asked.

"Linden tree," Johnny said studying it with a frown. (Conjugal love)

"I'll also take spiderflowers if that's all you've got." (Elope with me)

Johnny turned around holding the bonsai close to his chest.

"Wait-"

"Johnny Lawrence, will you-"

"Wait."

Daniel huffed, he was trying to be romantic here. He'd started to sink down to the ground but stopped. He needed full attention for this and Johnny wasn't giving him that. This deserved focus.

He usually got that focus, but Johnny was holding up his hand.

Johnny put the tree down on the counter digging around in the drawers.

"What is it, someone else? Are you mad because I told Chozen that maybe in another life he'd have a shot? But otherwise he's got to wait till I die? I'm not dying you know. I'm just trying to-"

"I wanted to leave but Mr. Miyagi came by and told me he thought we were going to get swamped. Asked me to stay here because he might need my help next door. But it's been dead. Eerily so. Not a single customer. So quiet. Which means he knew. Which means he told my regulars not to come. He can be sneaky you know? Which means...aha," Johnny said placing a box down on the counter.

He'd be first damn it.

That spark of competition rearing it's head.

"Johnny Lawrence will you marry me?" Daniel said quickly.

Johnny looked at him with a warm amused look. "Only if you marry me."

"Isn't that the whole..." Daniel sighed. "One of us is going to have to say yes."

Johnny leaned over the counter towards him kissing him. "Of course it's a yes."

"How did you know?"

"Jimmy called me, then Tommy. What about you?"

"Tommy called me first."

"Do you seriously want that bouquet?" Johnny asked.

"I want the meaning behind it," Daniel said walking around the counter and wrapping his arms around Johnny, kissing him again.

Daniel pulled away brushed off the counter and hopped up onto it, sitting and taking Johnny's left hand in his.

He watched Johnny work through all the meaning in his request.

"I used the Victorian guide," Daniel said. "The floriography book."

That had been a shock to Daniel.

That there were different books, different languages of flowers.

Chozen had gotten Johnny one on Hanakotoba, Japanese meanings.

That'd been a trip.

It'd been one of the gifts he'd given Johnny when Johnny agreed to help teach at the dojo.

Chozen didn't give up that was for sure. He'd worked on that for years. Daniel stopped by frequently at the start. Worried that something bad would happen but then realized with all the kids, Sato, and his cousin around Chozen couldn't really make any advances.

He actually really needed Johnny's help. And they worked well together with the kids. Though Daniel wasn't always happy to show up and find out the kids thought Chozen and Johnny were together.

Much to his later embarrassment he had gotten into an argument with a tween who called him a homewrecker and Daniel had to explain that Johnny lived with him not Chozen. That Johnny and Daniel loved each other and if anyone was a homewrecker or had the potential for it it was Chozen.

Louie had been there still wouldn't let him live it down.

He picked up the box with the engagement ring, and slid it onto Johnny's finger.

It'd taken so damn long.

He'd had that box in his desk for years. Waiting. And now it was there. On Johnny's finger where it belonged.

It was comforting, anchoring.

"Do you have any green carnations and dill?" Daniel asked, admiring the way the ring on Johnny's finger looked in the light.

Johnny laughed. "I do, but for your dictionary that's pretty forward."

"Lustful homosexual," Daniel said with a grin. "I think that's just a normal day."

Sometimes Daniel liked going through the Victorian dictionary because some of the options were fun. Sometimes it made him want to send Chozen a bouquet of Basil, Birdsfoot Trefoil, and Dame's Rocket. He'd never known that flowers could say 'I hate you, I will get my revenge, rival.'

But he didn't hate Chozen. Not really. Not any more.

But rival still fit.

"Do you like it Tesoro?" Daniel asked, running his thumb over the ring.

He'd spent weeks trying to find one that seemed like it fit. Something that Johnny would like. He kept getting distracted by actual wedding rings instead of the engagement ones. Kept looking at how gaudy some of them felt.

He wanted something pretty but simple and not likely to get dirt stuck in it. Because Johnny was always messing with dirt. Helping Mr. Miyagi at the bonsai shop next door. Or in their yard, or cleaning and fixing things.

Pretty, easy to clean, and it had to seem like something Johnny would wear.

He maybe had set the bar too high. Which is why he'd enlisted help. Throwing jewelers off as he pulled Bobby, Dutch, Jimmy and Tommy into store after store after store, asking them their opinions on ring after ring.

They had so many opinions. He thought they, as a group, were probably annoying to the jewelers.

But the guys talked about what rings were cool. What rings were too much.

"Get him the biggest rock you can find," Dutch said leaning over the glass looking at rings.

"I know for sure that's a no," Daniel had said. "Apparently they ruin sweaters."

"What sweaters does he care that much about? You guys live in California. Don't you wear his sweaters more then him?"

Daniel stepped back thoughtfully. Johnny had talked about Laura ruining a sweater. But he was a Californian. Sweaters weren't part of the usual dress in the Valley.

"Well we do go to the mountains at least once a year," Tommy said. "We all wear sweaters there."

“It’s not like those are sentimental though. I mean you can just buy a new one at the gift shop at the main lodge,” Jimmy said.

“What about those sweaters Nonnia made?” Bobby asked.

That was it.

He didn’t want to possibly ruin that handmade sweater.

“So no big rock so he doesn’t accidentally destroy Nonnia’s welcome to the family homemade sweater,” Dutch said looking at the rings. “I mean that’s fine. What kind of stone is he interested in?”

“He…said he liked the class ring rocks.”

Dutch burst out laughing. “Then just exchange class rings. Save yourself some dough.”

“I didn’t get one,” Daniel said.

“What? Why not?”

“Do you know how expensive those things are? Also they sent out the paperwork for them when you guys were still beating me up on the regular. Why would I want to ask my mom to buy me a school ring, which ridiculous as it is, for a school where I was tormented all the time?”

“Fair point,” Bobby said.

“Like you guys it makes sense, you went there for four years, had the whole school pride shit. You made friends and were in sports and clubs. But I didn’t like school until the last semester,” Daniel said walking over to the next case, away from the diamonds Johnny didn’t seem to like. “But if we had been dating at the time, if I had been able to afford one of those rings you can believe I would’ve traded rings with him like on the first date.”

“That’s the height of high school romance,” Jimmy said with a laugh.

“That and prom.”

“Was a bit busy trying to get him to notice me.”

“Oh believe me, he noticed you,” Dutch said.

“I was thinking of a sapphire,” Daniel said looking closer at the rings.

“Or an emerald. He said he liked blue and green.”

“This is also the guy who told you he liked the class rings,” Tommy said with a laugh.

“I don’t see any here that are his style,” Bobby said with a frown.

“That’s what I thought,” Daniel said with a sigh.

“Well there’s what? Fifty more of these shops?”

“Hundreds,” Jimmy said. “Actually, I have an idea.”

“Well spill,” Dutch said as they followed him out of the shop.

“Johnny went ring shopping with me and Jenny for our wedding. I mean we got bands, and not the engagement one, but I remember the shops he liked.”

“Why didn’t you lead with that?” Daniel asked.

“Because I thought you had ones you liked, but after ten shops I see you’re just sort of lost.”

“Yeah I’m lost. All I know for certain is that he doesn’t want a diamond. If I wasn’t lost I wouldn’t have brought all of you in.”

“And here I thought it was just because you loved us and missed us and wanted to spend some time and have us be a part of this process,” Dutch said, arm around Daniel’s shoulder.

“I-“ Daniel sighed as they headed to Dutch’s van. “I do, but…fine. Normally I think I’ve got the romantic stuff down. Like easy peasy. However. This whole process has made me wonder…or question… myself. You guys know Johnny best. You spent like 6 months trying to help him get a date with me. So, if the roles were switched, if you were helping me…be as romantic as possible and get that across to Johnny…How’d you go about it?”

“I’m not sure we could top you on romantic gestures,” Tommy said. “I mean you’ve been doing so much. The Firebird for one.”

“The guitar, magic kit, surfboard.” Dutch added as he drove.

“He fucking loves that book light you got him,” Bobby said.

“Maybe build him a reading nook or library in that house of yours?”

Jimmy said.

“That is a good idea,” Daniel said.

“Don’t sound so surprised. You guys slept in the same bed for the first time because of me,” Jimmy said.

“Take him on more trips,” Dutch said.

“More trips?”

“The guy…likes dates. Right? Like I don’t know, as a fellow super lonely kid…with a lonely home…he likes just spending time with people. Like that’s why he’s always volunteering to help people. Or at least why I think he does. It’s why he like comes to hang out with us all the time. Do some karate with him more often, if you’re feeling up to it.”

“Dutch is right. Johnny just really likes spending time with you,” Bobby said.

“But I want to keep doing big romantic gestures. And I’m stuck. Like I know I can’t ask him now, but how do I ask him later?”

Tommy turned towards Daniel, looking back at him, sitting in the backseat by himself.

“Daniel, Johnny won’t be able to handle a big deal engagement. Some people love that stuff. My aunt and uncle had a big engagement in front of a lot of people. Like the pop the question thing in front of a crowd where people applaud. But Johnny…he’s still learning to like himself. If you want him to ask you, then he will pull out all the stops. But I think if you want to ask him…maybe just get him flowers.”

“Get him flowers?” Daniel repeated with a frown.

“Listen. The guy gives flowers to everyone, but rarely gets them himself right? Like he made for Ali the most ornate bouquets every Valentine’s Day and I’ve seen the flowers in your apartments and home. Hell the flowers he got us when we graduated were stunning. But no one every returns that feeling. Not on the same level you know?” Tommy said.

“Tommy, did anyone ever tell you you’re a genius?” Daniel asked.

Tommy grinned. “Not recently no.”

It'd been the second shop they'd gone into from Jimmy's list of places Johnny had taken him and Jenny where Daniel had found the ring. Gold with emeralds, all twisted up to look like leaves. There were some diamonds because apparently everything had those, but they were small and not likely to get caught on anything.

He'd found a few that he'd liked, but that's the one that felt right. He'd just wanted to get Laura's opinion before he made the purchase and she'd smiled, ruffled his hair and said, "You're the one who wants to marry him. What one do you see helping you facilitate that question?"

A stamp of approval mixed with a non-answer.

Daniel had been elated and also frustrated.

But it looked perfect on Johnny's finger. He'd borrowed Johnny's high school graduation ring to get the ring size. It'd been a lot of work, and nerve wracking but he loved looking at it.

He kept it in the office after, he worried not that Johnny would find it, since he didn't snoop but that Louie would, or his ma. He loved them both, but LaRusso's talked a mile a minute and the possibility of accidentally letting it slip was too high.

"I do, I love it. Do you want to see yours?" Johnny asked.

Daniel laughed and held out his left hand. "Yes."

Johnny handed him the box. "Do you remember that time in Newark where your grandparents, mom and I went to New York City?"

"Yeah, there was some flower thing."

"The Macy's flower show," Johnny said.

"Right that. What about it?"

"Well the first year we went your grandparents asked me point blank if I wanted to marry you."

Johnny's face was a little pink and Daniel could only imagine. Johnny nervous being asked to go do something he wanted to do but hadn't been able to ask. But Daniel's grandparents wanted to make him feel included. And then finding out it was also an excuse, jut to be asked where he saw the relationship going. Johnny had probably turned as red as one of the roses on display.

That had been so long ago.

Daniel remembered offering to go with but his mother told him that Johnny watched over the baby LaRusso cousins so much he deserved a day off.

And Daniel remembered agreeing, but then when he got elbow deep in macaroni art and glitter did he remember there were a ton of other adult LaRusso's not helping out that could've chipped in and it didn't have to be exclusively either Daniel or Johnny on babysitting duty.

He remembered being so pissed about it.

He'd wanted to go see the flowers with Johnny, to hear what Johnny thought of them, to point at something pretty and for Johnny to tell him exactly what it was.

"I said, as soon as I could legally I wanted to ask you. And they hadn't understood that exactly, so I explained that it wasn't taxes, not really, but the ability to be by your side for that very specific part of the marriage vows. In sickness and health. The good times and bad. Legally I can't—couldn't."

Johnny tapped the box with his index finger. "I can get you something else if you don't like this."

"Can I open it?" Daniel asked looking at him amused.

"Yes, of course."

Daniel flipped open the box.

He looked up at Johnny eyes wide.

Johnny carefully removed the ring from the box.

"So I was told that when your grandparents left Italy there wasn't a lot they could bring with them. They had to be very careful of what they brought and they didn't have a ton of money. Just enough to get to Newark. But this, apparently is the LaRusso ring. Passed down from generation to generation. And I asked if they were sure, because I could buy you a ring and you've got so many cousins. But they were very very adamant.

“It was supposed to go to your father, but apparently he beat them to it. Asking your mother to marry him before they got a chance to give it to him to give her. So either way, eventually, it was supposed to be yours. And so they gave me the honor of getting to give it to you, along with a promise to stay by your side through all the good times and the bad, in sickness and in health, if you’ll have me.”

Daniel held out his hand, it trembled more than he’d expected. He remembered that ring, he remembered the stories. He remembered sitting next to his Nonnia and Nonno as they told the story over and over and over again.

He couldn’t believe they’d given it to Johnny for him.

Johnny reached up and cupped the sides of his face, scooting his chair in closer and rubbing his thumbs over Daniel’s cheeks.

“I already asked you,” Daniel said. “I asked you first.”

Johnny laughed softly, kissing him. “And I love it. And I’m hoping these are happy tears, or else I’m more than happy to get you something more modern if you’d like.”

“No, this is perfect. I’m just surprised,” Daniel said with a sniff.

Johnny wrapped his arms around Daniel’s waist and pulled him off the counter and onto his lap kissing his tear stained cheeks.

Daniel rolled around feeling for Johnny but he wasn't there. He pushed himself up grumpily looking around their hotel room. That had been some of his best work. Or at least he thought so. And it'd sounded like it. Maybe he was in the bathroom. Nope, no light on.

He kept looking.

Johnny was sitting on the balcony in a hotel robe.

Daniel laid on his side.

Johnny.

His Tesoro.

Sitting outside on the balcony in the hotel robe that if he was a betting man he bet was barely tied.

How he'd gotten up Daniel didn't know. He'd expected, he'd thought he'd done such a good job that Johnny would sleep through their plans in the morning, or ask to in that sleepy raspy voice he got that Daniel could never refuse, to postpone their plans.

Johnny was going to hate him.

He couldn't stop thinking about it.

Johnny was going to be pissed.

Ma was going to be pissed.

He'd been trying to think of how to bring it up and he hadn't wanted to ruin the festivities, but now he feared that he'd ruin their trip if he didn't say anything.

Now he supposed was better than never.

He looked around for something to wear, grabbing Johnny's shirt off the ground— ah right, he'd ripped this one off, buttons were gone.

He sighed, well he could ask the front desk for a sewing kit and fix it later.

If he could find all the buttons.

There had to be another robe.

Where had Johnny found that one?

Closet?

Aha, fluffy white robe.

Nice.

He carefully tied the sash and stuck on a pair of slippers and walked to the balcony pushing the door open and listening to the sounds of the city.

"Hey," Daniel said putting his hands on Johnny’s shoulders and sliding them down Johnny's chest. "What are you up to out here by yourself? Post cards?"

"Yeah, I thought it'd be good to get started."

Daniel picked one up.

"Seriously? Chozen?"

"He's babysitting our bonsai and running the dojo by himself which means dealing with Louie and he's helping Mr. Miyagi. That deserves a post card at least."

Daniel sighed setting it back down.

"There's something I've been meaning to tell you and you're going to hate me," Daniel said.

"Never."

Daniel slumped in the other chair looking out at the city lights.

"I've been thinking about this for a while, and I think I made a mistake, and it means I wasted all this time and you're going to be pissed."

Johnny's eyes widened a little, every so slightly, a look of panic.

"What's it about?" he asked. "What's it effect?"

"Everything."

"Rip the band-aid off."

"I don't know how to," Daniel groaned scrubbing at his face with his hands. "I wanted to tell you before but I didn't want to ruin things and well now I don't want to ruin the trip and I fear I won't stop thinking about it and I gotta tell you so—"

"Daniel."

Right.

He heard himself.

He was spiraling and he was one wrong step from taking Johnny with him.

He reached out taking Johnny's hand in his.

"I love you very much."

"Daniel."

"I've been trying to think about what I want out of life. I've got a nice house, a hot husband, who I realize I'm freaking out—"

He took a deep breath.

He'd just come out and say it and then he'd explain everything.

"I don't want to work at the dealership any more."

Johnny blinked. He pulled his hand out of Daniel's and Daniel frowned. Johnny grabbed the side of his chair and pulled him closer.

"Okay," Johnny said slowly, hooking his leg around Daniel's and holding out his hand. "Why would I hate you for that?"

Daniel took the hand again and held it tight. He took another deep breath.

"Let me explain the whole thing. I...you saw Ma's car right? The one that got us all the way here? I got so embarrassed with that thing. Ma drove me to dates in that thing and we had to get out and push and it was just...not how you want a date to go. But she couldn't afford a new car or a nicer one. And you...you lived in your families car. You and your mom. I'd never thought that sometimes people live in their cars. That that becomes their home and that's all they've got. It made me look at cars differently and I got so much joy out of working on cars with Mr. Miyagi. I wanted to combine all of that.

“I wanted to get this job where I could fix cars on the cheap for people who needed it, while also figuring out how to give people the best deals so that people who couldn't normally afford a car could. To help give them that joy of a first car. I wanted, if I couldn't help people get homes, to make sure they at least got the best shot at a comfortable car. And then I made that dream happen fast. Like it only took a year after college to get that dealership set up and not long for it to be successful. And I've got a home, a hot husband and a dealership. But I sat in my dealership and felt the same way I did in business school and at my apprenticeship. I like the people, I like my staff, I like what I do. But I don't want to be there. Maybe it's the grass is greener. But I don't see myself being happy there long term. Not alone."

Daniel looked up at Johnny, he wasn't sure what look he'd been expecting, but it wasn't the look he recognized.

The look he'd seen a thousand times of Johnny actively listening to him.

Not mad. Not pissed. He'd expected that, both, for Johnny to be upset and unhappy.

He wavered.

"I think if I wasn't alone at the dealership that'd be fine. But I miss being with you. I miss the smell of the dirt and soil. When I get home and you haven't showered yet and still smell like the shop, like flowers, I want to bottle that up. I don't want to sell LaRusso Auto, but I don't want to go into the office any more. I'm planning to step back. I still want to cut prices and give people what they want...but I don't think office life is for me."

"I thought part of the reason you left was because you couldn't handle being next to me at Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees."

Daniel gently rubbed his thumbs over the back of Johnny's hand. He reached out and took Johnny's left hand and kissed his ring finger, that ring he'd agonized over for months picking out that he held onto for years, waiting, half tempted to cave and just give it to him before anything could happen. The wedding band that matched his that they'd picked out together.

"Well that's why it's not Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees, and it's not helping you at the flower shop."

Johnny leaned forward kissing him gently. "You can do anything you want. You can come and go as often as you please and it won't bother me. You can go to college again, pick another degree to pursue, you can change your mind a thousand times, all I need is you."

"You don't mind? Me leaving another business? After everything? After betting on me?"

"Not at all."

Daniel felt the tension in his shoulders release and pressed his forehead against Johnny's hand that he held in his own.

"I just...It feels so irresponsible to create these places and keep leaving them. And it's not like I want to go back to Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees."

"So what happens now?"

“You know all the photos I’ve been taking?”

“The scrapbooks?”

Daniel laughed softly. “Yes and no. I’ve actually been working with Tommy’s aunt, and those contacts we made in Okinawa. Apparently I’m pretty good at taking pictures, and there’s more flexibility in my schedule with photography. I’d be out, moving around. And I think I need that. I don’t think I can stay cooped up inside sitting at a desk or in conferences all the time.”

“Isn’t patience and being still part of taking a photo? The right photo? Let alone when you develop it?”

“Yes, but I can be patient and still when I’ve got a goal in mind. But this will free my schedule up a bit. I can help Mr. Miyagi in the shop if I want to, or I can swing by one of the dojo’s and train with you or watch you train or I can help out at the flower shop.”

“Is this because of those weeks were your staff got food poisoning and I came in and worked the front desk?”

“You were the hottest secretary I ever had on payroll.”

“And one big HR violation.”

“More than one,” Daniel said with a grin.

It’d been fun to have Johnny at LaRusso Auto. Putting him in a nice snug fitting suit, watching him help the mechanics team, or walking around the floor talking to customers.

He was good at it. And if Johnny had wanted to work there he’d have hired him in a heartbeat.

He looked good in the lighting and out on the lot. He sold a lot of cars, he made a lot of repairs.

He even fixed things that his repair guy hadn’t been able to get to yet.

But he was also so distracting. Daniel couldn’t take his eyes off of him. He’d spot Johnny out of his peripheral and he’d want to go over and talk to him, to put his arms around Johnny and hold his hand.

He wanted to be a part of the conversations Johnny was having.

Louie, one of the few on his team who hadn’t gotten food poisoning because he'd been at the dojo instead, had to keep slapping Daniel's shoulder, joining his conversations and redirecting the focus back to work.

You're going to lose customers cuz. You're practically drooling. Focus.

And he did.

He'd focus until Johnny dropped something and would go to pick it up and then he was lost again until he reached a boiling point and during a break or during lunch he'd invite Johnny into his office to make out like horny teenagers. And often, more.

He thought he'd matured. He thought he'd gotten a better handle on things, but after a couple weeks of staying late to go over paperwork only to end up either on the floor under his desk in a tangle of sweaty limbs or with Johnny on his desk he realized there really was a reason he left Mr. Miyagi's Little Trees. And no matter how much he missed it it would take months at best to get it all out of his system.

But he did feel like he owed Johnny sometime at the flower shop. Because Johnny always worked for him, always helped when he needed it. And every time it came time to pay Johnny he'd ask to be paid in kisses.

Ridiculous.

Loveable.

Daniel was so deep in debt.

"So the plan is that I step back. Louie can run the place now. He's got the degrees, I've taught him everything I know. Which I can't believe. I can't believe he's mature enough to take care of the LaRusso Auto on his own now."

"I would not have agreed with you if it was when I first met him," Johnny said. "But Chozen's really worked so damn hard on getting Louie to focus and be responsible."

Daniel sighed getting out of his chair and moving to sit on Johnny's lap.

"I never thought I'd be grateful to Chozen. Okay yes, I see the look, beyond the initial comes to the Valley and gets rid of Cobra Kai and getting Miyagi-do up and running."

"You do know he wants Louie to lead one of the other branches right?" Johnny said. "Like you might have to fight Chozen for Louie."

Daniel laughed. "That's a thought huh? How time intensive is it? Really? Running your own dojo? Huh Sensei Lawrence?" Daniel hooked an arm around Johnny's shoulders, leaning in close.

"Chozen puts his all into it."

"Yeah. I know. And I know you've put a lot of hours into it too, Mr. co-sensei," Daniel said trailing his hand down Johnny's chest pushing the side of the robe open. "Ah, they seem a little swollen still."

"Yeah well whose fault is that?"

Daniel brushed his thumb over Johnny's nipple and felt the tremor run through him.

"There is something else I do appreciate Chozen for."

"What?" Johnny asked looking amused.

"He got you in your gi again. And he picked arguably the best cut of a gi for you."

"How so?"

"It shows your arms, and sometimes when your sparring there's just a little bit of this," Daniel said swiping his thumb.

Johnny shivered.

"A bonus is if there's time in my schedule, since it's flexible, I could come watch you teach, in your gi, and watch the beautiful little game of peekaboo that happens."

"Well now I know why Chozen won't let you spar with me as an example to the class anymore. I didn't realize you were ogling me the whole time."

"It's a good thing parents aren't allowed to stay and watch."

"Maybe you shouldn't be allowed to stay and watch. I'm not just a piece of meat," Johnny said.

"I know," Daniel said. "Can I kiss you now?"

"Yeah," Johnny said leaning forward and kissing him.

"Why'd you pick sitting out here all scantly clad?" Daniel asked. "You couldn't sleep?"

Johnny looked past him at the cramped buildings and the mountains in the distance lit up in lights. "I wanted to enjoy being here and to think."

"Yeah, happy with your choice?"

Johnny smiled at him. "Very happy," he said kissing Daniel's nose and wrapping his arms around Daniel's waist. "You?"

"Delighted. Ready to have cake for breakfast?"

"Seriously?"

"Oh so serious. Chocolate tarts for breakfast."

Johnny laughed softly.

Daniel kissed him again, running his warm hand under the side of the robe, rolling his thumb over Johnny's nipple again.

Johnny moaned into the kiss, hands tight on Daniel's waist.

"Still sensitive?" Daniel asked innocently pulling away.

"It's been only like a half hour."

"That's it?"

"Yes. How you oscillate so quickly from crisis to horny is...a real gift."

Daniel grinned. "Maybe I should get my poor dear husband some ice huh? Think that will help? Or maybe you need a distraction?" Daniel asked hand running down Johnny's abdomen, letting Johnny's robe fallen open as he did so. He carefully pressed a foot against Johnny's thigh, nudging it aside and away from him. "I bet it'd be even easier now."

"What?" Johnny asked looking at him amused, lifting up his leg so it was propped up on the other chair.

"Well you're awake, I'm awake, we're supposed to stay up for at least, what, another hour or two so the jet lag isn't that bad. And I already did all the prepping earlier. You said what it'd only been a half hour? I bet, you're still...prepared."

"Why are you saying it like that? Are you seriously suggesting that we spend what? 2 more hours doing this? Do you realize how many times we already—"

"Hey we've got records to beat. Couple of champions like us."

Johnny snorted a laugh rolling his eyes and Daniel kissed along his jaw, pushing him back a little and sliding a finger inside. Easy.

"See?" he asked, adding another. "I bet I could slide right in."

"I've already...taken 2 baths. I don't want to take a third."

"I'll help," Daniel said, curling three fingers in a way that made Johnny's chest arch in the dim light.

"You'll help?" Johnny repeated liked he'd heard a joke.

"I worked very hard earlier, and budgeted for a lot more kissing this evening. Besides, you're already interested," Daniel said gently poking Johnny's dick.

"It's your fault if we miss our tour tomorrow," Johnny said, leaning forward to kiss him. “Plus we’re supposed to visit your cousins and great aunts and uncles and family”

"Yes yes and I'll fix your shirt," Daniel said sliding off of Johnny's lap. "So how about we move this somewhere a little easier? Maybe the table?"

"I'm not having sex over the postcards."

"I feel like we should. I mean isn't it the whole point of a honeymoon? Isn't it what everyone knows a honeymoon is? I mean you know that essentially it's a vacation to have a whole bunch of sex. Right? It's literally a vacation celebrating the party you had for saying you like someone."

Johnny frowned.

"No."

"No? Johnny."

"It's not like, it's love Daniel. There's a difference. I like corn nuts, I like muscle cars and I like reading, I like flowers, but I love you. The difference between those levels is vast, the gap is huge. Marriage isn't a light thing."

"I know and I love you," he said kissing Johnny's cheek and reaching out to take Johnny's hand in his again. "And I know you want to go sightseeing, you want to go to Pompeii and look around. I mean I do too. I want to go around and see everything with you. But I also want to enjoy every second I can consummating this marriage."

"You're going to use that phrase as often as you can huh?"

"Yes."

Married.

It'd been a whirlwind after he'd asked Johnny and Johnny had asked him. Cake tasting, though Johnny liked the coconut caramel cake Daniel had had in mind all along, outfit fittings, location choices, picking a date, sending out invites. There were so many little tiny details that Daniel hadn't been aware of that Johnny knew. Like napkins and cutlery and having to pick all of that. Little tiny details.

Daniel thought Johnny wouldn't have cared. That he would've gotten frustrated after looking at the fifteenth cream colored napkin, but he didn't.

He actually spent time and care on every step of the way. And he worked with Daniel's schedule, bringing him things to look at and discuss over lunch at the dealership.

It was heartwarming to watch him open up the booklets and discuss patterns and colors and themes. He looked…so happy. Possibly happier then when he'd designed and opened the flower shop.

A lot of it had been easy. They had already done a lot of deciding what colors and patterns and fabrics they liked when setting up their house. They'd both already thought about weddings, specifically their wedding.

They knew who they were inviting and where they'd all sit.

The hardest part was their party. Who was best man for who?

They kept trying to divvy up their friends. Who'd stand on which side, who'd be in charge of something or other for who.

And it just didn't work.

Bobby was easy. He wanted to officiate. Threatened to battle any other person they thought of having that spot.

But everyone else…not easy.

After deciding maybe to write everyone's name on Popsicle sticks and draw them randomly they looked at one another, at the seriousness of the situation and burst out laughing. They ended up laying side by side in the garden looking at clouds passing overhead.

"Who'd have guessed this would be the hardest part?"

"I feel like a divorced parent."

"I don't think we can ask them to choose either."

"Oh hell no, if they don't all pick me then my feelings will be hurt."

Johnny had laughed and Daniel had rolled over towards him, there was a nice breeze. "I'd also be upset if they didn't all pick you," he said leaning down to kiss Johnny. "So, what can we do?"

Johnny frowned thoughtfully, moving to pull Daniel down into his arms. "Do you want a bachelors party?"

"Not really. I'd rather an engagement party," Daniel said. "How about you?"

"I feel like I already got to do that with the guys for Jimmy's wedding."

"Yeah."

"Do you think we could just make…one party?"

"Like they're all together rather than on one side or another?"

"I like it."

"So then we just got to tell them to divide responsibilities themselves."

"Maybe we could put Bobby in charge of them. He still has that booklet of stickers right?"

"Yeah. He does. So Bobby's in charge of Tommy, Jimmy, Dutch, Louie, Kumiko and Jessica?"

"Yup."

"That means being in charge of paying the staff at the end of the night, rings, getting us to where we need to be when we need to be there."

"I think they can handle all of that. I mean they did spend 6 months trying to get us together."

"And failing. Mr. Miyagi's the one who truly got us together."

"Or you and a storm got us together," Daniel said kissing his nose. "Sure you don't want to just elope?"

Johnny had frowned, rolling them over, "No. I don't want to run away with you. I want to stay. I want to tell everyone we know and love that I love you the best. Plus I'm pretty sure our friends and family would be pissed. The guys have been invested, I mean Tommy and Jimmy worked very hard to get this to happen."

Daniel knew Johnny was right.

The guys had always had their back. And Tommy and Jimmy had worked tirelessly to make sure Johnny and Daniel could get married.

He knew his grandparents would be upset if there wasn't a big wedding, his mother, Laura, their friends would all be upset.

But he liked the idea of just whisking Johnny away to some small place in the middle of nowhere, signing the documents, kissing and then finding some nice hotel to honeymoon in for like a month. He liked the idea of doing it ASAP. Before anything got in the way, before someone higher up in government thought wait a second what's this?

The way Johnny looked at him, so fiercely determined that it would happen, that it didn't need to be rushed, that they could take their time, it was trust. Trust that Daniel wasn't going anywhere, that when the guys told them they had the green light that it wouldn't disappear, that they deserved to celebrate years, decades together.

That he truly wanted to unabashedly tell everyone they knew, who was probably sick of hearing it, that he loved Daniel.

It was overwhelming in the best way. And maybe it took them longer than expected to make decisions because they kept having moments, like that one in the garden, where they made a decision and then got caught up in the moment, in each other. In a hurry to get out of clothes and to touch and kiss and be together. To wrap his arms and legs around Johnny in the garden and to enjoy the heat of his gaze and the feel of him. Enjoying the view of him above him, to touch wherever he wanted, happy they didn't have neighbors, that Johnny had designed the garden for extra privacy.

The engagement party had been fun, the guys didn't complain too much about the lack of a party of debauchery, the girls were more bummed then the guys were, except Louie.

Louie was pretty disappointed. So he'd gone with Jessica, Jenny, Kumiko, and Ali out only to return covered in glitter and saying he hadn't known what he'd expected but it hadn't been that. And he refused to tell Daniel where they'd gone.

He wasn't upset, or scarred, he seemed fine just still processing something.

The worst part of it was they were very adamant that Johnny and Daniel couldn't sleep together or see each other before the wedding. Some arbitrary 24 hour rule.

Daniel got the whale shark.

Johnny got the guys. Mostly, apparently, because Daniel complained about sharing a bed with them and Johnny didn't. Not as much anyway. And also because Daniel had protested that Johnny didn't sleep well by himself and Dutch had patted his shoulders and said, "Then we'll stay with him."

His plan had backfired. He'd wanted to spend time with Johnny before the wedding. To tease him about sex before marriage and being naughty and how tomorrow they'd be married and watching Johnny's face to run red, and his neck, and his ears and ask him if he knew that the honeymoon was this but more. If he was ready for their sex vacation.

But instead he found himself hanging out with Mr. Miyagi. It soothed the frustration he felt, spending part of his night playing cards with his family, with Mr. Miyagi, Yukie, and Sato.

He expected to be bored his final 24 hours unmarried. But to his surprise he spent most of it crying.

Not because he wasn't excited, or because he was getting cold feet. But because everyone kept coming to sit with him and have heart to hearts.

Ali who held his hands at the fancy hotel courtyard by the fountain talking about the past and how proud she was of him growing as a person, reminiscing. He'd talked with Kumiko, Louie, the guys, hell they had to sit down with Bobby a couple of times leading up to the wedding to talk about their relationship and the future.

Daniel might've made the entire process a little more uncomfortable by telling Bobby they had a plenty adventurous sex life and learned that the ruby glass container they used to keep ideas, was worth a small fortune. And he might've scandalized Johnny by letting Bobby look in the jar and read a few that were maybe a bit more detailed because Daniel had gotten bored at work and maybe added a few extra explicit things to the jar.

But it was really sitting with his mom and his Nonnio and Nonnia the night before the wedding that had knocked the air from his lungs. The fact that instead of four there should have been five of them. The way his mom had hugged him, the quiet, "He'd be so happy for you. He'd have loved Johnny you know? Loved how the two of you are together. Supportive and loving."

The way his grandparents held his hands and Nonnio had said with his voice cracking, "He wanted to be there for everything you know? Learning to drive, first date, first breakup, first job, all the good times and the bad. He loved you very much and he tried so hard to stay around as long as he could. But, all he wanted was what any parent wants, for you to be happy. And you are, right?"

"With Johnny? Very," Daniel had said brushing tears from his eyes.

"He loved weddings. And he'd love this one. All the hard work you two put in. All the people who came to see you. Like that girl and that woman that I thought you hated."

"I don't hate them!" Daniel said. "I just…she spent the summer one year and said she was Mr. Miyagi's best student and thus his favorite because he took her to prom and we started arguing about how I knew all of Mr. Miyagi's teachings and she said she did. And we sparred and it was like almost even. Like frustratingly even because apparently she'd been studying since she was little without realizing it and then she wanted to spar against Johnny, but then ended up teaching us something we didn't know."

"You didn't tell your grandparents this one?" his mom asked with a giggle.

"No, he didn't. So what special skill did she know that you two hadn't? I thought you both knew all of Mr. Miyagi's lessons?" Nonnia asked.

Daniel rubbed his face and sighed leaning back in his chair. "She tricked us. I mean she didn't know we were together, but she led us through this sparing style and then burst out giggling because it was the karate version of a waltz. And Mr. Miyagi came home right at that time and he laughed and said she'd become a good sensei too."

"So if you're annoyed with her then why'd you invite her?"

"She's like a little sister. Ever since Mr. Miyagi went to Boston, she's like my karate sibling. And she's got like the same bad luck as me and Johnny said she's just as stubborn and hot headed. She kind of reminds me of Louie, like when he first came to LA, or me. I don't hate her. And her grandma is nice. Plus like we kind of got our revenge. Twice. Once Johnny realized we were dancing, we actually started dancing. And she wasn't expecting that. And it was a lot of fun because Julie had started playing music. It was just nice to dance in Mr. Miyagi's garden, we hadn't done that in a while. And he kissed me and she was so shocked that it was delightful. And then we drove her to the dojo where she learned that she doesn't know all of the Miyagi secret fighting and it was just kind of fun to see her annoy Chozen."

When his grandparents had gone to bed he'd gone to spend time with Mr. Miyagi because he and Sato were still up drinking. Chatting away and laughing. Sato threw an arm around him as soon as he got close, pulling him to sit with them, grabbing a glass from nearby and passing it to Daniel, filling it up.

"Congratulations. Tomorrow, married."

"Yes, oh, thank you."

"Long over due step."

Daniel laughed softly. "Very."

Sato held out his glass and Mr. Miyagi held out his. “Italian cheers?”

“Cin Cin” Daniel said tapping their glasses.

“Cin Cin,” Mr. Miyagi and Sato said.

“Nariyoshi-san go to Italy,” Sato said. “Remember Cin Cin?”

“Not many Cin Cin with US military. Miyagi with Japanese and Americans. Say Kanpai or Cheers.”

Sato nodded, patting Daniel’s back a little drunkenly. “Daniel-san, love…precious. Like living thing. Like Nariyoshi-sans trees. Must be cared for. Like tree need nutrients and attention. Unlike tree…need communication. Right, Nariyoshi-san?”

“Hai. Miyagi hope Johnny-san and Daniel-san’s love live long time. Like old old tree. Growing, changing, but together. Miyagi know…big events, life events, miss father. But hope Daniel-san know, not alone. Sometimes Daniel-san make Miyagi feel like,” Mr. Miyagi said something in Okinawan and Sato nodded.

“I didn’t quite catch that,” Daniel said softly. It wasn’t the Japanese he’d studied or the bits of Okinawan he knew.

“Nariyoshi-san thinks of you, like son. Feels honored. Dear friend, cannot replace Daniel-san’s father, like Daniel-san cannot replace Nariyoshi-san’s son. But…hmmm…watching Johnny-san and Daniel-san learn and grow and become…”

“Men. Good men,” Mr. Miyagi said patting Daniel’s shoulder. “Miyagi very proud of Daniel-san.”

Mr. Miyagi’s eyes had been glassy, teary and Daniel’s had too. His throat scratchy as he sniffed and took another drink. He learned to cheers in Okinawan “Karii, and taught them the wedding cheers in Italian Per Cent’anni.”

Sleeping alone had been weird. The drinking had been helpful. All the tears had exhausted him. Sitting with those two and talking and crying. Louie eventually found him and shoo’d him off to bed, though he sat and chatted with Daniel for a bit.

Confused, actually seriously confused at how Chozen seemed vastly uncomfortable surrounded by so many LaRussos which had left Daniel grinning and laughing unable to explain it to Louie before he fell fast asleep.

Only to be woken up by the guys bursting into his room and bouncing on his bed like toddlers.

He'd been free from them for one glorious night, the trade off was he also hadn't had Johnny and now, suddenly he regretted sharing them as their party. If he'd just taken the girls as his best ladies he'd not have been woken up in such a manner. Muttering curses under his breath as they talked about breakfast.

Hungover, just ever so slightly in a way he wouldn't have been a decade ago, cursing age and wondering how Sato and Mr. Miyagi could handle all that drinking and still get up in the morning. Maybe Yukie knew some secret hangover cure.

"Come on Daniel. You can't be all doom and gloom today. You're getting married," Jimmy said. "It's not allowed."

"Yeah you can't back out now. Do you know how many letters I wrote? Even from Korea?" Dutch said.

"You keep mentioning letters. What letters?" Bobby asked.

"The sooner you're up and ready the sooner you get to see Johnny," Tommy said softly.

"Why is it always you four standing between us?" Daniel complained throwing his arm over his eyes to block out the light as Bobby pulled open the curtains. "I know Johnny liked Pride and Prejudice but it always feels like I'm trying to court someone whose not allowed out without four people to make sure I don't do anything untoward."

"Oooh fancy words for someone who looks mighty hungover. That bodes well for the ceremony," Jimmy said.

"Yeah I'd rather you not pass out during it," Bobby said.

"How is Johnny?" Daniel asked. "Did he sleep okay?"

The silence was disturbing and Daniel moved his arm off from over his eyes to look at them.

"Is he okay?" He asked sitting up. "Did you give him too much to drink or do something stupid?"

"Hey!" Dutch said with fake hurt, hand to his chest. "I'll have you know Johnny didn't drink anything. We followed him around all night. He chatted with Mr. Miyagi, Sato, and Yukie. Sat with his mom by the pool for a bit. Held his Abuela's hands and listened to her. Then went to bed with a good book."

"Then why didn't you just say he's fine?"

"Well he didn't sleep super well."

"What do you mean? Was he…did he change his mind?"

"Woah," Bobby said. "No way. He just kept talking. And the quietness was whether or not we tell you."

"Well you freaked me out."

Tommy sat down next to him wrapping an arm around his shoulders and resting his head on Daniel's nearest shoulder. "He spent most of the night talking about you okay? How it was weird not having you there, talking about the last time you two spent a long time apart where you didn't even call was when he went hiking. And then Bobby talked to us about that. And how everything felt too quiet. Like he was whispering you know? The way kids do at sleepovers when it's after lights out or whatever?"

"He talked about the honeymoon you two planned. About how much it means."

"I think…" Bobby said picking up the whale shark and holding it in his lap. "You know how when you've got something excited coming up and you can't sleep?

"Yeah," Daniel said

"It was more of that."

"So, how about, we get you up, dressed and to breakfast?"

"How's that going to work?" Daniel asked.

"What do you mean?"

"There's only one place in the hotel to eat. No way to avoid seeing him and you guys have been trying so hard to make sure I don't."

"Ah, well Louie, Jessica and Kumiko grabbed Johnny for breakfast already. He's eating with his mom and Mr. Miyagi and that crew.

They've driven off to a restaurant. You, however, are eating here, and I believe all the LaRussos are ready and waiting to talk our ears off."

"Oh I'm ready for that," Dutch said with a grin.

"Chozen however was not. I saw him talking to your cousins I think and he looked so lost and overwhelmed because then an aunt started talking to him," Tommy said.

"Did you go rescue him?"

"Yeah. Learned that there's a fancy bar that around 3pm serves tea. So we disappeared to have tea. Though it was high tea, which he hadn't had before and puzzled over the tiny sandwiches for a bit. He's grateful to be off with only one LaRusso at that breakfast."

"So ready to start your day? Or you still want to lay in bed and mutter curses at us?" Jimmy asked.

"I mean you can. If that's what you'd rather do, we're pretty good at cursing right back," Dutch said with a grin.

Daniel sighed. "You're right. The sooner I'm up the sooner we can get moving, the sooner I can see Johnny, marry him, and be far far away from all of you, for two glorious weeks."

"You do realize that a honeymoon isn't just sex right?" Bobby said.

Daniel got up and headed towards the bathroom to get ready.

"Right Daniel?" Bobby called again. "It's a chance to get to spend time alone together before your future, and to talk about things. It's not just two weeks of nothing but sex."

Daniel could hear Dutch laughing.

"Ah leave the guy alone he's probably decided it's just 2 weeks of 99% sex interspersed with the occasional sightseeing," Dutch said.

"Bobby it'll be fine, they were already living together. They've got a house after all, and they've already been having sex. You don't need to give those spiels you give old fashioned couples."

Bobby sighed. "I know. Out of all the couples I've married, shut up Dutch that's how you say it, Johnny and Daniel know each other best, and have been together the longest, but I still want…I take my job seriously okay?"

“We know Pops,” Dutch said. “And I find it fun that you went from orgies to marrying multiple couples every chance you got. It’s fitting.”

Daniel heard laughter as he pushed the door open again, dressed for breakfast and ready to go. There was something comforting from them. Something pleasant about the dorky applause he received for just getting dressed.

He never could be mad at them for very long. He was glad they were there. That he had them in his life, to cheer him on for the big things and the small.

Daniel looked down at Johnny, breathing heavily. Daniel had taken the postcards and thrown them through the open door into the room before they’d started.

“You okay?”

“Yes. But that’s the last round for tonight. I still want to go to Pompeii.”

Daniel laughed softly kissing Johnny. “Time for bed.”

“Yeah if we can move.”

“We’re not that old yet.”

“Daniel, less than 48 hours ago we got married, we danced for hours and hours and hours, and then we got on a 14 hour flight to Naples because we decided we wanted to start by marking Pompeii off the to do list and because your grandparents said the food in this area is amazing. So I’m not old…well it depends on the day if I feel old, but I am tired.”

“You’re the one who got out of bed to write postcards.”

“Because I had energy to write. Now I’ve got no energy. Zero.”

“My poor Tesoro ,” Daniel said kissing his nose and grinning at that face Johnny made.

“Could you stop moving like that?”

“You do know one of the parts about being married is…what did Bobby say, of one mind, body, and soul?”

“I don’t think that’s meant to be literal.”

Daniel pouted, exaggerated, but carefully took Johnny’s hand in his, lacing their fingers.

“I almost can’t believe we’re here.”

“Naples?”

“Married and in Naples.”

Johnny smiled softly. “I can’t believe you’re still awake and functioning. I took breaks from dancing and you kept dancing and drinking.”

“Everyone wanted to wish us well,” Daniel said.

“Did you enjoy it?”

“The wedding or the sex?” Daniel asked with a faux bewildered look.

“The wedding.”

“I loved it. I loved the flowers. I know you made the boutonnières. Red roses for love, ivy, myrtle and…what was the other one?”

“Dahlia. It’s for commitment and eternal love.”

“I gave mine to Ma to press.”

“She came to get mine too, afterwards,” Johnny said.

“Johnny, it was beautiful. I loved everything. Even Dutch dumping out all the letters he wrote to his representatives since you told him you liked me. That was cute.”

Johnny flushed red. “I can’t believe he did that.”

It’d been a little surprising. Dutch in his suit, assisted by Jessica in the bridesmaid dress her and Kumiko had coordinated, carrying a big bag and depositing it right in front of them before giving his speech.

“Johnny told me…or I suppose we guessed, that he liked Daniel in the winter of 1985. That was of course, right off the heels of Daniel kicking his ass at the All-Valley. He asked us to leave Daniel alone and we ended up doing the opposite. Instead we tried very hard to get these two together, to see if it was even possible.

"And it was, just Johnny was stubborn in a belief that Daniel didn't like him at all and friendship was the best he could hope for and Daniel was flirting as hard as could be and just assumed Johnny was used to it because it's California and we're always hanging around Johnny.

"But I decided, because I was bored and because I needed a distraction myself from losing at the All-Valley and the awfulness that ensued to go old school. By which I mean harassing my local and federal representatives. This was actual something I started doing when I was younger. For different things.

"One of the private schools I went to talked about politics and how their purpose was to listen to the people and make decisions based off of the feedback they got. Like dumbed down version of course. But I decided that it was like one of those anonymous feedback boxes. And so I'd call whenever I was mad about something or had a question. I looked up the office phone number and would call and complain about my school lunches, about why the buttons to cross the street were so high that I couldn't reach them, yeah little little kid me. I asked why there were dog parks but not parks for other pets, I asked how old you had to be to go to space.

"At first I think they thought it was cute, but then at some point I'd hear the hello you've reached the offices of so and so how can I help you? And I'd say my little intro which I'd memorized I'm a young future constituent, which believe me took a long time to stop tripping over and they'd sigh and ask if my parents knew how much these calls cost and I said my parents didn't care. That they approved of my political engagement. Which was true. Though I also don't think they knew.

"Anyway point was. I viewed them as a hot line to air out grievances and I made a change after going home learning that Johnny had a crush on a boy and instead rung them up and said "What's got to happen so that a dude who falls in love with a dude can get married?" and hoo boy was that a long ass conversation.

"I blame Jimmy for that. Jimmy had settled on law as part of his future goals after years of being lost, and he'd hammered in during one of our classes in high school all this law stuff. So I became a pain in the ass to my local political people. I got passed around, transfered, spent hours and hours and hours on the phone arguing and essentially talking up this soap opera style romantic drama unfolding before my eyes.

“And then they hung up on me. So I started writing letters. So many fucking letters,” Dutch said opening the bag. “When they changed things. They sent them all back. I think as a please for the love of god leave us the fuck alone. I like to think I wore them down.”

Dutch fished out a letter, carefully opening it and moving the microphone he was holding.

“Dear political ass hat, ah I was drunk when I wrote this one. I’m currently in Vegas watching couples who’ve known each other for five minutes elope. What the fuck? I mean great for them, but per my last one thousand or so letters, couples that have known and dated and loved one another for eons longer can’t? Please direct me to someone who actually has a logical brain. Or does it all work via money? Are you all just doing what some company or person with enough money pays you to do? In which case please send me to the sluttiest politician I can find. I can lobby too. P.S. If you don’t understand what this means, please ask your poor overworked intern about the gay soap opera I’ve been telling them about for about a decade now. I’m sure someone in your office knows.”

Dutch folded up the letter and stuck it back in the bag.

“I mean I wasn’t the only one a pain in their ass. We’re pretty good at being obnoxious as possible. Daniel knows this better than anyone which is why I’m pretty sure he and Johnny decided not to divide us into sides for their wedding party and just create one where we moved about and helped when and where we were needed. Daniel’s had to contend with us just showing up, sharing his bed like we’re Goldilocks and he’s one of the three bears but the one with the just right bed. Except there’s four of us.

“But Johnny’s important to us, just like we’re important to each other. And while we were shitty to Daniel for about six months I think decades of friendship and lovingly annoying the shit out of him has made up for it. He complains, for sure, but there’s no bite to it. Hell this morning, he was pissed when we came in to wake him up. Surprisingly not the most morning person to anyone other than Johnny. More like a snapping turtle.

“But he’s also there when you need him. Picking me up from the airport, visiting, sending care packages. Like they’re both there when you need them. And I think that’s why so many people struggled to pick a side at the actual wedding. They’ve been together for so fucking long that it’s hard to pick a side unless you’re family or their mom.

And then even I saw Lucille and Laura wanting to sit together and trying to move the seats together. Sorry Bobby we made a mess of your planning. Just be glad they didn't hold it in your actual church, your pews would've been pushed together, because nothing stops the LaRusso or Lawrence mom's.

"There's something comforting and horrifying about being known so well. And they do know each other pretty well. Like when we left Johnny this morning he told us to make sure Daniel drank a lot of water and ate a good breakfast because he knew. Knew that the night before was emotionally filled conversations with loved ones and lots of celebratory drinking.

"And Daniel on the other hand knew Johnny probably hadn't slept too well and worried about him almost as soon as he finished muttering about how much he hated us for waking him up.

"It's that Daniel arguably got stuck looking at his damn boutonnières for like a half hour with his brow furrowed trying to decipher what it meant because he knows Johnny picked out the flowers. It's why the weirdo is sitting there right now unable to keep from touching the centerpiece. Yeah I see you.

"It's big stuff like knowing when the other is off their game and sick but still stubbornly trying to work or buying a house and making a home. It's smaller stuff like, from what I heard from chatting with the librarians at the bar, going on dates to the library and just walking around whispering and recommending books to one another because they remembered something the other had said about learning about xyz or a mild interest in a moment about the other.

"It's going to Newark in winter to spend time with family, or traveling around to visit friends. It's making one another coffee or tea in the morning, or falling asleep together on the couch. All things I've seen when I've gone to visit.

"It's all these things that are small and big acts of love. Which is why while I was annoying my local and my not so local representatives, Jimmy, Tommy and Bobby were also doing what they could. A bit more…arguably importantly. Between law, holding a government office and being a well loved pastor it's been a lot of work to get here. Which I feel like you all know. And I'm sure you're like hurry up, we want to eat something before it gets cold.

"Which I feel you, the LaRussos are learning I can give them a run for their money when it comes to talking," Dutch had grinned and turned towards them picking up his glass. "So here's what I'm going to say specifically to Daniel.

"Thank you. Thank you for being an annoying pain in the ass who refused to ever give up or back down or stay down. Thank you for being stubborn and for caring and having a big heart. Because you forgave all of us for being dicks, and best of all is you helped us heal. You took a second look at Johnny and decided to stay by his side and while he hated himself arguably the most just showered him with love until he learned to forgive himself and love himself again. I know it was like a group effort, and that we can't overlook Mr. Miyagi's efforts and patient care. But I've already told him thanks probably a thousand times and he's told me to stop in that polite way of his by giving me chores. Thank you Daniel, for taking such good care of Johnny's heart, and for being our knight in shining armor."

Daniel had cried. He hadn't meant to. But Dutch knew just what to say to throw him off. But he had Johnny with him, by his side, he had cake to eat and wine to drink and dancing to do. And cheers. Cheers from his grandparents.

"Per Cent'anni!"

Daniel had thanked them, the guys, the gals, everyone before leaving. Maybe getting too much joy out of scooping Johnny off and walking towards their ride to the airport. A promise of, "We'll see you when we get back."

"Okay, the table is starting to dig into my skin. I'm sure I've got weird patterns on my back. I'd like to sleep in our nice fancy bed."

"You don't want to sleep here, under the stars? Listening to that party happening somewhere on the mountains out that way?"

"Oh hell no."

Daniel laughed, moving careful to disentangle himself, to leave without hurting or causing any additional friction that Johnny clearly had stated he didn't want.

"How about a warm bath?"

"That'd be nice but I'm pretty sure there's a good chance I'll fall asleep. And you…what did you do? Drink five espresso's since we landed?" Johnny asked taking his hand again and carefully sliding off the table with a slight grimace.

"I had three. The lady at the front desk seemed to like making them," Daniel said moving to wrap an arm around Johnny, and walk with him towards the bath.

"So you're never sleeping again?"

"I took a short nap."

"Yeah you were out for a good five minutes before you found me again."

"I tell you, if I don't have something to cuddle I can't sleep."

"Yeah and apparently I can't if you're not stuck to me like a freaking octopus," Johnny said as they walked to the bathroom and he slipped off the robe stepping into the tub.

"How did you even sleep with just the guys?" Daniel asked turning on the water.

"I didn't. Which is why you're going to have to make sure I don't drown in the bath. Which… why is the bath so tiny?"

Johnny's knees were practically to his chest, trying to sit in the tiny tub. He looked bewildered and a little confused as the water rose up around him.

"What if I get stuck?" Johnny asked.

"You're not going to get stuck. If you do then I packed plenty of lube and I'll get you out of there."

"Then I'll need another bath. Four is too many."

Daniel laughed softly. "I guess Italian baths weren't made for tall Californian hunks."

"Hunk of what?" Johnny asked as Daniel found a spot to precariously perch, one foot in the water for balance.

"Love?"

"Cheesy."

"Muscle?"

“Obvious.”

Daniel set about washing Johnny’s hair, liking the way his hands looked in Johnny’s hair. Maybe he should’ve taken off his rings, but he didn’t want to. Unless it pulled at Johnny’s hair but it didn’t seem to be a problem. He didn’t want to ever take them off.

Johnny had put those on his finger with so much tearful emotion in his eyes that it nearly made Daniel cry when it’d come to his turn. Just what Bobby had needed two sobbing idiots in love trying to make it official for the government and in front of their friends and family.

All three of them had to take a moment to compose themselves, Bobby carefully clearing his throat and pretending everything was fine as he continued on with the ceremony. The same tearful look that the guys got as they signed the documents, Tommy and Jimmy making them official official.

“Are you crying?” Johnny asked head tilted back to look at him.

“Good tears,” Daniel said as Johnny reached up to brush them away with a wet hand.

Johnny nodded, reaching towards him, a silent ask for a kiss that Daniel answered warmly.

It took a bit of combined effort, but they did manage to get Johnny out of the tub and Daniel took a shower laughing as Johnny complained.

“Why didn’t you tell me there was a shower?”

“Because you looked adorable stuck in the tub.”

“Mean.”

“I’ll give you lots of kisses to make up for it.”

“I’ll add them to your tab.”

“Oh god no. Uh can I trade them for hand jobs?”

“No. I’m adding two thousand.”

“That’s unfair. You got out without too much issue.”

“Fine. Then just one, but a special one.”

“Oh my god you went from 2,000 to 1? How does that work? If we haggle anywhere please let me do the haggling.”

“No, not just one, one special quality kiss.”

“Are you saying my kisses aren’t special or quality?”

Daniel caught the look that Johnny gave him from where he was drying off.

“How dare you. My kisses are all top tier!”

“Says the man who started to fall asleep while watching a movie, leaned over to give me a kiss and kissed my chin before face planting in my lap.”

“I was exhausted! That doesn’t count.”

“That’s why I’m saying not just any old kiss.”

“Not just any old kiss. Be careful or maybe I’ll go on a kissing strike.”

“You wouldn’t dare.”

Daniel frowned, he wouldn’t, he liked teasing Johnny about it, but he was right. No kissing would be just as bad for him. Plus he liked kissing Johnny.

“I wouldn’t. But for teasing me I do want a kiss now.”

Johnny smiled moving carefully to avoid the curtain and to lean into the shower to kiss him.

It was a good kiss. The kind where Daniel wanted to push that towel off of Johnny and pull him into the warmth of the shower and not stop kissing until the warm water ran out. But they had plans and Daniel did in fact want to go on their tours. He’d helped plan and decide everything after all.

He let go and Johnny kissed the top of his head before leaving him to finish his shower on his own. When he finished and crawled into bed, Johnny was reading, and Daniel curled up beside him as he finished the page he was on.

“Good night Amore mio ,” Johnny said.

“What?”

Johnny kissed him. “I asked your grandparents to teach me some words and phrases. It’s right, right?”

My beloved. Daniel felt a blush spread like wildfire.

“Sure you can’t go again?”

“Go to sleep. I still want to attempt hiking Vesuvius tomorrow and I know you do too.”

Daniel wanted to protest but Johnny turned out the light and curled up in bed by his side. He ran his fingers gently across Johnny’s arm, enjoying the warmth and solidness of him in his arms.

Johnny was right, he did want to go. He was the one who’d recommended they hike Mt. Vesuvius. He wanted to eat the tomatoes grown on the mountain, in simple pastas and on Napoli style pizza.

He wanted to eat so much gelato they got sick of it.

He wanted to explore.

He was excited for the future.

He was excited to drop the weight of LaRusso Auto off of his shoulders. He was stunned that Johnny didn’t care and yet unsurprised.

He’d worried about it for so long as he moved the pieces in place so Louie could take over. Because Johnny had supported him the entire time. They’d moved out of their first apartment so Daniel could save and open the auto shop. They’d moved to West Hollywood so he could focus on school and look at spaces to open up the dealership. Wherever Daniel wanted to go, wherever he thought of moving Johnny hadn’t minded. Helped pack up time and again as they moved around LA.

It was one of the big things he hadn’t exactly said when he bought the house, when he’d taken Johnny to look at house after house. A thank you for moving with me so much. A promise they wouldn’t move again for a long time. That they could finally settle and put down roots.

Daniel loved their home. Loved the garden. Loved grilling in the backyard. Loved when he came down in the morning and one of their friends was already there. Johnny had teased him once after they’d met Julie. After Julie had complained that Daniel was the reason Mr. Miyagi didn't knock, that he was also the reason people just showed up. He just pushed his way into places, not knocking.

Usually it was while Johnny was showering because he wanted to brush his teeth and because he wanted to spend more time with Johnny since they didn't see each other much during the day. But it was also at Mr. Miyagi's, at his Ma's, not knocking just opening the front door and waltzing in. And he did it to other people too. To Laura, to the guys in the dorms and in the homes they moved to later.

Johnny teased him when he got annoyed that people just let themselves in, chilling on the couch watching cartoons or late night TV and eating ice cream. Because neither of them actually said stop this. Because Daniel did it and Johnny always had allowed it. Johnny had always loved it when the guys had snuck into the mansion to hang out with him and spend the night. It felt safer. Even if he felt awful. Even if he worried what Sid would do or say. He loved having them there. So he wasn't surprised that it continued.

A revolving door for a front door. And now that they had a house Daniel liked it. He liked waking up and going downstairs to find Louie had let himself in and was having coffee at their kitchen table reading his newspaper because he wanted to talk before work or carpool together. He liked when Dutch had gotten his fill of home, of Mr. And Mrs. P and would find him making omelets or snoring away in the guest room. Though not every night. He still woke up to find Dutch in their bed. But at least they'd gotten a bigger bed. So it wasn't like he'd gone to bed with space and then wake up rolling into a wall.

Tommy spent the night too, let himself in when things got rough in City Hall. When he was stressed Daniel would find him in Johnny's reading nook curled up and fast asleep, one of Johnny's mystery novels open and on his chest. Daniel had a date in his head, where Johnny would be at the lake house with flowers and Chinese take out back when they lived in apartments or with their parents. But as the years passed he'd find Tommy sitting in their garden, or laying on his back watching butterflies and bees buzzing about the flowers and Daniel would go and sit with him, not saying anything but bringing him a glass of lemonade or a soda. It was the one time of year where Daniel didn't huff when someone got in their bed, just rolling over in case Tommy wanted to be in the middle. A soft warning of 'If I crawl over you in my sleep I'm sorry.' But Tommy never seemed to care or mind. Even if he woke up with Daniel laying over him, having searched for Johnny in his sleep, having found him, and just laying partially atop both of them to get to Johnny.

Tommy always laughed when he woke up in the morning like that. And Daniel would make his bananarama pancakes and they'd hang out with the guys who were around or who were free for the day. Sometimes, often as time passed that included Chozen, who'd go with them graveyard. Daniel liked to tease him that he only came because he wanted Daniel's famous bananarama pancakes though he knew Chozen was there to be leaned against, to support if needed on that hike through the graveyard.

Jimmy came frequently, with Jenny with the kids. Johnny's godchildren. And it was like a wall of noise. Daniel would come home and find that they'd dropped the kids off and would see tiny things near the door. Impossibly tiny shoes and Johnny in the backyard doing magic tricks to a delighted audience. Jimmy would lean his head against Daniel's shoulder and complain about sleep, about children's ability to sleep or lack thereof and failed nap times. And he'd grill and Jenny would hand Daniel a bottles of something nice and say something about how they were avoiding home for the moment so they were hiding out at Uncle Johnnys and Uncle Daniel's. And Daniel liked that, never said it, but he loved that he'd been handed that title. That tiny hands reached out for his and called him that, although not as fluidly.

Usually it was that they need a vacation. A date night. But they didn't want to go far so they came to their house. And the kids camped out in the guest bedroom and Daniel would laugh when Jimmy and Jenny pushed them to one side of their bed and curled up in the other.

"We have a perfectly nice guest room, two actually," Daniel had said.

"But it feels like a sleepover, the kind you get to do when you're young," Jenny said. "Plus when Jimmy said this was a tradition, I wanted to keep it."

"We're doing this back to you, you better be prepared," Daniel had said.

"Oh any time. Just beware of legos underfoot and that small children might jump on you in the middle of the night," Jimmy said.

"That's why I like it here," Jenny said. "I'm not going to step on Legos."

"Not that you love us?"

"No. You don't have legos. I've delineated safe spaces by whether or not they have legos."

Jimmy and Jenny always made them breakfast in the morning, were always up before them because the kids were always up before them. Every time Daniel got a breakfast that smiled back at him. Decorated in a fun way that made him smile.

Bobby was over the most. Daniel would find him swimming around in the pool after work, racing Johnny, laughing telling Daniel to jump in and join them. And he would. Because they made it look fun. And it was. It always was.

There was always so many desserts when he came over. From the bakery, from his parents test kitchen, things the Brown's wanted feedback on. And Daniel had a notepad he'd pull out of the kitchen junk drawer and he'd take his notes and call the Browns later and give all his feedback and Johnny's.

Bobby always brought a movie he wanted to watch, something he didn't want to watch alone, usually a horror flick and Daniel would have Johnny curling towards him waiting for Daniel to tell him the scary part was over and Bobby clinging to his other side watching but holding Johnny's hand super tight.

Daniel always made popcorn but it almost never got eaten until the movie was over and he turned on some late night comedy show. He loved how Johnny practically crawled into his lap every time, burying his head against Daniel, not wanting to see, wrapped up in a soft blanket. How every night Johnny followed him around, close, holding his hand because it was dark out and the movie haunted the air a little longer. And Bobby wouldn't leave either, so they'd camp out, chatting in the bathroom while Johnny showered, brushing their teeth and catching up. And there was never a choice, the doors to the guest rooms never opened on those nights as Bobby crawled into bed with them.

Sometimes Mr. Miyagi's truck would be parked outside and he'd find Mr. Miyagi sitting in their garden drinking tea and they'd sit and chat. Sometimes Sato and Yukie came with and they'd make dinner together and play games. Sometimes they'd bring Chozen, or sometimes when Kumiko came she'd bring him. And Daniel would find him looking through the scrapbooks or at the books on the shelves, at little mementos of all the years Daniel and Johnny had spent together. And Kumiko would bring CD's that she liked and play music and they'd dance late into the night, moving furniture aside so there'd be more room or dancing in the garden.

His ma would come by and bring things she saw and thought they might need. Stuff for cleaning their refrigerator coils, furnace filters, batteries for the fire and carbon monoxide detectors, lubricant for their garage door, and shower head cleaner. She brought light bulbs if she saw a sale and was out replacing her own and Daniel would find her sometimes in the kitchen cooking up a storm because she wanted to and they'd have leftovers for weeks.

Laura would come over with clothes she thought Johnny would like, or shirts for Daniel. Things that were in fashion according to the magazines she read. She'd bring tickets to shows and performances. She'd order take out or make pizza rolls and she'd bring a house plant she saw that needed a home. And sometimes she came with Abuela, or Gabriella and the fridge would be overflowing with food and the dinners they'd have would be amazing. And sometimes Abuela and Gabriella were just there, chatting away with Johnny, with cousins and grandchildren playing in the pool or in the garden and someone grilling.

Daniel enjoyed it. He enjoyed coming home to so much warmth. He enjoyed basking in the glow of it.

He loved when Nonnio and Nonnia came to stay with them and he woke up to the house smelling like his childhood and watching the way they interacted with Johnny the way Johnny listened intently to everything they said. And how sometimes when he had a bad day he'd come home and there'd be a hint of that and he'd realized Johnny had learned one of his Nonnia's recipes and had made it for him.

He'd wrap his arms around Johnny's waist and press his face into his back and breathe him in, soil and flowers and good cooking smells. And he'd help, wherever Johnny was along with the recipe, and they'd play music and they'd dance and Daniel loved it all. Their home, their guests, and that feeling of finally having a place that was theirs.

And there was so much he was looking forward to when they got home. Of passing the mantel of LaRusso Auto off to Louie. Seeing his face when Daniel surprised him. He was excited to work for magazine's like some Peter Parker or something only instead of taking pictures of his super hero alter ego, he'd take fashion photos or news photos or food photos for recipes or products and photos of Johnny.

Maybe he'd get really good at taking photos of flowers, and he could use that practice as an excuse to hang around Johnny's flower shop, watching him work, helping people plan out the best way to say what they were struggling to say, to express emotions when words didn't seem to be enough. To find their voice in an unconventional way.

He was excited to go home, to carry Johnny through that door again, to knock his feet out from under him, scoop him up and laugh while Johnny pieced together where exactly he was being taken. Maybe he'd try and throw him off by grabbing a snack on the way to their bedroom.

He was excited to swim in their pool, to have coffee in the mornings, for hundreds and thousands of more dinners cooked together, an intricate dance around one another.

He was excited to get up in the morning and watch Johnny puzzle over their Italian hotel's breakfast. Cakes and tarts and pastry filled breads, fruit and espresso.

He was excited to hike and for their tour of Pompeii. He was excited for Sicily and to see family he'd only ever heard of.

Nonnia warned him he'd probably spend the day making pasta with his cousins and he was excited to see Johnny a giant among his Nonnia's elderly cousins hard at work rolling out handmade pasta before exploring everywhere.

Nonnio recommended by vespa, which his mother sounded horrified by but Daniel had been watching the vehicles dart in and out of traffic, all the drivers of cars, buses, and vespas not seeming to follow any rules.

There probably were some but their taxi driver had pulled out of their lane and jumped forward, ahead, trying to cut in earlier towards the exit they needed.

Johnny had held his hand pretty tightly and Daniel wanted to see how tight he'd hold on if they took to the streets on a vespa.

He was excited for Rome and the Colosseum, Florence, Venice, Tuscany, and ending in Milan. For the family they'd been given addresses of to visit along the way. To catch up with cousins who had written and were excited to meet, distant aunts and uncles who'd heard so much about him and he them.

And the Dutch's apparently had a surprise for them in Milan and Daniel couldn't stop rolling that over in his head, trying to guess.

There was so much to do and yet part of him was worried that if he shut his eyes it wouldn't be there when he opened them again. So many years of bad luck, of brutally awful bad luck and it all felt too good to be true.

He remembered being a kid in his Nonnia's kitchen his dad picking him up so he could see all the photos of Italy better.

"That's where Nonnia and Nonno are from. That's them."

"No way."

"Yes. That was them before they became Nonnia and Nonno, back before I was even born. They're from big families, you know? But they came here with just a little, like that ring Nonnia wears sometimes for special occasions. And some day, when you're older, your Ma and I are going to take you. And you can meet all your cousins and aunts and uncles and great aunts and uncles."

"You mean there's more of them?" Daniel had asked.

"Tons. Some families lose touch with second cousins and third cousins and what not. But LaRussos don't. Nonnia and Nonno know where everyone you're related to on our side of the family is and all the latest gossip. It's a wonder they know anything beyond that. But you'll see. Just you wait."

He had.

And then he'd given up.

And then Johnny hadn't thought of anywhere else but Italy for their honeymoon for who knows how long.

A chance for Daniel to reconnect with his roots, to see all those people that his Nonnio and Nonnia told him he was related to.

He had a long list of names and phone numbers and addresses. An old beaten up address book that they'd give him. With notes and reminders. And a promise that he'd bring back photos and updates on how everyone was doing, that he'd given them all the gifts Nonnio and Nonnia had given him to give.

And that'd all happen soon, as soon as he went to sleep. But he didn't want to go to sleep.

It was a fight, an internal one, between not wanting their first day? More than a day? He'd count it as a day even though he knew it wasn't because of the flight, of marriage, to be over.

He wanted to savor each day, each hour, each minute, quietly reminding himself of the different titles they'd shared.

Strangers

Bully and bullied

Classmates

Rivals

Competitors

Acquaintances

Friends

Best friends

Boyfriends

Lovers

Partners

Fiancées

Grooms

Husbands

He liked that title, he liked sharing that with Johnny.

He wanted to just spend a few more hours looking back at the long journey they'd been on together.

Ever since he stepped foot in California Johnny had been in his life. A sturdy hand to hold, a warm embrace when he needed it, someone who listened and cared, who knew him. Sure they still misunderstood each other, they still fell off balance and had to get back up and communicate to find that balance again, but they always did. Because what they had was so important to one another. It was worth fighting for and protecting, encouraging it to grow and thrive.

Daniel spent a long time trying to balance, to figure out how to balance. And it wasn't easy. But having Johnny with him helped. It made it easier. But what he hadn't realized, in his long search for balance, was that what he had was harmony.

Chapter End Notes

> Tomorrow will be the final chapter and an authors note. So there will be two chapters but only one as an actual chapter if that makes sense. 🖤
>
> Also San Franscisco was one of the first places to allow same sex couples to have hospital visitation rights and that was in 1989, however I couldn't see them leaving LA. In the USA it didn't happen until 2015, which felt...later than I want, so it's more of a consistent pestering by their loved ones with a lot of money and time on their hands, moved it up alternative history. Because reality had it much later and took a lot longer and more hard work to get it to pass in the USA and California in general went back and forth on it a lot. You can read more about it and the time line for it in the USA here. So in this fiction, they're happily married and no government take backs because they would like the ex-cobras to stop calling them.

Root Beer Floats in the Garden

Laura had thrown countless parties, had been to so many parties that she'd lost count.

At one point the only benefit of parties was different food than what the staff made her. Things that weren't just healthy fad diet foods or good for her complexion. Things that weren't just what they thought was trendy for her to eat. And of course booze, and an excuse to go shopping for some nice dress or outfit.

But what she had wanted was the parties she was having now.

Yearly Halloween parties at her home, dinner parties with Lucille or at her sons.

Their sons?

They got to share now right?

She now had two sons.

She liked that. She felt like she unofficially had a lot of kids. Adopting ex-cobras who really adopted her first and their friends. She liked having been the house to stay at for a long time, with Jessica spending the night and catching her up on all the gossip in Ohio. Like what had happened to her ex boyfriend and whatever drama that always seemed to follow Elizabeth Anne Rooney. She liked that Jessica tried to talk her into going rock climbing with her and Laura agreed, but only the indoor ones. The ones with staff waiting below and colorful hand holds. It was nice to put chalk on her hands and give it a try.

And she kept doing it. There was something satisfying about picking out a new path and trying to figure out where to go and how to get there. Relying on herself to puzzle it out and to get to the top.

She liked when Kumiko came over and they went and got their nails done and she talked about Tokyo or wherever in the world she'd gone to. And she liked going shopping with her and Ali, watching local performances and hearing Kumiko's take on the dancers.

She liked her dinner parties with Lucille, or when they'd go out to the Country Club parties together, getting dressed up and going to a salon to have their hair done. She hadn't ever hated the country club, but she'd gotten bored with it, and now, now it was fun again with Lucille chatting away about life, her family, her work and about their sons.

But some of her favorite parties were at Mr. Miyagi's.

Her favorite of all favorites were surprise parties. And this one was going to be a doozy.

Daniel had called from Italy, asking her to get everyone together. He had big news. Not the normal type of big news a couple from a honeymoon came back with, which she was prepared to tease them about. But he was going to give Louie Jr. the business.

Jimmy was the only other person who knew and he'd helped draft up the documents.

On the other hand, she was using it as a chance to re-celebrate the marriage. A welcome home party. Which was the excuse she'd given to wrangle everyone together.

A surprise for the boys, her boys, and a surprise for Louie Jr. and the rest of the LaRusso's. The one's still in town anyway.

She was also going to finally have the talk she'd wanted to. There were things she wanted to say to Daniel.

Things she hadn't said because every time she tried it wasn't the right time.

She'd left Johnny tucked into bed surrounded by his ex-cobras, laying a satisfying lipsticked kiss on each of their foreheads.

But Daniel was crying and having a heart to heart with Lucille, and his grandparents.

And then later he was drinking and crying with Sato and Mr. Miyagi.

And then Dutch made a big speech and he teared up and he'd cried at the actual ceremony.

Laura was worried that if she so much as said 'Congratulations!' he'd burst into tears again and he'd be too dehydrate to make it to Italy.

To be fair, Johnny was crying a lot too, but she got to have her heart to heart with him earlier.

She got to have dinner with him, just the two of them in a big fancy bar and restaurant overlooking LA.

She got to tell him how much she loved the flower shop and how proud she was of him. She'd loved sitting with him going over the designs for the shop, the flowers he wanted to offer, the bouquet. The signs Chozen had painted for him. She remembered going in and seeing Chozen painting on the ceiling flowers and carefully writing what they meant next to them in a pretty scrawl. She'd asked Johnny if he'd requested it. But he'd said, "Chozen asked if I wanted some art and I said I'd like that and to just do what he wanted. And he did this."

It'd been stunning, and she remembered sitting on the counter having brought coffee for herself and Chozen, watching him work. Watching him make signage for the shop. Things Johnny had thought about like "Don't know what to get? Start with a mood." And like a mood ring had set up flowers and their meanings.

He'd gotten copies of the floriography books and magazines and set them out for customers to look at. Recommendations of what to get someone based on their favorite flowers. And she remembered going with him to pick out plants to fill the shop with. Bonsai of course from next door. But also things he planted and took careful care of in the window boxes and around the entrance. Things he'd worked with Mr. Miyagi on.

They grew trees along the edge of the shops, jacaranda and lilac, a magnolia tree that when they bloomed were stunning. And the bonsai were beautiful. And she loved the orchids and the moneyplants and the bamboo, cacti and succulents that had found homes around the florist shop.

Their shops were connected. With a little back door in case either needed help. Mostly because Johnny felt bad for leaving. But Yukie was usually around to help and she liked going in and making bouquets with Johnny and popping over to the bonsai shop and chatting with Yukie or Mr. Miyagi. She loved that they had signs they put up in their windows and on the front desk:

"At bonsai shop next door, ring for assistance."

Or

"At flower shop, come over for bonsai."

She liked the shelf behind Johnny's work station was for bonsai pick up and she liked that Mr. Miyagi proudly displayed bouquets he requested from Johnny in his shop and that he and Yukie took them home every night so that Sato could also enjoy them at home.

She was so damn proud and she loved the shop. She loved hanging out with him there and talking about flowers, helping him if he needed it, answering the phone when he was focused.

She told him how much she loved him and was proud of how far he'd come, teasing him about how small he'd once been, asleep in the back of their car, trusting her so completely to keep him safe and that it'd all be okay.

She'd brushed tears from her eyes.

"I'm so sorry that it wasn't. That for years we lived in that mansion and I didn't know that it wasn't okay. That I didn't know it wasn't okay at Cobra Kai. But I'm so glad that despite that you made it here. You are amazing Johnny. I'm so proud of you. Of everything you've accomplished. And I'm happy for you. That you get to do it this. That you found someone who loves you so fiercely that you love just as much. Someone whose got your back."

It wasn't something she'd ever had. Sid hadn't…loved her like that and it took a long time to realize it. To start chipping away at the fairy tale of it all to see just how rotten it was. And by then it almost felt too late. Going through the motions for so long, that she'd almost lost herself, almost lost Johnny.

They'd talked a lot that night.

It had been good. And it put her right on time to see Louie and the girls return from their festivities. Louie was covered in glitter. The girls had wished him a good night and he'd looked a little lost. So she'd sat with him, giving him a glass of water. Checking to make sure he was okay.

He was fine.

It'd just taken a while to get the story. A secret he hadn't been sure about sharing because he hadn't understood. But she had later when she'd found Yukie bringing Chozen water and aspirin. Apparently when Kumiko taught dance, Chozen was her practice partner. Which meant he danced. He'd learned a lot of choreography. And a very drunken Chozen apparently was quite the performer.

She wanted to make a bet with Lucille, or maybe Yukie.

Who would realize it first?

Of the group, her money was on Tommy. Tommy who was sweet and thoughtful and still figuring himself out. The quiet third boy who'd also been in love with Ali and had never made a move. Maybe he'd get the courage to do so this time.

She watched as Tommy walked over to Chozen sitting down next to him and handing him an iced tea. He'd been practicing his Japanese, learning bits of Okinawan.

But Dutch might figure it out first. Joining the two laughing and stealing some of Chozen's drink.

Maybe.

She was pretty sure the last to figure out his surprising popularity would be Chozen himself.

Though Daniel would never believe it, he'd never notice how Chozen had relaxed around the ex-cobras, had made a home for himself in the Valley. How while his gaze still lingered on Johnny, while every move was still filled with love and affection, he wasn't as devastated as she'd expected.

Though he supposed it was hard to be devastated when your friends, when Ali and Kumiko and Jessica were buying or bringing you shots every time you turned around. When your secret crush wasn't so secret and the people around you cared enough to check in and keep company.

It was why part of the delight of the party after the wedding was the dancing. Not just getting to dance with Johnny, or Daniel, or watching the two of them dance together. But to see how fun everyone had. To watch the girls dance, friends and strangers, the guys. Mr. Miyagi dancing with Yukie and Sato.

Chozen not getting to rest. Kumiko danced with him first, then Yukie, then Jessica was laughing and they whirled in a blur across the floor, and Ali. Then because the guys were the guys there was no chance for Chozen to stop and feel or wait or even notice the way Johnny and Daniel were looking at one another as they danced through one song to the next.

Because Dutch was dancing with him, and passing him off to Bobby, and Jimmy paused in dancing with his wife to go for a spin and Tommy and then LaRusso's found him.

She'd passed Chozen at breakfast the following morning, exhausted and hungover pushing eggs around his plate. So she sat with him for a bit giving him some toast and offering him some aspirin from her purse. Not talking just sitting and hoping Daniel and Johnny had had a good flight. That they enjoyed Naples, remembering when she'd gone to Italy with Sid and how this trip would be a million times better. Because it'd be filled with love. Though, she did enjoy all the fancy clothes she'd bought in Italy, and the coffee. And Chozen seemed fine, especially when friends filled their table chatting about the flowers and the food and the cake.

"Can't believe our boys are finally married," Lucille said picking up a glass of champagne that Laura had set out.

"It was perfect, something Johnny always dreamed of."

"Really?" Lucille asked turning towards her.

"That florists I talk about from time to time. You remember them?"

"Yeah the elderly couple who passed away."

"Well I used to take Johnny with me. The start of his life was mostly spent at the flower shop and there were two big events. Valentine's Day and wedding season. They were the flower shop to go to for weddings. It was really their specialty. And throughout the year couples would come in and talk about their engagement and what they wanted and those two, they just loved it, and they loved Johnny.

"They'd scoop him up so he could be part of the conversation. And at first he just sort of watched you know? A little baby with big blue eyes and the chubbiest of cheeks and that blonde hair. And the owners, they'd tell me he was their secret weapon. Couples got frustrated and argued during the whole process, because it was stressful. But they wouldn't fight or bicker if a baby was present. And every sale Johnny was a part of went smoothly. They said he was their lucky charm. But it meant as he grew up he was surrounded by weddings.

"He studied all the bouquets, all the flowers, sat with the couples listening to them talk about their wedding plans. Sometimes the couples would ask his opinion and he gave such wonderful responses. Recommending flowers that went well with the theme for their wedding, because he'd go through all the wedding designs with them. It was so charming. He was kind of obsessed.

"And when they passed, he still stopped, not just to look at flowers but to look at bridal magazines at the dentists or the doctors office, flipping through books with me. He loved weddings. And he was so excited when he got to be a part of all the decision making for mine. I told Sid that it was a must. No negotiable. Johnny was my best man."
"Seriously?"

"Smallest best man on the planet. But the most hard working. It was an honorary title, I just wanted him to stand nearby, for him to feel a part of it. To get to help me eat cake and try on fancy clothes. But he held the rings, and woke me up and he kept me moving throughout the day with his little kid's watch.

"It was a beautiful wedding. Intense, fairy tale, gaudy. But it was fun. I just wish the rest of it had been the same way. I used to tease him you know, when he got older about marrying. About Ali. I hadn't realized that Ali would dump him. That we'd start planning just for it to fail, that Sid had made him plan the entire thing, to budget it out. He told me it was how he'd planned to get rid of Johnny. The price tag was the wedding. I nearly slapped him, but my lawyer had a good hold on my arm.

"I'm glad they didn't get married, but I didn't realize how deeply that scarred until I started to tease him about Daniel and he pushed back."

Laura sighed lifting her glass of champagne and taking a sip.

"So I'm glad, so very very grateful that he finally got a good one. That that final piece that's been wounded and sticking since his godparents died finally got to heal over. That he got a second shot at it, but as a first. That-" She reached out and took Lucille's hand. "It was with Daniel, who when I teased him about it already had a cake picked out."

Lucille laughed. "Of course he did. Was it the cake they had?"

"Oh yes it was. I remembered that. And it was just as delicious as Daniel had made it sound."

"How are you holding up?" Lucille asked.

“What do you mean?”

“Well I just keep thinking of Daniel’s dad you know? How this was something he so badly would’ve wanted to be a part of. And I think of Daniel, surly the entire way here and I’m trying to pinpoint when this became home for him. When he put down roots and went from being that gangly teenager to a man. Which reminds me of when he was a baby and how small he was and those big baby browns and how he always babbled. And now that baby isn’t a baby anymore, and he hasn’t been for a long time. He hasn’t been a surly teenager for a long time either. And now he’s a successful business man and a husband.”

Lucille sniffed rubbing at her tear filled eyes.

“I didn’t screw it up. I was so scared I’d screw it up. When it was no longer us and just me raising him. I thought for sure…but you saw them, how happy they are. Like who else gets their wedding officiant to cry with them on their wedding day?” Lucille asked with a watery laugh. “Mine didn’t.”

“Mine didn’t either,” Laura said hugging Lucille. “And I’m pretty proud of them too. Of Johnny. I wish we’d gotten to have more of what you and Daniel have. But I feel like I got a second shot of that when they lived with me for a bit. And I’m really just so relieved that despite my massive screw ups he’s a kind loving man.”

“He is, he’s grown so much since I first met him.”

“What an awful first impression.”

It was. It had been awful. Possibly the worst first impression Daniel and Johnny could’ve had. But they’d come so far together. And she was looking forward to sitting on Mr. Miyagi’s deck and hearing about how Italy went. About how all of Johnny’s plans had gone.

It’d been lonely and not lonely all at the same time.

Johnny seemed to worry about her whenever he went on a trip. Or maybe the people in his life worried about her then. Because Abuela always came to visit more, Lucille always came to make dinner, the ex-cobra’s and their parents, Yukie and Mr. Miyagi and Sato.

Whenever Johnny was out of town even if she freed up her calendar her surprise guests quadrupled. And this time, because the wedding had been recently, it was even worse.

Moshe and Tristen came by with Lucille and they spent the night, playing board games and drinking wine and it'd been wonderful.

Nonnio and Nonnia asked if she was willing to go with them to do some sightseeing and she found herself eating ice cream on the pier, feeling like she was out with parents of her own, the way they fussed over her.

As soon as Daniel and Johnny disappeared from sight Kumiko and Jessica had turned on her and starting asking her if she wanted to go rock climbing or hiking or to see a performance with them in the morning.

The guys found her later with their own activities. And before she knew it Johnny and Daniel were due back and she'd barely had a moment to sit down and breathe.

She didn't know if Johnny asked them to keep an eye on her, or if they did it themselves. But all that time that she spent fretting about how quiet being single would be, how lonely, it felt so silly.

Sid had been a presence. Someone that couldn't be ignored, even if he was somewhere else in the mansion.

She always knew he was home because the whole place changed. She could hear him, stomping around, could hear the way the staff's footsteps change to become lighter. And now it was so peaceful.

There was laughter in her home.

There was silence, peaceful healing quiet.

There was friendship and family. Things that never seemed to take root in the mansion no matter how hard she worked at it. No matter how kind she was to the staff it never seemed to grow. No matter how hard she worked to establish relationships with the people Sid introduced her to it was just all fake.

They just wanted to be there because of the mansion, because of the money and Sid's power. They didn't care about her, or want to know her. They just wanted to know enough. Enough to use her to get what they wanted, either in a friendly way or an unfriendly one.

And she never realized how much of a weight that put on her until it was gone. Until she was free. Until the unannounced sound of her doorbell ringing only to find a friend on the doorstep was such a delightful unexpected joy. That she no longer cared if she looked picture perfect every time she answered the door. That she no longer had to be someone she wasn't, she could just be her, and the people who came to see her didn't want anything more than that.

There was also so much joy in being able to return that surprise.

She could swing past a law office in downtown and bother Jimmy and Jenny, take them out for lunch and they'd be delighted to go. She could swing by and play with their kids and coo over tiny feet and tiny fingernails and buy them adorable little outfits that she never got to do for Johnny because she hadn't had the money to buy the things she wanted for him.

She could stop by the mayors office and Tommy's assistant would run to go get him, excited to tell him that she was there because they'd always bring the assistant back something from wherever they went for lunch. She insisted on getting the best thing too. And Tommy would laugh and ask why she was trying to bribe his assistant. And she'd laugh and say it was because it meant she always was top priority when she came in. That his assistant always let her skip the line if she wanted, or made her calls priority. But it was also because she remembered being overworked and exhausted and how easily a job like that could tip into resentment. And she never wanted that to happen to Tommy.

Sid went through so many assistants and one after the other they hated him for it afterwards. And it was stressful. Though Sid always laughed about it. Which should've been a red flag.

Looking back, there were so many.

She could go sit in a church and watch Bobby talk to people, helping when he could, she could roll up her sleeves and catch up with him while going through donated items and food and passing it out.

She could find Dutch wherever he might be for a snack or drink and catch up for hours and hours.

She could go to a taco shop and listen to a family ask their matriarch why she was still working only for her to ignore them and put more food on their plates and pile hers high.

She could go visit Lucille, she could bother her at work or just hang out for a movie and dinner and some wine.

She could go to the Browns to try their newest concoction if her sweet tooth was acting up, or to Jimmy's parents home for a fancy party if she missed dressing up, or she could introduce the Dutch's to something mundane and watch them delight and puzzle over it, or she could hang out with Tommy's aunt and uncle.

If she got stir crazy she could go anywhere she wanted.

Though she kept going to Tokyo to catch Kumiko's shows, or wherever in the world she was performing.

Sometimes she told Kumiko, sometimes she didn't, just enjoying being a person in a crowd.

Often Yukie went with her, excited to surprise her niece.

Sometimes she'd mention she was going and she'd suddenly be in a group. They never missed an opportunity and it was fun to watch them all. To see Sato and Mr. Miyagi and Yukie laugh and the four of them try to find their way around whatever city Kumiko was performing.

"Good excuse," Sato told her one time after they took pictures together in front of the Eiffel tower after seeing Kumiko perform in Paris.

"What is?"

"Seeing Kumiko-san perform. When little, we make promise, see world together. But then my family pick Yukie-san for bride. And instead of talk, Nariyoshi-san make big stand. I was so hurt. So mad. But then Nariyoshi-san just leave, without either of us. No Yukie-san…no me. And get even more hurt. Now know never too late. Still make dream true. Still see world, together. Just long long time after we thought we'd do so. Thank you Laura-san."

She hadn't understood why he'd thanked her. But it made sense then every time she mentioned that Kumiko was performing somewhere new, that she was thinking of going they quickly offered to go with her.

They traveled on their own, a few times a year, but Kumiko was a good extra excuse.

And they sometimes took Chozen with them and it was fun to watch them dote and tease him. The sibling like way Kumiko reacted whenever she saw him.

And she liked surprising Dutch in Korea. She liked the look of shock on his face when she watched him compete and she brought him flowers after or when she'd visited him in university and she always stopped by to ask, "When did you last eat?"

She walked to Mr. Miyagi's kitchen opening the fridge and pulling out a couple of glass bottles of root beer. The glass bottles were harder to find now, but Jimmy always knew where to get them if she ever wanted them.

She set them on the counter and opened the freezer as she heard the doors slide open and footsteps echo through the hall.

Mr. Miyagi had gone to pick them up and she could hear Daniel, excitedly chatting away about Italy.

And then there was Johnny picking up a glass bottle of root beer, twisting off the top and flicking it into the trash with a nice clink, just the way she'd taught him as a kid.

No longer a kid, a man. A married man with a business he owned and a warm loving home.

He tapped the glass in a cheers to her champagne glass, before pouring it on top of the ice cream she'd scooped into a glass.

She set down the container and pulled him into a hug.

"Welcome home Johnny."

"Thanks Mom."

"Ready to tell me about Italy?"

Johnny smiled, shifting the bag on his shoulder and pulling out a gift bag and setting it across from her.

"I got you venetian glass, a bracelet made of that same glass with volcanic rock from Mt. Vesuvius, some lucky peppers, or at least I was told they were lucky, some scarves, and some sunglasses from Milan."

"This is too much," she said looking at the colorful array of things that slid out of the bag.

"We maybe had a little too much fun shopping. We sent back a couple boxes worth of stuff."

"Daniel was fine with that?"

There was a time where Daniel had been very adamant against Johnny spending any money towards him. She understood. She'd been similar when she first got married to Sid. When they first dated. And she worried the honeymoon might seem too extravagant.

"Well we hit a bump when we went to Sicily. His family wouldn't stop giving us stuff. They packed up homemade pasta for us and things to bring back for the rest of the family. And so we ran out of space really fast.

"So we gave in and just started shipping stuff home that wasn't breakable or would go bad quickly. I had to call Jimmy to get the pasta home safely. We ended up shipping it with his families company. That and the wine. Customs for family made alcohol is weird. But Nonnio and Nonnia are going to be delighted when they get home and get it."

"Did you get anything for yourselves?" Laura asked with a soft laugh.

"We did. Though I think the majority of our souvenirs are photos Daniel took. We dropped maybe ten canisters of film off to be developed on the way here. And then Daniel has a few that he wants to do himself."

"Dirty ones?"

Johnny's blush answered her question.

She burst out laughing.

"He took some pretty photos of the landscape and family that he wants to make into big prints."

"I'm sure everything he took is very artistic."

"Mom!"

"Well I look forward to seeing all the non-nude portraits you both took when they end up in those nice scrapbooks he makes."

Daniel had finished his rounds and popped up, kissing Johnny's cheek before coming in for a hug.

“Before you make your announcement I’d like to have a chat,” Laura said.

She felt him stiffen, and watched Johnny look at her curiously. But she smiled and he nodded, walking off with his root beer float to chat with the others.

He’d tell her all about their trip, the way he once told her all about his karate tournaments later. Just this time he’d leave parts out. Parts she’d notice he’d skip past and she’d tease him about it.

“It’s not bad,” Laura said ruffling Daniel’s hair. “I just couldn’t find a good time to chat with you during the wedding, and before you possibly freak your mom out again for changing career choices, I wanted to talk.”

He relaxed a little stepping back, he’d tanned during his trip, and Johnny had not.

Johnny’s hair was a little brighter, a little more blonde but it was fascinating to see the difference. Kumiko had once said that Daniel had made sure Johnny was wearing sunblock in the car and wouldn’t leave him alone, the first time they went to Okinawa. Making sure his pale easily burnt skin didn’t turn painfully lobster red.

She picked up a root beer, took the cap and flicked it into the trash pouring it over the ice cream and passing it to Daniel.

“You got a lot of speeches at your wedding, so there wasn’t really a good time for me to chat with you. I talked to Johnny. We had several little conversations, and I’m pretty sure Lucille got to talk to him too. I know sometimes you get a little…overwhelmed and intimidated. And maybe I like teasing you. But I’m also happy.”

She reached out and took his hand gently in hers.

“You are chatty and stubborn and strong willed. You spiral and get overwhelmed and panic. Your human. You’re still figuring out life. But you make Johnny so happy. I’m forever haunted from that day he came home from that All-Valley tournament, the way he hung his head down and the bruise around his neck and the way his voice sounded when he spoke. That shattered my heart.

“Learning that Sid was a piece of shit specifically to Johnny? That Kreese had tried to kill him? I was so worried that he’d never recover. That he’d spend his life slipping into a deep dark abyss of self hatred and never move forward. But he did. Slowly. He took his time and you never rushed him. You both took your time. Even if it was on accident. Like two turtles stuck in their shells slowly realizing it was safe to come out, but taking years to do so. Decades to wander around.

“Like I thought Johnny might never come out of his shell again. I thought that kid that trusted me so much, that understood so much and just rolled with every punch was gone. That I’d not see that smile again, or that it’d never be as bright. I worried that I fucked up. I mean I did.

“I was drowning when I married Sid and I didn’t want Johnny to drown too. I thought he’d have a better chance. That Sid would give him a chance for better things. A brighter future beyond anything I could ever have offered on my own. We were barely keeping afloat. And I didn’t have anyone to turn to. I didn’t have anyone to help or rely on. My parents were gone, I was an only child, Johnny’s father was out of the picture and the last people I’d had who did care had passed away suddenly. It was one bad thing after another.

“But I wouldn’t have realized it if not for you. I wouldn’t have realized that Johnny and his friends and you had made me a path out. You’d found a secret passageway with an escape hatch. I could safely leave Johnny with Mr. Miyagi and cut the cords to that golden parachute that was trying to strangle us.

“I could be brave because you all were so brave. Because Johnny was so impossibly brave. Braver than any kid or teen needed to be. And I’m sorry for everything you went through, that you both went through. But I’m also so thankful. Thankful that you helped him back up again and again. That you, I presume, make sure he puts on sunblock because you are wonderfully tan and he’s not sunburned at all, which for a vacation as packed as I’m sure yours was is a feat.

“I’m thankful that whether you meant to or not you brought me people. You and your mom invited me over and I know you were nervous but we’ve been close friends ever since. And you had Mr. Miyagi over and he suffers my drop-ins. You expanded my small circle. A circle that had been superficial for years. With acquaintances and mostly unreliable people. And now I have guests over, people to visit who I’m excited to visit who are excited to see me. Some of that was Johnny, but some of it was you. Together the two of you—”

She moved wrapping an arm around his shoulder and turning him towards the garden.

“Took a whole bunch of lonely people and brought them all together. People who might’ve drifted apart are now so tightly knit together that there’s no fear of that. You didn’t let anyone escape.”

She squeezed Daniel’s shoulder fondly.

“So I want you to know I’m thankful. Thankful when you come over with Johnny and you bring something to distract us. Magazines, puzzles, some random sparkly toy, newspaper article, one of those gorgeous scrapbooks of yours, or a movie, like we’re the easiest distracted people on the planet, and before I know it you’ve cooked a feast.

“I fall for it every damn time even though I know it’s happening. Did you know your mom does that too? She comes over with a bottle of wine and everything she needs to cook and she pours me a glass and I sit at the counter with her and we talk and before I know it she’s cooking and any time I offer to help her cook she bemoans how she doesn’t have you to cook for so just sit and let her cook for someone.

“You both, and your grandparents who don’t give me any peace either, they also came over and cooked for me and your Nonnia swatted at me with a spoon when I offered to help,” Laura said with a soft laugh.

“You all, cook with love. And before all of you. Before Abuela, I didn’t have that. Johnny didn’t have that. For a long time, an uncomfortably long time, food was something I worried about. How would he eat? Was what I could afford to give him, would it be nutritious enough or would it stunt his growth? And every time you all feed him, you and the guys and Mr. Miyagi—”

She sniffed carefully brushing tears away.

“It nearly always makes me cry. And then you all feed me? Like yeah we had enough food when we lived with Sid, but it’s not the same. Not even close. Your food is made with so much love. So I’m grateful, grateful to you for keeping him going, not letting him stay stuck in his shell and patiently helping him out, for feeding him and me.

“I know through all of this you’ve missed your dad. But he’d be so damn proud. And I know this because I’m so damn proud of you. And I feel lucky that I get the honor of calling you one of my sons, that I am a part of your family.”

“Laura,” Daniel said softly, turning and hugging her tightly.

That brave boy who she’d first met brought secretly by the staff in her office. Looking confused and bewildered and a little pissed but so stubbornly determined to see Johnny, to find him and give him his homework and tell him to come back to school.

He’d grown so much.

“I’m happy too. Incredibly lucky. And I’ll keep tricking you and Johnny into healthy home cooked meals whenever I can. Thank you for being there when Ma wasn’t. Thanks for taking me out to countless brunches. Your a good Mom. And I’m glad Ma and I aren’t alone in LA anymore. That she came back and we both get to keep the Lawrence’s in our family. You do realize you’re stuck with us right? We don’t let go?”

“Yeah,” Laura said hugging him back. “I know, I’ve got that yearly open invite to visit. I’ve got my handmade sweater and I get my care package every year of New Jersey foods. Plus Tristen and Moshe are always adamant that I stay with them, since you and Johnny are apparently too cool to stay with your godfathers anymore.”

Daniel laughed. “It’s not that we’re too cool. It’s just all my baby cousins follow Johnny around like little ducklings and I think they secretly like him better. So I find myself kicked out of bed every night in favor of story time. We tried it once and then started staying at a hotel, then we got guilted into trying it again, and it was like ten time worse, so never ever again. You can do story time.”

Laura laughed. “It sounds like fun and I’m looking forward to trying it. And welcome home Daniel. I hope you had a good trip and lots of fun and got to connect with your roots.”

Daniel stepped back and picked up his root beer float again having a sip. “It was great.”

“Go on, go drive Lucille up a wall with your news.”

Daniel sighed. “You think it’s going to be rough?”

“I think she just wants you to be happy and it’s going to take her a moment to realize that the dealership isn’t that place. But I get it and Johnny gets it.”

“Then I expect back up.”

Laura laughed. “You’ve got it. Plus you’re going to make Louie’s year.”

“Yeah, he’s surprisingly really good at it. And he seems to like the dealership so I hope he does like this,” Daniel said putting his shoulders back, steeling himself for his announcement then turning and leaning in to kiss Laura on the cheek.

She watched as he headed out into Mr. Miyagi’s garden. The way Johnny turned towards him and smiled. A smile that was big and bright that she thought had once been lost forever.

She watched him lean into a soft kiss, the way Daniel’s arm wrapped around his waist, the way Johnny’s wrapped around his shoulder as they turned towards their friends and family. The way Daniel leaned against him, the way Johnny supported him, the way that had changed but always been the same, leaning and supporting for so long that it was automatic.

For a long time in her life it felt like doors were closed to her and Johnny. That the only way in, the only way to get opportunities was through Sid and his connections and even then they weren’t great.

But Daniel and Mr. Miyagi had opened the gate to the garden and left it unlocked for them. No matter when, no matter what, always welcomed and it would always be there. For them, for others, and no matter what the future held, no matter what changed Laura knew she and Johnny were going to be okay. And that they finally had somewhere to truly call home.

Authors Note

This is my first time trying to publish a picture so we'll see if it works. But here's a completion sticker I made in Canva with my...uh...attempt at I don't even know what you'd call this...sticker making skills?

[image]
[Image Description: Teal background with a white circle in the center that reads "I read: Root Beer Floats and Green Tea A fic longer than "War and Peace". In the upper right is a yellow golden star that reads in neon "Your sticker from Bobby" in the lower left is a bonsai and in the lower right is a root beer float with two straws, one red, one yellow and a cup of green tea next to it]

So I hope that worked. But you did. You read something longer than war and peace. This fic ended up being (not including this authors note or the cut parts or rewrites) 782,765 words.
You read something that is longer than the English translation of "Les Misérables" which is 545,925 words.
That's longer than "The Lord of the Rings" which is 558,003 words.
That's longer than War and Peace, the English translation coming out to 600,000 words.
That is longer than Tales of Genji, the English translation is 750,000 words.

And some of you read it more than once! And I just wanted to take a moment to tell you that that's amazing. Reading long works is not easy feat and I'm honored you stuck with me through this long burn slow fan fic to does so. And also major kudos, you like read a small mountains worth of words.

I started this fic on June 23, 2021 after watching Cobra Kai because I decided for once to hit that play something random shuffle button on Netflix and ended up binging the show, getting mad at the "Pride and Prejudice"-ness of it all, re-watching the films that I hadn't seen in forever and deciding I needed to write something. Never would I have expected it to be this long. I wanted to challenge myself with it which was to 1. Write a slow slow burn 2. I wanted Johnny and Daniel to create a friendship, heal and show growth before they got together 3. I wanted to publish every single day for as long as I could. And I kind of accomplished that minus so life lemons pelting me in the face.

I want to say thank you for reading. For all the kudos and the comments. There was something fun at the start about posting every day and hearing what resonated, what parts you enjoyed, foods you liked, recipes, how you were fitting the daily updates into your routines, enjoying the research or telling me that you remembered things I included. Honestly there's so many wonderful things that came from this fic that I'm so honored by. Fanart, comments, the related work by usa123 but also how, for a time this fic made me feel not quite so alone and how that seemed to resonate with so many of you.

So thank you for going on this journey with me, this long long long journey and I hope you enjoyed it. Because I enjoyed writing it and I appreciate you being here with me. 💝

Works inspired by this one

Warm Places, Safe Spaces by usa123

Please drop by the Archive and comment to let the creator know if you enjoyed their work!